No record remains to us, nor does it appear that the Christian world has ever possessed any record, of the actual personal appearance of the Saviour. But the intense interest which Christians have always felt in any pretended likeness or confessedly ideal portrait has caused many false representations to be brought forward, especially during the earlier Middle Ages. The Veronica and Abgarus miraculous portraits on cloth, and the famous description of Christ's person asserted to have been sent to the Senate by an imaginary Roman Governor of Judea and predecessor of Pontius Pilate, belong to the class of mediæval impostures. The portraits in the catacombs of Rome and those of Byzantine antiquity pretend to none but a symbolic character; and the majority of them are symbolic in form as well, and represent some characteristic of his nature as frankly as do the Lamb of God and Good Shepherd types, so common then and so familiar even now. The profile head in intaglio, said to be upon an emerald and to have been made by order of the Emperor Tiberius, has, so far as we know, no legendary miracle connected with it, nor any fabled power of working miracles; and its claims to be considered a real portrait from life seem to rest upon the insufficient foundation that nobody knows anything about it or has any theory in regard to it. There is no alleged ancient piece of sacred art so completely ignored by most authentic writers on Christian iconography, and so uniformly declared an imposture by the few who mention it.

Mr. Sartain has engraved in mezzotint what purports to be a copy of this, at three removes. It is of about half life-size. This is not the first copy of the same head that has been made in this country. There is at least one other, but on a smaller scale, which adorns a cheap edition of the Prayer-book of the American Episcopal Church; and of this we own a copy which is worth keeping on account of its offensive weakness—valuable as being the worst so-called portrait of Christ within our knowledge.

Mr. Sartain's engraving is a little better than that smaller one, but not much better. These opaque, black mezzotints are very disagreeable and in every sense inartistic, and this is a bad specimen of the class. The face is very feeble and valueless in its conception, whatever its origin, and whether it is faithfully copied from something else or not. A circular accompanies the engraving which makes a slight attempt to prove the actuality and authenticity of the original portrait, quoting the long-ago exploded letter of Lentulus, mentioned above, and some surmises of later writers.

MISS HOSMER'S DESIGN FOR THE FREEDMEN'S MONUMENT TO LINCOLN.

IT appears from a circular before us that Miss Harriet G. Hosmer, the sculptor, heard while in Europe of the proposition to erect a monument to Abraham Lincoln at the cost of the freedmen. It appears that it was "in the mountains of Switzerland—free Switzerland—that this lover of freedom conceived and designed a monument." A model in plaster illustrating the design in question has been for some time past on exhibition in Boston, and some persons who are familiar with monumental architecture and can judge of it are heartily agreed in believing the design atrocious. But it seems that the commission who have the matter in charge "are so well satisfied with the design that they have adopted it, and have determined to give" people in general "an opportunity of passing judgment on what they (the commission) deem the greatest achievement of modern art." It seems, moreover, that the commission are quite positive that the completion of this monument "will place our country in art, as she is in freedom, in arms, in commerce, in manufactures, in science, and in skill in all that makes a nation great, in the front ranks of the nations of the earth."

The graceful compliment paid to the older civilizations of Europe by this admission that some other nations are as yet in advance of the Americans "in art" ought not to pass without notice. If we have surpassed or overtaken all other nations in the trifles mentioned above, we still defer to their maturer experience in art, and shall continue to do so until this monument shall have been finished and "inaugurated." It is strange, though, that the commission should care so much to have their country—which already stands with the foremost in "skill in all that makes a nation great"—excel in this pursuit which, by implication, does not make a nation great. In the next paragraph the matter is yet more involved in obscurity, for there we read that this work especially commends itself to the women of America, and that "the honor will belong to them of placing this crown of glory, this triumph of art, upon the brow of their country, and her (the country's?) achievement will raise and elevate every woman in the land in giving them nobler and higher aspirations." It seems to us that any human labor that puts a crown of glory on a country's brow, and that raises and elevates all the women in that country, may be classed with those things skill in which makes a nation great. As regards the "woman question" alone, we can think of no surer way of making this nation (for instance) great than by proceeding forthwith to "elevate" all the women therein contained, assured that the men of the next generation, if not of this, will share in that elevation, and that the whole will prove an effective forcing process applied to the national growth. And as regards the art question, we think the commissioners are too modest, for, if they really have in hand what they believe to be "the greatest achievement of modern art," they ought to count upon it for an immediate active influence upon the whole people. Is it not what all the land cries out for, some great achievement of art? Worried by critics who denounce the things called "art" in circulars and advertisements, and who confidently declare that the national treasures at Washington and the popular pictures and buildings everywhere are rubbish and not art at all, the almost despairing community asks anxiously for a few works of real power and beauty which even the critics will respect, and from which all may learn what modern art may be. So, if Miss Hosmer's design offers to us any chance of our getting a noble monument, combining truthful and lovely sculpture with grave and serene architecture, let us all look forward to its completion with the lively hope not of temporary pleasure of the eyes merely, but of lasting refinement of national character.

But the design, as we have said, is very bad; very bad architecture, and affording a chance for more bad sculpture than has yet been brought together. Under the circumstances, this latter is one of the most mistaken parts of the whole. To make anything good of this monument the sculpture must be of surpassing excellence; there is so very much of it, and it is so prominent and so principal. But we are safe in concluding, from what we have seen of Miss Hosmer's sculpture, that to model truly even one of the statues, or to compose nobly even one of the many subjects in bas-relief, is very far beyond her power as an artist. The letter, signed by Miss Hosmer, and printed with this circular giving an account of the design, will prove to those who cannot see the model itself that a well-conceived monument, or one designed on rational principles, is out of her reach. The unfortunate fate that seems to wait upon the literary labors of this commission, and to make their sentences tolerably hard to understand rightly, attends Miss Hosmer, too, whose description of her own design is far from lucid. It is a curious instance of the unfitness for modern uses of the pseudo-classical personifications still too common, that the meaning of the sentence about "mourning victories" should be a subject of disagreement, as it is, among different readers of the letter. And it is a curious instance of want of grasp of the subject in hand that the artist should suppose that, because soldiers' arms are reversed at a funeral, and torches of life are reversed upon tombs, and flags are hoisted union-down as signals of distress, that on this account Victory should "reverse" her trumpet when the victor has fallen on the field.

The gentlemen whose names appear upon this circular are made members of this commission on account of their constant, self-sacrificing, and intelligent labors on behalf of the freedmen. But there is nothing in these labors, nor in the rightness of heart that prompted them, nor in the good sense that has directed them, to make competent judges of art. Our estimate of the ignorance of this particular commission in this respect is formed from their circular. But the case is common. In preparing to erect a building, or to buy a picture, or to commission a piece of sculpture, when is any thought given to the matter of critical judgment? The men are chosen who can influence the raising of money, and who are known as good citizens and heartily interested in the cause, whatever it may be. That is in the best instance; but even then the question never comes up whether any one of these gentlemen knows anything of the matter in hand. Experts—men with special knowledge—are supposed to be the only competent judges in cases of law and medicine; nor would a committee seek to adjudge a prize for a scientific essay if no one of them were informed upon the branch of science treated of. But in the case of art anybody is thought a good enough judge; he "knows what he likes," at all events, and what he likes the public will certainly endure. We shall have no good monuments until there are directors of the business who know what they ought to like as well as what they like—who know good art—who, at least, know bad art and dare reject it.

THE TARIFF ON BOOKS.

To the Editors of The Nation:

Gentlemen: I have just had the pleasure of seeing The Nation for March 14, and from the number of wrathful replies called forth by my remarks on the proposed tariff on books, I find that I have unwittingly put my head into a hornet's nest. I wish that I could compliment your correspondents on their fairness as well as upon their earnestness.

In instituting a comparison between ad valorem and specific rates, one gentleman considers himself justified in taking Bohn's libraries as a standard for new books, and the works of Frederic the Great for old books. Now Bohn's libraries are known to all the reading world as purely exceptional. No English or American publisher has had the hardihood to imitate them, and even at the low prices at which books could be made here before the war, no one, I believe, ever ventured to reprint one of them. As for the "Œuvres du Roi de Prusse," it belongs to a class of books whose value is inversely as the square of the distance between their covers—the terror of all book collectors to whom space is any object. In fact, I gave away a very neat set of that identical book last year, simply because the very small proportion of valuable material in it was not worth the shelf-room that it would monopolize. The interests of literature and industry are not to be regulated by such standards as your correspondent has selected. Nor is this all—for he is careful to calculate his ad valorem on a basis of 25 cents to the shilling, then assumes that the present duty is equivalent to 35 per cent. in currency, and to crown all, turns his specific rate into a per-centage by adding on the gold premium. He seems to forget that the value of the shilling advances with the price of gold, or, if he remembers it, he probably thinks that the publishers are accountable for it—

> "Who fills the butchers' shop with large blue flies?"

Another gentleman takes as his standard of computation a mass of old cyclopædias, magazines, etc., which Elia would certainly have included in his category of "books that are not books." According to his own showing, he has had the opportunity of buying some of them at prices not very far removed from their value as waste paper, and less than an equal weight of clean printing paper would command. I suppose the collection of such material may be considered a harmless amusement, like that of autographs or postage-stamps; but I protest against the assumption that the importation of such matter into this country is to have any beneficial influence upon intellectual culture or the formation of a national literature. If I cannot congratulate the gentleman, however, on his taste, I can freely do so upon the extent of his library accumulations, when he can afford shelf-room for so many hundredweight of forgotten dulness.

I, too, have been a book collector for fifteen or twenty years, and my library, gathered together with infinite pains and reverent care, is probably, in its own special departments, second to none in the country. I know how jealously I measure the bulk of every volume that I buy, and how anxiously I watch the diminishing space whose disappearance will compel me once more to cull out from the shelves the older favorites and relegate them to the dusty recesses of the lumber-room. There are few bibliophiles who have not experienced this, and all will join me in envying the fortunate brother whose alcoves can find expanse for 184 pounds of "Rees's Encyclopædia" and 36½ pounds of "Christian Guardian."

I know, to my cost, that the days of cheap second-hand books in Europe are over. Bargains can no doubt still be picked up on the book-stalls of the Continent, but the antiquarian booksellers who issue catalogues are keenly alive to the fact that books which are worth anything will command full prices. Of course, in an age when there are almost as many authors as readers, multitudes of worthless books are printed which speedily gravitate to Lethe, and which can be had almost for the asking by any one reckless enough to collect them. You can, therefore, take up the second-hand catalogues and find books in plenty that nobody wants at prices apparently tempting enough; but, in the interests of that culture which you so earnestly seek to advance, it is to be hoped that as little of this sort of material as possible may be imported.

I think, however, that I can assure these gentlemen that the publishers at large have no sort of desire to be protected against this class of importations. It was thought, I presume, that the rate of ten cents per pound was as low as the financial exigencies of the country would permit Congress to go. For my part, I would be glad to see it five cents or less, and I would willingly co-operate in any endeavor to make it so.

As regards the per-centage to which the specific rate would be equivalent, it is easy to give examples. I will take, for instance, a book which you reviewed in your last number, the Rev. Orley Shipley's "Church and the World." This is a bulky octavo, published by Longman & Co., and, as the object of the author is polemic and not mercantile, it has been put at a price rather under than over the ordinary rates for such publications. Taking its cost, fifteen shillings, deducting 25 per cent. and converting it into currency at 24.2 cents to the shilling (the custom-house rate), its net price would be $2 72. Its weight is 2 lbs. 4 oz., which, at 25 cents per pound, would be 56¼ cents, or as nearly as possible 20¾ per cent.

Now, as to books in foreign languages. Hachette's publications are known to be remarkable for their cheapness. I take one which is lying before me—"Perren's Jerome Savonarole"—a bulky 18mo, at the low price of 3f. 50c. Deducting the trade discount, and converting this into currency at the custom-house rate of 18.6 cents to the franc, brings its cost to 49 cents net. Its weight is 12 oz., which at 10c. per per lb. makes a duty of 7½ cents, or about 15 per cent. Again, the "Bibliothèque Charpentier," at 3f. 50c. per vol., has long enjoyed a reputation among amateurs like that of Bohn's libraries, for the exceedingly low price at which the volumes are afforded. Of this I take "Capefigue's Hugues Capet," in two volumes, 7f., or in currency as before, 98 cents net; weight 1 lb. 6 oz., duty 13¾c., or about 14 per cent. Now these are rather extreme cases against me, but I will give yet another one. The Abbé Migne's publications are miracles of cheapness—small folios of 700 to 1,000 pages at 8f. brochês or 10f. full bound. I take two of them of average size, price 20f. bound, or, as before, $2 79 in currency, weight 3 lb. 7 oz., duty 34½ cents, or 12½ per cent. But the remarks in my previous communication were directed not to books exceptional in their cheapness, but for those of a high grade, for which you had put in your plea. I have, therefore, a right to take as a standard such a series as the publications of the "Société de l'Histoire de France," handsome octavos at 9f. per vol. Two of these weigh 2 lb. 6 oz., duty 23¾ cents, price 18f., or as before, $2 51 net in currency; per-centage of duty, 9½ per cent. As a collector of books, therefore, I should have been glad to see the proposed tariff become a law.

As for the gentleman who signs himself "Importer," I can only say that his unmannerly raising of the question of veracity renders it necessary for me simply to repeat my former assertion respecting the proposal of an ad valorem rate of 75 per cent.

Apologizing to you for taking up so much space, I remain, very truly, etc.,

The Week.

The President has, of course, vetoed the supplemental Reconstruction bill, and it has, of course, been passed over his veto without debate or comment. There was nothing new in the message, and the reiteration of what was in it has certainly not improved his position. He seems to have a notion that he owes it to himself, in some way, to give Congress a chance of snubbing him, and thinks that Congress, every time it does it, sinks deeper in the wrong. Some people have strange ideas both of dignity and duty, and he is one of them. One of the consequences of the exhibition he is every day making of his own weakness and insignificance, and of the facility with which the Government can be carried on without him, and even in spite of him, is that some people are beginning to ask what is the use of a President at all, and to suggest the entire abolition of the office. The Boston Commonwealth has taken this ground boldly within the past week; but, advanced as the position is, it is not in the extreme front. This is occupied by Mr. James Redpath, who, several weeks ago, proposed in The Anti-Slavery Standard the abolition both of the Presidency, the Supreme Court, and the Senate, "as the three remaining oligarchies."

Now that the supplemental Reconstruction bill has passed, the question of adjournment comes up, and about this there appears to be the greatest variety of opinions in both Houses. As a rule, the advocates of impeachment are opposed to any adjournment for more than a month at a time, while the opponents of impeachment are unwilling to come together again before December. Putting the impeachment aside altogether, however, there are a good many reasons in the condition of the South why Congress should not put it out of its power now to meet again during the summer. A good reconstruction bill to be sure has been passed, but the work of reconstruction is not yet done, and there can be little question that the certainty of security from legislative interference during the next seven or eight months would exercise a most unfavorable influence on the Southern temper. It is not perhaps desirable that Congress should sit much longer, but it does seem highly desirable, considering how much of the weight of Government now rests on its shoulders, that it should be able to come together again before long, if necessary.

The House has passed a resolution directing the Committee on Public Expenditures to investigate the charges against Mr. Smythe, the collector of this port, and if the testimony warrant it, to submit articles of impeachment against him. This course seems to give satisfaction to all parties, as it provides a means of punishing Mr. Smythe if really guilty, without recourse to Mr. Johnson, and at the same time gives him an opportunity of defending himself. But if he cannot do better before the committee than he did in his recent letter to the President, we think, and we are sure the public will agree with us, that it would not be a bad idea for him to resign without more ado. The plot seems to thicken the more the matter is discussed, and charges of falsehood on one side or other multiply every day. Senators Patterson and Doolittle say the committee lie; Mr. Bowen says Mr. Smythe lies; E. C. Johnson & Co. say Mr. Bowen lies; and finally a man named Hull has turned up who swears he heard, as he walked the Capitol grounds, Senator Patterson, whom he thought he recognized, tell another man whom he had never seen before, in a light, pleasant way, that "he had got his $5,000 and did not care a damn for the committee." This gentleman's testimony, which seems to have been intended to cover the case, amused the Senate a good deal, and when the reading of it was concluded, Senator Doolittle said Hull lied, too, and made the same remark with regard to Mr. Hulburd, of the House Committee. The point in dispute is—many of our readers may not be aware—whether Collector Smythe did or did not farm out the business of storing goods pending the payment of the duty on them, and corruptly divide the large amount thus received—some $40,000 or $50,000 a year—between himself and other persons, including Senators Patterson and Doolittle and "Mrs. Perry," a mysterious woman, whose home appears to be in the West, but who, as well as we can make out, seldom occupies it. The affair has a shocking look, and nothing but the high character Mr. Smythe has hitherto held prevents the public passing judgment on it at once. As every person, without exception, who has thus far opened his lips about it is accused by somebody else of having told "an abominable falsehood," it would be absurd for us to pretend that we can throw any light on the matter.

There was a sparring match in the House on Thursday between General Butler and Mr. Bingham, which seems to have been got up for the amusement of the members. The occasion was the debate on the Southern Relief bill, and after it had been carried on for some time with "considerable asperity of feeling," General Butler having given unmistakable indications of a desire to get at Mr. Bingham, and Mr. Bingham being evidently anxious to accommodate him, a ring was formed by "unanimous consent," and the "mill" commenced. General Butler led off by a smart left-hander, informing Mr. Bingham that he had gone over to the Democratic side of the House "body and soul." Mr. Bingham replied that General Butler had voted fifty-seven times for Jefferson Davis at the Charleston Convention and that he had not taken Fort Fisher, which caused great excitement, and the "first blood" was claimed for Bingham. In the next round Butler "came up smiling," and said that Bingham had hanged Mrs. Surratt on insufficient evidence. This fairly knocked Bingham off his feet, and he had some difficulty in coming to time; but in the next round, after a little preliminary feinting, he got home on Butler's conk, with the remark that "he cared no more for what General Butler thought than he did about who killed Cock Robin;" and forcing the fighting, he quoted Lord Bacon on the subject of "leaving his name and memory to the charitable speeches of men and future ages." He then "defied the gentleman's calumny," and was making desperate clutches at the general's head, with the view of getting it in chancery, when the Speaker's hammer fell. It appears to be admitted that Mr. Bingham had the best of it; General Butler was evidently not in training, and hit very wildly; but we have no doubt that if Congress should sit during the summer he will be able to do very nicely before the fall. Both parties bore marks of severe punishment.

THE concurrent resolution on "diplomatic apparel" came down to the House on Monday, and was the subject of a somewhat amusing debate. Mr. Covode cracked a rather vulgar joke on the President, of which, however, the President, considering his language last summer, would himself have no right to complain; and Mr. Noell, of Missouri, proposed as an official dress for foreign ministers a cocked hat, looped up with an American eagle, and a swallow-tailed coat with stars and stripes on the tail, and some other absurdities. In fact, the discussion became very farcical, but it was in every way worthy of the subject. All of a sudden, however, Mr. Banks made his appearance on the scene with some "lore," and informed the House that "Turgot had predicted in 1794 that the day would come when the United States would play the part which Carthage played in ancient times," and said that the United States would "soon establish a policy in the matter of dress" as in other things, etc. This seemed to settle the matter, for the resolution was carried, and now none of our foreign ministers can go to court any more in court dress. We have commented elsewhere on the philosophy of this great question.

MR. SEWARD has had the grace to offer an explanation of his action in the McCracken matter. It appears, then, that whenever there is brought to the head of the State Department any charge whatever against any person over whom the Department has any control, the rules and traditions of said Department, inexorable, unchangeable, severe, point out one, and but one, path for the Secretary to follow. What this path is he illustrated by an example; and we are bound to believe that if word were brought to Mr. Seward that his son Mr. F. Seward, an Assistant Secretary of State, had been seen in the Capitol grounds choking small boys, and making off with their pennies, it would be Mr. Seward's only course, though Mr. F. Seward were at the moment sitting in the same room with his father and his judge, to address to the accused a formal communication, countersigned by himself as Secretary of State, demanding a full explanation. This, Mr. Seward says or is said to say, is about what he has done in the case of the consuls and ministers plenipotentiary whom Mr. McCracken felt it his duty to denounce. Mr. Seward, at least, has the credit of having made an attempt to account for his proceedings. It is matter for rather melancholy reflection on the part of American citizens that the answers to the letter are still less than the letter susceptible of even that amount of explanation and excuse which Mr. Seward has been able to discover. To be sure, one can hardly help laughing through his blushes as he reads the letter of that diplomatic representative of the United States who brings a dozen, more or less, highly respectable American ladies, now abroad, to certify that they have never seen him the worse for liquor, and believe him to be a man of good moral character. But as one goes on and wades through the correspondence, Mr. Motley's part of it always excepted, he leaves laughing, and is reduced to the plain blushing of mortification.

MR. DONNELLY, of Minnesota, has more than atoned for his Fenian performance by the introduction of resolutions setting forth the dangers of the popular ignorance which prevails at the South, and recommending all Southern States to insert clauses in their constitutions binding their respective legislatures to provide free schools for all the children of the State. We should have been glad to have every State forced to insert this clause in its constitution, but this solemn and emphatic recognition by Congress of the political importance of popular education is honorable to Congress, and we trust will not be without influence on the South.

THE Trustees of the Peabody Educational Fund have taken steps to incorporate themselves, adopted a very sensible basis of operations, and nominated a general agent, the Rev. Barnas Sears, D.D., now president of Brown University. They propose to make primary or common-school education the chief object of their attention and assistance, and to this end will encourage and establish normal schools for the preparation of teachers throughout the South and Southwest. Wherever educational institutions already exist, they will work as far as possible through them and with them. They will aim to furnish instruction in the application of science to industrial pursuits. The details are left to their general agent, who is subject to their direction, and to him will be referred all petitions for aid, suggestions, etc. Their choice of Dr. Sears is eminently wise. We hope, in spite of his attachment to his present office—which is fully reciprocated by all the members of the university—that he will accept the appointment of the trustees. Some of the difficulties of the agency have been removed by Mr. Peabody's explanation, that he meant his bequest to be employed without regard to the number of States and the supposed claims of each upon a certain proportion of the fund. Upon this understanding, the State which manifests the greatest desire for schools and teachers will be likely to obtain most sympathy and heed from the trustees. The fund is palpably inadequate to supersede State effort, or to do much more than foster the love and the means of obtaining knowledge; and we are glad to see that this fact is appreciated by our publishers, the Messrs. Appleton having contributed one hundred thousand volumes of text-books, and others, it is said, being ready to imitate their generous example.

A GREAT calamity has overtaken both the stage and the country during the past week, in the burning of the Winter Garden Theatre in this city, and with it Mr. Booth's collection of costumes, enormously valuable and having few if any equals in the world for richness and accuracy. What makes the misfortune all the greater is that Messrs. Booth and Stuart, the lessees, lost in an hour the fruits of many years of labor. They have the deep sympathy of everybody, both of those who know them and those who do not, and ought to have something more substantial. The misfortunes of such men are public misfortunes.

LAST year we had cholera in New York and New York harbor, and this year, the Board of Health informs the public, we are to have it again. This year, like last year, the unfortunates who cross the sea in an infected vessel will find on their arrival in our waters that, whether they are well or so sick as to be barely alive, the accommodations provided for them at the quarantine are no better than can be afforded by hulks tossing with the waves of the Lower Bay. By midsummer the Board of Health expects to have the hospital buildings on West Bank ready for use. We certainly are of those who believe that the despotic powers of the Board were so used as to save us last year from a very severe visitation of the cholera, and though we do not know what reason there is, we suppose there may be a good reason for the failure to provide at the quarantine ground decent lodging for the well and decent hospitals for yellow fever and cholera patients.

HERE and there in the South a politician or a newspaper of influence puts faith in the Supreme Court, and stands out against reconstruction under the Military bill. Mr. Parsons, for instance, can see no reason why the people of Alabama "should make the monstrous act of Congressional usurpation their act," and wants them to wait. The Montgomery Mail explains to its readers that Mr. Seward said so and so in 1862, and Mr. Lincoln said this and that in his first inaugural, and that therefore true Americans oppose military reconstruction bills. The Charleston Mercury says that within a month a case can be made up for the Supreme Court, and the trial of it begun. Meantime, till the constitutionality of the law is passed upon, The Mercury counsels obedience to the military authority. But the tone of the press generally shows that action under the law will not long be delayed. The New Orleans Crescent thinks the do-nothing policy of the South in the past was a wise one, but that the moment has arrived when a change is desirable and necessary, and it urges all Southern men to vote at the elections unless they want "the era of Butler" to return on them. General Lee is of opinion that reconstruction under the new law is not dishonorable, and his word will more than balance Mr. A. H. Stephens's, who is said to advise quiescence. The Richmond Times thinks apathy is folly, though it probably agrees with the Charlottesville Chronicle, which sums up the provisions of the bill, and for editorial comment has the two words, "Pretty tight." The Richmond Dispatch is an advocate of action. General Longstreet, in the New Orleans Times, tells his fellow-citizens they must recollect that they are a conquered people. He thinks the will of the conqueror as expressed in the bill under consideration must be obeyed. The New Orleans Picayune wants immediate reconstruction. The Galveston News urges the Texans to bring all possible influence to bear upon the negro to make him friendly. This will not be hard to do, the Norfolk Virginian thinks, for "Buckskin and Cuffey are naturally allied, but Cuffey and Nutmeg are born antipodes." "We should find in him," The Virginian says, "our natural friend and ally"—the reason given being that the negro knows the true gentleman at a glance. The Index, of Petersburg, Virginia, urges the education of the freedmen, and Mr. Wade Hampton and other gentlemen of South Carolina give plain indications of an intention to utilize their colored brother in the political field. The results of the change in Southern tactics will certainly be of advantage to the colored men. As to the question whether or not the newly enfranchised freedmen will be of advantage to the Republican or to the other party, that is a question which cannot be answered beforehand with any certainty. We expect the colored vote to go very often with the Southern candidate in local and Congressional elections, and we do not doubt that it can, with very little difficulty, be had for the Republican Presidential candidate. It can in the next election, at any rate, and the reason why is too plain to need stating.

DR. EDWIN M. SNOW, State Superintendent of the Census in Rhode Island, in his annual report has a word to say in regard to the diminution of the native American part of the New England population. The native American population in that section of the country is not, he says, a normal population; that is, it does not contain, in the natural proportions, persons of youthful, mature, and old age. It has an overplus of aged persons; for the young emigrate and rear children in the West. In 1860 there were not less than 560,336 New Englanders living in other States, and the increase of these New Englanders from 1850 to 1860 was equal to an emigration of 10,645 annually. The emigrants, whose children are thus lost to New England censuses, are mainly young people, or people in the prime of life; it is the aged and the quite young who are left behind in the New England country towns. But the foreign population living in New England has an unnaturally large proportion of persons of that age to which we look for the increase of population, and an unnaturally small number of aged people. The foreign population of Providence, for example, contains but 3.61 per cent. of the age of 60; the American population contains 7.53 per cent. who had reached or passed the end of their sixtieth year. Providence is a manufacturing city, and Dr. Snow would have done well had he given us the statistics of some of the country towns where the young men and women are not gathered together in shops and factories. As he says, in these small towns, "the true home and origin of the native American population of New England, the proportion of aged persons is very much greater, and that of young persons is very much smaller, than in the cities." Thus in Exeter but 1.47 in 100 persons are of foreign parentage; in Providence, 43.76 in every 100 are born of foreign parents. Thus it is possible, without resorting to the hypothesis of the physical degeneration of New England women, we may account for the fact that the American population in that particular quarter of the country is increasing with less rapidity than the foreigners living there.

THE foreign news of the week as received by telegraph is meagre and unimportant. There are rumors of Cretan successes in Crete, and the Turkish question is evidently every day assuming proportions more and more formidable. The debate on the new Reform bill has begun in the House of Commons, but its defeat on the second reading seems certain.

THE FREEDMEN.

ANOTHER of those cases in which it is sought to retreat from a bad investment in slave property by means of the Emancipation Proclamation has come up in Georgia. In 1857, as we find the facts reported, Tumor bought of Tucker, in South Carolina, slaves to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, giving in security for the payment a mortgage on them and on lands in Georgia. Tumor remained in possession of the slaves until the emancipation, without having paid for them. After their freedom Tumor refused to make payment, on the ground that Tucker, having a mortgage on them, was still the owner, notwithstanding Tumor's possession up to the time of their emancipation. On this issue suit was instituted, and a verdict for the plaintiff was rendered by a special jury.

—The Maryland and Delaware Legislatures have both adjourned. The former failed to pass the bill admitting the testimony of blacks in the courts of the State on an equal footing with that of the whites. The latter equalized by law the punishment of offences, without regard to the color of the criminal.

—The Pennsylvania Legislature and Gov. Geary together have made it law that within the four corners of that State the public carriers must know no distinction of color in receiving passengers. The juster sense of the people has thus robbed Philadelphia of the honor of putting away the last custom which allied her with the South "as it was," and made her really a Southern city—a city of caste in a Republican State and nation. The new statute was not needed, inasmuch as the spirit and the precedents of the law were ample and in fact unanimous for the protection of colored people in their right of conveyance; but the bench has shown itself too timid and time-serving, desirous rather to avoid the issue than to court it and settle it on legal as well as Christian grounds, and the Legislature has therefore done good service to the present generation by a positive enactment which removes all doubt and every pretext for perpetuating a cruel abuse. There still remains, however, an opportunity for deciding what the law was before the passage of this bill. A case is now pending before the Supreme Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, in which the Philadelphia and Westchester Railroad Company are plaintiffs in error vs. Mary E. Miles, defendant. The latter is "a well-bred, intelligent, and respectable colored woman, holding the responsible position under the Government of teacher of the National School for Orphans of Colored Soldiers—unobjectionable in person, dress, and demeanor," who, having declined to remove to a seat provided for colored people exclusively, was ejected from the cars without excessive force, but to her great discomfort and disappointment. Bringing a suit for trespass in the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia County, she obtained a verdict and an award of $5 damages—too little for her proper satisfaction or for the punishment of the company, but too much to allow them to acknowledge the defeat of prejudice and rescind their proscriptive regulations. The following extracts from the paper book of the plaintiff in error deserve to go upon record:

> "The result of supporting the views of the court below will be that negroes will be authorized by law to insist upon having rooms in hotels, seats at public tables, boxes at the theatres, pews in churches, and lots in cemeteries.
> "The sanction of decision will be given not merely to equality, but to compulsory social amalgamation.
> "For so many years that we cannot remember to the contrary, negroes have been excluded in this city from omnibuses and cars. There was a time when one of them would scarcely have thought of bringing his case before this court. A few years ago, however, one of them was induced to assert his right in the district court, and it was held that he might be excluded.
> "Is a company, desirous of carrying all, whose interest it is to be liberal, but which is permitted to consult its own interest as well as the comfort of the passengers, to have its discretion in judging when society is ripe for amalgamation, reconsidered and passed upon by courts of justice?"

One of the counsel for the defendant writes us:

> "An exhaustive research showed us no decision of any superior or supreme court of any State of the question involved in Miles vs. The Railroad. Neither could we find in the Common Law reports or elsewhere any decision of the exact principle here involved, either in the cases of Jews, serfs, or villains, under the Common Law, oppressed religious sects, or other hated and abused persons. Either these classes (or some of them) feared to sue, or if they sued, it was with the same result that would have attended the suit of a slave against his master for wages."

The illness of Judge Reed prevents a decision being made before January next. By that time Philadelphians will have forgotten the state of things which has given rise to such a suit.

Notes.

LITERARY.

It will soon be a distinction not to own Dickens's works. We are to have yet another very cheap edition. In a few days Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will issue the first volume of what is to be called the "Globe edition." It will consist of thirteen volumes, and the price of each volume will be a dollar and a half. The public already knows the Hurd & Houghton edition in fifty-three volumes, containing forty-one illustrations from designs by F. O. C. Darley, and twelve from designs by John Gilbert. All these illustrations are to be given in the Globe edition; fine paper is promised, and the type will be large, speaking comparatively, for the size of the volumes is to be 16mo, as in the costlier edition above mentioned. "Nicholas Nickleby" will be first to put on the new dress. The first volume of the "Riverside Dickens" will also soon be published. This is the edition that is to contain all the illustrations (except those from Mr. Eytinge's designs) that have ever appeared in England or America. That is, each novel, in addition to its English pictures, will have the pictures done by Messrs. Darley and Gilbert for the fifty-three volume American edition. In one respect, however, there will be a very great, and we suppose an expensive, improvement on the later English editions: the illustrations will not be printed from worn-out plates, but from plates expressly prepared for this edition. In the new "Oliver Twist," which we have seen, Cruikshank appears to far greater advantage than in the Chapman & Hall "Oliver Twist."

—It is not surprising that many charges of misrepresentation come from various quarters against Mr. Hepworth Dixon and his last book. There are numerous reasons for believing that the author of "New America" had made his theories of American life before making his first observations of it. The Oneida community has honored the author who, alone of authors, has honored it, by devoting its evenings to the reading of his book, and Mr. J. H. Noyes, who is the head and front of that "Bible family," republishes in The Circular the chapters that relate to him and his society, correcting, in foot-notes or long articles, the more important errors, but occasionally abandoning the attempt when Mr. Dixon blunders too hopelessly. The community appears, however, to be in the best of humors. But quite other is the mood of a respected correspondent of ours, who holds a high judicial office in Colorado, and writes us from Denver as follows:

> "In his effort to make a readable book, Mr. Dixon has armed with bowie-knives and pistols the people who reside in the State of Kansas and the Territory of Colorado; has clothed them in grotesque, outlandish costume, and given them semi-barbarous manners; of all which I complain. I trust that no one will be deterred from visiting Atchison, Kansas, through fear of meeting at the breakfast table 'a jolly set of dogs, each dog with a bowie-knife in his pocket, a six-shooter in his belt,' as narrated on p. 14. I am persuaded that those 'dogs' visit the breakfast table only when men of Mr. Dixon's imaginative faculties are present; for I have been at Atchison several times myself, and I have not seen them at the breakfast table or elsewhere."

Our correspondent agrees with Mr. Bowles—we presume it is Mr. Bowles who, in The Springfield Republican, showed up some of Mr. Dixon's mistakes—in casting much doubt on Mr. Dixon's narrative of the perils he encountered on the plains, and speaks still more disrespectfully of the tale of terror (p. 55) about a certain Jack Dunkier whom Mr. Dixon depicts riding into Denver with the leg of an Indian warrior slung to his saddle—a leg which he had cut from the trunk; having previously, by the way, stripped off the scalps of five Sioux braves—and on which he had been feeding for five days:

> "During a residence in Denver of more than six years," says our correspondent, "I have not heard of Mr. Dixon's valiant cannibal, and I venture the assertion that no credible citizen of Denver will affirm that any one ever appeared in the streets of that town with the leg of an Indian warrior slung to his saddle. The people of Denver would be quite as much astonished at such a spectacle as they are to learn from Mr. Dixon's book that they have seen and applauded the barbarism. Of the same kind is the story of the return of the Sand Creek volunteer with a woman's heart on the end of a pole—so shamelessly false that it is very surprising that Mr. Dixon could adopt it."

The citizens of Denver and of Colorado generally are traduced, this writer says, when they are spoken of as gamblers, drunkards, brothel keepers and brothel-haunters, bloodthirsty scoundrels, contemners of matrimonial obligations. Violence and bloodshed and lynch law are not the rule in Colorado; they are the exception, and the people of that Territory profess to be and are "a civilized people, with the habits and customs of civilized people." Finally, as to the supposed origin of these errors, our correspondent appears to entertain but a low opinion of the particular "Norse god" who made the deepest impression on Mr. Dixon. If, he says, that gentleman wanted a hero,

> "He ought to have selected some one of better reputation for truth and sobriety than Robert S. Wilson. Perhaps the presence of this hero will account for some of the Munchausen stories in this book. 'New America,' however, has reached its fourth edition, a fact which may, perhaps, console him (Mr. Dixon) for having made a good many misstatements."

—On the 18th of February the President approved an act amendatory of the copyright laws, by which it is provided that every proprietor of a publication, book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, shall deliver a copy of it to the librarian of Congress, and for each failure to do so shall forfeit the sum of twenty-five dollars, to be collected at the suit of the librarian. All such matter may be sent through the mails free if the words "copyright matter" be written or printed on the outside of the package, and all postmasters are required to receipt for such packages and see that they are forwarded without charge.

—"A Comprehensive Dictionary of the Bible" is announced by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. It is based upon the very well known Bible Dictionary of Dr. Smith, a work which only a scholar can use to advantage, and which not every scholar can afford to buy. The new work will be this dictionary of Dr. Smith and his coadjutors popularized to a certain extent, improved, doubtless, in some particulars, diminished in size from three volumes of more than three thousand to one volume of about one thousand pages, and, finally, made very much cheaper. Its price, in semi-monthly numbers at thirty cents a number, will be not far from seven dollars. Prepared as Dr. Smith's dictionary was, by many different writers who held differing views on many points of doctrine and of biblical criticism and over whom editorial control was not exercised with any strictness, of course contradiction and discordance between articles are not infrequent. In "The Comprehensive Dictionary" all this is, so far as possible, changed. The editor, the Rev. S. W. Barnum, who was Prof. Goodrich's principal assistant in the revision of "Webster's Dictionary," says that he has "unhesitatingly omitted expressions and sentiments which are hostile to the views or needlessly offensive to the feelings of most evangelical Christians."

—No attempt will be made at giving Dr. Smith's famous work any particular theological color in the new edition of it which Messrs. Hurd & Houghton have in preparation. Prof. H. B. Hackett is the American editor and is assisted by Mr. Ezra Abbot, the assistant librarian at Harvard. The dictionary will be offered to the public not only unabbreviated but enlarged as well as corrected; and the list of writers whose services have been secured by the publishers embraces names of men of various views. Dr. A. P. Peabody, Prof. E. A. Park, of Madison, Prof. W. G. T. Shedd, Prof. Hovey, Dr. Schaff, Prof. Fisher, and President Woolsey are among the gentlemen who will contribute. The dictionary is to be issued in monthly numbers, of which there will be thirty, more or less, each containing one hundred and twelve pages, and each worth seventy-five cents.

—It is in America that spiritism or spiritualism has had its greatest success, and a "History of Spiritualism in America," as it must recount the rise of that faith, so it ought to lay before us the whole nature of it and enable us to estimate exactly its meaning and value. Whether or not it is likely that this can be done to acceptance by any of the devotees themselves, it is not doubtful that it will not be well done by the somewhat famous "medium" Emma Hardinge, whose literary performance when she is "under the influence" is prophetic of sad work from her when not inspired. She is said to be preparing a history of the Rochester religion in two volumes.

—Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. have published a new and greatly revised edition of Prof. Perry's "Elements of Political Economy." The book has been carefully worked over in every part, and many alterations and additions have been made, and several new discussions have been introduced. The work is written with great clearness of style and of development of the subject. The chapter on value, which is modelled on Bastiat, those on money and on foreign trade are especially noticeable, while those on currency in the United States and American tariffs are new and interesting. We know of no book more suitable for schools and colleges, not even excepting Fawcett's manual.

—Mr. John Pennington, of Philadelphia, who died on the 18th inst., was the last, if not the only, American bookseller who represented the old traditional booksellers. A scholar of fine parts, thorough in his knowledge of bookselling, with judgment and skill, a bibliographer in its broadest and best sense, he was an honor to the craft, and he took pride in it. He was a man of fine taste, of large reading, and of exhaustless service to all who were curious in scholarship or earnest in the study of letters. Descended from one of the old, respected, and wealthy Quaker families of Philadelphia, it was accident that made him a bookseller. His father's large fortune was suddenly lost. During his youth Mr. John Pennington had gathered a valuable collection of books, and had frequently contributed to the literary proceedings of the various learned societies of his native town. Not caring for general mercantile pursuits, and suddenly thrown on his own resources, he quietly turned his library into his stock in trade, and with it opened one of the best bookstores of the country. Proud of his books, and contented with his shop and the fair profit which it brought him, he never allowed himself to be tempted from his chosen pursuit. His shop became the gathering place of scholars and men with a taste for letters, and one generation after another grew up almost under his eyes in the various branches of literature which he supplied. His business did not stop with supplying books to his customers; they were all his friends; they knew that to him they could turn for help in everything that related to books, and that his knowledge was only surpassed by his readiness to impart it; and his help was never refused to the earnest seeker after knowledge, no matter how small his requirements of Mr. Pennington's services as a bookseller. Book-selling with him was not so much a trade as an art; books with him were valuable for their real, substantial merit; the book-buyer was precious in his eyes who knew what he wanted and why he wanted it. He never got rid of his old love of books for their own sake, and that love was too well founded in a knowledge of books ever to be lost in a poor ambition to become a great bookseller—a mere trader in so many thousand volumes of which he knew nothing and thought less. One of the matters of his trade in which he took pride was the fact that his list of subscribers to the new edition of Brunet was the largest outside of Paris, and thus he brought together the oldest bibliographer of the Old World and the youngest student in the New. With Brunet and with Bossange, as with all the other leading booksellers in Europe, his relations were intimate, and ripened always into fast friendships, each man finding in the other much to like and to respect. The sound judgment which characterized him in his private business was not lost in other things; and in political and public matters his advice was always safe. He was frequently called upon to assist members of Congress in framing such parts of the successive tariffs as were within his special business knowledge, and his recommendations were never biassed by his own interests. The loss of such a man, capable in his business, proud of it, and making himself dear to his friends, is at all times a great one. Particularly is this the case now and here, when study and scholarship are taking their accustomed places, from which they had been seriously disturbed by five years of war. The trade of book-selling in his hands was elevated to the dignity that it really acquires in the hands of competent men. Such men are rare everywhere. Here, unfortunately, they are growing rarer every day. In growing great rapidly we are not always growing wise, and the men who mean to study and want a book-shop and a bookseller to furnish them with the tools they need, will look long and vainly for such help as they always got from John Pennington, of Philadelphia. It is beside our present purpose to speak of him except as a bookseller; but we should do wrong to forget that patriotic Philadelphia during the last five years contained no man more sincere, and few men more forward, in every good work that civil war imposed upon lovers of the country.

—The English Government has for some time been engaged in printing, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, a series of historical works, old chronicles, state papers, and the like, which are throwing much light upon the early and mediæval history of the country. The originals are published in all cases, though the Latin spelling is often modernized and corrected to suit the notions of the Master of the Rolls, with a translation, but without notes. The last volume of the Rolls publications is one concerning the history of Ireland, the "Chronicum Scotorum," a chronicle of Irish affairs from the earliest times to A.D. 1135, and is edited, annotated—an exceptional case—and translated by William M. Hennessy. It is printed from the oldest existing manuscript of the work, evidently of the seventeenth century, now in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, which was written by Dubhaltach MacFirbisich, one of a long line of professional historians, who was assassinated in 1670. The work, though almost entirely written in Irish characters, is, singularly enough, composed partly in Latin and partly in Irish, sentences in each language lying side by side, and continually intermixed, which gives reason to suppose that it is a compilation. Its composition is, with some degree of probability, ascribed to Gillachrist Ua Masileoin, abbot of Clonmacnois, who died in 1127. The chronicle is filled with accounts of battles, murders, and deaths, the vicissitudes of the Church, and with descriptions of various prodigies and miracles. In the language there are some noticeable peculiarities in the use of Latin words. Jugulatio and jugulatus est, for instance, are apparently used by the annalist to signify death by violence of whatever nature, while occisus and interfectus mean death in battle only. The death of an ecclesiastic is always expressed by quies, quievit, dormitatio, dormivit; that of a layman by moritur and mortuus. The words in clericatu seem to be used in the sense of "in pilgrimage."

SCHOOLS FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.[*]

"If you would live in peace," says the Russian proverb, "you must be deaf, dumb, and blind." It is exceedingly doubtful if even the small class referred to actually get through life without quarrels, and it is certain that merely to be deaf and dumb gives men no exemption. For proof of which we would refer to the controversy now going on in England and in New England respecting the proper mode of educating deaf-mute children. The pamphlet of which the title is given below is one of the most concise statements of one side of the question in England, but Mr. Copleston is by no means the only champion of the cause he advocates. Dr. Kitto, Dr. Townbee, Messrs. Payne, Arnold, Hawkins, Van Asch, etc., have within a few years maintained the advantage of the system of Articulation for the deaf and dumb; in former years Dr. Watson, Dr. Roget, and others did the same thing. But they all have had little to do compared with the labor undertaken by Dr. Howe and his friends in New England; for while in Great Britain the dumb have been taught to speak for more than two centuries, in this country scarcely anything has been attempted in that direction.

It is curious to notice what has led to so wide a difference between the methods of teaching deaf-mutes in England and in America. Why should we have adopted the French method rather than that praised by Dr. Johnson and practised for a century in the schools of Scotland and England? Apparently only because old Mrs. Braidwood, in 1816, would not allow a Yankee enthusiast from Connecticut to learn the art which had made her husband so famous, and because the Abbé Sicard happened then to be in London and to show Mr. Gallaudet the courtesy which his British rivals had not displayed. Thereupon the French Catholic led the Connecticut colonist back in triumph to Paris, taught him the Théorie des Signes, and lent him a young deaf-mute to begin his school with in Hartford.

From 1816 to 1843 Hartford and our whole country followed zealously in the steps of Sicard and Gallaudet, although Sicard had been superseded in his native land by Bébian Gabel and Ordinaire. Articulation, though favored by a few, was ignored and disowned by the directors of the American Asylum, in whose policy all the American schools substantially agreed. But the revelations made by Horace Mann concerning the German articulating schools excited a lively interest in New York and New England. Hartford, in 1844, sent a second delegate to Europe, and New York gave him a colleague who could speak French and German, thus enabling him to extend his enquiries beyond the British isles. By this mission of Messrs. Weld and Day a new impulse was given to the instruction of deaf-mutes in America, for both of them, while adhering, as in duty bound, to the system which they had learned and taught at home, still found so much to praise in the German schools that classes were at once formed at Hartford and elsewhere in imitation of the articulating classes at Paris, Bruges, and Berlin. In 1845, out of 182 pupils at Hartford, 30, or one in six, were practised in articulation; in the following year, 40 out of 192, or more than one in five. The same experiment was set on foot at our New York institution, and for a time its results were satisfactory in both schools. But habit is stronger than reason in most institutions, and the classes in articulation gradually fell into disuse at Hartford. The eye of Horace Mann ceased to rest upon these establishments; he was busy fighting the battles of liberty in Congress, or struggling in behalf of learning at the West. There was no one to take his place, and before his death teaching the dumb to speak became again a thing almost unheard of in New England. The special teacher at Hartford was dismissed, the semi-mutes were allowed to lose their power of speech, reading on the lips was wholly neglected, and, in this respect, all things went on as in the days of good old Dr. Gallaudet.

[*] "How to Educate the Deaf and Dumb. A short exposition of the proposed plan for the establishment of Day-schools for Teaching the Deaf and Dumb to speak by means of Articulation and Lip-reading, on Mr. Mary's system. By J. Copleston." London: A. M. Pigott, 13 Paternoster Row.

Within the past five years the matter has been again agitated by a few gentlemen and ladies of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, some of them having semi-mute children to educate, and others from a philanthropic interest in the subject. Among the latter is Dr. S. G. Howe, of Boston, who, as chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Charities, has within the last year brought the question once more before the public for discussion. In the reports of that board for 1865 and 1866 a change in the Hartford system is strongly advocated, and Massachusetts is urged to undertake for herself the education of her own deaf-mutes. This suggestion, so reasonable in itself and so pleasing to the State pride of her fellow-citizens, has been brought before the Massachusetts Legislature by Governor Bullock, and a special committee of both branches has been for two months engaged in taking testimony and examining methods of instruction. On the side of home education appear all the deaf-mutes of the State, who have sent in petitions and passed resolutions in favor of the plan proposed by Dr. Howe. On the other side appear the managers of the Hartford Asylum, the whole weight of that powerful establishment being thrown against any change in existing arrangements. On the side of an extended use of the method of articulation appear, either personally or in writing, the Board of Charities, led by Dr. Howe, Mr. Thomas Talbot, Mr. Gardner Green Hubbard, Mr. George Walker, Mrs. Horace Mann, Mrs. Lamson, the teacher of Laura Bridgeman and Oliver Caswell, Professor Diman, of Providence, and several ladies whose children have been instructed in this method. On the other side, again, appear the managers of the Hartford Asylum.

A prominent figure in these discussions is a young lady, hitherto unknown to the world, Miss Rogers, of Chelmsford. This lady, whose sister was one of the teachers of Laura Bridgeman, has opened a small articulating school for young deaf-mutes, near the city of Lowell. We believe the present number of her pupils is seven—the same number with which the Hartford Asylum opened a half-century ago. Miss Rogers, without any previous knowledge of deaf-mute instruction, has been so successful in teaching her pupils, especially to read the lips—to "heare with the eie," as Sir Kenelm Digby said—that she has received great praise from persons qualified to pronounce upon the subject.

Some account of her school is given in the third annual report of the Board of Charities (pp. 173–5). A jocose and not very exact description has appeared in the Boston Advertiser ; but the fullest statement yet made public concerning it may be found in a paper lately read before the Social Science Association in Boston. It is an interesting topic, about which we may expect to hear more as Miss Rogers goes on in her work. At present hers is the only school in the United States, we believe, where articulation and lip-reading are taught to the so-called deaf and dumb.

We are not disposed to engage in the pending controversy, so far as there is one; but we conceive it to be for the good of the unfortunate class of deaf-mutes that another school for their instruction has been opened in Massachusetts. The well-known eminence of that State in all matters of education and philanthropy gives every reason to believe that such a school will be well sustained and of good result. If it can do anything to promote the early instruction of deaf children—a matter which the late Canon Corton, of Bruges, had deeply at heart, and which Professors Day and Bartlett have so warmly advocated in this country—a real benefit will be conferred upon the community. We regard this early instruction as of more consequence than any choice of method, however important that may be.

PRESIDENT REED.[*]

Mr. William B. Reed has taken up arms once more in defence of his grandfather. The ninth volume of Mr. Bancroft's history is the casus belli, and Mr. Reed, in repelling the attack made in it on his ancestor, takes occasion to reply to the earlier onslaughts made on President Reed by the Cadwallader pamphlets in their various reissues. Mr. Reed is a capital scholar; his English is pure and good, his knowledge of Revolutionary history thorough and exhaustive, and his mastery of all the weapons of political and literary warfare very complete. Yet, with all these qualities, we doubt if his last pamphlet will add much to his reputation or save that of the fond object of his earlier and later labors. His angry indignation at the vamping of old calumnies is hearty enough to commend itself to the honest sympathy of all who may read his book. Still it is far from satisfying u that the question of President Reed's patriotism is for ever settled. Undoubtedly Mr. Bancroft laid about him with a double-edged sword, and undertook to slaughter reputations which had become almost sacred. The descendant of General Greene has met these attacks successfully. Curiously enough, General Greene is Mr. Reed's best witness, and his endorsement of President Reed is full, frank, and to the purpose. Of the other witnesses, old and new, little can be gleaned that is satisfactory. Mr. Reed has reprinted the famous letter of General Washington—that last letter from General Washington to President Reed—the letter which closed finally the correspondence between the two men who had at one time stood in such close intimacy. It is a letter which does not satisfy any one who has not already made up his mind as to President Reed's guilt or innocence of the charge so hotly pressed against him. It is cold, formal, and reserved. It says emphatically that at the time when President Reed is reported to have been dealing with treason Washington did not suspect him of it. It does not say that when the letter was written (in 1780) General Washington was still of the same mind. No later letter is extant from Washington to Reed, and the conclusion is almost irresistible that, whatever may have been Reed's reason, whether it was his own proud sense of innocence or his feeling that he had for ever silenced the calumny, President Reed never again was able to produce any testimony from General Washington to exculpate him from the charges made against him. Of Mr. Reed's modern witnesses little can be said; they are of his school of the politics of the day; it is rather bold on Mr. Reed's part, in this discussion of a charge of treason in the times of the Revolution, to cite even in foot-notes such a man as James W. Wall, who has retired into the obscurity which covers the "Copperheads" even in New Jersey; another of his friends is Mr. George H. Moore, of the New York Historical Society, who, whatever his earlier merits, seems to have found a new vocation in abuse of New England and of New England men, because they are from New England.

Mr. Reed's violent diatribes against the "Donop Diary" and the use which Mr. Bancroft has made of it do not seem to be altogether natural; certain it is that the extracts which he prints and comments on do suggest this curious fact, that the enemy, with whose officers General Reed is charged with dealing, had a contemporaneous rumor of the fact, for the diary records the report as one that was brought to their hearing just at the time when it was alleged long afterwards that the transactions in question had taken place. The printing of the Cadwallader pamphlets and the quarrels out of which they grew did not take place until long after the date of the record in the "Donop Diary." This in itself is curious and significant, without, however, being decisive in any way, and while Mr. Bancroft has properly not commented on it, Mr. Reed, with all his protestations of anxiety to meet all the charges made against his ancestor, does not mention nor dispose of it. If he has a theory of his own on the subject, it would have been well for him to have added it to the other hypothetical statements with which he has met Mr. Bancroft's direct renewal of the charge. It is perhaps a matter of regret that Mr Reed's varied and thorough knowledge of historical literature had not taken some other direction than that of ancestral biography. His "Life of President Reed" is in many respects an admirable contribution to the biographical history of the Revolution, his "Letters of Esther de Berdt" a very graceful addition to the little that we possess on the domestic life of leading Revolutionary families. That he should feel deeply the renewal of the attacks on his ancestor is perhaps a sign of repentance and a retraction of the somewhat startling manner in which he claimed the martyr's crown for his own part in our late struggle. The insult which he did to literature both here and in England by his little memoir of Mr. Thackeray is not likely to be soon or easily forgotten by any one whose misfortune it was to see it. With graceful, honeyed accents he told the story of Mr. Thackeray's visit to this country, and ingeniously contrived to say or to make Mr. Thackeray say slighting things of every man and of many women who had shown hospitality to him, and who had taken a part in the rebellion other than Mr. Reed's. Then he endeavored to fasten on Mr. Thackeray, dead and sincerely mourned by all who had ever known him, a participation and a sympathy in the rebellion as marked and as wholesale as Mr. Reed's. If the man who could do that can now feel pain and bitterness at a charge nearly a century old made against his ancestor, it is, we trust, a sign that he intends, before he leaves the world, to put on record something that may palliate the part which he took in embittering the sectional strife that produced the war of the rebellion and has not ended with it.

ARNOLD'S LINCOLN AND SLAVERY.*

In some respects this biography would appear more worthy to be read and preserved than any on the same subject which has preceded it. Just as every historian of the rebellion has felt it necessary to go back to the formation of the Union to discover causes adequate to so grand an effect, so Mr. Arnold has wisely sketched the progress of the slaveholding interest, from the time when it first established itself in the very framework of our government, in order to set forth fairly the task of destroying it, and the character of the man who accepted and achieved this task. The author had a twenty years' acquaintance with Mr. Lincoln, and with his approval, and during his lifetime, began the volume which lies before us. His own part in the overthrow of slavery had been neither slight nor unconspicuous. In 1862 he procured the passage of an act "to render freedom national and slavery sectional," by prohibiting slavery in all the actual and contingent Territories of the United States.

Unavoidably much of the present work is to be found in those of Messrs. Raymond, Barrett, and Holland. The thrice-told events of the war must likewise be told again. But in the quotation of speeches and public documents Mr. Arnold has shown much discretion and a certain originality of selection that makes this book a positive addition to the biographies just alluded to. The Congressional debates are reported with considerable fulness and will not be found redundant even by those who have the good fortune to own Mr. Wilson's "Anti-Slavery Measures in Congress." Mr. Lincoln's professional and political career has been nowhere so well described as here. It is interesting to learn that in 1841 he wielded the Ordinance of 1787 in defence of a slave girl who had been sold in Illinois, and thus redeemed her from bondage and put an end for ever to the traffic in human beings upon the soil of his adopted State. His efforts in 1849 to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia are well remembered. But it is not so well known that in the State convention to choose delegates to the Philadelphia Convention in 1856 he furnished the simple and solid platform which was adopted—the Declaration of Independence, and hostility to the extension of slavery; and that at Philadelphia, on the informal ballot, he received 110 votes for Vice-President. Indeed, it was the ignorance or forgetfulness of these facts that made the nomination of Mr. Lincoln at Chicago a very general surprise and disappointment at the East; for though Mr. Arnold omits to record it, Mr. Seward was the candidate of New England, in spite of his gratuitous condemnation of the John Brown affair, and Mr. Greeley's judgment in politics was not then (nor has it since been) so trusted that his decisive opposition to Seward was pardoned in an instant.

We cannot forbear to quote some of Mr. Lincoln's detached sayings which we meet here for the first time, and which illustrate anew his humor and his wisdom. In 1843 he was appointed by the friends of the late Col. E. D. Baker to attend a convention at which he had hoped to be nominated for Congress, with instructions to vote for his rival. He said, "In trying to get the nomination for Baker I shall be 'fixed' a good deal like the fellow who is made groomsman to the man who has 'cut him out,' and is marrying his own gal!" In a speech delivered in July, 1848, replying to the charge that the Whigs were taking shelter under Gen. Taylor's coat-tail, and had turned Henry Clay out like an old horse to rot, he amusingly said:

> "Old horses and military coat-tails, or tails of any sort, are not figures of speech such as I would be the first to introduce here; but as the gentleman from Georgia has thought fit to introduce them, he and you are welcome to all you have made, or can make, by them. If you have any more old horses, trot them out; any more tails, just cock them, and come at us."

And, further on, of General Cass:

> "He was volunteer aid to General Harrison on the day of the battle of the Thames; and, as you said in 1840 Harrison was picking whortleberries two miles off while the battle was fought, I suppose it is a just conclusion, with you, to say Cass was aiding Harrison to pick whortleberries. This is about all, except the mooted question of the broken sword. Some authors say he broke it; some say he threw it away; and some others, who ought to know, say nothing about it. Perhaps it would be a fair historical compromise to say, if he did not break it, he did not do anything else with it."

Concerning the dissensions of the Democrats:

> "I have heard some things from New York, and if they are true, we might well say of your party there as a drunken fellow once said when he heard the reading of an indictment for hog-stealing. The clerk read on till he got to and through the words 'did steal, take, and carry away, ten boars, ten sows, ten shoats, and ten pigs,' at which he exclaimed: 'Well, by golly, that is the most equally divided gang of hogs I ever did hear of.'"

Was there ever a more perfect definition than this of "squatter sovereignty"? "If any one man choose to enslave another, no third man shall be allowed to object."

Finally, here is an interesting reminiscence:

> "I remind him [Douglas] of another piece of history on the question of respect for judicial decisions, and it is a piece of Illinois history, belonging to a time when the large party to which Judge Douglas belonged were displeased with a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, because they had decided that a governor could not remove a secretary of state. You will find the whole history in Ford's 'History of Illinois,' and I know that Judge Douglas will not deny that he was then in favor of overslaughing that decision by the mode of adding five new judges, so as to vote down the four old ones. Not only so, but it ended in the judge's sitting down on that very bench as one of the five new judges to break down the four old ones. It was in this way precisely that he got his title of judge."

Mr. Arnold, we may remark, is far more lenient to Mr. Douglas than another generation will be; his vulgarity and intemperance are all overlooked. And even polygamous, "miscegenate" Sam Houston is commended for his "deference and gentleness" to the fair sex. Mr. Lincoln himself he treats throughout as a lover and panegyrist, thereby manifestly doing him injustice, since the steady growth of the President in breadth of view and dignity of moral purpose is only to be concealed by those who judge of character by results and not by processes. It is not, for instance, difficult to prove, as Mr. Arnold does, in a valuable chapter, that Mr. Lincoln bequeathed an honorable and sagacious opinion of the true conditions of reconstruction; but this will appear much more creditable if we remember that he had previously made the fatal mistake (which Mr. Johnson eagerly adopted for the corner-stone of his bastard policy) of attempting to set up Louisiana and South Carolina on an exclusively white basis, and that narrowed still further by the local laws in force before the war and now revived by the President.

Mr. Arnold's last chapter is devoted to the constitutional history of the war. To make this review was a happy thought, but to make it thorough and authoritative required far more space than he could allow it. He has marked out the ground for some perhaps more competent publicist, who will acknowledge indebtedness to him for the suggestion.

GAYARRÉ'S PHILIP II.*

The "Introductory Letter by George Bancroft," which is prefixed to this volume, is rather singular in some respects. Mr. Bancroft says that "the development of the national mind would be imperfect if each part of the country did not contribute its stream to the great river of public opinion." And he thinks Rives's "Life of Madison" "the most valuable contribution of the last winter (1865-6) to the history of the American Constitution and Union." But Mr. Rives's analogies, Mr. Bancroft thinks, as "drawn from the Greek republics and applied to ours, are founded upon erroneous notions." One of Mr. Bancroft's friends, "on finishing the volume (Rives's 'Life of Madison'), said that it had to him all the interest of a novel." Mr. Bancroft thinks the "History of Louisiana under the French, Spanish, and American Domination," written by Mr. Gayarrê, "the fruit of thorough research," and that it "takes a very high rank among the best histories of the several States." But about the book under consideration, Gayarré's "Philip II.," for which the letter was prepared, he says very little, and that little he says very guardedly. It is written with care and vivacity, he says, and the mind of the author when he wrote it rose superior to the influences of superstition. And Mr. Gayarré, Mr. Bancroft says, has a quick eye for the picturesque and a rapid movement in his narrative, and discerns and portrays the social and political tendencies of the reign which he describes. All which would be high praise if justly accorded to some monkish chronicler of the dark ages; but seems to want something when one looks for the characteristics of a writer who follows Robertson, to say nothing of Prescott and Motley.

The book is a historico-biographical review article, in the manner of Macaulay's, expanded into a volume. It begins with Philip on his deathbed suffering with fortitude and in undisturbed peace of mind the pangs of a combination of diseases at once excruciating and loathsome. The king seemed to enjoy a conscience void of offence, to wait for death as a man might who had deserved well of his fellow-creatures; to all appearance died without a thought of remorse and in the confidence of salvation. This, Mr. Gayarré thinks, constitutes the man a psychological curiosity, and the work before us is his contribution towards an elucidation of the mystery. So we are told how fanatical a Roman Catholic Philip was, that he, no doubt, believed the cause of the Church was to be advanced by all means, and that deeds of blood or treachery committed in her interest were in no respect crimes, but were acts not only justifiable, but praiseworthy. We are told, also, that Philip was a firm believer in the doctrine of the divine right of kings to govern; that the monarch was God's temporal, as the Holy Father was God's spiritual, vicegerent on earth; that he who attempted to restrain the monarch's power committed sacrilege as well as treason. Which of these two ideas exerted the predominating influence on Philip's habitual way of thinking and acting, Mr. Gayarré thinks is questionable. He inclines to the supposition that, in Philip's conception of the relation between royalty and the Catholic faith, they were as twin sisters bound together by mysterious ligaments, which could not be severed without fatal results to both. To prove this view of Philip the true one, and to illustrate the traits of his remarkable character—his taciturnity, his immobility, his patience, his cruelty, his tortuous, intriguing caution, his habit of procrastination, his indefatigable industry, his way of puttering and meddling in the smallest concerns of the state and of individuals—Mr. Gayarré wanders discursively, backwards and forwards, without regard to chronology, over the whole period of Philip's reign. But he relates his corroborative evidence with a fulness that distracts the reader's attention from the point which the evidence was meant to prove, and the result is that the book produces a very confused impression. A history of Philip's reign it was not the author's plan to give, and he does not attempt to give it; so we have a history which the author's intention of making an essay has spoiled, and an essay which is spoiled by the intrusion of too much history. It is a history of Philip II. in which the rebellion in the Netherlands is barely mentioned, the war against England is barely mentioned, the death of Don Carlos, the life and death of Don John of Austria, are barely mentioned; it is an essay on Philip II., in which a thousand trifles are told and in which Philip cannot be plainly seen. So the book succeeds in being unsatisfactory both for what it tells and for what it does not tell.

* "The History of Abraham Lincoln and the Overthrow of Slavery. By Isaac N. Arnold, late Member of Congress from Illinois." Clarke & Co., Chicago; Jos. Wilson, Jr., New York.

* "Philip II. of Spain. By Charles Gayarré. With an Introductory Letter by George Bancroft." New York: W. J. Widdleton. 8vo, pp. 366.

As for how it tells it, the reader may partly judge by a sentence or two which we quote. This is written of the trial of Antonio Perez:

> "Be it as it may, as soon as the king arrived in Aragon another change took place in this extraordinary trial, which seemed to be constantly assuming different hues like the dying dolphin."

With equal vivacity he describes the ill effects of the interference of the extraordinary councils with the ordinary administration of justice:

> "The Cortes complained that it produced confusion and many difficulties which greatly retarded and perplexed the transaction of public business. Their complaint was certainly well founded. The curriculum of the state was already but too notoriously known as a slow coach. It was intolerable to have poles thrust athwart its wheels further to impede their sluggish rotation."

This is Spain under Charles V.:

> "If Spain was not Pallas, springing from the disrupted brow of Jupiter, and received by Olympus and admiring nations as the acknowledged goddess of wisdom in the panoply of war, she certainly was the heroine of Christianity, wielding in her robust faith the lance of Ithuriel, sallying in the romantic spirit of true chivalry in quest of adventures for the honor of the mother of God, wearing her colors as those of the proclaimed lady of her love and allegiance, and believing, like the Hebrews, in the special and constant interposition of Heaven. Such was the appearance which she presented externally, and well might Europe be struck with admiration and fear. It was no mean champion who had entered the arena, and flung down his gauntlet in the contest of national ambition and supremacy."

The style, we are bound to say, is considerably inferior to that in which Mr. Gayarré's "History of Louisiana" is written, and that work is, as Mr. Bancroft says, a work of care and research. Whoever should estimate Mr. Gayarré's abilities and services by this quite worthless book would make a mistake.

Paris; including Routes from the Sea Harbors of Northern France to Paris, the Rhine and Switzerland to Paris, the Rhine and Switzerland. Handbook for Travellers. By K. Baedeker. (L. W. Schmidt, New York.)—For all who do not care for elaborate description, doubtful criticism, and a profusion of historical reminiscences, such as Murray's books afford, there are no guide-books like Baedeker's. They are of convenient size, contain everything that the ordinary traveller wants to know, told accurately, sensibly, and succinctly. Their list of hotels and restaurants is generally trustworthy, and may be consulted with confidence by persons to whom expense is of some consequence. The hand-book of Paris before us is excellent in every way, and gives, besides a sufficiently minute description of the city, the two ordinary routes by which Americans usually enter and leave Paris. As there is no American hand-book which is worth carrying, travellers cannot do better than start with this one.

Wiley & Son publish a large map of Paris for the use of visitors to the great Exhibition which, as far as we have been able to test it, seems accurate enough; but, not being mounted on linen, is for a traveller almost worthless. Booksellers ought to remember that there is no use in offering a folded paper map of a city to a tourist.

Wisconsin in the War of the Rebellion. By Wm. De Loss Love. (Chicago: Church & Goodman. 1866. 1 vol. 8vo, pp. 1,144.)—The thick volume of Mr. Love not only presents a history of the honorable part which Wisconsin bore in the suppression of the rebellion, but also begins with a succinct sketch of the settlement and growth of that young and vigorous State from the time when it was first explored by the French missionary Nicolêt in 1639. This is followed by a brief account of the origin and spread of slavery, the enactment of the Fugitive Slave Law, which Wisconsin was one of the first States to pronounce unconstitutional, and the series of events which led to the bombardment of Fort Sumter and the great uprising of the North. In the war which ensued Wisconsin has a long and bright "roll of honor." With a population of 868,937, she sent to the field fifty-three regiments of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, and fourteen batteries of light or heavy artillery. Nearly 11,000 of her citizen soldiers were killed in action or died in service.

In this, as in every record of the war, there is one sickening chapter entitled "Rebel Prisons." But we need not recount the horrors which such names as Belle Isle, Salisbury, and Andersonville suggest to every mind. From these pens of misery, in which cruelty revealed its most revolting features, the reader will gladly turn to the labors of the Sanitary Commission, and follow the bright feet of Christian charity over battle-fields and through hospitals and soldiers' homes. Never before in the history of the world did the sweet and generous fruits of culture and civilization grow so close to the wastes and jungles of barbarism.

Mr. Love's volume contains twenty-six steel-plate portraits, most of which (especially those by Ritchie or Buttre) are well executed; in several instances, however, the Western Engraving Company, Chicago, has failed to give the life-like expression, although, in the case of persons deceased, this may have been the fault of the photograph.

The Rev. Mr. Sourball's European Tour; or, The Recreations of a City Parson. By Horace Cope. (Philadelphia: Duffield Ashmead. 1867.)—A score or more of small quarto sketches, that may claim at least the merit of originality, of the moving incidents of a city parson's visit to Europe. Not a few churches and not a few congregations will find a personal interest in seeing the clever, not ill-natured, not very powerful fun that is roughly pen-and-inked at the growing taste of city parsons to find their only relaxation from their parochial duties in a trip across the water. Of course some too weak brethren will find something personal in the allusions and illustrations. But there is really so much to be said on their side of the question that they will hardly take this little book as a text on which to say it. The practical exclusion of our clergymen here from all positive intercourse with men and women in matters outside the church has the result of making them in many respects a sort of close corporation. This is in itself a fault; and a mild protest, such as Mr. Sourball's Tour, may cure them of the fault of being, and allowing themselves to be, set aside for weekly exhibition in the pulpit. The sooner clergymen are brought into our daily life like other professional men, the better for them and the better for the world in which they work. As Goldwin Smith remarks, even "the salt of the earth is dug out of the earth," and it may as well frankly confess the connection. Though let us not be understood as charging that the fault is wholly or chiefly the salt's.

Trials of an Inventor. Life and Discoveries of Charles Goodyear. (New York: Carlton & Porter.)—The life of Charles Goodyear was eminently one of severe trial, patience, and indomitable perseverance in the work to which he gave himself. That he had a genius for it, and the greatest enthusiasm in it, is seen at every step of his progress. His entire life seems to have been free from all that was mercenary, and to have been governed by the pure motive of making a discovery which should prove a great blessing not only in his day, but for all time. A life so single in purpose in the common routine, and among the common orders of men, has in it a vein of romance; but the obstacles he overcame, his disappointments, impoverishment, and incredible vicissitudes, invested his work with the higher qualities of heroism and great achievement. The success of the discovery and its immense benefit to his fellow-men have sealed it as a great work.

This little volume recites the simple story of his labors. In his early manhood he conceived the idea that gum-elastic could be applied to various most useful purposes in the economy of life, and that he was commissioned to work out the problem. From the humblest beginnings, through crushing poverty and privation, through obloquy, amid the keenest sufferings of a devoted family, he never lost the inspiration of his thought. With him it was truly a religious mission. And when he had finally discovered the vulcanizing process after more than six years of experiment, and a fortune was apparently within his grasp, he still put aside all ease and luxury, using the profits of his manufacture as a means of perfecting it. The process of curing the sheet of rubber entirely through, so that it would resist alike heat, cold, and the strongest acids, was discovered in 1839. Yet it required several years of experiment to be able to stop the process at the exact point of heat and time where the gum would be divested of its native adhesiveness. The difficulty will be seen from the fact that it takes a year, even at this day, for a man to learn to conduct the process with certainty. The process of making rubber cloth by mixing it with the fibre of other fabrics he regarded next in importance. This required a long series of experiments. Having secured his patent in 1844, he soon after issued what may be styled a prophetic circular, in which he enumerated the great variety of purposes in the domestic and mechanic arts, and in alleviating human suffering, to which this discovery would be applied. Like most inventors he was devoid of financial skill, and while from his achievement others reaped vast pecuniary rewards, he died leaving no legacy to his children except a pure name and the associations of a life devoted to the good of his race.

The story of his labors and trials, his imprisonment for debt both at home and in France, where, in the Great Exposition, he fitted a "vulcanite court" which, with the exhibition of his wares, cost nearly $50,000; his long-continued litigation, in which he, with those holding his licenses, paid Mr. Webster $25,000 to defend his patent against piracy; his serenity and faith amid all reverses, his Christian benevolence and happy death—all unite to make this a record of unusual interest, and one which, better than Mr. Parton's (to which this is largely indebted), is adapted to convey to the young the most important lessons in industry, enthusiasm, and goodness.

Joubert. Some of the "Thoughts" of Joseph Joubert. Translated by George H. Calvert, author of "First Years in Europe," etc. Preceded by a notice of Joubert by the translator. (Boston: William V. Spencer. 1867.)—If Mr. Calvert would confine himself to translating other men's thoughts his countrymen would no doubt appreciate his services as they cannot when these services assume the form of his own reminiscences and lucubrations. Therefore let no one be deterred from opening this casket and examining the thoughts of Joubert because the author of "First Years in Europe" hands him the key. Those who have read Matthew Arnold's essay on Joubert can well afford to skip the introductory notice with which Mr. Calvert favors us. Those who are not so fortunate will find here a few facts in the life of Joubert that will be interesting in connection with his thought, but little more. Joubert's life was singularly uneventful. An estimate of his character and genius is what the reader wants, and that Mr. Calvert does not give him save in a very general and superficial way. An intelligent reader can form a more satisfactory opinion by a perusal of the "Thoughts" than by hearing anything that the translator has to say. Joubert was a tender plant rooted in the past, and shrinking from the present. "I need to be shone on with looks of favor," he says. He had high thoughts, but they were not vitally related to the life of men about him except on the side of art. In his literary judgments he reveals his highest power. Here he is strong as well as nice, vigorous as well as fine. His political judgments stand at the opposite extreme, and are less satisfactory than any of his others. Before the awful drama of the French Revolution he stood blind and helpless. "The Revolution drove my mind from the world of reality, by making it too horrible for me." And this failure to perceive on his part was rooted in his anti-social disposition. The social aspects of human nature did not interest him. His concern was with the inner life of men, and their relations to the infinite. In the domain of the affections, and most of all in the æsthetic world, he touches bottom and is always perfectly at home. Despite his own inclinations, it is a matter of regret that he did not write more freely. There was something very morbid in his passionate desire to get a volume into a page and a page into a word. Arnold is certainly right in thinking that his aphorisms are the least satisfactory portions of his thought. As the body would not enjoy being fed with a nutritive paste containing all the chemical properties that ensure vitality, so does not the mind enjoy being fed with proverbs. The exercise of discrimination and elimination is more enjoyable than mere reception, to which the method of Joubert would degrade his reader's task. But it must be remembered that Joubert's object was to improve himself. And his method was doubtless well adapted to his end.

Ripley's System of Map Drawing. By E. L. Ripley, Michigan State Normal School. (New York: Barnes & Co. 1866.)—Geography is best learned in its natural connection with history. The school-books of the future will present the three subjects of elementary or outline history, geography in the sense of boundaries, distances, and outlines, and that part of geography which deals with soil, climate, and productions in their proper relations to one another. The geography now taught in most school-rooms is generally forgotten after passing out of the school-room door. Nobody—no child—forgets the geographical character once shown him of the lands where historical events interesting to him have once happened. We all know school-boys of twelve who know ancient geography a great deal better than modern, because they are interested in Numantia and Carthage for the sake of old wars, Hannibal and Scipio, Hispani and Carthaginians, while they have not been taught to care for Saragossa and Palafox, or Algiers and "Commodore" Decatur.

To the common system of geography, good for occupying in a not unhealthy manner the time of children who would otherwise be idle, map-drawing is a good auxiliary. When taught in a skilful, complete manner, by a sort of simplified triangulation, as has been successfully done, it rises to more than this; but that cannot be the case with young children in common schools. For them, copying by eye and hand, with the help of a vertical line or two, or a circle, or any other easily drawn mathematical form, is quite sufficient. And so is tracing—transferring the tracings afterward. It amounts merely to a simple form of mnemonics, and the children may be left to show their own preferences.

This book is as good as another. The plan followed ought not to be designated by the name of a "system." It will do to guide an ignorant or over-occupied teacher and to keep a class all in the same path. The illustrations are good staring abstracts of maps, easy to see and understand.

Daily Hymns; or, Hymns for Every Day in Lent. (Boston: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1867.)—This small volume contains a hymn for Ash Wednesday, for Easter Day, and for every day between. The range of authors laid under contribution by the editor is a wide one, including Adelaide Anne Procter and Thomas of Celano. The most frequent contributor is a certain "A. G. R.," whom we do not know, but whose verses are graceful, show command of metres and of the poetico-religious diction, and suffer no more than those of many others of the better known contributors by their juxtaposition with the works of the renowned hymnists. We should say that all who endeavor to observe Lent might find this book convenient and helpful.

Recent Republications.—We will not say that our "land travel or seafaring" with Jonathan Romer among his tropical princesses and lions and palms takes us to any region whither it is important we should go; but, at all events, we are taken millions of miles from Wall Street and Woman's Rights and Reconstruction and Anthony Trollope's novels, and the business and dulness of life generally. Herein, we suppose, lies the reason why "Kaloolah" is read not without pleasure, and why it is republished after having been for some years out of print. It is one of Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son's books.

> "Venice, Venice, none Thee unseen can prize,
> Who hath seen Thee too much will Thee despise."

So "J. H." wrote "to Robert Brown, Esquire, at the Middle Temple, from Venice," two hundred years ago and more. But he believed none of it; he was only quoting "a common saying that is used of this dainty City," and himself was deeply enamored of his "hospitable Maid." "What cannot she afford," he cries, "for humane pleasure and delight?"—"a place where there is nothing wanting that heart can wish; Renowned Venice, the admiredst City in the World;" "this Virgin City," "still gay, flourishing, and fresh, and flowing with all kind of bravery and delight;" "this ancient, wise republic;" "this rare City." Much better than the hard saying above quoted was he pleased, he said, with this of Sannazarius:

> "When Neptun saw in Adrian Surges stand
> Venice, and give the See Laws of command,
> Now Jove, said he, Object they Capitol
> And Mars proud walls: This were for to extol
> Tyber beyond the Main, both Towns behold,
> Rome men thoul't say Venice the Gods did mould."

The delightful old "Clerk of the Council" would be well content if he could know how much has been done by a man of his own name, not improbably of kin to him, to throw discredit on the harsh distich. One reads the "Venetian Life" and feels that Venice is not "unseen" by him since Mr. Howells has seen it for him, and the reader is one of a thousand if the book does not help him more than his eyes would to "prize" Venice justly. As for the second injurious verse, the man (of all who have described it) who has seen Venice most and knows it best says, "It has never lost to me its claim upon constant surprise and regard, nor the fascination of its excellent beauty, its peerless picturesqueness, its sole and wondrous grandeur." There can be little need of speaking to our readers in commendation of "Venetian Life." Those critics who have seen St. Mark's and the Rialto declare that Venice itself is in the book; their testimony is not needed when the question is of the author's charming humor and the grace of his style. This new edition, which Hurd & Houghton have just issued, contains a chapter, not before published, on Venetian commerce. The chapter on "Holidays" is enlarged by ten pages, and there is a brief index which is of some small value. It is a volume that every one of us who likes excellent reading, and would encourage excellent writing, owes to his book shelves. If they are too full already, eight out of ten American works may be pulled down to make room for it, and the library will be the richer.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son have issued two volumes of a series which they designate as "Railway Classics," and, whatever that phrase may mean, these books are certainly more attractive in every way than the bulk of those which are forced upon us in the cars. The print is clear, the paper good, and the purple covers as substantial as may be without being cloth or boards. Irving's "Traveller" consists of a great variety of short tales in which Italians and Englishmen, tourists and banditti, play a very heavy part, while New England is made sponsor to "The Devil and Tom Walker," and New York to "Wolfert Webber." Irving's humor, always broadly disposed, is well enough suited to the easy habits of the rail, and the desperate straits of his voyagers are particularly enjoyable in the midst of perils no greater than a drunken switch-tender, a tardy express train, or an open draw. But one sentimentally inclined may prefer the second volume, called "Maga Stories," which have been selected with judgment from Putnam's Magazine, and in some sort, by reviving the best portions of that respectable periodical, do justice to its memory even while they bring its death to mind. The price of adventures in travel and in love is alike but seventy-five cents—a small toll to oblivion of the Camden and Amboy conspiracy against the rights and comforts of passengers.

In their singular list of the most entertaining and absorbing works published—"White Scalpers," "Ladies' Guides," "Lives of Highwaymen," "War Novels by Henry Morford," "Scenes in Arkansas," "G. W. M. Reynolds's Works," "Dow's Patent Sermons," "Green's Books on Gambling," and many more of which the natural home is the back-country circulating library—Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers occasionally have a good book which is thus made as cheap to the reading public as the not good books that constitute the bulk of the publications of that house. Of the delightful "Initials" they have recently made a volume, rather good-looking outwardly, though the back of it is disfigured by the usual patches of gilding, the shield and pelican and open book; inside, the paper is poor, and with the four hundred and third page begin the Peterson advertisements. Bound in paper the novel can be had for a dollar and a half, in cloth for two dollars.

The same firm have just issued another volume of their cheap edition Dickens—"David Copperfield." The familiar figures of Mrs. Gummidge and Mr. Micawber and young Mr. Heep and Mr. Peggotty and Em'ly and the rest are recognizable, albeit sometimes not without difficulty, in these copies of the illustrations designed by Browne, and, on the whole, the reader may properly be glad that they are given with the text. Indeed, to those who used to read Dickens's works as he wrote them, these old illustrations are a necessary part of the books.

CONGRESS AND THE CONSTITUTION.

NONE of our readers will ever suspect us of too great a reverence for Congressmen; and we think that we cannot justly be charged with want of respect for the Constitution of the United States. We have all along urged the adoption of a constitutional policy, both by the President and Congress; and while warning those who seek to make the Constitution a means of ruining the country that the nation would not and could not be expected to submit to strangulation by law, we have neither said nor believed that any such result would be produced by a fair interpretation of the Constitution.

Some journals—the New York Times for one—which, during the war, unhesitatingly justified the suspension of the habeas corpus without the authority of Congress, the establishment of military commissions in loyal States, and various other measures the unconstitutionality of which is no longer in doubt, if it ever was—are now amazed and afflicted at what they assume to be the unquestioned disregard of Congress for the Constitution. In this lamentation they are of course joined by that larger number of journals which denounced the unconstitutional acts of Mr. Lincoln, but applauded to the skies the more unconstitutional (because less necessary) acts of Mr. Johnson.

We do not propose to investigate in detail all the acts of Congress which are thus criticised, nor can we fully discuss the questions raised upon any one of these measures. But when it is taken for granted not only that the action of Congress is utterly violative of the Constitution, but that nobody imagines it to be otherwise, it may be well to indicate, however briefly, the grounds of a different conclusion. Some of our readers may be impatient with the subject, for ever since John C. Breckinridge uttered his jeremiads over the violation of the Constitution, while himself preparing to destroy it, the mass of loyal citizens have been too much disgusted with the whole plea of unconstitutionality to listen even to a refutation of it. But this feeling will and should pass away.

The first and most hackneyed objection to the action of Congress is in respect to its "exclusion of ten States." No one reading the articles written on this point would suspect that Congress justified this exclusion upon any other ground than that such was its will and pleasure. Yet the writers are perfectly aware that a large portion of Congress honestly believe that the "ten States" have entirely ceased to exist; while nearly three-fourths of Congress are fully satisfied that none of these States have valid and regular governments. The latter ground has been finally taken by the dominant party, and it is one which is incontrovertibly sustained by the facts. If those governments were regularly organized, it is scarcely possible to conceive of any usurpation which, being a de facto government, will not be regular. No argument can be needed to show that, if the State governments are invalid, the senators and representatives chosen under their direction are properly excluded.

The next objection is to the suspension of the habeas corpus by act of Congress, a measure for which we have no special affection, but as to which we must here consider only the question of legitimate power, and not the question of expediency. It is said that the rebellion is over, and therefore that the power to suspend this writ has expired. It is true that all organized war is over; but is it to be imagined that the suspension of the writ must cease upon the instant that the last rebel army lays down its arms? Do all the rights of war cease at that moment? If so, no prisoner of war could have been lawfully detained after that time, and all the precautions and machinery incident to a state of war must then have been instantly abandoned. We all know that there is no such rule. Mr. Johnson certainly never acted upon it. No government or military commander ever did. The state of war lasts until society is restored to its natural and normal condition. If the war is between distinct nations, it lasts until a treaty is signed, even though months elapse, during which the vanquished nation has not a man under arms. If the war is a civil one, it lasts until civil government is fully restored by legitimate authority. This has not been done in the Southern States. Mr. Johnson thinks it has, and utterly ignores all contrary opinions. His veto messages have been carefully framed not to controvert the arguments by which Congress justified its action, but to give the impression to the world at large that no such arguments were thought of by any one. There is something ingenious, but not ingenuous, in this mode of carrying on a public controversy; and the fact that ten men read the veto messages to one who reads the speeches or other arguments in confutation of them, gave Mr. Johnson an immense advantage. Such tricks of argument are common among unscrupulous lawyers, and it is by some such persons, we surmise, that the Presidential messages have been written.

Of the same class is the objection to the recent law regulating the elective franchise in the rebel States. Mr. Johnson suggests, with an air of mild surprise, that it has never before been deemed within the power of Congress to regulate that subject within any of the States. The fact that these States had become so utterly disorganized as to make the interference of the national Government necessary, in pursuance of an express provision of the Constitution, and the further fact that he had himself acted upon this theory, regulating the right of suffrage in these same States according to his own will, he entirely keeps out of sight.

This poor example of an unworthy Executive is religiously followed by all his supporters and apologists. They gladly quote every hasty expression of impatience with constitutional restraint which they can find in the speeches of Congressmen opposed to the President's doctrine; but they never allow their readers to suspect that the Congressional policy is believed by any one to be warranted by the Constitution. The establishment of martial law in the rebel States is probably the most doubtful of any of the measures of Congress; yet its validity, assuming the continuance of the war, has been expressly affirmed by four judges of the Supreme Court, one of them being a Georgia Democrat. Nor did the opinion of the majority of the court in the Milligan case at all affect this question, unless by inference it conceded the power to Congress. Mr. Johnson certainly claimed this power for himself, maintaining and administering martial law until civil government in his opinion was regularly organized. Congress simply proposes to do the same thing until in its opinion civil government is regularly organized. Its power to do so is far more clear than was Mr. Johnson's, while its jurisdiction to determine the validity of the governments set up at the South is indisputable.

In conclusion, we expect always to advocate a strict adherence to the Constitution, but not a strict construction of it. Such a construction has been vehemently advocated, but never maintained. Jefferson, who was its ablest advocate among our earliest statesmen, was compelled to violate it; and Calhoun himself would have done so had he been President in a time of emergency. No human wisdom could frame a detailed plan of government that would not at some period suffocate the nation if strictly construed. We do not believe that the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated the possibility of such a war as we have just witnessed, and we therefore do not believe that all its restrictions were designed to be severely applied to such a case. A very wide scope must be allowed to legislative action under such difficulties, and a liberal interpretation should be given to the general words of the Constitution. But we do not imagine that Congress is absolved by these difficulties from obedience to the fundamental law, nor have we seen any evidence that Congress supposes itself to be so. It has preferred some other dictionary to Johnson's, and this is the origin of all the trouble.

THE PROSPECT AT THE SOUTH.

THE addresses of Messrs. Wade Hampton, Arthur, Talley, and others to the colored men the other day in Charleston, S. C., prove pretty clearly that those were right who maintained that negro suffrage, if it did nothing else, would at least secure decent treatment for the negroes from their white neighbors. If we had not witnessed so many wonderful things during the last six years, we should find it exceedingly difficult to believe that the white orators who spoke on this occasion were really men of the same breed as those who supplied South Carolina with its law, morals, theology, and political philosophy before the war. If there was anything fixed in Southern notions of the arrangement of the universe, it was that the negro was utterly incapable of taking care of himself, that he would only work under the lash, that education would simply develop his powers of mischief, and that civilization could only be preserved in communities in which negroes abounded by the rigid domination of the whites. When, therefore, one hears Mr. Wade Hampton informing a crowd of colored men that they are fellow-citizens, and that the prosperity of the State will depend on their cordial co-operation with the whites in industry and politics; and Mr. Arthur informing them "that education would go far to make them mentally and morally the equals of the whites;" and Mr. Talley inviting them "to work shoulder to shoulder with the whites" for the regeneration of the South, and to trust to their "old friends," their white neighbors, rather than to Northerners, those who refused to believe that the franchise could do the negro any good may well rub their eyes. Luckily, too, the character of this meeting has been such as to make all arguments based on what occurred at it à fortiori arguments. It took place in the chief city of the State in which most of the extreme Southern theories of politics and religion were hatched and preached; in which the negroes bear the largest proportion to the white population, and in which, therefore, their admission to political equality may be expected, on the old Southern theory of their character and capacity, to work the greatest mischief; and, though last not least, the white speakers were drawn from the class which has always been foremost in its hostility not only to negro emancipation but to free society, or to any form of society in which the laborer is not owned. When Wade Hampton comes out and avows his submission to the new order of things and his hopefulness about it, the weaker brethren of his political church may well take courage and be of good cheer.

We have always feared that if the work of educating the Southern negroes were allowed to flag when the franchise was bestowed on them, if they were not, as fast as possible, brought into contact with Northern opinion by the diffusion amongst them of the arts of reading and writing, they might so use their political power as to do serious injury both to themselves and the country. That this is no chimera we know from what we see happening amongst the Irish wherever they are congregated in large masses, as they are now in some of our large cities and in the coal districts of Pennsylvania. And we have feared that if the provision of means of popular education were left optional with the States, the whites might be so opposed to it and the negroes so indifferent about it that schools might never be established in sufficient numbers to cope with the dense and almost heathen ignorance with which the South is overshadowed. We feared, too, that if the provision of security for life and property at the South were left, as a great many good people a year ago wanted it to be left, to "the laws of political economy," Northern philanthropy would, once the troops were withdrawn, be allowed but scant opportunities for its work. And we confess we have not got over these fears. It is true there is manifested amongst the negroes a very remarkable and, we believe, an increasing thirst for knowledge, and that the best class of whites do see clearly the extent to which Southern prosperity must depend on the intelligence of its inhabitants of all races. But, on the other hand, we have not yet seen the normal working of the new state of things. The whites are busily engaged at present in getting rid of the Yankees. They have tried one way and failed; they are now trying another, and how they will behave when the Yankees are gone we believe nobody knows. We say, therefore, that there is no certainty as to the course Southerners will take in the matter of education once the hand of the North has been taken off them, and the data we have for the formation of a judgment as to the extent to which the negroes will be able or ready to provide it for themselves are still too slight to warrant anybody in speaking confidently about it.

But one thing is clear, that the ballot will provide for the negro, what we have always predicted it would provide, the first essential of civilization, and that is security from violence. This comes before education and before everything else; without it civilization is not possible, and the Federal Government could not have effectually provided it. But with the ballot every negro has the means of punishing any officer of the Government for inattention to any claim for lawful redress. Every politician now knows that to succeed at the South he must address colored people in a civil and respectful manner, and the habit once formed amongst politicians, it will rapidly diffuse itself amongst all other classes. Whenever we have to co-operate with men in any field, we must be polite to them, must at least pretend to respect them; and, exaggerated as the assertion may seem, there is nothing which raises a degraded race more rapidly than respectful treatment at the hands of those whom they have been accustomed to look up to. No men or women of ordinary mould can long respect themselves it nobody else seems to respect them, and although self-respect is not the first of the virtues, it lies at the root of nearly all the others. In reforming people who have for any cause fallen very low, half the work is done when we have given them a proper sense of their own dignity and value. This, too, we fully believe the suffrage will give the freedmen, and from this we confidently expect all other things to flow.

Moreover, there is one other force at work which is likely to assist largely in reconciling the two races to each other, and that is cotton. The predictions of the sages who saw in emancipation the ruin of Southern industry have been signally falsified. Even the most sanguine people did not expect the crop of 1865 to be over 1,500,000 bales, or about half the crop of tolerably good years before the war, and this low estimate was certainly justified by all the apparent facts. It was the first crop after the close of the war, and it was picked in a country devastated by four years of hostilities, and in which the whole social system had been disorganized by emancipation. And yet it ran up to 2,700,000 bales; that is, to very nearly the same figure as some of the best crops of the slavery period. There have in like manner been very dismal forebodings as to the year 1866, owing to the ravages of the worm and the unsettled political and social condition of the country; but it now proves that the crop will reach at least 1,750,000 bales, and the prices have been drooping under this prospect for the last three months. In all business circles there is a wide-spread conviction that next year an unusually large crop may be expected—that a very large quantity of land is being put in cultivation this spring—and that there will be an abundance of steady labor to work the crop and pick it. So that, no matter what theories we may hold about negro capacity and white disposition, the fact remains that the South is gradually recovering itself, and that this recovery is in great part due to the steady industry of men, working voluntarily for moderate wages, to whom whole schools of philosophers and physiologists only four years ago denied any higher place in creation than that of beasts of burden.

THE CONNECTICUT ELECTION.

THERE is always some good reason for taking special interest in the Connecticut election. The State is small and the election annual. But parties are very evenly balanced, the Republicans having a natural majority of but little over 1,000 on a poll of 90,000 votes. So slender a difference would seem not difficult to overcome, at least occasionally, and therefore vehement efforts are frequently made to do so. The election takes place at the season when the political issues of the year are just taking shape, and Connecticut is the first really doubtful State that is called upon to pronounce judgment. Her decision has naturally much influence upon the not insignificant class who like to vote with the majority. In 1860, 1863, and 1866 these considerations led to desperate efforts on both sides to carry the State, and the result in each case had a marked effect upon the later elections.

The Republicans have invariably carried the State ever since 1856, but on three occasions by majorities very small and wonderfully uniform; their majority in 1857 being 546, and both in 1860 and 1866 exactly 541. In 1855, 1859, and 1865 they carried all the four members of Congress to which the State is entitled; in 1863 they elected three, and in 1857 and 1861 only two. Last spring the majorities in the Congressional districts were as follows: First, 128 Republican; Second, 1,887 Democratic; Third, 2,425 Republican; Fourth, 125 Democratic.

These figures alone show that the State must be considered very doubtful. But it must also be remembered that the Lieutenant-Governor and Secretary of State elected last year by the Republicans have gone over with Mr. Johnson into the opposite camp. Collector Babcock and Postmaster Sperry, who last year worked actively for the election of Governor Hawley, are now actively opposed to him. Senator Dixon, who was sent to the United States Senate by the Republican party, and who was at the worst inactive last spring when Mr. Johnson had not made his path of duty plain, is now doing his best to defeat the Republican ticket. It will therefore be seen that the result of the contest is even more uncertain than it was last year.

Nevertheless, as the defection of more important men in other States has failed to influence the people, we hope that the Republicans of Connecticut will not be materially injured by the desertion of a few office-holders. Governor Hawley is a popular and worthy candidate, and although his opponent, Mr. English, is immensely rich, while Governor Hawley is unable to spend much for even the legitimate expenses of the canvass, we think the wealth of Mr. English will have little effect outside of New Haven and Hartford.

In the Thirty-ninth Congress, Connecticut had four Republican representatives elected on the day that Richmond was captured—news peculiarly depressing to the Democrats of Connecticut, a majority of whom were sincere advocates of secession. Of these the member from the New Haven district must certainly be lost, as the majority in the district for McClellan was 871, and for English, last year, 1,887. We especially regret this, because the Republican nominee, Prof. Northrop, of Yale College, is the ablest candidate in the State. We fear the hopelessness of the district accounts for so good a nomination being made. Col. Henry C. Deming has a hard fight in the Hartford district against Richard D. Hubbard, who, we believe, was a War Democrat—a species bitterly despised by most of the Connecticut Democracy during the war, but greatly in request just now. Mr. English himself was thrown over by his party in 1865 for voting to abolish slavery, but they were very glad to take him up again in 1866. Mr. Starkweather, the Norwich postmaster, who resigned his office rather than be hampered in his opposition to Mr. Johnson, will be elected from the New London district, as he deserves to be. Mr. P. T. Barnum runs against William H. Barnum in the Fairfield district, and has a majority of 125 against him to start with.

The election is important, as indicating the popular judgment upon the recent action of Congress. It is certainly very desirable that there should be no appearance of hesitation at the North while the provisions of the reconstruction law are being carried out. There is no real change of public sentiment adverse to the policy of Congress; and any circumstance which should lead Mr. Johnson or the Southern people to believe otherwise, would only lead them to new acts of folly, involving them in further difficulties. Whatever losses the Republicans may sustain in Connecticut (and we have shown that they must lose one, and probably two, representatives) will be owing to circumstances wholly unconnected with national issues. We trust, however, that by re-electing their worthy governor with an increased majority, they will make it impossible to doubt the fidelity of the North to the cause of equal rights, or the determination of the people to maintain the wise policy adopted by Congress.

BARNUM AGAIN.

We print elsewhere a defence of Mr. P. T. Barnum not because there is anything particularly new in it, or anything favorable to him which we did not acknowledge in the article we wrote about him a few weeks ago, but because it is an excellent illustration of the flabby condition into which the judgment of a large number of very good people has fallen on all matters relating to the character and qualifications of public men. All that “J. B.” says on Mr. Barnum's behalf—and we do not doubt its accuracy—simply shows that Mr. Barnum is, outside of his museum, a very good citizen. But then as it is by the museum he has made his money and his reputation, we decline, in the interest of public morality, to admit that the museum has nothing to do with his qualifications for a seat in the national legislature. The country swarms with gentlemen who would very gladly have the public overlook the way in which they make their money, and fix its attention only on the way in which they spend it; but we hope the public will never enter into any such arrangement. The one gives a very much better insight into a man's character than the other can possibly give, and the way in which Mr. Barnum has become rich has been scandalous and injurious to public morality; and even if it had not been, a person who makes “humbug,” or, in other words, the extraction of small sums from gullible people on false pretences, his profession, is not fit, for a dozen reasons not purely moral, but very strong nevertheless, for a seat in the national legislature. The jocose way in which Mr. Barnum treats his performances in this line, so far from extenuating them, renders them, in our estimation, infinitely more repulsive and more likely to do mischief. It may be that the rival candidate, the other Barnum, is a bad man also; but then his election will do comparatively very little harm, because his party does not make the pretensions to morality that the Republican party does, and therefore its doings have comparatively very little moral influence. If the Copperheads had put P. T. Barnum up we should not have thought the matter worth much comment. The election of Morrissey in New York was a great disgrace; but suppose he had been nominated by the Republicans of New York, it would have been a still greater disgrace. As to Mr. Barnum's “noble letter” on the use of money at elections, we feel bound to say that the noblest and most pathetic passage on that subject we remember to have met with occurred in one of the last messages of that “old public functionary,” Mr. Buchanan. If the time ever comes when “noble letters” will be accepted as substitutes for “noble lives,” “J. B.” may rely upon it that we shall see our epistolary literature enriched by a body of doctrine, compared to which, either in bulk or unctuousness, the teachings of all the writers on ethics from Zoroaster down to Dr. Alden would hardly be worth mention.

Finally, the circumstance that Copperheads thank us for our article, and are circulating it widely, does not affect us at all unpleasantly. On the contrary, it causes us great gratification, because it assures us that what we have thought it right to say on a most important subject is reaching the eyes of those who stand most in need of it. The argument that what you say cannot be sound because some bad man likes it and agrees with it, is very frequently used, but we have never heard of its affecting anybody who retained his reasoning faculty in tolerable condition. It is no part of our business or of our aim to harass or annoy Copperheads or any other class of men, or to avoid saying things in which they are likely to take pleasure. The object of political discussion, as we understand it, is not to make the other party miserable, but to get good men into the Government. We do not rate too highly, we trust, the amount of service we are able to render to the Republican party; all we say is that it will never get any service from us but honest service, nor any that an intelligent writer who respects his own mind and conscience ought not to render. For the task of ranting, bellowing, calling names, “making faces at the enemy,” humbugging the Fenians, humbugging the “working-men,” and humbugging every class which has votes to dispose of, the party can always find plenty of zealous laborers, and has plenty of them now—and we wish it joy of them.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

Each day reveals more clearly the extent to which the position of the French Emperor has been shaken by the blunders of the last few years. The unfortunate coincidence of the total failure of his diplomacy in Germany with the total failure of the expedition to Mexico, and the necessity of making a heavy draft on the national energy in order to regain the ground thus lost, undoubtedly led to the late concessions to the Liberals touching the debates in the Corps Législatif and the position of the press. The mass of the people was opposed to the Mexican expedition from the outset. It does not take and never has taken any pleasure in distant conquests, and gave up a century ago all hope as well as all desire of founding a great colonial empire. The glory which is to satisfy a Frenchman's aspirations must be won in Europe, at his own door and under his own eyes, and won from an enemy of his own standing in civilization. The great names in his military annals are those of victories over Austrians, Prussians, Russians, and Englishmen; no victories over outlandish people beyond the seas can ever take their place. The exploits of the Orleans family in Algeria, brilliant as many of them were, and much as was made of them at the time, both by Horace Vernet and the press, really made very little impression on the popular imagination, and gave the princes of the house, in spite of their brilliant services in the field, very little hold on either the people or the army, as was clearly shown in 1848, and did little or nothing to redeem the king from the reproach, which finally damned him, of being a peaceable, grocer-like old body, whose policy and demeanor made France of small account in European councils. The Mexican expedition, therefore, even had it proved successful, would not have done enough for the reputation of its projectors to compensate for the expenditure of blood and money necessary to carry it on; nor would its late abandonment have, perhaps, worked very much mischief had it not occurred in the very year in which the Prussian campaign revealed the astounding fact that the fifteen years of the Napoleonic régime had done absolutely nothing for French influence and prestige, that the effects of the Crimean war and Italian war were neutralized by a single Prussian victory over Austria, and that France was consigned to a position unmistakably second-rate. The coincidence, in point of time, of two such defeats, of course raised the eyes of every thinking Frenchman from the events of the day to the whole field of Napoleonic policy, and the prospect has been found anything but cheering.

Unfortunately for the Emperor, there was for him but one way of repairing the disaster, and that was to double the army; to call 160,000 recruits under arms every year, instead of 80,000, so as to be able to bring as many men into the field as Prussia, or, rather, as the new North German Confederation. Not only, however, is this a cruel aggravation of the national misfortune, but it brings it home to all classes and conditions as nothing else could. It tells every peasant, in plain and unmistakable terms, that somebody has blundered, and that France has got to pay for the blunder in blood. Any government could, of course, raise large armies—the Restoration, or the Republic, or Louis Philippe. What was expected of the "saviour of society" was that, by wisdom and dexterity, he would either avoid the necessity of raising large armies or that, if they were raised, he would use them for the purpose of raising French influence to a higher point than ever, and not for the purpose of merely enabling France to lift up her head beside a power which, only one year ago, she would never have thought of treating as an equal.

The new army bill excited a great clamor; but there was absolutely no way of avoiding it. The other attempts made to repair the breach made in French influence, such as the almost puerile demand made for the left bank of the Rhine, only widened it, and increased the popular agitation. There was nothing left but to raise more men and provide a good breech-loader; but it does not take a great man to do this. As the best mode of silencing the more caustic critics and diverting popular attention, concessions, or what seemed to be concessions, were made to the legislature and to the press. The right of interpellation, or, in plain English, of questioning the ministers and getting answers from them, in reality creates a certain kind of ministerial responsibility which, though slight as yet, may be the basis of something real and substantial. So, also, the withdrawal of the press from the arbitrary rule of the Minister of the Interior and the transfer of its offences to the jurisdiction of the regular courts of law, although it may not at present, owing to the temper of the judges, effect any great improvement in the condition of the newspapers, recognizes at all events the great principle that nobody should be held answerable for anything he speaks or writes anywhere but before a judicial tribunal, and, this once recognized, the utmost freedom of speech may be looked forward to as at least attainable.

The misfortune of a despotic ruler is, however, that let him be ever so well inclined, he cannot substitute freedom for despotism without giving his own hold on power of any kind a terrible shaking. When he gives free play to the tongues of his subjects, the very first topic of discussion is sure to be the mistakes, follies, outrages, and shortcomings of the system from which they have just escaped. He cannot draw a curtain down on the past or sever its connection with the present. Accordingly, no sooner had it become certain that the press in France was entering on a new régime, and was no longer to be liable to suppression by the arbitrary fiat of the minister, than M. Emile Girardin, the veteran proprietor of La Liberté, the man of all others connected with the press in France who could inflict the deepest wounds, summed up the events of the last fifteen years in the columns of his paper, and showed in a criticism, of which nearly every word drew blood, that France is at this moment not only no better off, but very much worse off now than she was when the Emperor took charge of her in 1851; that the small additions made to her territory have been purchased by an enormous outlay of blood and treasure, and that in real influence in Europe she stands much lower than she did at the time of the coup d'état; and this being the case, of course the question arises, Where was the justification for that act? M. Girardin has been prosecuted, convicted, and fined, but the article has been read in every village in France.

To crown all, the great Exhibition of this year, which was intended to be an immense sop for the national vanity and a great gain for the Parisians, promises to prove a calamity for the Empire. The expense bids fair to surpass by far the original estimates, and a portion of the burden is accordingly about to be thrown on foreign nations, to their great disgust. The inside of the building has been fitted up in such very inflammable fashion that no company will ensure anything in it, and many exhibitors therefore refuse to send valuable articles. This, however, is but a small matter. But owing to the prospect of a great crowd, prices and house rents have risen so enormously as to excite serious discontent already among the working classes. The pay of the garrison has been raised, but the wages of the working classes cannot be raised, and the result is that the one great object of the whole undertaking seems likely to be missed. At the tail of a list of humiliations, already long, comes the attempt to form a confederation of Holland, Italy, Switzerland, and Belgium, against Prussia, which will probably fail. Both Switzerland and Belgium are well aware that to make such a confederation of any value they would have to place their military force at the disposal of France in case of war, and this, of course, would be virtually the first step towards the absorption of both of them into the French Empire.

SOLEMN TRIFLING.

THE important question of the clothes of our foreign ministers, or, as they are called in the lofty language of the Congressional reports, "diplomatic apparel," came up in the Senate on Wednesday of last week in the shape of a joint resolution, reported by Mr. Sumner from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, prohibiting American representatives abroad from wearing "court costume" on certain occasions. This important problem of what dress American ambassadors ought to wear when they go to see a king or emperor has been discussed several times within the last fifteen years, and the whole attention of some great minds has been directed to it, but, we believe, without reaching any satisfactory solution. One reason why the nation has ever been vexed by it is this: that diplomacy not being a regular profession with us, and appointments in the diplomatic service being made with reference solely to the candidate's political services at home, a great many persons from time to time make their way into foreign missions who, not having any taste or social judgment, cannot be trusted to dress themselves as representatives of the United States. There being no rule on the subject, some equip themselves for court ceremonials in costumes of their own invention which would suit a harlequin better than the ambassador of a republic; and others go into court circles in attire which might pass at a Southwestern barbecue, but which in the Old World simply procures for the wearers the reputation of being barbarians, and for the people who employ them the reputation of being fools.

Now, courts in Europe, as we not long ago had occasion to remark, are considered private houses. The king's palace is not, as the White House is, "an executive mansion," the property of the nation, in which a certain officer is allowed to reside temporarily and in which he is expected to receive all comers. Emperors and kings have as absolute and as well recognized a right to decide whom they shall invite to their palaces, or receive in them, as any man in America to decide whom he shall receive in his own house. Ambassadors do not go to court in their official capacity. They go as distinguished strangers, to whom the sovereign, as the first gentleman or lady in the country, feels bound to show attention. Usage—and in matters of dress there is no higher authority than usage—has in all European countries prescribed a certain costume for persons going to court, just as it has prescribed a certain costume for persons going to a private dinner party.

The dress in which a man goes to the Tuileries or to St. James's is, perhaps, somewhat more ridiculous than the dress in which a man goes to spend the evening with the Earl of Derby or M. Rouher; but there is no more moral or political significance in the one than in the other. Why do men wear black clothes and white cravats at dinner parties nowadays? To this there is no answer except that it gives pleasure to their hostess and her other guests to see them in that costume, and their wearing it is taken to be an indication of the respect in which they hold the entertainment. The very same thing may be said of court dress. Persons wear it at a particular house on festive occasions because other people do, because it looks nice; but no defence can be found for it either in principles of political philosophy or in political economy. If any great statesman or logician chooses to assail it, he is sure of an easy victory. But, then, if we had to justify, book in hand, all the little observances by which we seek either to gratify our own vanity or that of other people, or to adorn or beautify or smooth over intercourse with our fellows, we should soon find that the only thoroughly logical and "simple" costume was a bag with three holes in it, and the only permissible entertainment the distribution of broken victuals to paupers.

It seems to us that democracy has no "message," to use the cant phrase, to deliver with regard to dress. What democracy has been sent into the world to preach is liberty—liberty in clothes as well as in opinions, free play for individual taste as well as for individual faculties. When Congress, therefore, undertakes to prescribe what a minister shall not wear at a ball, it is guilty of just the same weakness as the monarch who prescribes what dress he shall wear. In both cases the idea which forms the base of the order is that a man's clothes are of great consequence and have a symbolic character—that knee-breeches and a bag-wig represent one principle and a plain suit of black another. But the truth is that if it be ridiculous to assert monarchical principles by wearing a court suit, it is also ridiculous to assert republican principles by wearing a frock coat and black satin vest.

With all this folly our Government ought to have nothing to do. Our business is to prove the insignificance and not the significance of clothes. If we have no better way of exemplifying our polity than displaying our minister in black broadcloth at court festivals, when everybody else wears gold lace, it is time we gave up exemplifying it altogether. What the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and both Houses of Congress ought to do is to dismiss the subject of ministers' clothes from their thoughts at once and for ever, and devote themselves to the task of providing good ministers. If we only send abroad able, educated, and accomplished men, of high character and honorable antecedents, and trained for their work, we may safely let them wear what kind of suit they please, and feel sure that neither our fame nor our interests will suffer in their hands. "A man 's a man" whatever covers his back, and as long as our whole civil service is in its present condition resolutions directed against particular kinds of breeches look very like a grand washing of the outside of the cup while within all is uncleanness. The Washington correspondent of the New York Times unconsciously touched upon the root of all the trouble the other day when, in approving of the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the usual stereotyped way, he said that when some of our ministers now got their court suits on, "the American citizen was entirely lost sight of." Anybody in whom the American citizen disappears under a court suit we may be sure never had much of it about him. The same correspondent lays down the rule that all our foreign ministers ought on all occasions to wear the dress of "a plain American gentleman." Why not have pictures of "the plain American gentleman" taken and sent to all our foreign legations, and despatch democratic tailors once a year on a tour of inspection to see if any diplomatic officer was departing from this great model?

ENGLAND.

London, March 8, 1867.

As I write we are still receiving reports of the second Fenian insurrection. The little sputter with which we were favored a short time back is not, it seems, to be the last; and the present is a rather more serious attempt at a rising. Shots have actually been fired and a few men killed. I shall, however, say nothing further about it in this letter, as the vast cloud of fiction under cover of which all Fenian operations commence has not yet had time to subside. We must wait a day or two before obtaining any trustworthy details.

The parliamentary campaign has meanwhile been so curious that it deserves some detailed description. The Conservative party, which began the session a month ago as a compact and united body in presence of an Opposition distracted, although numerically superior, has all at once gone to pieces. It is crushed, broken up, and demoralized, and that not from the assaults of an open enemy, but by an explosion from within. The essential virtue of a small body in presence of a larger hostile force is to be united; but even the steady pressure from without has been unable to restrain the spontaneous bursting tendencies of the Conservative party. I remarked to you some time ago that it was difficult to understand how a cabinet which included Mr. Disraeli and Lord Stanley on the one hand, and General Peel and Lord Cranbourne on the other, could be in harmony as to reform. It now turns out that such harmony was impossible. On Saturday last we were startled by hearing that General Peel and Lord Cranbourne, together with a more moderate minister, Lord Carnarvon, had left the cabinet. The explanations which followed have thrown a curious light upon the mysteries of parliamentary government. The profound secrecy in which Mr. Disraeli delights to wrap himself was calculated to give an impression that the cabinet had some deep-laid scheme of policy, which was suddenly to be sprung upon us like a mine. It now appears that the Government plans were concealed for the best of all reasons, namely, because they did not exist. Nobody could account for the rules by which Government was steering, for they were, in fact, drifting at random before the wind. They seem to have had two plans more or less in view: one was to offer a measure of enfranchisement sufficiently wide to take the wind out of the sails of agitation, but at the same time to endeavor to qualify the concession by a "plurality" of votes; that is, as they understand the word, by giving additional votes to persons with certain qualifications, such as paying income tax. Thus they meant to be ostentatiously liberal, and yet by a skilful sleight-of-hand to neutralize the effect of their concessions. The second plan was to offer a bill which should be a slightly modified edition of that which Mr. Gladstone introduced last session, just disfigured enough to satisfy their consciences and to enable them to vote for it with a certain show of consistency after rejecting Mr. Gladstone's bill. Thus the Liberal party would be compelled to accept their own offspring in a slightly new dress, and the Conservatives would get the credit of carrying it. However, the best-laid schemes may come to grief, and Mr. Disraeli's policy is only another example of the truth. The cabinet could not quite agree which plan to adopt, and they drifted on into the session with no distinct understanding. Then it was determined to proceed by resolutions—in other words, to lay a series of propositions before the House of Commons, and to shape a bill in accordance with the answers which the oracle should return. This plan of fishing for a policy egregiously failed. The House evidently would have nothing to do with the resolutions; they were vague and indecisive, and could only waste time uselessly; and the cabinet soon found that, willingly or unwillingly, they must produce some definite proposal at once. Then Mr. Disraeli came out with the second scheme I have mentioned. He spoke clearly and well in the speech which introduced it, but it was evident that he was acting a part and was speaking with the constraint of a man who has to father a scheme of which he inwardly disapproves. His own party sat in humiliated silence behind him, for to accept a reform bill at all is annoying to them; and the Liberals, of course, received the plan coldly. A very short discussion showed that it would satisfy nobody. A year ago it would have been accepted. Now the offer comes too late; it was merely ridiculous, and was laughed out of existence.

Hereupon the cabinet resolved to fall back upon the bolder plan; they would offer household suffrage and try to qualify it by some "plurality" device. But here, at last, this plan of doing anything and everything if only they might keep in office began to revolt some of the tougher Conservatives. Lord Cranbourne, Lord Carnarvon, and General Peel made a stand—it does not exactly appear upon what point; probably they thought that so plastic a government would give way even if the House of Commons should accept the concession offered and reject the cunning device for taking out the sting; or perhaps, even as presented, the Government scheme went too far for their consciences. Accordingly they resigned, and they and Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby have been making personal explanations ever since, exposed to a lively fire of more or less refined taunts from their opponents. The consequences to the Conservative party have been something unprecedented. They are humiliated and dispirited to the last degree. "What are you going to do now?" said a reformer, the other day, to a minister. "Whatever you bid us do," was the answer. It is not only the Conservatives who are puzzled. The position of parties reminds one of the old Commonwealth battles, such as Edgehill or Marston Moor, where the two armies were irrecoverably intermingled, and a general found that his forces were pierced through the centre, that his right wing was in the enemy's camp, his left wing retreating in disorder, and the enemy in as great a mess as himself. Thus there are at least five perfectly distinct political sections, of which only the extremes know plainly what they would be at. There are the Conservatives who still follow the ministers in office, who find themselves in the strange position of offering a suffrage so wide that it would last year have shocked half the Liberals; then there are the Conservatives who follow the ministers out of office, who are at heart stubborn old Tories, but who are also pledged to some kind of reform; next comes the small band of "Adullamites" who fight under Mr. Lowe's guidance. Mr. Lowe is a true liberal in all matters except the vital question of reform. He and his little band really object to all extension of the franchise, though they qualify their dislike by general terms of vague approval of some indefinite reform, and thus, though Liberals, find themselves isolated beyond the furthest wing of the Tory party. They have been frightened by their exposed position, and are endeavoring, with various success, to sneak back to their natural standards. Besides these fragmentary parties, there are the two great sections of the Liberals: those who follow Mr. Bright unflinchingly, and who alone of all parties know what they want and mean to have it; and those more moderate and perplexed Liberals who follow Mr. Gladstone, half fearing that they may get a rather larger dose of reform than they would like to swallow. Mr. Gladstone, I should say, has during this part of the session won the respect of all candid observers by the somewhat unexpected degree of prudence and self-restraint which he has exhibited.

There are many morals to be drawn from the state of things I have described, but I leave them to the discretion of your readers, only remarking the curious process by which, with remarkably little sincerity as to reform on any side of the House, each fraction has managed to pledge itself in succession to something more than it wanted. The only men who really wish for a substantial measure are the small body of ninety or a hundred Radicals; the only men who are not pledged deeply to support a substantial measure are the little band who follow Mr. Lowe. This has somehow come about in the distracting and uncertain party warfare which has taken place during the last year or two, when each section has been ready to promise anything in the future, and each section has found itself, to its great disgust, bound to redeem its pledges. And what will be the end of it? Can Mr. Disraeli, in command of a remnant of his own party and supported by the mass of the Opposition, carry a bill against the various discontents from his own side and the other? Can a man, say some cynics, gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles, or get a genuine reform bill from the Tory party? Will not so treacherous and uncertain a combination be sure to collapse in action? There are many fights to be fought before the slow length of a reform bill can be dragged through the House of Commons; there are months of work to be done, and at every turn there is abundant opportunity for skirmishing and delay, if not defeat; and beyond the House of Commons lies the dangerous defile of the House of Lords. A strong ministry with a large majority might force a passage, but a weak ministry with a party made up chiefly of its political opponents has a perilous task before it. To this others reply that the Tories are more utterly dispirited than the Austrians after Königgrätz, and will give up any position to be once well rid of the question; that from one source or another Mr. Disraeli can command a good working majority; and lastly, but most to the purpose, that there is a unanimous feeling in the country that the question ought to be set at rest, and that this dawdling and dodging and backing and filling are rapidly becoming intolerable and disgraceful. How this may be I know not, but I think that any one may see that, whatever the fate of this particular agitation, we are entering upon an era of agitation such as has not been known for years in England. Parliamentary reform just now obscures everything else; but on all sides—the army and navy, the church, the law, the land, trades unions, pauperism, education, and many minor matters—there are questions waiting for decision which will inevitably come forward before long with more emphasis than they have perhaps ever done. We are at the break-up of a quiet period, and are beginning somehow to doubt Pope's great aphorism, which has till lately been our creed, Whatever is, is right. If the progress of the reform debate does not impose upon me the necessity of attending to it exclusively, as it forces the more unwilling newspapers to do at present, I will endeavor to call your attention to some of these topics in future letters.

Correspondence.

[We are compelled by press of matter to hold over several letters until next week, amongst others, one from Mr. Weir Roosevelt, complaining of our recent article on the New York Board of Education.]

A WORD FOR MR. BARNUM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Dear Sir: Your recent leading article headed the "Two Hundred Thousand and First Curiosity," etc., and your advice in to-day's Nation to "every Connecticut voter to scratch Mr. P. T. Barnum's name as a religious duty," seems to me to emphasize a line of argument that, though pushed with your usual acuteness, I should say lacks your usual wisdom.

Will you permit a careful and enthusiastic reader of your paper, who lives near Mr. Barnum's competitor (Mr. W. H. Barnum) and who has had unusual facilities for knowing Mr. P. T. Barnum, to state the nature of the present Connecticut contest—especially in the Fourth District?

The Democratic party of Connecticut having nearly grasped a victory last spring by the aid of Andrew Johnson's well-managed apostasy in its favor, is now emboldened to make victory complete. The combined Democratic ticket—or a part of it only—represents millions of wealth; a considerable portion of this being wielded by the "Iron" Barnum, as he is called—though "copper" would be the fittest appellative. His friends boast that he will put $50,000 to the corruption fund in his district. And this is precisely the reason he is in nomination. He would be thought of for no political office whatever if he were not rich, or even if worth only the sum which his friends report he will spend. It would be easy to pick twenty men in his own town who would serve the Congressional district better at Washington; but not easy to find a more narrow and bigoted representative of the party.

On the other hand, Mr. P. T. Barnum is the representative of temperance and anti-corruption, having written the noblest letter against buying voters that has yet emanated from any public man—a firm, uncompromising Republican, the friend of justice and equal human rights everywhere. Notice his speech in the Connecticut Legislature on negro suffrage last year; notice his plea for safety of human life on railroads, and, indeed, every public utterance he has ever made. He was not only patriotic when and where it was brave to be so—under the shadow of the virulent Bridgeport Farmer in 1861—but he is generous, humane, and public-spirited. No public enterprise or charity, whether it be the improvements of his neighboring city, the contributions to suffering Portland, the support of religious bodies near him, the school interest, or whatever it may be, goes without his aid if sought, or even unsolicited. If it were in appropriate taste to relate a touching incident of his tenderness in sickness to a stranger, which would grace any man's biography, I should be glad to do it here; but I pass to another matter.

Let it be admitted, if you please, that Mr. Barnum has in his earlier history, from a desire to call attention to his business, as he says, but full as much from a certain exuberance of mirth and in boundless good nature, exhibited a few curiosities not altogether genuine, and in the same spirit reported them—must these old follies for ever overbalance all else in his character? From the same sportive impulse, he quite frequently in conversation represents his "gifts" as a "profitable philanthropy;" so that one who does not know his peculiar style of jocular self-disparagement might, if seriously inclined, underrate a benevolence and public spirit that, I fear, will require the lapse of many years to make sufficiently common.

I do not speak of Mr. B.'s idiosyncrasy here either to commend or uphold it; but knowing, as I think I do, just to what extent it goes, and that it is from this fraction of his character that most of the public are led to think they know the whole of it, I am induced to make only this brief allusion.

I fully agree with you in the necessity of character as well as ability in our public men; but when the only party that has ever insulted the public intelligence and morals, by such men as Rynders and Morrissey, is again in the field sowing corruption broadcast, and advocating principles for which I acknowledge they are suitable representatives, it seems hard to make Mr. P. T. Barnum the text for an assault on immoral candidacy, particularly so at a time when it makes every rebel sympathizer your grateful debtor.

THE TARIFF ON BOOKS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Dear Sir: I am sure from the candor invariably displayed in your columns that you are a lover of fair play, and will, therefore, not deny me a little of your valuable space in defence of the book-importing interest, which some people in ignorance have been endeavoring seriously to injure.

The article in your issue of the 21st inst., signed "A Publisher," exhibits a disposition to take a one-sided view of the operation of a specific duty of 25 cents per lb. on English books. Your correspondent surely cannot be aware of the extent to which Bohn's Libraries and similar books are imported into this country, otherwise he would not be so unfair as to exclude them from consideration when instituting a comparison between the specific duty of 25 cents per lb and the present ad valorem rate. I venture the assertion that there is no series of books brought into this country in larger numbers than Bohn's Libraries, and if none other of a similar character were imported at all, they alone form an argument in favor of the ad valorem duty which in importance outweighs anything that can be said to refute it.

But the principal mistake your correspondent makes is in endeavoring to average a specific duty of 25 cents per lb. with the view of establishing his theory that it is equivalent to only a very moderate ad valorem rate. It is a very plausible way of presenting the subject, and if the importer's business could be conducted on this average, 25 cents per lb. would not be so objectionable. "A Publisher" ought either to be more familiar with the nature of the importer's business, or, if familiar with it, he should display more candor than is evinced by his effort to conceal all the objections to a specific duty on books under the delusive statement that it will average so little at an ad valorem rate. Whatever may be the average, the application of the law would not be conducted on it. We find houses importing entirely, or almost so, books the weight and price of which correspond with Bohn's Libraries, and the ad valorem duty such houses would pay under the 25 cents per lb. system would be prohibitory, or at least so enormous that the business would diminish, and there would be no inducement to continue it.

The following figures will prove this: The average weight of one of Bohn's Library books is 18 oz., and the book retails in England at 3s. 6d. The importer buys it at 2s., on which under the present duty he would pay 12 cents in gold, whereas under the duty of 25 cents per lb. he would have to pay 28 cents in gold, which is an advance of 133 per cent. on the present rate, and is 56 per cent. on the value of the book. After adding the exchange, the price of the book, with this enormous duty, would require to be such as would effectually stop its sale. This is no exceptional case, as your correspondent asserts, and I am in a position to know that more than one importing house whose business is mainly in such works would be compelled to relinquish the business they have been engaged in all their lives, and would have to turn their attention to other branches of industry, if a specific duty of 25 cents per lb. were to become law.

While this is the case as regards books on which there is no expensive copyright, and on which no great amount of artistic skill either in the illustrations or the binding has been expended, the operation of a duty of 25 cents per lb. would be exactly the reverse on books which possess high literary value, or whose price is enhanced by rich illustrations and expensive binding. The weight of such books is not affected by their increased value, and the importer of these would, if the duty were 25 cents per lb., pay on an average a much less rate of duty than even the present 25 per cent. Your correspondent and all the other publishers associated with him in the agitation for a specific duty appear to me to be "penny wise and pound foolish." A duty of 25 cents per lb. will open a door for finely illustrated and elegantly bound books they little dream of; and if, as is asserted, the publishing business is languishing for want of protection, I hope I shall receive credit for honesty, at least, when I inform the publishers that, as regards the finer issues of the trade, 25 cents per lb. will secure for them a less degree of protection than the present duty.

Your correspondent, I trust, will perceive from what I have written that, while it may answer to ascertain by average what 25 cents per lb. is equivalent to at an ad valorem rate, with the view of arriving at the results to be expected from it affecting the benefit or injury to the Treasury, it will never answer to make use of the average as an argument in favor of a specific duty of 25 cents per lb., because, as I have shown, it would destroy one branch of the importing business while it would greatly favor another, and the Treasury would suffer to the extent of five per cent. upon all the importations, as shown by your correspondent himself, without benefiting any one.

If "A Publisher" is really in earnest when he asserts that he needs to be protected, it is incomprehensible to me why he should be a supporter of a specific duty which, as he says, averages less than the present 25 per cent. If 25 per cent. does not yield protection enough, he is surely blind to his own interest in consenting to a duty which is less on an average. There is an inconsistency here which your correspondent does not attempt to explain, but which operates strongly against him and all who agree with him in urging the proposed change of the duty.

I have been familiar with every movement of the importers regarding the duty, and I am certain your correspondent must have been misinformed when he was told they would not object to an ad valorem duty of 75 per cent. It is quite possible some individual importer, who was likely to be a martyr to the specific duty of 25 cents per lb., may have expressed a preference for a duty of 75 per cent.; but I know that no such preference proceeded from the importers as a body, and I have it in my power to prove this. Respectfully yours, CANDOR.

A WORD WITH A GOTHIC MAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

I have read the letters of "A Gothic Man" with a good deal of interest, as being a part of the protest which common sense is making against our antiquated course of college studies. None are more anxious than the true friends of the classics to have due weight given to arguments of this nature, and to have a judicious reform in university education. Indeed, so much has been already accomplished in this direction, that these allusions to the bed of Procrustes are already far from applying to some colleges. I think it will be found that, at the present day, we miss the best intellectual training rather by reason of the multitude of branches in which the student's mind is dissipated, than of any disproportionate amount of classics in the course.

The complaint is, however, that the classics are required at all; he would have all the studies optional, as proposed by Dr. Hedge in his alumni address at Harvard last summer. With all my heart; let us bring our universities up to that standard as soon as possible, remembering always that it will not be feasible until our students average older at entering than they now do—at least in the Eastern colleges. But, meanwhile, what shall we do with this degree of A.B. that he laughs at? It is understood by the community that these cabalistic letters mean Latin and Greek, if nothing else—if, in any given case, the Latin and Greek are not there, it is the fault of the institution which conferred the title. Now, I am not arguing that German or chemistry is not better than Latin or Greek in any given case; simply, as this one degree has an established definition implying such and such studies, we should not throw away the small element of certainty which we now possess by destroying the distinctive character of this degree, but introduce at need new courses and new degrees—bachelor of science, bachelor of literature, or what not—to meet the new demands of the age.

I do not propose to repeat what Mr. Mill has just said so well that we may consider it as said once for all, as to the value of the classics in a liberal education. I am, however, surprised that so fierce an attack should have been made upon the character of classical literature. Most certainly there are indecent books in Latin and Greek; but they are not the books we give our young people to read. There are indecent stories in Greek mythology; but the boy learns mythology from English books, not from the classic authors that he reads; for in these he finds, for the most part, only allusions. The books read in fitting for college contain very little that is objectionable; those read in the college course are, many of them, of the most ennobling character. I do not know where in modern literature the student will find more healthy, bracing books than the "Antigone," the "Apology" of Socrates, and the "Agricola" of Tacitus. And I will maintain boldly that I do not know of any college course of Latin and Greek which need cause anxiety to those who allow their children free access to Shakespeare and the Pentateuch.

MARCEL.

"FANNY FERN'S FIRST LITERARY SUCCESS."

"Fifteen or sixteen years ago, 'Artemus Ward,' 'Mrs. Partington,' and 'Miles O'Reilly' were laboring together in one office, each in his degree, working on The Carpet Bag, a not very comic comic paper, which was then trying hard to live, and was published in Boston. We may be mistaken, but we think 'Fanny Fern' was first successful in the columns of the same journal."—THE NATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Fanny Fern's first article was written for a one-horse religious magazine in Boston, called The Mother's Assistant, or some such name. The remuneration for that article was fifty cents, and the writer went up four pair of stairs five times to the office of the editor to get it, beside being put through this catechism:

Widow, eh? See you have on black! Children? How many? Girls or boys?

Yours respectfully,

FANNY FERN.

MR. LANMAN'S DICTIONARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

DEAR SIR: Several of the suggestions contained in your review of my "Dictionary of Congress" are accepted with thankfulness. There is one point, however, in regard to which I ask the privilege of being heard, viz.: the propriety of designating the political status of the Congressmen. In very many cases this would be quite impossible; so far as the more distinguished statesmen are concerned it would hardly be necessary; and if attempted in regard to mere politicians, there would be no end to the confusion. By mentioning the politics of many men without explanation, they would charge me with injustice; and in a single volume, containing nearly five thousand biographical notices, it would be impossible to go into the necessary particulars. By way of sustaining my position, I would refer you to the political history of two living ex-presidents and statesmen of wide reputation, as follows: James Buchanan, Federalist, Democrat, Conservative, and Union man; Millard Fillmore, Whig, Know-Nothing, Democrat, and Conservative.

The point you make on my carelessness for omitting such a man as Arthur Lee is apparently just; and yet I can parry that blow by stating that a sketch of him was written by me, and must have been overlooked by the printer.

Once again. That the House of Representatives refused to print an extra supply of my work because of the errors it contained, is hardly sustained by the facts of the case. After the chairman of the Printing Committee had delivered his argument against the propriety of printing a copyright book, a vote was taken which resulted in my favor; but after two personal enemies had been permitted to denounce me in angry and bitter terms, some of my friends were frightened, and, in the hurry of the expiring Congress, I was defeated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES LANMAN.

CULM ROCK;
OR,
THE STORY OF A YEAR.
WHAT IT BROUGHT AND WHAT IT TAUGHT.

Books there are by the million. It is only at intervals, however, that one is issued which combines such elements of interest and power as the work announced; the sympathies of the reader are at once blended with those of the author, and he becomes a willing captive to the "Story of a Year," as he traces the wonder-working providences which the history unfolds. To the young reader it has all the charm of a "Robinson Crusoe;" while the whole affecting story is sanctified by a high moral purpose, that runs like a silver thread through every page of the work.

The Week.

Congress has just closed a session of only twenty-six days' duration, in which little actual business has been done, and which nevertheless has been one of peculiar interest, and of a character without precedent. This has been the first instance in the history of the country of an extra session of one Congress ordered by its predecessor, or indeed, so far as we now remember, of any extra session ordered by Congress at all. The motives for the measure are perfectly well understood, and have been fully justified by the events of the last six weeks. It is entirely to the fact of this extra session that we owe the now assured reconstruction of the country, as well as the success of minor but still important measures, such as the reform in the tenure of civil office, the disbandment of Southern militia, etc. All these bills must inevitably have failed, if the certain approach of the Fortieth Congress had not made "pocket vetoes" alike useless to the cause and dangerous to the personal interests of the Executive. So complete was the success of the warning implied in the call of this extra session that but little was left for it to do. Fortunately for the country, all efforts to induce Congress to take up at this session the questions of the tariff and the currency were entirely unsuccessful. Such matters could not have received sufficient consideration had they been taken up; and the commercial interests of the nation would almost certainly have suffered from any action of Congress. Bad as our present fixed system is, we fear that legislation is only likely to make it worse. The reputation of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses must rest upon their settlement of the issues between the North and South, and not upon their disposition of financial questions.

There is a good deal of apprehension in many quarters as to the effect of the Connecticut election on the temper of the South; but we doubt very much whether there is much ground for it. The majorities with which the State has been carried for some years back have been too small to make its defection look very serious. And, at all events, the election can, as every Southerner of ordinary intelligence must see, exercise absolutely no appreciable influence on the process of reconstruction now pending, inasmuch as it exercises no appreciable influence on the Congress which is to sit for the next two years.

There is some talk of a movement to ask the Supreme Court to grant an injunction against Andrew Johnson, to prevent his carrying out the Reconstruction bill—which reads very much like the very poor story which went the rounds of the papers two or three years ago of a Greek lawyer, who had applied to the Supreme Court at Athens for a reversal of the judgment on Socrates. But it would do much good if the bill could in some way be got before the court, so that it might pass once for all on the extent of its own powers, and thus deliver some of the Southern politicians from the hopes of judicial interference by which they are now afflicted.

Beyond a doubt, Mr. Butler succeeded in astonishing the public at large, and to all appearance he astonished Mr. Bingham too, when he got Booth's diary before the House. The diary in question is one of the ordinary morocco-covered note-books, pretty well filled with writing, and was found in Booth's bosom when he was captured. When it came into Judge-Advocate-General Holt's hands for use in the trial of the conspirators, some of the first pages were missing. It was "spoliated," Mr. Butler says, and he insinuated, after a fashion that a district attorney might envy, that Mr. Johnson was the "spoliator." Whether he was or not, nobody knows, and nobody is likely to know. Booth himself may have cut the pages out, or soldiers may have taken them for mementoes, or unlikelier things than these are more likely than that Mr. Johnson was in a plot to have Mr. Lincoln murdered. Mr. Bingham seemed to know nothing about the diary, and, whoever is to blame for the "spoliation," he probably is not. Mr. Butler's real end was answered, however. He has not got very much the better of Mr. Bingham in their squabble, but he has kept himself very prominently in the public eye, and shown his peculiar abilities in full exercise.

The Maryland Republicans are calling on Congress to do for them what they would not do for themselves, though they were entreated, and though they had superabundant power. In resolutions passed in party convention, and in others passed by the Republican members of the General Assembly, they beg Congress to interfere and "protect the loyal majority of the people of Maryland, white and colored." Loyalty was as valid a reason for forgetting color two years ago as it is now, and the Maryland Republicans might then have done what Congress will not do and cannot do—what, at any rate, the Republican party will not undertake to do. Their case is bad, and much to be regretted; but so far as concerns the white loyalists of the State, it is hardly possible to resist saying that they are served right. Twenty years from now, and after much up-hill work, they may get what, a couple of years ago, a vote in the Legislature would have given them.

The recent Republican Convention in North Carolina, composed of white and black delegates, seems to have been a body eminently respectable for numbers, for honesty of purpose, and for ability. Old General Dockery was made president; but probably that was because he is aged, respectable, of considerable local importance, and in 1861 was "good Union." We fear he thinks the colored voter ought to be moved to South America. It is not long since he would have made that disposition of the colored laborer. And Mr. W. W. Holden was put at the head of the executive state committee of the party; but he has been provisional governor, owns a paper—the Raleigh Standard—and deserves the credit of bitterly hating the present government of the State. Mr. Settle we take to be a clever and good-hearted young man, and a politician of a good deal of ability and some experience. John Pool is an able man, and sure to be heard of in the future political history of North Carolina; Lewis Thompson is a gentleman of influence and ability; Mr. Heaton is very well spoken of; and many of the other prominent white delegates are at least sensible men and men of character. In the list of colored delegates we see the name of J. H. Harris and that of Mr. J. W. Hood, both men of excellent abilities, and whose services will be valuable to their party. The platform, like all Republican platforms in Border States, contains some denunciation of treason and traitors, and of secession and all its works, and some glorification of the Union. For the rest, it asserts the right of free discussion and the right of all citizens of the United States to the ballot. We are very glad to see this movement begun; in North Carolina we suppose nearly half the vote of the State can be controlled by it; and we suppose that in whatever State the new party does not take definite form and become aggressive, many of the bad features of the old political reign of slavery will be perpetuated.

Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, is the only place in the world in which the Fenians have thus far succeeded in establishing a territorial sovereignty, and it is in virtue of their possession of that district that they are, if at all, entitled to belligerent rights. It appears they have there inaugurated a reign of terror, having during the past month murdered fifty respectable and inoffensive persons with impunity. The remnant of the decent people have petitioned Governor Geary for protection, and he has laid their case before the Legislature.

General Rousseau is said to have done very good service during the war. We suppose there are plenty of men who could tell off-hand where it was he distinguished himself, and just how much glory belongs to him. In all probability there are official documents, too, that gauge his merits, and prove him to be a brave man and a good enough officer. As to our own knowledge of his record, we confess that it is somewhat vague. But we should not have been particularly surprised at his nomination for a brigadiership in the regular army, and should have maintained the silence becoming the civilian in regard to it, if last summer Mr. Rousseau had not—we will not say thrashed Mr. Grinnell for words spoken in debate, but gone out attended by two or three friends, while Mr. Grinnell was alone, armed while Mr. Grinnell was defenceless, and made an assault, the manner of which disgraced the assailant as the assault itself disgraced the House of which Rousseau and Grinnell were members. All this ought to be remembered against him, and any one of a dozen generals, good as he as military men, and not notorious for any piece of mixed absurdity and ruffianism, might a great deal better have the office.

An elaborate, and in parts amusing, appeal has been made to General Grant by the Rev. George Trask, of Fitchburg, praying him to stop smoking, and using every variety of argument—physiological, moral, historical, and religious—against the habit. Smoking may be a bad habit, but there is considerable difficulty in making out a good case against it as regards its effects on health, and its enemies are apt to damage their cause by trying to prove too much. One of the first authorities in America on diseases of the nerves approves of it, which shows that even doctors differ about it; and well they may, considering that the civilized world has smoked hard for two hundred years and the bills of mortality have gone on falling all the time. The example of Turkish lethargy, too, is fairly set off by the example of Prussian vigor. If there be tougher brains in the world than those of German scholars, we do not know where to find them; and some of the most enthusiastic of German scholars are amongst the most persistent smokers. We are not arguing now in defence of smoking. We are simply deprecating the air of mathematical certainty which too many social reformers seek to throw over their reasonings on subjects about which demonstration, or, in fact, anything more than guessing, is impossible.

An agitation has begun on a small scale by working-men in New York for legislative interference with rents, which are alleged, and truly, to be enormously high, so high as to produce great suffering and disease amongst the poor. But we believe they are not higher on the average than the enormous rate of taxation and high cost of building materials will justify. There is but one way of lowering rents in New York, and that is by reforming the city government. If this were done, not only would the taxes be lowered, but better paving and cleansing would quadruple or quintuple the space available for comfortable human habitation. It is melancholy to see how readily the working-men are cheated by newspaper twaddle about extortion into the belief that the Legislature can relieve them from the natural operation of the laws of trade. Of course, if capitalists were not allowed to charge for houses what would cover taxation and repairs and insurance and leave them a good profit, there would soon be an end to house-building, and houses will be dearer than ever. There are some signs that if some of the working-men could have their way, we should before long have, first, the hours of labor regulated by law; then, as production fell off, wages regulated by law; then, as prices began to rise under diminished production, prices regulated by law—till at last there would be nothing left unregulated except the hours of our meals.

Russian America is inhabited by fifty thousand fishing, trapping, fur-bearing Esquimaux, and nine or ten thousand Russians, Russian Americans, and people whom the gazetteers call Aleoots and Kodiaks. They import a good part of their provisions, and export a yearly diminishing quantity of furs. The country is a frozen wilderness, better known to arctic explorers and whalers than to most other men, and probably of no possible value to any men but them, the semi-civilized tribes that support existence there, and the Russian sutlers who trade with them. The territory is rather larger than eight States like New York would be, its area being 394,000 square miles. What we want of it, unless to take a solitude and call it Seward by erecting it into a Territory, we do not know, but we can buy the privilege of flying the stars and stripes over a colony, and a worthless colony, by paying seven millions of dollars for it. This we suppose Congress will not do. There is no good reason for doing it, and several good reasons for not doing it. We do not want far-distant, detached colonies, nor ice and snow territories, nor Esquimaux fellow-citizens, nor Mt. Saint Elias, and there is nothing else to be had from Alaska and Barrow's Point, so far as we are informed. The Czar's intentions, aside from his design of getting the seven millions in gold, are doubtful. It may be that he thinks New Archangel not worth the powder and shot he may have to expend in its defense in case of a new Eastern war. It may be that he wants to impress Europe with the idea of the closeness of friendship that must exist between Russia and a country for whose sake Russia cuts off a limb. European statesmen, however, will hardly sleep the worse on account of the phantom of an alliance between this country and Russia, and the Czar himself probably knows that, not to put too fine a point on it, the people of the United States know little and care less about Russia. But with all these considerations we have no concern. We are to consider our own interests, say yes or no to Mr. Seward's chimerical project of saddling us with a frozen desert of a colony—and we imagine there will be little difficulty in choosing the right answer.

The telegraph announced a few days ago that the English reform bill had "passed to a second reading," as if this was something very important. The fact is, however, that the first reading of a bill in the House of Commons is a mere matter of form. The fate of the bill is settled in the debate on the second reading, which in this case has yet to come. It appears, as we said last week, pretty certain that the bill will be lost, and if it is, Lord Derby announces his intention of dissolving Parliament and appealing to the country. The English papers are filled with discussions of what is the main feature of the measure; that limb. THE telegraph announced a few days ago that the English reform bill had "passed to a second reading," as if this was something very important. The fact is, however, that the first reading of a bill in the House of Commons is a mere matter of form. The fate of the bill is settled in the debate on the second reading, which in this case has yet to come. It appears, as we said last week, pretty certain that the bill will be lost, and if it is, Lord Derby announces his intention of dissolving Parliament and appealing to the country. The English papers are filled with discussions of what is the main feature of the measure; that is, "dual" or "cumulative voting," which is neither more nor less than a device for enabling the upper classes to preserve their power, while admitting the working classes to the franchise, and it is founded on the old theory, that the majority are the natural and irreconcilable enemies of the minority, and that the latter must be armed with some special means of defence. The dual vote is the rock on which the bill is likely to make shipwreck. It gives an extra vote to all persons paying direct taxes—that is, all the middle and upper classes—thus creating a most exasperating distinction between them and the class below. As every man who possessed a certain amount of property, or lived in a certain kind of house, voted, it might have been said that this qualification was a good though rough test of his fitness. But, under the system of cumulative voting, the working-man is told, after he has qualified himself for one vote, that his neighbor must have two—not because he is twice as intelligent or well educated, but because he is richer. Of course there is little chance of a distinction so odious being enacted, or, if enacted, remaining long in force. Mr. Gladstone denounces it with justice as likely to "excite a war of classes." The excitement is evidently increasing, and the agitation will probably end in a more radical reform than any that was at first anticipated. Governor Eyre has been, as was expected, discharged after a short examination before the Warwickshire magistrates, with whom he had probably been dining every day for the previous fortnight.

THE two great events of the week in France have been the speeches of Thiers and of Persigny. That of Thiers was a very brilliant and sharp attack on the foreign policy of the Empire, bristling with points and happy hits—the stand-point from which the subject was viewed being that of a statesman of the Palmerston order, and of the time of Louis Philippe, and the central idea being that the loss of one state is the gain of another, and that it is the duty of each to do what he can to keep others down. For instance, he loudly proclaimed that had he been at the head of affairs, he never would have consented to the unification of Italy. The speech in many ways revealed the weak points of the Orleanist régime. Persigny's was a somewhat ridiculous attack on parliamentary government, in which he compared the relations in which the Executive in this country stands to the Legislature to those in which the Emperor stands to the Corps Législatif.

THERE is nothing new about the Turkish question, unless it be news to say that trouble is still brewing. Russia has taken very strong ground in published despatches in behalf of the Turkish Christians, and the Sultan seems really frightened and to be trying in a feeble way to make reforms. The Servians are making desperate efforts to secure the withdrawal of the Turks from the fortress of Belgrade, but the Turks naturally hesitate, as the garrison is the only protection which the Mussulmans of Bosnia possess to prevent their being cut off from Constantinople by Servia and Montenegro in case of a Christian rising.

CONNECTICUT TEACHING.

IF it were not for the inveterate habit of exaggeration with which many of the "great dailies" are afflicted, there would not be anything very disheartening in the result of the Connecticut election. It is, perhaps, desirable, on grounds of expediency, to represent the fate of the nation as dependent on a particular election; but then, when all is over and the election has gone the wrong way, it is somewhat difficult to get people who have been thus worked up into frantic enthusiasm to believe that the matter is really of little or no consequence, and has no meaning whatever. There are in Connecticut 90,000 registered voters, of whom 25,000 are ignorant foreigners, who are on the same side in every struggle, and on whom arguments, facts, and events produce absolutely no impression. It is against this rising tide—for it is a rising tide—of political stupidity and immorality that the Republicans of the State have had to fight for the last six or seven years—and a hard fight they have had of it, escaping defeat even in the most glorious years of the war by only a few hundreds. But it must not be forgotten that in States like Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania, in which the two great parties are nearly equal in strength, the triumph of either side by a small majority does not in reality indicate any change whatever in the feelings or opinions of the main body of the voters. In Connecticut, for instance, the issue of each election depends in reality on about one thousand persons, who are not attached to either party by strong ties of conviction or feeling, but vote with either as they happen to be pleased or displeased by the conduct of the majority during the previous year, caring little or nothing about the great principles which underlie the struggle. They usually consist in about equal proportions of fastidious people, indifferent people, and corrupt people. The main body, of course, are persons who are too strongly impressed with the importance of the issues to be shaken by ordinary events, and only change their party at revolutionary periods like that in which the Republican party took its rise.

Now it is just because in closely contested States, like Connecticut, the decision at every election is in the hands of a small and uncertain body of persons who are easily disgusted and alienated, that we have, during the past year, so often taken the liberty of suggesting to the majority in Congress a careful use of its enormous power. It was because great majorities are so strongly tempted to abuse their power that we hinted the other day, apropos of Mr. P. T. Barnum's election, that that majority was perhaps too large for the good of the party, and that it would have acted more wisely if it had acted in the presence of a stronger opposition. The gagging of the minority on so many occasions by sheer force of numbers, in the guise of the "previous question," without the slightest necessity and without any better result than the production of irritation and a sense of wrong; the hasty and often reckless legislation which was pushed through by the same means; and the efforts made to bring impeachment into use as a weapon of party warfare, have all doubtless had their effect in driving off that small body of voters on which, in some States, the Republican party has to depend for its victories, but on which its hold at the best of times is very insecure. The party has a magnificent history, and may, with ordinary discretion, look forward to a magnificent future, because its basis is justice and right; but its tenure of power is saddled with the same conditions as that of all other parties. It was guilty in Connecticut of the folly of nominating Mr. P. T. Barnum for Congress. He ran considerably behind his ticket, a large number of voters having had the good sense and virtue to "scratch" him, which we trust will next time serve as a lesson to nominating conventions. The party can only gain in the long run by such examples, and can only be saved by respect for character as a political force. The big war drum which The Tribune is in the habit of beating at every election, makes a splendid noise, but it does not make wrong right. The main cause of the Republican defeat was, after all, the stand the party has taken on equal suffrage, and it is better to be defeated on this than triumph on many other things. The election even of English is a prodigious advance on the part of the Democrats since 1863 or 1864, and General Hawley has the consolation of knowing that the cause he has served so long and so well is still sure of final triumph.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Before the summer heats and the dulness of trade put a stop to publishing for some months, our New York publishers will give us a few books. "Italian Journeys through Ferrara, Genoa, Naples, Pompeii, Herculaneum, Capri, Grossetta, Pisa, and Florence, with Excursions to some memorable places in Northern Italy," is the title of a volume by Mr. W. D. Howells which Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will issue very soon. Readers of The Atlantic Monthly and of this journal have already once enjoyed these sketches, and will heartily welcome their reappearance; they well deserve a place beside the same author's excellent "Venetian Life." Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt will be ready, in the second week of April, to give the public the "Frithiof Saga" in an English dress. The translation is the Rev. W. A. Blackley's, and Mr. Bayard Taylor has furnished an introduction and notes. People who have read Mr. Hepworth Dixon's work on the abnormal relations between the two sexes in various parts of America, will be interested in a little essay, the joint work of Carlier, of Paris, and Dr. J. Jeffries, a well-known physician of Boston, which is entitled "Marriage in the United States." De Vries & Ibarra, of Boston, publish the volume, and Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt are the New York agents. Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. promise the immediate publication of "The History of the Navy during the Rebellion," an illustrated work in two octavo volumes, by the Rev. Charles B. Boynton, the well-known chaplain of the House of Representatives, who is also a professor at the U. S. Naval Academy. The engravings are to be numerous, some in chromotints, some on steel, some on wood, and among them will be many maps and charts from Government surveys and official plans. The same house publish a small edition—not more than three hundred copies—of the "Political Writings of Richard Cobden," with a brief preface by Wm. Cullen Bryant. It is in two volumes, and the price of the work is six dollars. Du Chaillu's late journey into equatorial Africa has resulted in a volume of five hundred pages, which Messrs. Appleton republish and will issue on the 6th inst. The expedition was brought by the savages to an untimely end, and "the great zoölogical traveller" has not this time added much to what we already knew of Western Africa in the torrid zone. Besides these works, Messrs. Appleton have in press another of the numerous Mühlbach historical novels, "Frederick the Great and his Family," and a novel, "Sybil's Second Love," by Julia Kavanagh. Messrs. Scribner & Co. announce for Saturday next the last two volumes of Froude's "History of England," and W. J. Paulding's life of his father, James K. Paulding, who flourished—if it can be said that he flourished at all—in the days of "Salmagundi," when American literature was very infantile indeed.

—It might puzzle Mr. Friedrich Kapp to mention a nation or tribe of men which has not given its great men indiscriminate and fulsome adulation. In an article on Washington's character, which he contributes to The Historical Magazine for March, he charges the fault upon Americans in the case of Washington, and somewhat severely animadverts upon it. Mr. Jared Sparks specifically he denounces for "falsifying the record of Washington's life and of American history." It is within his personal knowledge that Mr. Sparks suppressed some passages in certain autograph letters of Washington which Mr. Kapp has seen, and tampered with other passages, in order to make the hero appear more devoted as a Christian than he really was and more conversant with the requirements of modern propriety. In one of the future articles promised from his pen, Mr. Kapp may perhaps be more explicit both as regards Washington and as regards his New England biographer.

—Mr. Edward McPherson, Clerk of the U. S. House of Representatives, announces that he has in press a "Political Manual for 1867," which will take up our political history where his last manual ended, July 4, 1866, and carry it down to April 1 of the current year, or the end of the present session of Congress. He has compiled it from official sources, promises that it shall be accurate and fair, and believes that it will be useful to men of all parties. Mr. McPherson's performances have thus far never disappointed those who have trusted his prospectuses. His political history of the rebellion and his Manual for 1866 were and will remain the completest and most valuable collections of the kind ever made in this country. The Manual for 1866 records the Presidential attempt at reconstruction, and the beginning of Mr. Johnson's rupture with Congress as foreshadowed in his speech of the 22d of February. The forthcoming Manual will embrace the famous tour to Chicago, the assertion by Congress of its right to reorganize the Union in its own way and time, and the ineffectual opposition of Mr. Johnson. It will also present the doings of the two conventions at Philadelphia, the reports of the committee on the New Orleans massacre, the judicial opinions in the Milligan case, and, in short, all the most important documents that illustrate the interesting period just expiring, and by which the political events of the ensuing year are to be very largely shaped and determined.

—The U. S. Sanitary Commission is now publishing, through Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, "The Record of the Metropolitan Fair," an account of the great fair of 1864. The work would have appeared in the spring of 1865 instead of 1867 had it not been for the preoccupations of the secretaries of the fair and of the persons who were expected to write it. But it is now here, having been prepared with care and all possible promptness by Mr. John Safford Fiske, aided by Mr. Eugene Schuyler, who have produced a work very much more readable and entertaining than such chronicles are apt to be. It is a large-paper octavo volume of 250 pages, adorned with photographic views—some of them very good indeed—of the buildings and booths.

—The proposal that a royalty should be paid the author of a book on each copy sold by the publisher is Mr. James Spedding's contribution towards the settlement of the ancient quarrel between authors and publishers. To this The Spectator wants a rider added in the interest of the publishers, and, considering the vexations which the present system imposes on the genus irritabile, in the interest of the authors also. The royalty ought not to be paid, The Spectator thinks, unless the sale of the book exceeds a certain limit, which limit, of course, will be one thing in one case and another in another, and in all cases will be fixed by the publisher. "This is the 'half profits' system, with one all-important difference." In this country, in the case of authors not well known, there is the widest diversity in the terms offered. A form of The Spectator's plan is not seldom tried, the author getting a specified per-centage of the retail price after so many hundred copies are sold, he to pay all expenses on presentation of the bills. The translation now in the American market of a certain well-known foreign book is published under this agreement: the translator pays for stereotyping, for paper, and for everything, material or labor, necessary in the manufacture of the book; he agrees to furnish so many pages of copy each day and to correct so many; and he gets one-half of the price of each copy sold. He stipulates that no demand for money, except a certain small fraction of the whole expense, shall be made on him until so many months after the stereotyping is completed. The contracts are made in writing under seal, and though such as we have seen might well enough make an unknown author despondent, they set forth details so fully that quarrelling about their provisions would seem difficult.

—Mr. John Hill Burton, who is known to many American readers as the author of a very pleasant book called "The Book-Hunter," has now put forth four volumes of what will probably be for a long time the history of his native country. Its title is "The History of Scotland from Agricola's Invasion to the Revolution of 1688," and the fourth volume brings the work down to the abdication of Mary. It seems that there is more of the Scotch dryness than of the ingenium perfervidum Scotorum in the book. About the long line of Scottish monarchs whose portraits may be seen at Holyrood, Mr. Burton is perfectly incredulous. He wisely shirks the question whether the Pict was a Teuton or a Celt, and it is not easy to know with exactness whether he thinks the theory that brings the first Pict from an island in the Danube more or less valuable than that which assigns him his cradle in Hindostan. Of St. Serf he says that he "had a reputation for the neatness and appropriateness of his miracles." Not that this dry humor is in excess; the history is praised for clear and sometimes picturesque narration, for prevailing good sense, for being calm, unbiassed, even over-judicial, and purely historical—praise not to be given any other history of Scotland.

—Among the recent announcements of English books are, by Messrs. Longmans, "Short Studies on Great Subjects," by James Anthony Froude, the historian, including essays on Job, Spinoza, Homer, Wolsey; another volume of "Dissertations and Discussions, Political, Philosophical, and Historical," by John Stuart Mill, M.P. Messrs. Low & Son announce the speedy publication of "On the Heights," by Berthold Auerbach, being the first three volumes of Tauchnitz's new series of English translations from German authors. Chapman & Hall have on their list "Nights in the Harem," by Emmeline Lott, authoress of the very entertaining "Harem Life in Egypt and Turkey;" "Church Embroidery," by Anastasia Dolby; and "The English Constitution," by Walter Bagehot, a reprint of his very valuable and interesting articles in The Fortnightly Review. We hope this book will be reprinted in this country. Macmillan & Co. will soon publish two new books by the Rev. Charles Kingsley, "The Water of Life, and other Sermons," and "On the Ancient Régime as it existed on the Continent before the French Revolution," being three lectures delivered at the Royal Institution; "Essays on Reform," by Lord Houghton, Thomas Hughes, M.P., Frederick Harrison, Leslie Stephen, Goldwin Smith, and others; and a new volume of the Golden Treasury Series, "La Lyre Française," edited by Gustave Masson. Mr. J. Russell Smith has in press, to be published in ten parts, "A Bibliographical Hand-book to the Earlier Popular Poetical and Dramatic Literature of Great Britain to 1660," edited by W. Carew Hazlitt. The Queen is said to be revising for publication a book which has lately been privately circulated at court, "Leaves from my Journal in the Highlands," and has written a preface to an account of the late Prince Consort by General Grey, which has been printed but not circulated.

—In the department of history of old classical literature the most noticeable recent German work is Kleine's "Geschichte der Drama" (History of the Drama), of which four volumes have appeared; the first three treat of the subject to the eleventh century, and the fourth of the Italian drama to the Renaissance in the sixteenth century. Prof. Haupt says that this is the most fundamental, the most learned, and the cleverest work that has appeared in the century; that it contains a fulness of new ideas, and for the history of the later Greek comedies forms the capstone to all investigations. With all deference to such an authority, we can only conditionally subscribe to such a verdict, for Professor Westphal, in Breslau, having finished his elaborate work on the Greek Metric and Rhythmic systems, has sent out a number of others in the same field. First, a revision of the work on rhythm, in which he places Aristoxenes as the sole deciding standard, differing from Cæsar, of Marburg, who takes Aristides as his standard. In "Geschichte der alten Musik" (History of Ancient Music) Westphal has made a most ingenious attempt to show that the ancients were acquainted with harmony as well as with melody, and that the metric of the Greeks corresponds to the tact system of the moderns. The third section of his work contains Plutarch's "De Musica," accompanied by a new critique and a commentary worthy to be considered a model.

—Of new German works on Latin and Greek grammar, the first volume of Neue's "Formenlehre der lateinischen Sprache" (Grammar of Latin Forms) treats of declension, and contains a most complete repertory of the Latin forms in the old classics, and also a survey and history of the Latin forms from the inscriptions and monuments down to the time of the Antonines. A short treatise on the same subject is Bücheler's "Grundniss d. lat. Declination" (Sketch of the Latin Declination). It is founded entirely upon the forms in Plautus. The "Kritische Nachträge z. lat. Formenlehre" (Critical Supplement to the Grammar of Latin Forms), by W. Corssen, is the most extended history of Latin grammar since Schneider. Especial attention has been paid in it to the question how far the elder Latin forms of the inscriptions, of the comedies, and of Lucretius suffered a change through the influence of the Greek grammarians, and the result contradicts the teachings of former German philology. In Greek grammar the Sprachvergleichende, or comparative method, has effected a complete revolution. George Curtius, in Leipzig, was the first to introduce this method into the schools, and his Greek school grammars, in spite of the protest of K. W. G. Krüger that they were a compilation from his own, have almost crowded their rivals out. His "Erläuterungen z. griech. Schulgrammatik" (Elucidations of Greek Grammars for Schools) contains such an excellent plan of instruction and so much more than any one would surmise from the title that it well deserves an English translation. An earlier edition of his school grammar was the basis of the widely-known Greek grammar by Mr. Hadley, of New Haven.

EDUCATIONAL.

A MEETING of the educational section of the American Social Science Association was held in Boston on the 13th of March at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Prof. Wm. B. Rogers presiding. A large number of influential persons were present, though the number from a distance was less than could be desired if the association is to be, as its name imports, a national and not a local body. Papers were read on deaf-mute instruction, on the New England high school, on reformatory schools for girls, on the provision for military instruction in the Congressional enactment of 1866, and on other topics, each of the essays being followed by a brief discussion. We hail it as a sign of coming improvements that gentlemen not concerned in teaching nor in the administration of school affairs are disposed to come together and quietly examine the principles which underlie our educational establishments, with a view to their advancement and improvement. The American Association for the Advancement of Social Science will accomplish much if it maintains a series of meetings for educational discussion which shall neither be teachers' institutes for the benefit of inexperienced young ladies nor mass meetings for the awakening of the community, but conferences of thoughtful and scholarly men reflecting the intellectual and moral advancement of the country.

—The West shares with the East the discussion of the question touching classical and scientific courses of education. In Michigan we observe the lectures of Mr. D. Bethune Duffield, of Detroit, whose views are quite as iconoclastic as those of "A Gothic Man," to which we have given expression in our recent issues. "Out here in the West," writes a correspondent, "we have long since dismissed the idea of infallibility in our colleges"—an implication which our conservative Faculties would probably repel, but which is at least suggestive of the true state of the case.

—Each new census of France reveals a deplorable tendency on the part of its rural population to flock to the cities, to Paris especially. They are lured thither by the wealth and glitter and amusement, the opportunities for speculation, the educational advantages, the hope of ease in return for a small expenditure of wit or labor. Cease demolishing and reconstructing Paris—it has been urged as a remedy for this evil—put a stop to Haussmannism at the capital, and improve the country roads. Stimulate the love of cultivating the soil, and teach the best methods and introduce the best machines. Lift up the rustic civilization, so far as material prosperity can do it, to the level of that enjoyed by the cities. To these voices M. Duruy, the Minister of Public Instruction, has just added his. In the session of the 2d of March he told the Corps Législatif:

> "It is complained that the laborers are quitting the country for the cities; but we lavish on the cities all that can draw them there—the hospital, gratuitous instruction, the splendor of civilization. Something, then, must be done also for the tiller of the fields, who has nothing of all that, and who is nevertheless a social force."

It seems to us that similar doctrine would not be out of place in this country, where the growth of the cities at the expense of the rural districts is not yet alarming, but is perhaps demonstrable and at all events to be provided for. We do not urge the State to make every village so attractive that most men will be content to stay and work out their destiny in it; but we believe that in building noble school-houses, founding public libraries, and bestowing kindred endowments on their native towns, the men who have come to the city and made their wealth there will found their highest claims upon the gratitude of the nation. Let the chief attraction of the city be its opportunities for business, and let its superiority in culture and the means of amusement and self-improvement be so slight as to be of little weight.

SCHAFF'S HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.*

The three centuries, from the conversion of Constantine to the accession of the first Gregory, present to the historian of the Church an immense wealth of materials. If, in the preceding period, his contemporary documents are comparatively few, so that he is often obliged to grope in the twilight, and substitute combination and conjecture in lieu of sure testimonies, the case is wholly altered on passing into the second era of the church's progress. Christianity from a persecuted sect becomes a dominating faith, and, in turn, employs coercion against heresy within its own pale and paganism without. Ecclesiastical history is henceforward inseparable from the history of the administration and fortunes of the great Roman Empire. Thus the field of view is widened. The second era is the fertile and productive period in the department of thought and discussion. The great writers of the first era, so far as their works are extant, may be counted on the fingers of one hand. The Latin Church produced no original theologian before Tertullian. But when we pass into the next stadium, we meet with the illustrious names of Augustine, Athanasius, Jerome, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil—and these are far from exhausting the catalogue. On the leading subjects of Christian theology, theology proper, or the Trinity and the person of Christ, and anthropology or the doctrine of sin, grace, and free-will as related to grace, the contributions to Christian thought are most rich and abundant. All that has been done since in these branches of the Christian system is little in comparison to what is furnished by this golden age of the Fathers. The mediæval period found work enough to do in the bare task of systematizing and reducing to a coherent whole the vast amount of theological matter which it received as a legacy from that fruitful age. It was the age of the great councils, beginning with Nicæa; the age when the hierarchical system developed itself, when the Roman bishop became established in his ecclesiastical supremacy, and when monasticism ascended the Papal chair in the person of Gregory.

The advantages and difficulties of the historian are obvious even from this brief sketch. His means of information are ample; but the labor of mastering his materials and of shaping his narrative with a just method is proportionately serious. Dr. Schaff has thoroughly and successfully accomplished his task. The volumes that lie before us are replete with evidences of a careful study of the original sources, and of an extraordinary and, we might say, unsurpassed acquaintance with the modern literature—German, French, and English—in the department of ecclesiastical history. They are equally marked by a fair-minded, conscientious spirit, as well as by a lucid, animated mode of presentation. These volumes illustrate the possibility of depth in a German, without either obscurity or dryness. As concerns the history of theological doctrine, to which, as is proper, nearly the whole of one volume is devoted, we know of no treatise which, on the whole, is more satisfactory. A specimen of the author's discriminating habit is found in his account of the Arian controversy and of the Nicene orthodoxy. It is frequently, and by English writers generally, assumed that the Nicene Creed is in full agreement with the so-called Athanasian symbol, and with the later developed theology of Augustine on the point of the relation of the Son to the Father. This is not the place for a discussion of such a topic; but we will just remark that the terms of the creed of Chalcedon, wherein is affirmed the homoousianism of Christ as to his human nature with us, are sufficient to show that the word homoousian, in the symbol of Nicæa, does not of necessity imply numerical consubstantiality. It is often, but erroneously, assumed that the metaphysics of Athanasius are explicitly embodied in the creed. Dr. Schaff keeps clear of this misconception; and, while clearly expounding the theory of the great champion of the creed, he explicitly says: "The Nicene doctrine refuses to swerve from the monotheistic basis, and stands between sabellianism and tritheism; though it must be admitted that the usage of οὐσία and ὑπόστασις still wavered for a time, and the relation of the consubstantiality to the numerical unity of the divine essence did not come clearly out till a later day" (Vol. III., p. 657). The Greek theology, in which the Father is the fons et origo divinitatis, and in which the subordination (though not in an Arian sense) of the Son to the Father is ever maintained, should never be confounded with the conception of the great Latin Father and with the doctrine of the Athanasian Creed, a later product of the Western Church. Dr. Schaff observes (Vol. III., p. 640, note) that John Milton cannot properly be termed Arian. But, in the celebrated posthumous treatise of Milton on "Christian Doctrine," he fully adopts the distinctively Arian statements respecting the person of Christ. After a careful examination of that treatise, we are entirely persuaded that Archbishop Sumner was right in regarding it as the product of Milton's mature age, instead of being a youthful essay, as some have contended; and we are equally certain that the doctrine of it is both Arian and Arminian. In truth, an attentive reader of "Paradise Regained" will find in that poem clear traces of the same opinions.

The first of the two volumes before us opens with an animated description of the character and career of Constantine. The various hypotheses which have been broached concerning the real tenets and religious position of the imperial patron of Christianity are subjected to a critical examination. If we were to express any difference of judgment from Dr. Schaff on the subject of Constantine's conversion, it would be in the form of an objection to the decided manner in which our author casts away the theory of an optical illusion in connection with that event. It appears to us not at all improbable that, in conjunction with the vision or dream, there may have occurred a parhelion bearing enough resemblance to the cross to impose upon the disturbed fancy of the Emperor. The somewhat ambiguous position of Constantine with reference to the two religions is quite explicable. The situation in which he found himself when an aspirant for the imperial throne led him—with the vein of superstition that belonged to his nature—to give great prominence to Divine Providence, to the aid of the higher powers, among whom he found more and more cause to depend chiefly on the Christian's God. In the current Christian theology, the pagan divinities had a real existence; they were counted to be demons or evil beings. It was for this reason easier to mingle with a truly Christian belief more or less of a superstitious deference to the gods of the old mythology. The delay of Constantine's baptism arose from a prevalent superstitious notion of the efficacy of that rite in cancelling all transgression previously committed. But we must refer our readers to Dr. Schaff's able discussion, where they will find the material for an intelligent judgment upon the curious questions suggested by the conversion and religious course of a man who, if not great, at least played a most conspicuous part in human affairs.

It is difficult to write a history of the church—especially of the ancient church—without making rather a commentary upon the history than a consecutive, flowing narrative. Dr. Schaff has probably avoided this tendency as far as it was practicable to do so. His volumes are enlivened by biographical pictures of eminent men, and by instructive as well as entertaining information relative to Christian art and Christian worship. We do not hesitate to say that should he complete his work according to the plan indicated by the present volumes, he will have furnished the public with a history of the church which, while it satisfies the demands of scholarship, is more readable and better adapted to the taste of the class of cultivated persons than is any rival production in the same department of literature.

We must not omit to state that the main portions of this work have been translated, with much skill and taste, by Dr. Yeomans from the author's German. It is very seldom that we have noticed an incorrect or inelegant expression. In one place (Vol. II., p. 41) we read, in reference to the enterprise of Julian, that "in the entire failure of this effort heathenism itself gave the strongest proof that it had outlived itself for ever." To outlive is to live longer than another; "to outlive itself for ever" is a not very intelligible phrase. But author and translator are entitled to congratulations for the generally felicitous manner in which their respective tasks have been executed.

THE CHARITIES OF FRANCE.*

We hope we are guilty of no impropriety in giving some account of this interesting volume, which the author must have taken great pains in compiling, but which his modesty restrains him from offering to the world. He is not a professed man of letters, and, therefore, his book is lacking in the merit of accurate generalization summing up the result of figures; but he is a man of clear intelligence; he has resided in Paris; he has directed particular attention to its charitable institutions; and he has used well all the opportunities there were for obtaining trustworthy information. The volume contains but one hundred and ninety-five pages of text, exclusive of an admirable index; but its thirty-four short chapters, composed of pure facts, with hardly a repetition, present a solid statement of the charitable administrations of France as they now are. It is already so condensed that further compression is impossible. Only the most general summary can be given. We will try to give that in such a way as to convey the general impressions left on the mind by the book, and supply in some sort the deductions which the author does not draw.

The French, as everybody knows, are a singular mixture of sentiment and sense. They are the most sentimental and, at the same time, the most practical of people. Their religion is Roman Catholic; their economies are scientific. Their religion teaches them to make the care of the poor a sacred duty, to be discharged from the love of God, in obedience to Christ and the church, and in the interest of salvation. Their economy teaches them to waste nothing, to do nothing aimlessly, to support nobody in idleness, to encourage industry and thrift, and to make every particle of vitality available for the purposes of society. It is interesting to see how these two somewhat inconsistent principles get on together in the administration of beneficence. From the number, size, completeness, and endowment of the establishments, it would seem as if the first principle had the matter wholly to itself. Indeed, that principle has been from time to time officially proclaimed. In 1790 the National Assembly, "penetrated with the eternal truth that the duty of providing for the subsistence of the poor in the construction of an empire is not less sacred than that of securing the prosperity of the rich," appointed a committee to take into consideration the whole subject of public charity. And this committee laid down the axiom that "society should aid without requiring labor from those who are incapacitated from age or infirmity;" that "every man has a right to his subsistence," that "the relief of indigence is a debt due by the state." This principle was afterwards repudiated, but the state is as diligent in discharging the charitable office as if the confession of the debt were still made. The whole administration of public aid is placed under the Prefect of the Seine and the Minister of the Interior. There is a general director who is appointed by the minister on the nomination of the prefect. In 1864 the director estimated the number of those who would require relief in 1865 at 259,199, of whom 100,000 were registered poor, 91,355 were in hospital, 30,000 were sick treated at their dwellings, and 23,416 were abandoned children placed in the country. There are eight general hospitals, containing altogether 3,911 beds, and eight special hospitals, containing 2,738 beds. These do not include the various benevolent foundations established by individuals, some of which are very munificent. The hospices are thirteen in number, for men and for women separately, two for the insane, two for the aged, and one, about five miles from Paris, for aged couples, widowers, and widows; one for foundlings, one for workmen over sixty years of age, etc. In all they contain 10,547 beds. Other hospitals there are, civil and military, not under the charge of the administration. Such are the new Military Hospital near Vincennes, with 600 beds; the Hospital of Val de Grace, with 1,500; the Jewish Hospital, founded by M. de Rothschild, with 100; two asiles, one with 300 beds, the other with 500. Some of these establishments are of immense proportions; the Salpêtrière had last year a population of not far from five thousand, including those employed there.

Besides the institutions mentioned, there are a multitude of others which give relief to every existing phase of want or distress. La Maternité takes care of women through the period of child-birth, from a week or so before till a week after, and also maintains a school of midwifery, to which young women from all parts of the empire resort. The Maisons de Retraite and Hospices des Ménages give comfortable shelter and pleasant lodgings, with every domestic convenience, to old people, single or married, who can pay a capital sum of from 1,000 to 3,000 francs, or a trifling rent of fifty or sixty dollars. Houses of Refuge take in able-bodied laborers who may be temporarily out of employment, and give them work at less than the ruling rate of wages, or discharged convicts who, on leaving prison, can get nothing to do, or servants looking about for situations, or girls of loose morals wishing to reform. The Sisters of Charity have charge of most of these institutions. The Crèches take care during the day of infants left by mothers on the way to their work. The Crêche is not popular. In 1849 but one in fourteen was filled; in 1853, but three in twenty-five. The mortality in them is greater than under the ordinary circumstances of children in the city. The General Administration, for several reasons obvious enough, has never adopted them. The Salles d'Asile welcome children between the ages of two and six, and have some of the features of a primary school. Foundlings, abandoned children, and destitute orphans have abundant provision made for them. The Bureaux des Nourrices procure nurses, under rule and direction of government, for mothers who are unable to nurse their own children. The Sociétés de Charité Maternelle give aid at the time of confinement to women who, having one child living, have been widowed during pregnancy; to women with at least one child and a husband who is disabled or chronically diseased; to disabled women having two living children; to women who, having two children already, give birth to twins; and to women who have three children already, the oldest under fourteen. The Société du Prince Imperial loans to working-men, or individuals of good moral character exercising any trade or profession, such tools, instruments, or materials as may be required, they pledging repayment of the loan within a certain time. The fund is obtained by a voluntary weekly contribution of two sous by the children of France. The sum at the disposal of the society in 1864 amounted to 1,698,489 francs. The Empress is interested in the institution; but it does not pay. Last year there was a deficiency of 209,213 francs. The Ateliers de Charité, or public workshops, at the charge of the state, the departments, or the towns, supply workmen with manual labor, chiefly on the highways, in seasons of public calamity, when stagnation in business occasions public distress. The system of out-door relief is substantially the same with that adopted by our own provident associations, but is much more comprehensive, detailed, and thorough. The central office or bureau is managed by a committee consisting of the mayor and assistants, twelve administrators, and as many visitors and Sisters of Charity as may be required, a treasurer and a secretary. Many voluntary associations work in conjunction with this bureau, ministering to every species of want. The physicians, of whom there were in 1864 two hundred and one, receive small salaries; so do midwives. The largest expenditure is for medicine and baths; the next largest is for provisions and supplies. Very little money is given. The funds are in part appropriated to each arrondissement by the general administration, and are in part received from individual generosity. Applicants for aid must have resided one year in Paris; foreigners must have resided ten years. No one can be aided who neglects to send his children to school or refuses to have them vaccinated. Experiments at colonizing children in Algiers have not been so successful as our experiment at colonizing them in the West. The "Monts de Piété," or pawner's banks, are popular institutions in France. They must be established by permission of government and of the town authorities, and must be managed exclusively for the benefit of the poorer classes. There were forty-four such banks in all France in 1853, conducted at an expense of 1,375,546 francs. The salaries consumed 940,670 francs and the balance went for general expenses, repairs, and rent. The rate of interest ranges all the way from four to twelve per cent. Some of these establishments barely meet their expenses.

From this summary view it will appear that the work of charity in France is undertaken by the state, and is carried on with rigid system and with exhaustive completeness. Such elaborate recognition of poverty is repulsive to our notions of personal independence and the importance of self-help. The very completeness of the administration makes an institution of poverty itself, and virtually declares that the state is bound to provide for the poor for its own defence, if not for their good. This is the objectionable feature in the whole system; at least it would be with us. Incidentally, however, there is much to be learned from the details of the French administration. The legal right to a support has never been established in France. Begging is sternly forbidden. The utmost precaution is taken to limit the aid extended to those for whom it is specifically designed, and whose claims are indisputable; imposition of every kind is watchfully guarded against. No end of pains are taken to spare the feelings, save the personal respect, stimulate the industry, and keep up the morale of the beneficiaries of every class. The period of dependence is in all cases reduced to the shortest possible time. The amount of dependence is diminished to the smallest point, and the sense of dependence is persistently discouraged. In the hospitals and hospices the medical and religious toleration is above all praise. All the inmates are, as far as possible, turned to use. The old women in the Salpêtrière make up the worn-out linen of the establishment into bandages for the surgeons' wards. The babies at the Crèches amuse themselves by tearing up old papers and letters, with which pillows for the sick are stuffed. Extraordinary attention is given to the treatment of young children, the foundlings, and the abandoned, the severest regulations being imposed on those who volunteer to bring them up either in town or in the country. They must give them separate beds, provide fine fenders for their protection, send them to public school and church. To expose a child in a solitary place is a crime to be punished by imprisonment from half a year to two years. If, by exposure, the child become mutilated or injured, the person exposing it shall be considered as causing the hurt; should death ensue, the crime is murder.

The economy of suffering both bodily and mental, as well as of life, is wonderful. The state does its best to be a father to the poor. We must use general expressions, for if we were to detail the exquisite carefulness practised in a single hospital—the Lariboisière, for example—we should have no space for anything else. All this costs money, but the French are ingenious in obtaining that too. They make pleasure support poverty. Under the present act, which has continued in force since 1817, the theatres pay one-tenth of the gross amount received from the sale of tickets; and managers of balls, concerts, fêtes, etc., who receive money at the door, pay one-fourth of their gross receipts. In 1860 the sum derived from these sources was as high as 1,644,263 francs. On the whole, the French administration of charity is the most satisfactory in Christendom. If the government takes charge of it, it does so in the interest of health, order, and industry, and on scientific principles. If the provision made seems enormously large and provokingly minute, it must have the effect of discouraging fraud and pauperism. Democracy has organized no charity as yet. Would that it might never be compelled to. But, if compelled to, it may profit by the study of organized charity in the Empire, for while the Empire confesses poverty to be an institution, it deals with it as an institution that should be kept within limits and assailed in its causes. While it trims the branches it lays an axe at the roots. The principal, if not the sole, cause of distress among the lower orders of people is want of moral and intellectual culture; and this want the Empire does all in its power to supply not only outside of charity, but in and through it.

THE MAGAZINES FOR APRIL.

THAT noble Roman, Trajano Bocalini, informs us that all the virtuosi of Parnassus, Aristotle, Averroes, Plato, and the rest, being assembled in full conclave, decided after argument "That Inn-keeping was not a sordid Occupation, but a most worthy Heroick vertue," and it missed but little, that authority goes on to say, "that this vocation was not added as an Eighth to the Seven Liberal Sciences." Reading in Harper's for April Mr. C. H. Webb's pleasant account of the famous "What Cheer House" of San Francisco, one forgets New York restaurants and can half believe the virtuosi right. There is a library connected with the "What Cheer," a laundry, a place where the miner may have his clothes patched if they need it, a room in which fifty miners at a time may black their boots, a museum full of Californian and foreign curiosities, and there is a restaurant where four thousand meals, at an average charge of fifteen cents, are served daily. Bells are dispensed with by having in each sleeping-room everything that a man can be imagined to require. The price of a night's lodging is fifty cents. The house is for men only, no women being allowed on the premises. Our daily papers every little while tell us that a fortune awaits whatever man will open in New York a restaurant or a hotel at once good and cheap. It is true too; the owner of the "What Cheer" derives from it an annual income of thirty or forty thousand dollars, and the need of New York is greater than that of San Francisco; but the man, at once a very good man and able to keep a hotel like that in California, is not forthcoming.

We do not know what are the contents of the comic almanacs of to-day. Conundrums, we believe. Twenty years ago, when we had an intimate knowledge of that branch of literature, we made our first acquaintance with Davy Crockett, whom the present generation of youth does not know. We recollect him as being "death on coons," and perhaps the most successful hand-to-hand fighter with "varmint"—a term inclusive of "Injuns," "painters," and "bars"—which this country has ever produced. While memory holds her seat we shall not forget many wood-cuts relating to that mythus, and one in particular depicting the last scene in a "personal difficulty" which the hero had with what he styles "a Puke." The conflict began, like all his conflicts with the class of persons thus designated, by Crockett's grinning for an hour at his antagonist, who grinned in return. Then the Puke walks round Crockett for an hour and "hollers." Crockett, after an hour spent in the same manner, closes in, and, after tearing up a great deal of the surrounding country, finishes the fight by biting his enemy through the knee and breaking his back. Just this moment is the one which the artist seized, and the effect which his pencil produced was vivid. Turning to "Davy Crockett's Electioneering Tour," the Crockett of legend shrinks into the Crockett of fact, and our old type of Western civilization reappears in the guise of a student of the Constitution. One of his constituents declines to vote for his re-election to Congress on the ground that Col. Crockett voted to disburse twenty thousand dollars of the public money for the relief of certain sufferers by a fire in Georgetown, and convinces his representative that the people do not tax themselves for any such purposes.

Perhaps the most noticeable article is that entitled "A Christian Neighborhood." It is addressed to Christian women who regulate their conduct "by faith in the awful realities of the future life—an eternal heaven, an endless hell." The writer argues that "the family state can be instituted by any woman who has the means of earning a livelihood, as every woman should have.’ The distinctive feature of this state, he says, "is not that there should be parents, for Abraham, the friend of God, was eighty-five before he had any child, and a hundred before Isaac was born." Nor are husbands and wives absolutely necessary: "The true aim of the family state is to place a small number of persons under the care and authority of one or two that they may be trained to virtue and happiness chiefly by the influence of self-sacrificing love." Therefore, the writer would have women who have the necessary means at their disposal build houses, for which he furnishes plans, where children may be trained to usefulness and goodness. Such houses might be built near each other, and mutual help be rendered by the various establishments in the Christian neighborhood thus formed. A vast number of people will give their assent to the writer's theory.

The other articles in this number of the magazine are of little interest. J. S. C. Abbott would have not quite so unsatisfactory a reputation as he has if he had never written worse than in his account of Lieut. B. H. Porter. But the adjective is still too much for him. We must not omit to mention a little sketch called "Bushy and Jack," in which the reader will find the very best reproduction of the true negro dialect that we have ever seen in print.

An article, by the Rev. Henry H. Jessup, in the April number of Hours at Home contains a statement very damaging to William Gifford Palgrave, the English traveller, whose book on Arabia was so successful last year. Mr. Palgrave, Mr. Jessup says, is the "Kos Michael" who in 1860 was a Jesuit missionary in Syria. In that year occurred the massacre by the Druses of the Christians of Lebanon, and many of these people, being houseless and starving, were fed and clothed and sheltered by an association composed of American missionaries, English merchants, Greeks, Jews, and Roman Catholics, which was known as the Anglo-American and German Relief Committee, and which was supplied with funds by the charitable in England and America. "The Kos Michael," Mr. Palgrave, wrote a letter to The Times denouncing the committee as a mere proselytizing agency, and asserting that before any man could get money to relieve his necessities he had to turn Protestant. An investigating committee, consisting of a Papist, a Jew, and a Greek, after examining the case reported back to London that the Kos Michael's story was "a fabrication and a lie from beginning to end." After this Mr. Palgrave again appeared in Syria, where, if we believe Mr. Jessup, whose language is perhaps a little strong, "at length the Kos Michael's name became synonymous with falsehood"—a fact which readers of the travels in Central Arabia would perhaps do well to bear in mind.

Prof. W. S. Tyler continues his "Representative Cities," and treats in this number of Tyre and the Phœnicians. Prof. E. P. Evans furnishes a readable review of "The Huguenot Galley-Slave." Edward Seymour reviews Figuier's "Vegetable World." The Rev. George Bacon writes another of his Siamese papers. It is all about the father of Prince George Washington and brother of Somdetch Phra Paramendr Maha Mongkut. That monarch thinks, or he thought, for he is dead now, that "'Webster's Dictionary' is better than any English"—an ambiguous compliment if we consider the words, and doubtful, too, if we consider the source; he subscribed for The Illustrated London News; his band played "Yankee Doodle;" he owned the Abbotsford edition of Scott's works; he had a portrait of Washington hanging on the wall; he poured tea for his guest, and made the enquiry, "Cream and sugar?" While he did so, his wife, the queen, crawled on the floor; so did his son, and knocked his head on it when his father spoke to him; his majesty had no trousers on, and, of course, that being the case shoes and stockings would have been an affectation; all his head was shaved clean except a narrow place between the crown and the forehead, and on that was a ridge of clipped hair, stiff like a blacking-brush; round his waist a shawl was twisted, and on his shoulders he wore a blue sack coat. This was the gentlemanly second King of Siam. The author promises another of these amusing papers. Donald G. Mitchell discourses of "Parks, Gardens, and Groves," and makes some remarks concerning "the town poor" and the cheap beginnings of parks which we hope the editors of papers in the rural districts may copy. Dr. Horace Bushnell writes about "The Moral Uses of Bad Government," and preserves a cheerfulness his readers will envy him; there is another "Short Sermon to Sunday-school Teachers;" in some remarkable verses, No. I. of "City Lyrics," Mr. Sherwood likens the newsboy to John the Baptist. On the whole, Hours at Home steadily grows better.

The Catholic World opens with an article which reminds one of the palmy days of Brownson's Review, when the editor of that magazine used to give us in each number some of the most vigorous writing that has ever been done in America. It is entitled "Church and State," and is ostensibly a review of the Marquis of Valdegamas' essay on "Catholicism, Liberalism, and Socialism," which has recently been translated from the Spanish by Mrs. Goddard, now the wife of Rear-Admiral Dahlgren. It is to be wished that the opinions expressed by the reviewer were those held by every Catholic in the country: "There is nothing, then, that the Church can receive from civil society that she has not in the United States;" and again: "The duty of the Catholic on this question is to do his best to preserve this union [the present 'union,' as distinguished from the 'unity,' of church and state] as it is, and to combat every influence or tendency hostile to it."

And it is to be wished, too, that the American Catholic would not be obliged, in following this advice, to go counter to the historical action of his Church and to what seems to be its present desire. There is also in this number of the magazine an able review of Lecky's "History of Rationalism," and the usual variety of articles, good and bad, original and selected. Each number of The Catholic World nowadays is apt to have a religious poem really good. "Olive Branches in Gethsemane" is an example.

In The Atlantic, Dr. Holmes's "Guardian Angel" is more interesting than it has been before. The heroine suffers from hysteria, and the author is on his best ground in describing her disease and the mesmeric treatment to which, to the danger of his own and her peace of mind, her young physician subjects his patient. Better done than anything else in these chapters are the scenes in which the old doctor talks with his son, and the little passage-at-arms between Byles Gridley and the hostler. Into the mouth of old Dr. Hurlbut Dr. Holmes puts the best "good thing" the novel has yet afforded: "Live folks are only dead folks warmed over." It is not as a novel that "The Guardian Angel" is going to be a success.

We cannot wholly rid ourselves of the impression that there is a good deal of stuff and nonsense in the recollections of Mr. Lincoln which Mr. Herndon and, after him, Mrs. Dall have been giving the public. How ill the feminine admiration for strength in the other sex consorts with "the critical spirit" is amusingly illustrated in Mrs. Dall's "Pioneering." After some writing of the intense order—in the vein of Miss Rossetti's "There came a strong man from the North"—about "the sturdy shoulders of Southern men looming far above those of their Eastern brothers," and about Dr. Gwin "offering an arm which seemed on a natural level with the crown of a woman's head," and about "the muscles strapped across the bones" of the descendants of such Southern poor whites as went West, and, finally, about the return of the hot Southern blood, in the persons of the Southern-blooded Western men, to the high places of power, she lets us down wofully in a foot-note by a confession, based on the statement of an Illinois senator, that "if you take the census of his State to-day," there may be found in ten thousand inhabitants one person of the first generation of pioneers of pure Southern blood! In the second generation of the pioneers you find one Southern man in every two thousand citizens of the State. Illinois, we suppose, is a more favorable example for Mrs. Dall's theory than the other States of the Northern Mississippi valley.

Quite a number of the contributions in the April Atlantic call for no particular comments. Bayard Taylor, in "Travel in the United States," is severe, in the usual way, upon the tyranny that railway corporations exercise over travellers. He has seen a man knocked down with a slung-shot, he says, by a conductor on a Western road, because he endeavored to enter what is called the "ladies' car," the rest of the train being loaded with drunken and riotous soldiers. Mr. T. W. Higginson's "Haunted Window" is a very prettily written story of that kind in which apparently supernatural incidents are at last explained on natural principles, and it has the fault, common in the case of such stories, of ceasing to be interesting at all when the supernatural element disappears. Mr. T. Buchanan Read's poem, "Timon's Soliloquy," gives us the mildest sort of a Timon; not him of Athens by much. "Adelaide Ristori," we think, we have read once or twice before. "Katharine Morne" goes on, we see. There is nothing to be said of "A Winter Adventure on the Prairie" nor of a brief sketch of "Chester Harding." "The Restless" tells in strenuous lines, and with here and there a very vivid expression, how an oak that a witch had been hanged on and that she had cursed was builded into a ship which, having sailed, could never, because of the malison, make port. Who "H. Rich" is we do not know; but it seems that he has some sombre fancies, and is not unable to give them adequate expression. Mr. E. E. Hale succeeds in making a very readable paper on the "Sanitary Commission," and by his article and Mr. Lowell's "Familiar Epistle to a Friend" and Mr. John Fiske's careful essay on "University Reform," this number of The Atlantic is saved from being a poor one.

Mr. Fiske's article does not directly bear on the controversy now going on between the friends and enemies of classical education. Keeping in his eye Harvard College as at present constituted, his object is "to educe from a few general principles the rudiments of a systematic scheme of reform," so that the university, without becoming a shop for making either sciolists or profound students in this or that science, or for making specialists of any kind, may yet avail herself of every branch of human knowledge in order to the making of cultivated men. We have seen nothing on this subject since it was first agitated among the alumni of our New England colleges so good as this very practical essay, and we are disposed to believe, and certainly we hope, that it will not be long before many if not all of the excellent suggestions offered by Mr. Fiske will be the law and practice of his own and all other American colleges.

Mr. Lowell's "Familiar Epistle" might indeed have been a letter, and to a friend, for its ease, careless ease it seems to be at times, and its frankness The whole is better than any of its parts—which perhaps is not true of all of Mr. Lowell's or all of hardly any other poet's poems—but we may be allowed to please ourselves by separating from the context this characteristic passage:

> "I have not spilt one drop of joy
> Poured in the senses of the boy,
> Nor Nature fails my walks to bless
> With all her golden inwardness;
> And as blind nestlings, unafraid,
> Stretch up wide-mouthed to every shade
> By which their downy dream is stirred,
> Taking it for the mother-bird,
> So, when God's shadow, which is light,
> Unheralded, by day or night,
> My wakening instincts falls across,
> Silent as sunbeams over moss,
> In my heart's nest half-conscious things
> Stir with a helpless sense of wings,
> Lift themselves up, and tremble long
> With premonitions sweet of song."

Mr. Howells is only to be found in the "Literary Notices." We will not suppose that it is he who gives the American critic those "eminently suggestive" lessons in criticism in the "Advertising Miscellany."

Of the juvenile magazines we see many, from the instructive Paper for Young People, which is not too young for people of sixteen years, down to Miss Seavern's "Nursery" for almost the smallest of the small. Our Young Folks and The Riverside Magazine continue to hold the first positions, and the latter is improving steadily, as a new magazine should. We were able to read with pleasure the whole of the number for April, and saying this seems to us to be saying a good deal for a juvenile magazine, the literature of these periodicals being too often sufficient to strike a man into despair. Let us remark of The Riverside Magazine that when we see Mr. H. L. Stephens's foxes, so human in their expression and action, we are the less inclined to pardon his wretched children, not human, in the frontispiece; and the queen is not a nice creature.

Poetical Works of Sir Walter Scott, Baronet. With a Biographical and Critical Memoir by Francis Turner Palgrave. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1866.)—This is the cheap edition, known as "The Globe Edition," recently put forth in England. Prettily bound, very well printed on good paper, furnished with a sufficient number of good historical notes, and with an essay by Mr. Palgrave, an accomplished critic, we do not know a single cheap edition, nor many dear editions, that can for a moment stand comparison with this. Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Palgrave says, describes Scott as the finished man of the world; Carlyle seems to think of him as in the main a manufacturer of hasty books for the purpose of making money and a landed estate to rival the neighboring country gentlemen. Both these views Mr. Palgrave believes incorrect; they fail, in his opinion, to explain how such imaginative prose and verse as Scott's had room to come into being. In Mr. Palgrave's view the true solution to the difficult problem of Scott's character is not that the nature of the poet was absent, but that it was more closely and curiously combined with the man of common life than in others. This idea the essayist supports by considerations drawn not only from Scott's history as a poet, but from his novels as well, and from his life in the world of affairs. This may be said to be Mr. Palgrave's summing up of Scott's character: "As a child of the critical eighteenth century and the son of a shrewd Scotch solicitor Scott was, on one side, a born sceptic in romance, the Middle Ages, and Jacobitism; as a cadet of the Scotts of Harden and a man of the strongest imaginative temperament, he was likewise a born believer. Now not only his writings, which in the strictest sense reproduce himself, but his life and character, present a continual half-conscious attempt at a real and practical compromise between these opposing elements. In the details, what struck his contemporaries was plain but genial common sense; in the whole, what strikes the later student is the predominance of the poetical impulse." The essay gives, we think, formal expression for the first time to what has been for some time the general opinion about Scott, and for this, to say nothing of some excellent incidental criticisms, it is very well worth having.

Manual of Legal Study. By Scott R. Sherwood. (New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1867.)—This is a convenient little manual for the use of law students, in which they will find a course of legal study marked out for them which will materially aid them in determining what books they shall read—a question very perplexing to beginners, and one upon which they usually get very little light. Our own judgment does not entirely coincide with that of Mr. Sherwood in respect to the choice of books, as we think either Kent's "Commentaries" or Bouvier's "Institutes" better worthy of repeated study than Blackstone; and it seems to us that the number of books included in the list is somewhat too large. But a student beginning on the plan here laid down will soon be able to judge of this for himself, while he may, at all events, be assured that his time will be well spent if he concludes to adhere to the programme of this manual. It is the only thing of its kind which is at all adapted to the present day, and will be of service to students.

THE POLITICAL FUTURE.

THE nature of the arrangement which Congress has made as to its adjournment renders it certain that, barring some gross act of folly on the part of Mr. Johnson or of the Southern leaders, there will be no session until December. As well as anybody can judge from his present attitude and language, he is not likely to do anything to impede the free working of the Reconstruction bill. The generals in command of the military districts are men in whom the country has every confidence, and what they have done so far warrants the conclusion that they will do hereafter all that the occasion calls for or the people expect, without either let or hindrance from the White House. There could, in fact, hardly be a better augury as to the future than the steps General Sheridan has just taken at New Orleans. We may therefore fairly anticipate that the constitutional conventions in the various States will be duly held, and that not only the Unionists, properly so called, but everybody not formally disfranchised by the act, will take part in the election of the delegates. It is impossible to read the speeches of the leading Southern men and the articles in the recent Southern papers without feeling satisfied that active submission has at last been determined on, that the South is going to reorganize under the act, and that the plan of flattering and managing the negroes has been fixed on as the best and only mode of taking out of the new law whatever sting or danger there may be in it. We shall probably see during the coming summer most of the leading Southern politicians, and a large number also of influential men who have never taken much part in politics, carrying on a brisk canvass amongst the freedmen, and competing, and we believe not unsuccessfully, with the Southern Radicals, properly so called, for the negro vote.

That the conventions will comply with the requisitions of Congress we have no sort of doubt. It would, of course, be a great mockery, as everybody at the South now knows, to hold them for any other purpose than compliance. That the establishment of free schools is not amongst those requisitions, as proposed the other day by Mr. Sumner, we consider a great misfortune; and we cannot help thinking that the whole North will see it in the same light before many years. Of what the Southern planters can do in the political management of ignorant voters we know something already, but we greatly fear we have something still to learn. If, therefore, Mr. Johnson confines himself during the summer to the routine duties of his office, and indulges in no worse outbursts of feeling than "conversations," there will be nothing for Congress to do until the regular time of meeting. The game of removals from office which the President played last summer is, of course, barred by the Tenure of Office bill, and our foreign ministers may hereafter meet the gaze of the McCrackens without wincing. Thus Mr. Johnson is really exposed to hardly any temptation.

What, under these circumstances, is likely to become of the impeachment? In the first place, it is quite evident that its great advocates have now very little influence in the House. General Butler went to Congress charged with the special duty of carrying it through, and may be said to have made absolutely no impression on anybody, and has been condemned to the somewhat inglorious rôle of sticking pins into his personal enemies for the amusement of his fellow-members. Mr. Stevens, too, has evidently lost his power, or else the House has grown thick-skinned, for his lash, though ever so mercilessly applied, does not produce the slightest movement. What is more significant than all is that the Judiciary Committee makes no secret of the fact that it is proceeding in strict accordance with legal forms, taking evidence only under legal rules, and is admitting rebutting testimony at every step. We have all along maintained that if this were done the impeachment had little chance. The only mode of impeachment which promised success was something in the nature of a bill of pains and penalties, or what might be called "impeachment by acclamation." We are still of opinion that no evidence has been brought before the committee which would bear examination in a court of law, because it could only reach the committee through the promoters of the movement, and thus far these gentlemen have not tantalized the public by their secrecy. They have been, of course, very anxious to secure support from the people, and consequently are not likely to have kept back anything of importance which came to their knowledge, and yet they have told us absolutely nothing that we have not all known for the last year, unless it be Mr. Boutwell's charge about the pardon of the West Virginia deserters. We have at the same time the assurance of the committee that they will prosecute their enquiry diligently during the summer, and if they find any high crime or misdemeanor will do their duty about it fearlessly. In any case, however, the probability is that we shall not get their report till December.

In calculating the effect of it, even if unfavorable to the President, it is desirable to remember that the convention for the nomination of the next President will be held in the summer of 1868, and that during the previous half-year the attention of the political world will be entirely absorbed in the manufacture of candidates, possible and impossible, likely and unlikely, and will continue to be so till the nomination is made. After the nomination of course comes the campaign, and we doubt if a more exciting one has ever occurred. It is safe therefore to predict that Mr. Johnson, insignificant already, will, after the first of January next, become more and more so, and will cease to be spoken of at all as the winter wears on, and that some of those who are now most eager to try him will then be least disposed to trouble themselves about him. Moreover, suppose an impeachment process were commenced in December, if conducted with legal form, as it ought to be and certainly would be, it would last till the following summer at least, and conviction might possibly be secured about the time of the next election; but we doubt if either the cause of th ecountry or the interests of virtue would be served by it.

THE NORTH GERMAN CONFEDERATION.

THE assembly convened to consider a draft of the constitution which is to unite twenty-two states of North Germany in a federal union has been sitting for some weeks past in Berlin, and the cable has just briefly informed us that the constitution submitted to it had been adopted, with some slight modifications. What these modifications are we can, pending the arrival of fuller intelligence, only guess; but we can learn enough from a careful reading of the reports of the debates, combined with what we know already of the feelings and tendencies of the great party leaders, to guess with a tolerably close approach to accuracy. The proposed Confederation—or, to speak more accurately now, the actual Confederation—will, in many important particulars, resemble the American Union. The legislature consists of a council, composed of representatives of the different states, and corresponding in character to our Senate, and of a lower house, or diet, composed of representatives of the people. The presidency of the Confederation, however, is lodged in perpetuity in the King of Prussia. He is to declare war, make peace, enter into treaties and receive ambassadors, and to command the army and navy and to appoint the president of the council; but the lower house will choose its own speaker. The confederate constitution and the acts of the confederate parliament are declared to be the supreme law of the land, to which all state legislation is to be subordinate; and as we hear nothing of any tribunal competent to pass upon the constitutionality of federal laws, the federal authority may really be said to be, for all practical purposes, unlimited. The constitution can only be amended by a two-thirds vote of the council, or upper house; but this provision really amounts to nothing, as Prussia is to possess an absolute veto on all changes. Perhaps the most striking provision of the new constitution, and that which constitutes the most effective preparation for a still closer political union, is that which confers community of citizenship on the inhabitants of all the confederated states. The subjects of each state are to stand in all other respects on absolutely the same footing in every respect as natives.

The federal courts are to have exclusive jurisdiction in all matters relating to commerce and navigation, banking and currency, railroasd and telegraph lines, and in all civil proceedings little except the administration of criminal justice and the management of the police, education and the church, being left to the local authorities. To crown all, the power of military execution against contumacious states is conferred on the general government in express terms. Had our Constitution contained a similar one we should have certainly escaped a most wearisome controversy, and probably a bloody war.

The constitution in the form in which it has reached us, and in which it has probably been passed, appears to be the work of several persons who have not succeeded in blending their work. Some portions of it are marked by great clearness and conciseness, and others by a tedious and unnecessary minuteness. Some of the articles are contradictory, and in others points of grave importance are left in great doubt. In fact, it is only with the greatest difficulty that one can extract from it a clear idea of the exact nature and limits of the functions assigned to the presidency, the council, and the diet respectively.

The assembly recently organized is composed of about 296 members, of whom 193 represent the old provinces of Prussia, 43 those recently annexed, and the remaining 21 the other states of the Confederation. Of those from Prussia proper a large majority—thanks, strange as it may appear, to universal suffrage—are Conservatives; from new Prussia about one-half are Conservatives, and very few who are not either Separatists or Ultramontanists. Schleswig-Holstein sends mostly Separatists, Hanover one-third Separatists, and Electoral Hesse and Nassau Liberals only. Most of the other states and one-third of Saxony return only Liberals and Union men. As a rule, the Conservatives were quite ready to accept the draft of the constitution as first presented to them, while the Liberals sought to make some alterations; but of course the position of Prussia in the matter makes deliberation over it little more than a form. The objections of the Liberals were three in number: (1) the exclusion of state officials of all ranks from seats in the Diet, (2) the absence of a responsible ministry, and (3) the absolute and final settlement at the outset of the per-centage of population liable to military service, and of the sum to be appropriated for the maintenance of the army, thus depriving the Diet of the principal, in fact only, check either on usurpation or abuse of power. The first of these objections has been pushed very strongly, and has probably led to one of the modifications which the telegraph announces; the second the King of Prussia has expressed his willingness to meet by concession, and it is proposed to make the Prussian ministry the ministry of the Confederation; the third is the most serious. If the Diet is allowed to vote the supplies for the army each year, it would of course render the control of the army, which is now lodged in the hands of Prussia, only nominal. But this Prussia is naturally unwilling to submit to, as she is determined that whatever the nature of the Confederation may be, she shall really rule in it, at least so far as to prevent its breaking up without her consent. She has been in the meantime strongly urging on the parliament the acceptance of the constitution as it stands, leaving the work of amendment to be done hereafter; but as amendments can only be made by the vote of two-thirds of the council, and as she commands at least seventeen of the forty-three, the acceptance of the constitution pure and simple, if it has taken place, of course means simply submission to her will.

The position of the South German states just now is rather singular. They do not seem by any means disposed to follow the course which everybody expected them to follow when the treaty was made at the close of the war, which stipulated that the North German Confederation should not extend further south than the line of the Main. Austria then expected an alliance of all the South German states, and the other states hoped to form a south-western league which would enable them to hold the balance in all disputes between Prussia and the North German Confederation on one side, and France and Austria on the other. Baden, Würtemberg, Bavaria, and ducal Hesse now begin to perceive very clearly, however, that a combination in antagonism to North Germany would not only give them no influence in German councils, but would place them in the position of a weak adversary, and deprive them of all claims to consideration on the score of their German nationality, and Austria is clearly too weak to be relied on in a pinch. Moreover, the Zollverein, or customs league, will now expire in a few months, and Bismark will doubtless refuse to renew it, in the hope of forcing these states to join the Northern Confederation, so that their manufacturing and commercial interests will suffer severely if they persist in trying to set up a confederation of their own. They are accordingly clamorous already for closer union, and the terms of such an union seem to have been already settled, and only waited the formation of a government at the north competent to treat to be embodied in a formal league or alliance. This government is now, it appears, in existence, and we shall see before long the consummation of Bismark's hopes and the verification of his saying—"Let Germany be put in the saddle, and there need be no fear of her inability to ride."

WHAT IS THE USE OF GOING TO COLLEGE?

The question of the comparative value of classical and scientific education, or rather of the value of classical education, has been undergoing very vigorous discussion in this country as well as elsewhere for the last year or two. The ferocious attack on classical education which appeared in these columns from the pen of "A Gothic Man" has called forth a number of letters which want of space prevents us from using, but none of which sheds any new light on the subject. Our periodicals East and West teem with articles on it from presidents and professors of colleges, and from what are called "practical men." The last number of The Atlantic Monthly contains a very sensible and able attempt to state what ought to be studied in universities, and to assign to each study its share in the work of a sound general education; and finally Mr. John Stuart Mill, in his recent address at St. Andrews, may be said to have closed the discussion. It is not at all likely that any better or more authoritative exposition than his of the nature of an university education is likely to be made by anybody.

The general result seems to be that the enemies of the classics have had the worst of it. The weight of authority, whether it be the authority of cultivated radicals or cultivated conservatives, is all against the exclusion of the ancient classics from any course of study the object of which is to furnish a man with a well disciplined, flexible, highly tempered, and robust intellect, and this is or ought to be, it is universally admitted, the chief object of all university training. This point we for our part consider settled, and even if we did not consider it settled, we doubt if anything that could be said about it in the space we have at our disposal would be of much value. It seems to be taken for granted by the best class of university reformers—we mean those who really seek to make universities instruments of general culture—that if they do succeed in making them so, they will satisfy the demand of the majority of those who are dissatisfied with the existing system. But we think this is a mistake. The literary taste and literary wants of the country are undoubtedly improving, and have improved greatly—how greatly any one can see who takes the trouble to compare the American books and periodicals of to-day with the American books and periodicals of forty years ago, or the Congressional speeches over which most people now laugh with the Congressional speeches reported in "Niles's Register," over which nobody laughed. In fact, the intellectual needs of the population change every year. Success in any field of literature or art or science is every year more difficult, and every author and orator and artist feels every year the edge of a sharper and more exacting criticism. But then there is no question that the popular craving for the highest culture, or the popular respect for it and appreciation of its value, does not increase in the ratio of the national growth in other directions. The class of men of the highest culture bears a smaller proportion to-day to the total population, we venture to say—although this is an assertion which there is no means of proving—than it has borne at any other period. In three things—population, material wealth, and mechanical skill—our progress for twenty or thirty years has been very rapid, so rapid that nothing else has been able to keep pace with it.

The result is that in the eyes of a large proportion of the people material progress has come to mean all progress, and anything that does not help it so rapidly and visibly that any business man can see and appreciate the help is looked upon as comparatively valueless. The signs of this are very numerous. When a measure is proposed in Congress, for instance, which is likely to affect the supply or distribution of knowledge—one of the most stupendous subjects which can occupy the attention of the legislature of a civilized country—whom does Congress call before it and consult? The philosophers, teachers, students, writers, philanthropists, or preachers of the country? Not at all. They are never so much as mentioned, and probably there are not ten men in both Houses who would go to hear their opinions or wishes about it. It is those who trade in books—the paper-makers, booksellers, printers, and bookbinders—who are sent for, whose desires are recorded, and whom ambitious members labor to please; and when the "book trade" is satisfied, who gives himself any concern about what the readers and writers of books feel or think? When rich men leave money to an institution of learning, or when legislatures endow them, is hardly ever nowadays for the promotion of general culture—for the general purposes of a university—but almost always for the encouragement of some particular branch of knowledge which is likely to be of immediate use in making the country richer, not wiser simply. We find no fault with this. The encouragement of any branch of knowledge is a noble use of wealth; we simply record it as one of the signs of the times. Even pictures have not yet in the eyes of the great body even of picture-buyers risen above the rank of furniture, and the artists themselves have of late helped to diffuse and confirm this unfortunate popular impression of the nature of their calling by placing their productions in the category of "native manufactures," and joining the upholsterers and cabinet-makers and paper-makers in a cry for protection from foreign competition, as if native and foreign artists were rival mechanics, instead of being what they are—joint contributors to the world's stock of graceful and beautiful and ennobling things.

So, also, when preparations are made nowadays for the establishment of a new university, or when a cry is raised by the general public for what is called "university reform," we find almost invariably that what is sought in a university is a collection of schools for the teaching of certain money-making arts, and what is meant by a "university education" is such an education as will qualify a man to earn somehow fifteen hundred dollars and upwards yearly. In fact, there seems to be a general tendency to look on the money spent in a young man's training as simply an investment, which must be managed on strictly business principles and made to yield ordinary interest at least, and, if possible, a good profit at the earliest possible moment. It is not with regard to the college course only that this tendency shows itself. The dislike of law students to studying law yearly increases. Most students chafe terribly under the laborious reading on which forensic fame was in old times built, and will none of it, and qualifications for admission to the bar having been in most States made nearly nominal, they rush into "business" as soon as they have got hold of the rules of practice. Doctors are forced into somewhat greater patience by the fear of prosecution for manslaughter. In the lower arts we witness similar phenomena. All master mechanics will tell you that impatience of training grows apace, that boys will not now submit to apprenticeship, and that the inefficiency of workmen consequently becomes yearly greater and more embarrassing. The shipbuilders of New York mentioned this a few months ago, in a printed statement, as one of the causes of the decline of their trade in this country.

We do not call attention to these facts for the mere purpose of making up what is called a "startling picture." We believe them to be the natural and inevitable consequences of the sudden opening by steam and electricity of the boundless resources of a vast continent to a population twenty times too small to work them properly. There is so much to be done, therefore, and so few to do it, and wealth is to be acquired so much more rapidly and by so much less exertion than ever before in any other age or country, that finish or accuracy or high proficiency are not asked for. Mr. Lincoln said of his law papers, that they would amuse lawyers in Boston, but out West they did well enough; so it is with many other things. Men will not, on the whole, do anything better than society requires them to do it, or, to put it in a coarser form, than they are paid for doing it; and society in most parts of the United States has just now so much to do and is in such a hurry to do it, that young men find they can get employment as lawyers, doctors, and mechanics with a very small amount of training, and therefore are unwilling to submit to more training than they will require to enable them to get as large wages as are to be had. Moreover, the ease with which wealth is acquired has raised the standard of living so very rapidly, and made the position of those who do not possess it in many ways so much more uncomfortable than it has ever been before, that few young men are willing to delay one minute in the race for it to pick up the finish or culture, particularly as they see that the heroes of the day are generally the "self-made men"—that is, the men who, starting without education and going on without ever acquiring any, grow very rich and influential.

We fear, therefore, that the question which is occupying the minds of the majority of American parents just now is not what kind of course their sons ought to pursue at college, but whether there is any "use" in sending them to college at all, and we wish sincerely that some of the ability which has been expended in settling what the college course ought to be may be diverted to convincing the public of the advantage of pursuing it. When one reads much of what is written on the subject of "university reform" at the West, and particularly the accounts one receives from that region of the collegiate novelties they are about to produce out there, one has little difficulty in concluding that Mr. Mill's idea of an university—"not a place of professional education," "not a place for the production of skilful lawyers and physicians and engineers, but capable and cultivated human beings;" not places "from which men should carry away professional knowledge, but that which should direct the use of their professional knowledge, and bring the light of general culture to illuminate the technicalities of special pursuits"—is not likely to meet with general favor.

But this renders it all the more necessary for those who have universities in charge, or who are interested in their working, to hold fast to this ideal, and whatever changes they make to keep this and this only in view. In our time the useful is sure to take care of itself. Schools intended to fit men to make money easily will always find plenty of founders, patrons, and pupils. The malaise from which the country suffers, and suffers without knowing what is the matter with it, is the want of a greater diffusion of that highest culture which makes "capable and cultivated human beings," the object of which is not to make better miners or surgeons or pleaders, but to widen the range of our intellectual vision, elevate and purify our tastes.

The great difficulty, in short, with which the universities have to contend in trying to become what they ought to be, is not the prejudices of professors or "classicists," as some reformers would have us believe, but the general rage for money, or, as it is sometimes called by an imposing euphemism, "the spirit of the age." As long as professional as well as other men can pick up all the knowledge that society requires of them and fill all posts of honor and profit without high cultivation, the universities will have a hard time in trying to spread it. Men will not at present fag their way into the heart of the sciences for the mere honor of being considered by the public "scholars and gentlemen"—that is, well-informed incapables, well enough in their way at literary tea-parties, but useless for war, or politics, or commerce, bearing about the same relation to the "practical" man that an Italian greyhound does to a watch-dog. We know of but one way for the universities to combat this evil at present. It must be made pecuniarily profitable for young men to cultivate themselves to the highest point. If this stimulus were once applied, we have no doubt the class of highly cultivated men would soon become large enough to diffuse through the whole community a higher standard of excellence in all departments of knowledge than now exists, and thus to render the public more exacting; and the more exacting the public becomes, the higher will be the average of attainments amongst men laying any claims to education. Large fortunes have now become very numerous all over the country, and our rich men are plainly acquiring a noble habit of endowing or making donations to colleges. Hitherto these gifts have usually been made for the foundation of specific courses of instruction, which is so far very good, but does not, after all, touch the root of the prevailing evil. We might have in every college in the country splendid "schools," rich museums, and well-stocked libraries and swarms of professors, and still be no better off than we are now. No means and appliances of learning can be of any use unless there be amongst the students thirst that will not be slaked, ambition that cannot be satisfied, energy that never tires. All your wells are worthless if your horses will not drink. If, therefore, donors to universities would for the next few years devote themselves to founding pecuniary prizes of sufficient magnitude to make them really tempting to young men beginning life, to be awarded only to the highest merit in a real university course, while leaving the winners free to engage in the business of life whenever they pleased, it would, we are satisfied, do more than anything else that can be devised for the creation of a higher standard of excellence, for the diffusion of a more exacting spirit amongst the public and of a stronger feeling of sympathy and fraternity amongst men of education, and for the banishment or suppression of the large bands of dealers in counterfeit wares who may now be found in every highway and byway of science and literature, and who raise such a prodigious outcry and call so many of their victims to their rescue when any attempt is made to bring them to justice that they may be said to enjoy complete impunity.

PARIS GOSSIP.

Paris, March 8, 1867.

If in the streets of Paris the carnival is all but extinct, its presence still lingers in the salons of the capital, where innumerable masked and fancy balls have been given during Shrovetide, while in half the houses dances and suppers on a more modest scale have been going on from garret to cellar. One of the most splendid of these Shrovetide balls was given on Sunday night, in one of the grandest hotels of the Faubourg St. Honoré, all the guests being attired in costumes imitated from the reigns of the Valois kings. The supper, which was superb, was served in Faenza ware of the reign of Henri II.; the wine was in Venetian glass of the same epoch; the salt-cellars were the work of Benvenuto Cellini; and the table was lighted entirely with candelabra and candlesticks of Murano, the exquisite whiteness of the glasswares being relieved by the splendid hues of their flowers.

The fancy ball at the hotel of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has been the most splendid of the official fêtes of the defunct carnival; the fair daughters of America, as usual, carrying off the palm of beauty, and rivalling the most splendid in the richness and elegance of their costumes. Mrs. Lambreth as a marquise of the time of Louis XV.; Mrs. Barclay as Folly, hung from head to foot with little mirrors in gilded frames; Mrs. Thompson as an Irish gipsy, and her sister, Miss Farnell, as a star, in blue and gold; Mrs. Spencer in a wonderful dress of gold gauze, and her lovely daughter in a fanciful Italian costume; and Miss Beckwith as a Greek slave in chains, were among the most admired of the brilliant assemblage. There were costumes representing "golden rain," the Huntress Diana, "shower of ice," Arabs, Algerian Jewesses; a group representing "Night," exquisitely got up, with dusky wings, whose under side was constellated with diamonds; another group, representing a "shower of ice," was equally effective. The costumes of the gentlemen were equally rich, and all were well adapted for dancing. The ornamentation and lighting of the rooms were unusually splendid even for Paris; and the Emperor and Empress were present, in masks and dominos, enjoying the scene. Prince Napoléon, who wore no mask, was the object of no end of witty attacks on the part of the masked merry-makers about him; but bore with great good humor the "chaffing" to which he was subjected, generally (for he is one of the wittiest of the witty) paying back the "chaffers" in their own coin. The last of the state balls at the Tuileries was the most brilliant of the four; the Empress, in a dress of white satin trimmed with roses, and a diamond sparkling in each leaf of this trimming, "taking the shine" out of all the other ladies by the splendor of her jewels. Her Majesty's private Monday evening parties, admittance to which is so eagerly sought for and so hard to obtain, are to be resumed next week. Several ladies of the American colony have succeeded, to the amazement and envy of less favored aspirants of the other colonies, in making good their footing at these charming soirées. It is said that one of these, immensely rich and particularly enterprising, having got herself presented at court, took an opportunity of setting forth to the Duc de Bassano, the grand chamberlain, her great desire to be invited to the Empress's "Mondays," and earnestly entreated the duke to intercede with the Empress in her favor.

"But, my dear lady," objected the duke, "on what possible ground, on what imaginable pretext, could I ask her Majesty to place your name on her list?"

"Oh, Monsieur le Duc," returned the lady, "if your excellency would but say to the Empress that I have the most magnificent diamonds, and that her Majesty cannot see them to any advantage in the great cram and crush of the state balls, whereas her Majesty would certainly see them with pleasure at the Monday evening parties, where they would produce a most splendid effect!"

So earnestly did the lady plead her own cause and that of her diamonds that the Duc de Bassano, moved by her entreaties and the oddity of the idea, at last consented to lay her request before the Empress; and the latter, greatly amused by the communication, actually sent the invitation so greatly desired. The lady, who delights in rigging herself out in diamonds from top to toe, and who covers her yellow hair with the same until her head looks like a thatched hay-rick on a frosty morning, came out for the occasion in all her splendor. And whether it be that the Empress really considers the diamonds in question as forming a desirable addition to the attractions of her drawing-room, or whatever else may be the motive of the preference, certain it is that the lady alluded to has so far made good the position so curiously gained that she has been, with her husband, ever since regularly invited to the Empress's Mondays, and is received by her Majesty with the utmost kindness and attention.

The American colony gave, on Washington's birthday, a magnificent fête at the Grand Hotel. The rooms were filled with flowers and flags and splendidly lighted. A fine portrait of the founder of the Great Republic occupied the place of honor; and the beaux and belles who had met to celebrate the day danced with great animation, and did full justice to an excellent supper.

An avalanche of parties, balls, concerts public and private, dinners, theatres, and operas is rolling over Paris; and people are beginning to ask, with some anxiety, If the tide of dissipation is already so overwhelming, what will it be during the six months of the Exhibition?

Rossini has just given a most charming and brilliant musical soirée in celebration of his seventy-fifth birthday. All the artistic and literary notabilities of the day were there, with the cream of the political, aristocratic, and financial worlds. The old maestro, who is far prouder of his skill as a pianist than of his genius as a composer, played, with M. de Saint-Saëus, a duet composed by the latter; Patti, Delle-Sedie, and all the leading "stars" taking part in the programme of the evening. Madame Alboni, withdrawn from the stage and living in her pretty hotel in the Cours-la-Reine, gave a similar party a few nights ago, and not being able to find among her guests a bass voice for a chorus which was to be sung during the evening, she took the part herself, and that with a roundness and richness of voice that perfectly astounded her hearers.

The Emperor has determined to help Lamartine out of his difficulties by getting the Legislative Assembly to vote him a "national recompense" of 400,000 francs, which sum, it is hoped, will enable the ex-president of the late republic to pay off his debts and keep his head above water for the rest of his lifetime.

Fine Arts.

THE PROPOSED GOVERNMENT BUILDING IN NEW YORK.

THE Government Commission which has charge of the matter of a proposed new building for post-office and United States courts issued an advertisement about a month ago stating some of the requirements of the building and the conditions under which architects may offer designs. At the same time a circular was sent to the architects of this city and vicinity containing the substance of the advertisement and a map of the site. The map was very insufficient and inaccurate, and a second and larger one has very recently been sent to the same architects, giving the needed facts and figures.

The lot ceded by the city to the General Government is a piece taken off the southern end of the City Hall Park. It is in shape something like a triangle with one rounded corner; or, if the little segmental piece at the lower end were dropped, the shape would be nearly a symmetrical trapezoid having the two parallel sides 320 and 120 feet respectively, and the two other sides each 300 feet. If the building occupies the whole of this piece of 70,000 square feet, and is only three stories high, it will be vast and costly enough for the "metropolis." It is to be fire-proof, faced with white marble, and, we may add, nobody expects it to cost much less than two million dollars.

As the criticism of existing buildings is an important part of our department of "Fine Arts," so it is of interest to enquire what chance there is that this great edifice will be of good architecture. The old routine is not to be followed. Congress has appointed a commission of New York business men, and this commission has advertised, inviting architects to compete. And inasmuch as nearly all the architects of standing in the land have rejected publicly the invitation of the War Department, and as a smaller number of the same have pooh-poohed the chance of sending designs to Albany for a new capitol, the present commission has offered terms and conditions which are at least more carefully considered than usual, and are, in many respects, fair and business-like. But it seems to be certain that many, to say the least, of our best architects will avoid altogether the proposed competition. All or nearly all of those whose names are favorably known by important work well done, and the great majority of the younger men who represent good possibilities and control the future, will, it is clear, refuse to offer designs for the building which they each and all would so much like to build. This is a most unfortunate state of things, and, as regards the conditions and prospects of architecture, to be regretted as much as any of the numerous errors in the building enterprises of the faultful past.

We think that the architects are not altogether right in their decision, so far as their decision is common and for reasons given, and we shall say a word concerning what seems to us their mistake. But there can be no doubt that they are right in the main in their common objections to the terms of the commissioners' invitation and in their dislike and dread of such competitions.

Without attempting further to speak for either the commission or the architects, let us consider some points that look unpromising. In the first place, the combination in one building of post-office and law courts is very unfortunate. To bring them together in one building at all will be to any architect who may undertake the task a very great difficulty and embarrassment. The ground floor must of necessity be a great single room surrounded by a broad corridor for the public; those are the conditions precedent for the main body of a post-office for New York, and to build above that a couple of stories of large and small and variously combined rooms, the whole to be fire-proof, heavy with brick and iron, is a trying and anxious labor.

Then, in the second place, the directions of the advertisement are very insufficient and vague, and sometimes, we cannot but think, are mistaken. Even if they are all right to the letter, they are so insufficient that every one must go make his own enquiries: Which offices are the most frequented, which the least? which rooms are to be large, and which small? Are the present rooms of the marshal, district attorney, circuit court clerk, sufficient in size and convenient in arrangement, and, if not, what changes are imperative, and what changes are desirable if easy to effect? As for the post-office, all is left in uncertainty. This most difficult part of the problem is left for each architect to work out without assistance. The whole plan will prove a hard one to perfect.

And then, thirdly, there is no time allowed to do the work in. Six weeks would hardly suffice if no one had anything else to do. Six weeks would hardly suffice if all requirements were clearly stated, and nothing were asked of the architects but an exterior. But to compose this building covering seventy thousand square feet—to make each department perfect in itself and to combine all harmoniously—to design a noble and complete exterior, and to represent the whole by sufficient drawings, is not six weeks' but three months' work even for tolerably unoccupied men.[*]

Here comes in another, the fourth difficulty. There are parts of the invitation which read as if a handsome building were not desired. "Unnecessary and inappropriate ornamentation to be avoided." Can any one conceive of ornamentation which the designer would confess inappropriate? Would it be ornament at all if inappropriate, or even if unnecessary? And can anything which is truly ornament be unnecessary—except, indeed, in the sense that the building would stand without it? "The material of the exterior to be of white marble, except as to first floor, which is to be estimated both for marble and iron." Taking together and in connection these two quotations, it seems that a study of Broadway store fronts would nearly suit the case. It is certainly to be hoped that neither iron nor cast-iron will appear anywhere upon the front except in sash-bars and railings, and that a proper proportion of the whole cost may go for necessary and appropriate ornamentation.

A fifth objection is purely a matter of business. The commission announces "that all plans for which premiums shall be awarded shall be retained as the property of the United States." There are fourteen premiums offered; five of these of five hundred dollars each, and five of only three hundred dollars each. And the wording of the invitation forbids an architect to refuse the three hundred dollars if awarded him and demand the return of his drawings. This stipulation is quite valueless, for any architect employed upon such a work must feel an insurmountable repugnance to using designs of others for which no adequate remuneration has been made, and they could only embarrass him. A public exhibition of the designs would be very desirable, and this would develop and bring to light every forgotten point, and explain every half-understood need. But the designs could only be of value to the Government as a part of the history of the times. The difficulties contained in this stipulation can best be clearly shown by the statement that all architects consider their drawings as their own, as a lawyer's papers are his, a clergyman's manuscript sermons his. An architect's business is to build houses; a lawyer's to win cases; a clergyman's, in part, to preach sermons. The tools by which they work, materials of their trade, remain theirs after house, verdict, and sermon are finished and delivered.

Another business point makes a sixth objection. The commission "reserves the right of rejecting all plans submitted to it." It is usual for quartermasters and commissaries advertising for Government stores to specify this reserved right, necessary to enable them to reject bids from irresponsible parties. It has crept into this specification, too, where it will do more harm than good. By all means let this reservation exist as regards the actual building, but let the prizes be duly awarded and paid. The bidders for beef and flour contracts will admit that the examiners can judge of their samples and of the accountability of their endorsers, but the architects will not admit that the commission can judge of their designs. This is precisely the central difficulty, that experts in any difficult business distrust the judgment of outsiders; that the architects are sure that if they work their hardest and succeed the best, the opinions formed of their work by the judges will be founded upon no adequate knowledge of the requirements of the building or the difficulties of the case, so that every one thinks that the possible merit of some of the designs will be no bar against the rejection of them all, and the loss of all the labor given to the competition.

A seventh objection is to the site, which no one approves. As public opinion is singularly unanimous upon that point, we pass it, merely saying that it is generally held that no building for the proposed uses will ever be built at the south end of the Park.

If we contrast with this circular of invitation and specification the corresponding documents in the cases of two important competitions now going on in England, we shall find the conditions so different as to make the undertakings themselves seem radically different. These are the competitions for the new National Gallery of Fine Arts and for the law courts or "Palace of Justice;" both buildings to be in London, one on Trafalgar Square, one on the Strand near Temple Bar. In London the leading architects are known as well as the leading painters; as well, let us say, as in New York the leading lawyers are known. And they have won their position by that combination of powers—power of design, of construction, of business management, of organization—which alone can make a man a fit architect to undertake a large work. In the case of the law courts twelve leading architects or firms are invited to compete. The circular of instruction is a pamphlet of perhaps fifty large octavo pages; it is explicit in its directions and full and suggestive in its hints. There is no chance to mistake and no necessity to lose time in making further enquiries. Nine months were allowed in this instance, and the architects were expected to send in, and they have sent in, plans, elevations, sections, views of general effect, drawings of detail, models, etc.—twenty-four, twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-five drawings respectively, besides models, being the offerings of different competitors. Rich and decorative buildings were expected and will be built. These drawings and models are to be the property of the Government, indeed, but the Government pays for them—eight hundred pounds sterling is to be paid to each competitor. The successful architect is to build the building and to receive five per cent. upon all outlay. The designs are exhibited to the public in an ample gallery, in which each architect had his own space allotted to him, where he has arranged his drawings and models to suit himself. The public have visited them; the London press discusses them—the literary weeklies giving pages of elaborate criticism to the designs, following up the subject week after week; and the dailies of the better class treating them with about ten times more attention than our newspaper treatment of our one annual exhibition of pictures. And now appears in The Athenæum an announcement that the public exhibition of designs will henceforth be only on Thursdays, and admission for members of Parliament and special visitors on Saturdays only, "the other days being needed for the labors of the commission." That last clause is, we think, of the best augury for the success of the London law courts. The reason why architects most dread the judgment of the inexpert is because it is so likely to be hasty and reckless. If the New York commission would undertake to give a full day of eight hours and close attention to each design sent in, beside the necessary concluding discussion, they would be pretty sure to reach an approximately right decision.

THE TARIFF ON BOOKS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I have no desire for the "last word," yet considering the space again occupied by "A Publisher," in pleading the cause of monopoly vs. cheap books, I pray you to let me state

1. That if "Bohn's libraries are known to all the reading world as purely exceptional," the exception consists in their large consumption by book-buyers, and proves the hardship of raising the tariff on them from 25 per cent. to more than 50, by the absurd duty of 25 cents per pound.

2. That the assumed "worthlessness" of certain heavy books, in the critical eyes of "A Publisher," is no reason for taxing them 50 to 100 per cent. on their commercial value, and thereby excluding men who are engaged in wide and comprehensive studies from all power of enlarging their libraries.

3. That the grievance sustained by the publishers through the accidental cheapness of a few English books (reprinted here) under the present duty, is like a drop in the bucket when compared with the oppression of the whole community of American scholars by duties almost prohibitory.

[*] The time has been extended to the first of June, notice to that effect having been given about two weeks before the day first named for sending in designs. So far as this third difficulty has operated to keep architects from competing, it is too late to repair the mischief.

4. That all the instances cited by " A Publisher " to prove the proposed duties low ones are calculated (with a solitary exception) from books chargeable with 10 cents per pound. Now nothing is more certain than the fact that the books published since 1850, and therefore to be taxed 25 cents per pound, are far more largely imported than those issued before that date. Witness Bohn's libraries, and witness also the libraries of Charpentier and the Abbé Migne, the very instances cited by " A Publisher," who rates them at 10 cents per lb., carefully ignoring the fact that most of them were published since 1850, and, therefore, his figures are to be multiplied by 2½ to arrive at the correct cost.

5. All the objections urged against the new avoirdupois duty on the productions of the intellect remain unanswered. Its cumbersome machinery, its awkward division of parcels by an arbitrary date, its vexatious delays, its complicated problems of books reprinted and not reprinted, books printed with various dates and no dates at all, and, in short, its perfection of absurdity and unreason, fairly entitle it to the appellation of " the patent combined circumlocutory protective and prohibitive tariff."

6. Perhaps there is now little danger that a tariff which violates every principle of political economy and common sense will become a law ; but would it not become our prosperous and successful publishers to remember the story of the dog and the bone in Æsop, and hold fast to the protection they have, rather than to invite too close a scrutiny from a sorely-taxed people by eagerly grasping for more ?

VERITAS.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION IN NEW YORK CITY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The editorial in your paper of the 7th, under the taking title of "The Ring in the Board of Education," is founded, I assume, on what you deemed to be trustworthy information ; and, being unfortunately an editorial article and not a mere communication, it may not be altogether courteous to ask you to admit a reply. The press cannot more usefully employ its power than in keeping the public schools before the public ; but I need hardly remind The Nation that, to do this fairly and effectually, the press should be well informed. The article in question contains, on its face, inconsistencies which should not have escaped your editorial eye, and leaves the attentive reader disappointed with the promising title, and still anxiously enquiring, where, after all, is the ring in the Board of Education ? The misdeeds of the ward officers are mingled ingeniously with the shortcomings of the central board, so as to create a general suspicion in the minds of the public ; there is an imposing array of figures, seasoned with school gossip and personal references to members of the boards ; but there is nothing, not even assertion, to suggest the existence of a " Ring " in the ordinary sense of the word. It is stated that three of the members have sons employed as clerks in the Board of Education ; but it is not suggested that these clerkships are unnecessary, or that the employees do not faithfully perform the duties of the office. It is stated, at the same time, as a charge of equal weight, that former members of the board are also enjoying clerkships in its gift, and, though there may be a question not of morality, but of delicacy, in reference to the employment of the relatives of members, there can be no question that persons well acquainted with the system, whose characters are known by former association with the board, are precisely those of all others who should receive such appointments. It is asserted that the public money is improvidently lavished on the smaller grammar schools ; but there is no attempt to show that the members are engaged in intercepting this money on its way to the schools.

There is an implied accusation of this sort which can be disposed of by confronting your informant with himself, and contrasting two curiously inconsistent paragraphs which I quote from your article :

> " For a few years after the passage of the present school law some of the most respectable citizens filled the offices ; but the city officials soon found there was a placer to be worked at their very doors equal to any to be found on the Pacific coast. Since then we have found them from aldermen down, familiar as they are with all the jobbery and corruption found in other branches of the city government, devoting themselves to the cause of public education."

Now compare this alarming statement with the assertion almost immediately following, uttered, I may say, in the same breath :

> " That the vote cast for the school ticket should be rarely more than, and often under, one-half of the regular vote of the city, shows how slight is the interest the public take in the matter."

If this is true, we have for the first time in our city a number of lucrative offices put to vote and no scramble for them. Our people feel deeply and vote largely for a register of deeds, but our politicians with their keen scent for a " placer," and the masses whom they control, are coldly indifferent to the nuggets lying loose around the Board of Education. The kind of evidence brought forward to convict the board of an unknown and undefined amount of corruption is equally singular. The board, you say, put an end to various local jobs " by taking from the ward trustees the power of spending more than twenty dollars a month," and one would think this looked like a good movement ; there was a glimpse of good intentions, a virtuous spasm. Thereupon " one of the oldest and most efficient school officers in the city," I quote from your article, " said to the clerk of the board in his office : ' It is very fine to talk of the boards of school officers ; the reform should begin here ; this place is a sink of corruption, the bottom is out of it.' "

This is hearsay testimony with a vengeance, and should be a warning to the bottomless Board of Education against attempting to provide a bottom for the expenditures of the local boards. Most of our New York pickpockets will assure you that the police system is " a sink of corruption " without any bottom. Your informant, commenting on the superintendent's account of 222,527 children taught last year in the public schools, with an average daily attendance of about 99,000, gravely announces that, according to the census of 1865, the number of children in the city is less by 16,723 than the number taught in the public schools—" a thing unparalleled in any part of the civilized world "! The explanation is simple. The 222,527 represent the number of children, taught for longer or shorter times, whose attendance is desultory, and who shift from school to school during the year, and may thus be counted more than once on the various registers. A few days ago that " bottomless " concern, the Five Points House of Industry, reported the whole number of children taught there as about 1,000, and the average daily attendance as about 300. In the same simple way I can explain the imposing column of figures which show the varying cost of children educated in the various public schools, ranging from $21 a child up to $56, " whereas," you say, " if properly managed, there should be a uniform cost throughout the city." Now, suppose that a principal, at a salary of $500, has an attendance of 100, and another principal, at the same salary, has 200, the first batch of scholars will obviously cost $5 apiece, and the second but $2 50. Unless you can provide that each school in the city shall be attended by exactly the same number of scholars, you cannot have uniformity of cost, although the Board of Education has endeavored to meet the difficulty by providing a sliding scale of salaries, based on attendance, but necessarily neglecting fractions.

It is true that some of the small grammar schools should be consolidated and more primaries established. Your article is so far fair enough, and your remarks cannot be too often repeated. The press should hold up the school system and its officers in the broadest daylight, and should never relax its grasp ; but the kind of attack into which you have been misled will only result in discouraging school officers honestly desirous of doing their duty, and repelling decent citizens from accepting an odious trust, to say nothing of its inconsistency with the character of The Nation.

P. S.—I have overlooked the most important witness, " a professor in the leading college in the city accidentally elected commissioner from one of the up-town wards," who " being asked in relation to the existence of a ' Ring ' in the board, ' Why, you knock your head against it when you enter the room,' was the reply." Was this experienced gentleman stunned and bewildered for life by the collision ? If not, why did he, after nine months' attendance, address the board, or rather the " Ring," which, to be of such dimensions, must have comprised a majority of his colleagues, in the following terms ? I quote from his letter of resignation to President McLean, dated Oct. 17, 1865 : " In taking leave of the board I beg you, sir, to tender my sincere regard to my colleagues, between whom and myself there have always subsisted the relations of kindness and respectful candor. Permit me to include in this tender of my regard the officers of our board, and accept for yourself the assurance of my high esteem. If at any future time it should appear that I can be of any service to the board and the cause of education, I beg that you will dispose of me." Unless this witness has been misunderstood, which is no doubt the case, I have complied with his farewell request, and " disposed of " him.

M. W.

[Our correspondent does not refute a single statement in our article ; even the inconsistencies which he fancies he discovers do not exist. The struggle for office is in the nominating conventions, not at the polls. Even the office of " register of deeds," which he cites as an example, has excited no interest since Gulick ran as the firemen's candidate. The fact remains that city officials are members of the board, and it is their misfortune that the public does not believe they are there from honest, to say nothing of disinterested, motives. Neither does it consider nepotism more respectable in the Board of Education than elsewhere.

He should also bear in mind that the words of the learned professor are not to be taken literally. The "Ring"—the existence of which our correspondent does not himself deny—though generally admitted, is not obvious. The public are in the condition of the country clown, who knew that the miller's hogs got fat, but did not know whose corn they ate.

The charge of one of "the oldest and most efficient school officers" against the board seems to be fairly balanced by putting all the local officers on the level of pickpockets. It is, therefore, hardly fair to charge us with "repelling decent citizens from accepting an odious trust." The explanation that the 222,527 children alleged to be taught in the schools—the 1,000 of the Five Points House of Industry is included in this number—are made up by counting the same children several times over, shows it to be, as we stated, a fraud on the law, which reads: "But the aggregate amount so reported shall not exceed the sum of eight dollars for each pupil who shall have actually attended and been taught in the schools entitled to participate in the apportionment."

Under this, the Board of Education were entitled last year to $693,392, whereas by their peculiar system of computation they got $1,628,120, defrauding the tax-payers of $934,728. The number of scholars contributed by the corporate schools towards raising the $1,628,120 was 13,440 (actual number 5,183), and the amount paid them by the Board of Education was $37,673 74, or a fraction over $2 80 per scholar.

A bill has just passed the Assembly giving the board two dollars additional per scholar and increasing the taxes some $420,000. Our legislators at Albany seem to ignore the fact that the one and one-quarter mill tax for schools throughout the State which has just become the law, will give the Board of Education some $350,000 more than last year, which ought to render this additional per capita unnecessary. Will not the Senate or the Governor see to this? The board will cost the city this year considerably over $3,000,000.

Our correspondent does not seem to be aware that the cost of this unpaid board is within a fraction of $1 12 on every scholar taught in the public schools.—Ed. Nation.]

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I have not proposed the abolition of the "Presidency, the Supreme Court, and the U. S. Senate as the three remaining oligarchies." I advocated the impeachment of the President, not the destruction of his office; the reconstruction of the Supreme Court on democratic principles, and either the abolition of the Senate or its reorganization. If the President has exceeded his power and violated the Constitution—as, individually, the majority of Congress believe—then I hold that members have no right to view the question of impeachment as one of party expediency. They are bound by their oath of office to impeach him. It is the same lack of moral courage which Congress has shown that constantly defeats the best purposes of the people in political life. Here in Massachusetts, for example, we have the same farce, in an abridged version, on the legislative boards. The Legislature enacted a prohibitory law. The governor does not enforce it. The constabulary—created for the express purpose of carrying it out—coolly imitate Mr. Johnson's policy (before Congress met), and undertake to decide how much of the law they shall enforce! The party which defies the law petitions for a license act. The prohibitory party resist. That is all. But if they were in earnest, they would either impeach the governor for not executing the law or order him imperatively to appoint a constable who would do it. As it is, National Chief Constable A. Johnson goes unwhipped of justice; and State Chief Constable Bullock permits a thousand grog-shops within a few miles of his headquarters to violate the law with impunity—the law which he has solemnly sworn to enforce—while the friends of that statute look helplessly on, as if they were powerless to compel their servant to do his duty. It seems to me that America needs to teach her male domestics of public life what Cromwell, according to the elder Boswell, taught monarchs —"he gart kings to ken they had a lith in their necks"—that whoever fails to do his duty shall be removed at once, just as any other hired servant in private life would be.

As to the other points, I advocated the election of the judges of the Supreme Court for a stated term of years by the whole body of the people; and (as I see no reason why a man in Rhode Island or Florida should have greater power in any department of a democratic government than a man in New York or Pennsylvania) I urged that U. S. Senators should be chosen by popular suffrage from equal senatorial districts, or that the upper branch of Congress, as an unnecessary limb of legislation, be quietly lopped off What is the use of it?

The third oligarchy was the regular army as now organized. West Point needs reconstruction as much as the South.

Yours, James Redpath.

The Week.

THE rumors of impending war in Europe which have been prevalent in this country for some days, and which have seriously affected the money market, are, it is safe to say, not baseless, but entirely untrustworthy. There are only two questions out of which war can come. One is the Eastern question and the other the German question; but there is not to be discovered in either of them one of the indications of an approaching conflict. No power has shown the slightest disposition to interfere with Turkey, separately and apart from the others. Russia is the only one at all likely to do so, and she has in her latest despatches confined herself to the repetition of the old call for combined intercession—not interference—with the Porte on behalf of the Christians. Moreover, the Greek insurrection is not gaining ground, and the Turkish difficulty with Servia about the fortress of Belgrade, out of which it was feared trouble might come, has been settled by the withdrawal of the Turkish garrison. We do not say that the Eastern question will not yet end in a final conflict; all we say is, that there is, if we know anything of the signs of trouble, no immediate prospect of it. As to the German difficulty, no sensible man doubts that it will not be settled without a trial of strength between France and the new Confederation. The Prussian success has wounded the Emperor too deeply in his pride, his prestige, his dynastic prospects and reputation for sagacity, not to make war almost a necessity of his position. We do not doubt that he will attempt to justify the new scheme of military organization by the use he will make of the army he organizes under it. But, then, neither France nor Prussia is now ready to fight, nor will they be ready for a year to come. Prussia has not yet organized the federal army; the federal constitution is not yet settled, and some of the recently annexed states are still under military government. Moreover, the French army is still on its old footing, and numbers little over half what Prussia can bring into the field, and is still armed only with muzzle-loaders. The new military bill is still under consideration, and the great Exposition, to which all the world has been invited, is only just opening. In fact, no careful political observer can discover in any quarter of Europe, at this moment, the smallest reason to apprehend the outbreak of a great war during the present year. The British quarrel with Spain is, of course, one of those small affairs which will probably be settled by an embargo or reprisals, and which cannot exercise any influence on the rest of Europe.

THE only striking political event of the week has been what seems a combined application of all the Southern States for an injunction to restrain the President from carrying out the Reconstruction bill. It is not likely that promoters of the movement have any expectation of immediate practical benefit from it. They are hardly foolish enough to suppose that a judgment of the court against the constitutionality of the law would tempt Mr. Johnson into open disregard of it; or that Congress would ever acknowledge that the court possesses an absolute veto on acts of the legislature. What the petitioners most probably seek and hope to get is not present, but future help; not an injunction which will prove effective just now, but a decision which can be used hereafter as a campaign document, and be embodied in a party platform. There are probably few warm radicals who understand how widely spread the opinion is in the ranks of their opponents that the whole radical policy of the last four years is but an outburst of revolutionary madness, and that the present régime will pass away before long, as did that of the Long Parliament in England and that of the Convention in France.

THE process of reconstruction under the military bill and its supplement is going on with all desirable rapidity. In the Carolinas white and black men hold meetings and are getting ready to work jointly in the harness of political parties, and the best understanding is said to prevail between General Sickles and Governors Orr and Worth. We should imagine that a few speeches like that of Mr. Orr at the dinner recently given by the Charleston Board of Trade might bring the good understanding to a sudden end. It must have delighted the governor's Charleston audience when, in the course of his speech, he turned to General Sickles and remarked, "You know, sir, that faith was pledged"—meaning the faith of the Democratic party, in which organization General Sickles used to be a "war-horse," and in the name of which, as Southern men are fond of saying, he and other leaders promised that if the Southern Democrats had to make war on the Federal Government, their Northern brethren would be found ready to aid them in the field. But the general could afford to listen to the governor's hospitable remarks if the governor could afford to make them. In Virginia General Schofield has designated certain of his officers to constitute a board for appointing in each county three registrars of legal voters. In Georgia Governor Brown is active. A. H. Stephens, it is reported, has never advised his fellow-citizens to sit apathetic, and if he were not "a prisoner of war" he would recommend them to get to work and take back their State into the Union as soon as possible. At Savannah there has been held a mass meeting a noticeable incident of which was that it was addressed by James Simms, a brother of the famous Thomas Simms, whom an ex-governor of Georgia introduced to the audience. In Arkansas Gen. Ord is working in unison with the Union State Convention. In Tennessee a white and black convention of a remarkable kind is said to have been held at Chattanooga on April 6. The Conservative Union County Convention was attended by 500 colored and 300 white delegates, and resolutions opposing Brownlow were passed. There is even a rumor that the Conservative candidate for governor will be a colored man. The United States troops are not removed, to be sure, but on the whole we seem to see indications that Southern polling-booths will not, after all, long need to be surrounded by bayonets in order that the negro may cast his vote, and there are plain signs that before many months are gone the prophecy will be fulfilled, and many Democratic politicians will have negro blood in their veins—while on the stump, at any rate. "Negroes from choice and not from necessity" will be numerous enough to drive Mr. Nasby to suicide.

THE Democratic victory in Connecticut is evidently not giving the South the comfort that many people feared it would. Most of the Southern papers seem to estimate it at its just value, and the orators and planters seem to be arranging their affairs before taking their final plunge into negro suffrage. There is one thing to be borne in mind in calculating the effect on national politics of such little local reactions, or what seem to be reactions, as that which has just taken place in Connecticut, and that is, that revolutions do not go backwards, and that no election can now make the result of the great crisis through which we are passing a whit less certain.

IT is proposed to make an organized effort for the diffusion through the State of Connecticut of political information, by means of papers and documents, not as now, during the two or three weeks preceding election, but through the entire year. There can be little doubt that it is only by these means that the State can be won over to Republicanism. The mass of ignorance and prejudice it contains is too dense to be affected by a hasty canvass, conducted every spring in the midst of intense excitement.

LATE gazetteers give little information about Russian America, but various gentlemen who spontaneously address letters to Secretary Seward in support of his scheme set forth the value of our possible new possession in such terms that why the fortunate Czar should think of parting with it is a wonder. Perry McDonough Collins writes to Mr. Seward that the waters of the country abound in fish; that gold-mining is already begun; that silver will doubtless be found; that copper is found on the banks of the Coppermine River, though, out of regard for the morals of the peasantry, the Russian Government has not encouraged mining; that wheat and barley can be cultivated as far north as 60° N. lat.; that the supply of ice in the fresh-water lakes is enormous; that the climate is not so very bad; and, finally, that we may expect, when once the territory becomes American, that its trade in ice, in fish, and in furs will soon make it valuable. Dr. Bushnell writes to the Hartford Courant the best letter on the subject which we have yet seen. The climate, he thinks, is hardly more severe than that of Scotland; but what river in Scotland remains frozen till the 23d of May, as Mr. Collins says is the case with the Knitchpeg River (in N. lat. 62°), Dr. Bushnell does not tell us. The whale fishery, he says, is important, and, he might have added, free to all nations. But what is of most importance, in his view, is the fact that, going north-westerly from Lake Superior, we can run a railroad along the valley of the Saskatchewan, in British America, with its mild climate and bituminous coal-beds, avoid all mountains, and reach the coast at a point north of Cape Alaska; or, if we like, strike the Knitchpeg and—after the 23d of May or 1st of June, we suppose, and before the 15th of September—float down that stream to the coast. When we are there, we have a line very nearly coincident with the great circle of the globe between Russian America and China and Japan, and have the shortest passage to those countries. Unfortunately, the coal in the Saskatchewan valley does not belong to us, but to the British, who also would like the shortest passage to China and Japan. However, these are the things which are said in favor of the proposed purchase, and the Senate has ratified the treaty.

EVERYBODY who has had occasion to use the telegraph for messages of a private nature must have often felt himself not a little doubtful as he trusted the operator—sometimes a young boy, sometimes a more foolish young woman, sometimes a man not by any means of the highest character—with secrets affecting not himself only, but perhaps a dozen other people. In fact, the known instances are too numerous where the operators have abused the advantage which their position gave them; and Mr. Cornell's bill, just introduced in the State Senate, will, perhaps, be of some service. It is proposed to punish by imprisonment for three months in the county jail, or by a fine of $500, any person connected with a telegraphic company who shall wilfully divulge the contents of any message entrusted to him, and to punish by a fine of $1,000 any one who connives with an operator to obtain knowledge of the contents of a despatch. That this bill will at all meet the real difficulty, no one can expect. You cannot frame a law adequate to prevent the revealing of a man's thoughts, and the telegrams an operator transmits become part of his mental furniture—that is, if he likes to retain them in his memory—and to convict the future offender, whatever may be true of the more careless offenders of days past, will hardly be possible. Only his own evidence or that of his accomplice will be available. Persons transmitting telegrams must hereafter, as now, guard their secrets against violation by using a cipher or by telegraphing hints and inuendoes.

THE New York Tribune is publishing a series of letters touching the moral condition of the New York Legislature, and the picture the writer draws of it, shocking as it is, is, by those who know most of the original, considered under rather than over drawn. It is now generally acknowledged that votes at Albany are as regularly bought and sold as meat in the market; that no bill can be passed without purchasing a considerable proportion of the members of both houses. A few years ago this was done on a smaller scale, and with at least an attempt at secrecy; now it is done openly; and a class of bribing agents has sprung up—that is, lobby agents who have laid aside all pretence—to whom the money is confided for distribution, and who do the work as effectually as any other brokers. Nor is the business confined to the corrupt passage of bills. The latest device for raising the wind is the introduction of bills of peculiarly outrageous character, which, if enacted, are sure to ruin a number of persons. It is not intended, however, that they should be enacted. They are merely decoy ducks. They bring the birds to the fowler's net. Numbers of frightened people rush up to Albany, see the legislators, are thoroughly plucked, and sent home somewhat lighter in pocket, but also relieved in mind. The beauty of the thing is that it is not the poor devils of grog-shop-keepers whom the Fenians send to the Legislature from this city who drive this trade. These are knaves, to be sure; but if they were amongst honest men they would have to live by sucking their own paws. The main body of the corrupt drove are lawyers, farmers, and what not from the interior of the State, Republicans in politics, and sound enough on all the great issues of the day to please Thaddeus Stevens himself; and there is probably not a man of them who would not write a "noble letter" on "the use of money at elections" that would draw tears from a gorgon. This sad and humiliating story—and, let us add, New York is not the only State of which it may be told—is related with becoming horror by men who, in the same breath, deride the notion that a candidate's private character is of any consequence as long as he has been regularly nominated.

IT is a sad thing to see how enforced association with an inferior race may by subtle influences lower the high-toned nature of superior beings. "The Yank" or the equally grovelling "nigger," one or the other, which we do not know, has corrupted "Pollard of Richmond." He advertises a prize for the best "Poem on the Confederate Dead." For, as his custom is, Pollard has started a new paper, and to eke out the expected brevity of his journalistic life he is going to utilize the bones of the killed in battle, to convert the friendless bodies of the now peaceful and happy dead first into Southern poetry, filling his columns for many months, and next into newspaper subscribers. One would rather not die than be treated so. It reminds one of the Otando practice which the Africans of that kingdom call alumbi. When a gentleman of Otando covets the brass pots or other goods of his neighbor he sends to him, with his compliments, a mess of some heathenish pottage into which he has put some scrapings of the human skull. Thus, at the expense of some disrespect to the deceased, he endeavors to soften the heart of him who owns the coveted property, and expects to effect by this means its transfer to his own pockets, or whatever part of his anatomy answers to the pockets of the civilized man. That this barbarous practice should crop out, as the geologists say, in Richmond and in Pollard of Richmond is melancholy. It is barbaric superstition, or it is the dreadful shrewdness which distinguishes Connecticut and Massachusetts as Connecticut and Massachusetts appear to the Southern mind, and in either case we offer our condolences to the friends of the afflicted.

The state of political affairs in England will be found fully discussed in our correspondent's letter. The fate of the Reform bill seems to be tolerably certain; and it is now doubtful whether, if the ministry were defeated, they would try a dissolution of Parliament. Their failure has been so lamentable that there is really nothing left for them to "go to the country" upon. A report has appeared from a commission appointed to enquire into the system of working children in gangs in the eastern counties showing that it is the custom for parents amongst the peasantry to hire their children of both sexes out, from the age of six, to gang-masters, who carry them about in droves from farm to farm, doing the lighter kinds of labor for the farmers on contract, forcing them to walk long distances every morning to their work, and herding them together literally like beasts of the field. They grow up in heathen ignorance, worse than heathen vice, and are described by some of the witnesses as indescribably brutal, debased, and licentious. Apropos of this, The Spectator tells a story of the farmers in one county being consulted as to the propriety of establishing schools for the children of their laborers. They all approved of it, but were opposed to giving any greater instruction than would qualify the pupils to read their Bibles and sign their names. Arithmetic they would not allow to be taught. But light is, nevertheless, breaking, for the farm laborers in one district have at last struck for higher wages—the first evidence this unfortunate class has ever given either of ambition or power of combination.

In France the Emperor's foreign policy continues to be the main subject of interest, in spite of the fact that he is irresponsible and irremovable, and that what he has done cannot be undone. The excitement which the subject creates is due mainly to the connection of this policy with the new project of army organization. "Had the foreign policy been different," say the Opposition, "this vast augmentation of the military force would not be necessary." "But," replies the Government, "it is not necessary for safety; Germany is no more formidable than she was; not so formidable as she was in 1815; what we want the large army for is to prevent anybody thinking that France is weak." To which the Opposition rejoins that this is a horrible price to pay for keeping up appearances. The truth is, however, that Germany has become fairly irresistible on any ordinary calculation of probabilities. The virtual merger of the South German in the North German Confederation, which we mentioned as likely last week, and the recently concluded treaty between Prussia and Bavaria, really put the whole military force of Germany proper in the hands of Prussia, and Germany, armed, marshalled, and trained by Prussia, will be a force compared to which the Germany of 1814, even in the height of the great rising, was but a dwarf. But tremendous as are the military preparations of the Great Powers in our day, there is no question that the enormous increase which we witness in the size of armies is in reality a fresh guarantee for the peace and prosperity of the world. It is a curious but instructive fact that the length and frequency and destructiveness of war have declined in the ratio of the increase and effectiveness of armaments, and that when the King of Prussia takes the field with half a million of men he is not half so formidable a foe to industry and civilization as Francis I. or Charles V. when he went warring with his 30,000 or 40,000. The Emperor having recovered his health, the rumor-mongers have gone to work on that of the Prince Imperial and represent him to be in a dangerous state.

AN INTERNATIONAL NUISANCE.

We have very little doubt that if either the newspapers or the telegraph company cannot make arrangements to have the European news collated, or condensed, or boiled down, or whatever it is that telegraph operators do to news, by more competent persons than those who now perform the duty, it will be generally agreed, a year or two hence, that the Cable not only does not fulfil its mission of bringing the two continents into closer relation, but acts as a positive breeder of misunderstanding. The habit of telegraphing his own vague impressions and guesses as positive facts, by which Reuter's operator on this side of the water did so much mischief during our war, is evidently growing on the gentleman who collects news for the Associated Press on the other. A despatch appeared a few days ago, after the announcement of the Russian treaty, announcing that "regret was generally expressed by the press and in political circles at the proposed sale of the Russian possessions in North America to the United States." An attempt was made by some of the papers here, by using such sensational headings as "Excitement in England over the Proposed Sale," etc., to use this utterly worthless announcement to give the treaty popularity here. But it will be seen, on a moment's consideration, that the report of a man of whose judgment or acumen or social position or education nobody knows anything, as to what is expressed in "the press" of a particular morning, or as to the feelings of people in "political circles" during the twenty-four hours last past in a place like London or Paris, is not only good for nothing, but, when factitious weight is given to it by telegraphing it along the bed of the ocean for three thousand miles, may prove positively mischievous. We know nothing of the facilities which the agent of the Associated Press has for forming correct impressions, but we infer from his despatches that these are exceedingly small. On Sunday last he telegraphed: "There is a general distrust in political and financial circles all over Europe;" a statement the entire value of which depends on the character and position of the man who makes it. It would take Rothschild himself or Count Bismark to say, with any approach to accuracy, what the feeling is in political and financial circles all over Europe. We may be quite sure the opinion of the gentleman who compounds these little despatches for the press here, on a subject of such vast range, is not worth more than that of the first man one might happen to see in a Cheapside chop-house. On Monday he went to work again, and telegraphed that

> "The feeling of distrust in financial and political circles has increased to a war panic. The uncertainty in regard to the future action of the Emperor Napoleon, and the fears that he will adopt a warlike policy, create widespread distrust among business men, and great depression in consequence exists in commercial and financial circles both in this city and in Paris."

The first effect of this bosh was, of course, to produce depression and alarm here, which is the more surprising as a refutation of it was to be found in the same batch of despatches. The true gauge of the feeling in financial circles in London is the price of the funds. We find on looking at this that for a week before last Monday consols stood at 91; under the influence of the "panic" described by the reporter they fell to 90½, which shows what his information is worth. If a "panic" pervaded Europe, in the present state of English politics and of the English army and navy, the stock exchange would have a very different story to tell. The Associated Press ought to do one of two things, either by a large salary tempt a first-class man in London, whose political and financial judgments are worth something, and who does know how people feel in political and financial circles, to make up their news for them, or else rigidly reject all that portion of the despatches of the present worthy incumbent which consists of his own guesses and predictions, and publish nothing but his facts. Otherwise the Cable will become a pest and a nuisance as far as the public is concerned—how great a pest and nuisance nobody can imagine who does not know how many people get all the foreign news they ever read from the telegraphic despatches.

Notes.

LITERARY.

A BOOK is announced which, as Mr. Wilkes once said about something, bids fair to "discount propulsion and confound the thought." It is a book which, according to its publishers, Messrs. G. W. Carleton & Co., "is not an argument, but a pulsation." "Prometheus in Atlantis" is the title of it, and it is "A Prophecy of the Extinction of the Christian Civilization." The literary, political, social, and religious condition of the age is treated of—we have a notion that our friends of Oneida and Utah are to revisit us—and the cheerful conclusion is drawn "that Western Christendom has reached a crisis which will not be passed without a dissolution." The publishers allow us, however, to indulge a hope that things are not really so bad as one might imagine from the lugubrious note that is sounded in the prospectus; "the trade" are requested to send in orders early, for the book is expected to have an immense sale. We are to have a little time, then, before we begin weltering in chaos; or are we to read Messrs. Carleton & Co.'s publications in the predicted state of disorganization and demoralization? We suppose not; he that runs may not read when his next neighbor is running after him with a stone mallet; we are not going to peruse prophecy when we are remanded to our natural rights and live in caves. When piracy is an honorable occupation will "the trade" give orders? Will "the trade" exist when murder is a safe employment? Perhaps, after all, as the book is a pulsation and not a good argument, it may be a pulsation and rather an indifferent prophecy. Among the other announcements of Messrs. Carleton & Co. are "How to Make Money and How to Keep It," a treatise on the way to grow rich, by Major-Gen. T. H. Davies, who treats of brokerage and commission and banking as if civilization were to last for generations longer, and we were far from simple robbery; and "Artemus Ward in London," to which is prefixed a sketch of the humorist's life. It is probable, too, that the same firm will be the publishers of a new novel entitled "Bleeding Hearts," by Mr. Mansfield T. Walworth.

—Two recent American books that have been very successful, as publishers estimate success, are Dr. Hayes's "Open Polar Sea" and Mr. Carpenter's "Six Months at the White House." Probably the interest which the public felt in Sir John Franklin and its admiration for Dr. Kane's work have made not only the latest book of polar travel but any book of polar travel a book likely to sell. "The Open Polar Sea" is now going into its seventh edition. Mr. Carpenter's book, of all the books written about Mr. Lincoln, is perhaps the most satisfactory, for, notwithstanding some obvious faults, it has the merit of being made up almost wholly of Mr. Lincoln's own sayings and of little characteristic incidents which fell under Mr. Carpenter's observation, so that, in a sense, it is an autobiography, a picture which the subject of it himself painted. Twenty thousand copies have already been sold.

—Ticknor & Fields are ready to give us the long expected "Translation of Dante's Divine Comedy" on which Mr. Longfellow has been for so many years engaged. The outward dress of the work is said to be as creditable to American typography as the work itself is creditable to American scholarship and literature. The volumes are of crown octavo size, or nearly as long and wide, though not so thick, as the bound volumes of The Atlantic Monthly; the paper is of the finest quality and the utmost pains have been taken with the printing. We suppose we hazard nothing in saying that this is the very best translation of Dante ever made, and these the handsomest volumes ever made for a translation of Dante. The "Inferno" appears in April, the "Purgatorio" in May, the "Paradiso" in July. And we believe it is to be not many months before Mr. Norton's translation of the "Vita Nuova" will make a fit companion for the three volumes of "The Divine Comedy." The same house announces as a companion for the very popular "Diamond Tennyson" the "Diamond Longfellow," which in a small quarto volume will give, without pictures, the complete works of the most popular American poet.—"Thomas Lackland," a writer who chooses to appear under a new name instead of under an old one which is favorably known to the public, is the author of a new volume of pleasant sketches entitled "Homespun, or Five-and-Twenty Years Ago," which will be issued in a week or so by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. "Old England: its Scenery, Art, and People," another work announced by Hurd & Houghton, is a volume of essays by Professor Hoppin, of Yale College. The "art" of which the title-page makes mention is architectural art as displayed in English cathedrals. The same house have in press "The Diary of a Milliner," which we understand to be not a novel but a realistic representation of the daily life of a woman behind the counter in a milliner's shop.—C. Scribner & Co. have in press for immediate publication a book by Mr. J. S. Gibbons, which, if it fulfils the author's intention, ought to be in the hands of every tax-payer. Its title is "The Public Debt of the United States," and, beginning with an attempt to substitute clear and definite knowledge for the ignorance in which the public mind is now involved as regards the various kinds of securities, it goes on to a consideration of the rights and duties of the tax-payer, and a treatise on the nature of currency and the laws of trade. Whatever may be the value of the rest of the work, the first part of it, which may be called a hand-book of the public debt, will certainly be welcomed. Scribner & Co. announce, also, "Rural Studies, with Practical Studies for Country Places," by Donald G. Mitchell; R. C. Trench's "Studies on the Gospels;" and a work by Dr. W. G. T. Shedd, "A Treatise on Homiletics and Pastoral Theology," which, it is likely, will soon be a text-book in most theological seminaries.—"The Ornithology and Oölogy of New England" is an elaborate work describing the birds of New England, their food, song, times of arrival and departure, time of breeding, etc., etc., which has been prepared by Dr. E. A. Samuels, curator of zoölogy in the Massachusetts State Cabinet, and will be published, for subscribers only, by Messrs. Nichols & Noyes, of Boston. There are to be three editions of the work, one at $15, in which all the plates will be colored; one at $7, in which the plates of birds will be uncolored; and one at $5, in which all the plates will be uncolored.

—The quiet old library known as St. Patrick's, and better known as Marsh's, in the cathedral close at Dublin, was not only a favorite haunt of Swift's, but it was a workshop and a study for him as well as a secluded retreat; and there, after an undisturbed repose of more than a hundred and twenty years, have been found some highly interesting relics of the great dean's presence and labors. Pencilled marginal notes in Cyrano de Bergerac and Hall's "Mundus alter et idem" show that from them Swift gathered hints for "Gulliver's Travels." Other pencillings are scribblings merely, some of them being familiar words written out as if the writer wished to verify by the test of the eye the orthography he had settled on in his mind; and some of them being fantastical words, which probably the inventor wrote out to see if they were fit for service in the "Travels" along with his "houyhnhnms" and other verbal monsters, which alone are enough to prevent the latter books of his famous work from ever becoming popular, and the utter and exasperating unpronounceableness of which reflects discredit on Swift's judgment. The most important portion of the new treasure-trove is quite a long passage which seems to have been intended, says The Pall Mall Gazette, for the fourth chapter of the fourth book of "Gulliver." It relates a conversation which Captain Gulliver had with his patron, the houyhnhnm, on the subject of horse-racing as carried on in Britain, or rather on "the turf," as that British institution was in the beginning of the eighteenth century. It is in Swift's best vein of quiet bitterness, directed to the satirizing not of human nature, but of an evil not irremediable, and worthy of his severest lashing. The passage is far too long for quotation; this brief and not too savage stroke will as well recall Swift as half a volume would: "I told him that we encouraged a special breed of exceedingly light and small Yahoos for this purpose, whom we clothed in the brightest and gayest colors, whereby, I submitted to his honor, the disgrace of carrying so vile a creature was rendered somewhat more endurable." As for the suppression of this chapter or part of a chapter, the very probable supposition is that after Swift had written it he paid a visit to England (1726), and found that the racing mania which was then raging had attacked some of his personal friends, as, for instance, Bolingbroke and poor Gay, and from an unwillingness to hurt their feelings refrained from speaking his mind about the prevalent folly.

—Some months ago the distinguished chemist Justus von Liebig published a notable pamphlet ("Ueber Francis Bacon von Verulam und die Methode der Naturforschung"), which late newspaper criticisms on a French translation have brought again to notice. It is a work of great interest. Liebig says he was led to the study of Bacon's works by his investigations in natural history, and expected to find in them a vein of excellent substance, but he found only adjectives and pomposity, and came away from his readings disappointed, dissatisfied, and empty-handed. After citing certain passages that Bacon had taken bodily from Gilbert, Drebbel, and others, he says: "In these modern days of sensitiveness in regard to such things, Bacon's act would certainly have been called flat plagiarism." In concluding he says: "The false and erroneous views of a past age often prevail among the people long after their roots have been destroyed. Out of the old worn-out rags of science Bacon shaped a new garment to fit his countrymen; and, although it did not cover their nakedness, yet every one found that it was convenient and of good cut; and so, through his labors to confirm the old falsehoods in possession of the ground, the new truth which Newton, Harvey, and Boyle brought to light had the more difficulty in struggling for acceptance." Liebig's judgment would seem rather harsh if he were not so well supported by others. Any one who has read Humboldt's "Cosmos" will recollect that he says Bacon was quite behind his age in mathematics, astronomy, and physics, that he was unjust towards Copernicus and Gilbert, and that Leonardo da Vinci had long before him treated of the method of experimental induction. Laplace also said: "Bacon has indeed given the prescriptions but not the example of investigation." Lastly, Liebig's French translator says he was led to the work by finding Liebig's views so exactly coincident with his; that he had been much engaged with the works of investigators and travellers of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries in preparing his work on Asia Minor, and was surprised to find how arid and unsatisfactory Bacon's works are.

—A late review in The Spectator contains some ingenious guessing as to the authorship of a successful anonymous novel, "Nina Balatka: the Story of a Maiden of Prague"—a Christian maiden of that quaint, half oriental, half western city, who loved a Jewish merchant. The critic suspected that the book might be the work of Mr. Anthony Trollope, and as he read said to himself: If it be Mr. Trollope's, "I shall soon come upon the phrase 'made his way,' as applied to walking when there is no physical difficulty or embarrassment, but only a certain moral hesitation as to the end and aim of the walking in question." Within a page or two the phrase was found, and in the course of the novel a dozen or so of others which also the reviewer declares to be peculiar to Mr. Trollope's style. From The Spectator's account of it the story is a very good one and every way worthy of its putative father, though its strong point is not Mr. Trollope's strongest point in his acknowledged works—"manners described with a flavor of satirical humor." Praised as the book is, its authorship will probably not long remain unknown.

—Some conversations held by a friend of his with the late Leon Gozlan have been published at Paris, and the French correspondent of The Publishers' Circular gives some of Gozlan's characterizations or caricatures of French literary men. This is Guizot: "I met on a glacier in Switzerland an Englishman who spoke French." Michelet: "A woman's voice—a child's voice—moans, groans, cries of distress. Great God, 'tis heartrending! I am agitated. I run to give help. Lord bless you, neither a woman nor a child! A supple, strong man throws his arms round my neck, strangles and throws me down. Help! Murder! Murder! Thief! Thief! No, 'tis Michelet." The satirical element disappears in the sketch of Victor Hugo: "Victor Hugo, minute and grand. Michael Angelo—Meissonier." Chateaubriand is "a pagan tattooed with sacred hearts, a Narcissus of the Dead Sea or of Jordan.' Sainte-Beuve is poorly done: "Sticky and slippery, fleeting and glazed, real eel-pie.

—At the close of the next semester August Boeckh will resign the professorship at Berlin which he has held and honored for fifty-six years. Made a Doctor of Philosophy in Heidelberg in March, 1807, he had in 1810 acquired such a reputation that immediately after the establishment of the Berlin University, though scarce five-and-twenty, he was called to it as "Professor of Philology in Ordinary" and "Professor of Eloquence;" the latter chair he has not filled for many years, but his lectures on philology have been scarcely interrupted since his appointment. Notwithstanding the infirmities to which an octogenarian is ever heir, his mind is still vigorous and his enjoyment of society unweakened. The conversation at the tea-table of his accomplished daughter, Mrs. Professor Gneist, one evening turning upon the United States, he spoke very pleasantly of his American acquaintances and scholars, noticing the peculiarities of some of the latter, and calling to mind the industry which, in the last score of years, has gained for many of them eminence and esteem. It having been always supposed that a rare memory must be one of the gifts which have enabled him to accomplish so much, it sounded strange when, speaking of an examination for admission to the faculty of the university, he said that it was very fortunate for him that the custom of examining professors was of modern date, as he would surely have failed to pass, and that the faithlessness of his memory had made anything of the kind a terror to him from his boyish days.

SCHELE DE VERE'S STUDIES IN ENGLISH.[*]

Schools and colleges have long been waiting for a scientific treatise on the English language based on history. Several of the books in use are of the lowest order of merit, repetitions of repetitions and compilations of compilations, with only a slight attempt to verify or correct what had been said before, and, of course, little or no original research. One of the worst features of these books is a profound unconsciousness of ignorance. It would never be suspected from them that our knowledge of Saxon is nothing to boast of, and that we are all but utterly in the dark with regard to several centuries of English. It is true that all the materials necessary for the making of a thorough book have been at no man's command, but a want of materials has not been the chief cause of the deficiency. But though the deficiency exists, some good work has still been doing for now many years. If we have no science, we have many important facts; and if we have no history, we have many interesting anecdotes; and a man who should set out to find and tell what has so far been really ascertained, would do good service even if he made no new discovery.

We are unable to award to Prof. Schele De Vere the credit of having done this, or of having done anything but another labor of indiscriminate compilation. He seems to have read most of what has been written from Horne Tooke to Dr. Angus, and to have received the whole with that unquestioning confidence which a sound theologian reposes in the Hebrew canon. He has been an extensive gleaner, but so far from nice that he has ground up in his mill thistles and wheat, cockle and barley, fresh corn and very musty chaff, indifferently. As he has read more widely than other writers of his class, there happens to be more of good matter in his book than in some others; but he is no whit more critical than the rest, and his comely volume abounds in fallacious opinions and misstatements of fact.

Jefferson, when he founded the University of Virginia, we are told in the preface, "appreciating with rare foresight, nearly fifty years ago, the importance of a scientific study of the English language, inserted Anglo-Saxon among the subjects on which a course of lectures was to be delivered by the incumbent of the chair of modern languages," which place is filled by Prof. De Vere. We heartily commend the wisdom of Jefferson, and would praise him still more had he also foreseen the necessity of requiring that his professors should study Anglo-Saxon before giving the lectures. We wish that some authority existed which could compel all persons who write books about the English language to do the same, or at least to make themselves acquainted with the rudiments of Saxon grammar. This most obvious of all preparations is the very last thing that is thought of; that is to say, it is not thought of at all. The consequence is much tiresome blundering and absurd misrepresentation, of which a very few specimens shall now be given from this book.

On p. 309 we have what may be called the pons asinorum of the expositors of English, the great problem of methinks. "What an expression to come under the ferule of the strict grammarian!" exclaims Dean Alford, who by a method unintelligible and impossible seeks to derive the expression from the familiar English verb, instead of the Saxon thincan, to seem. Schele De Vere does the same, though here the parallel case of the German denken and dünken might have helped the professor of modern languages to a fair guess. On p. 308 there is a most extraordinary account of "the auxiliary I can," which is never an auxiliary in any rational sense of that word. It is "a regular verb," we are told, and has in Chaucer an imperfect conde; and conde being often used with would and should "took an inorganic l, which was never pronounced," and the letter n, "unpronounceable where it stood," was dropped, and so conde became could! We will now invite the author to find conde in Chaucer, or anywhere else, unless it be in Chatterton, and then to give his idea of a regular verb, can being on the whole the most irregular verb in Saxon. The account given of must and will (p. 306) will also make the judicious grieve. Again, under nouns (p. 182) we read the following: "Our kitten was originally the plural of kit, a diminutive made from cat, according to early Gothic usage. . . In like manner cock makes first chick, and then in the plural chicken." The truth is that both kitten and chicken are simple diminutives with the change of vowel (umlaut) so familiar in German. This change may have been known to "early Gothic usage," but it is remarkable that in the only Gothic which has come down to us umlaut does not occur. It is to be feared that the author's ideas both of Gothic and of Norse are somewhat hazy, for on p. 24 he tells us that the Danes had no grammar (meaning, we must suppose, no Lindley Murray or Goold Brown), and abhorred difficult and subtle inflections, and so they "deprived Anglo-Saxon of much lumber of that kind." The Norse inflections were in reality somewhat more difficult than the Saxon. On the same page we are informed that garden is a plural of gard, which is as true of the English word as of the German garten and the French jardin, and there are other curiosities revealed in English plurals for which we have no space. Adjectives are treated with no less erudition. Thus we learn (pp. 232, 233) that "we have lost the once popular adjective bet, from which we derive our better," and that our less is derived from a now obsolete leas or less which formed a comparative lesser, the substitution of less being quite recent. The fact is simply that bet and less (laes) were as much adjectives in the positive degree as the Latin adverbs melius and minus, of which they are the equivalents.

To pass from the grammar to the dictionary, here is a specimen of painstaking scholarship, and it may also serve for one of perspicuous writing: "The Saxons were as poor mariners as the majority of Germans are to this day, thanks to their remoteness from the sea [the Saxons?], and hence a ship was to them a mere-hûs or sea-house. Gast-gedale [gâst-gedâl], the parting of the ghost with the body, was their nearest approach to our abstract 'death'" (p. 169). Would not any one suppose from this that our piratical ancestors were a race of land-lubbers? And would any one imagine that mere-hûs and gâst-gedâl were a couple of little used poetical words (the former being Cædmon's phrase for Noah's ark), and that ship and death occupied just the same place in Saxon that they have in English? Another example in both particulars we take from p. 167: "Maidenhead does not belong to this class [of words in head, hood, as Godhead, manhood], as it refers literally to a head of the Virgin Mary, an image which stood in that locality, as Bagford writes to Hearne." The inference is that we get our word maidenhood from the town in Berks, not the author's meaning probably, but he can escape from this interpretation of his language only by confessing to extreme negligence. On a par for accuracy with the foregoing are the statements that though reader and writer are old Saxon words, maker, founder, and doer, all of which occur in Wiclif or Chaucer, are comparatively modern (p. 147); that sheer (manifest) is derived from shear, to cut (p. 168); that summons (old French semonse) is a contraction of submoneas (p. 184); that a marshal was a schalk or servant that attended on a mare (p. 210), the mar really representing the Saxon mearh, horse, of which the feminine was myre; that quail, to faint in the presence of danger (Saxon, to die), is of the same stock as the bird of Latin name (p. 278), and so on.

It need not be supposed that any more care has been taken with the general principles and large rules than with individual facts adduced as proofs or illustrations. Much of the theory and history is probably true; a good deal decidedly not to be depended on. Here we have a good bold assertion which perhaps requires a little scanning before it is bolted: "The most careful researches, the most sifting investigations, have failed to bring to light a single new root that has been added to the first common inheritance (sic) of these dialects (those of the great Aryan family), or a single new element that has been created in the gradual formation of their grammar since their first separation!" (p. 9). And here a contradiction: Our English maintained its independence of Latin, "gained largely in words and in terms, but never troubled itself to translate, as the Germans do now with pedantic purism, by which, after all, but one-half of the sense is caught" (p. 26); but, nevertheless, suffered irreparable injury by its temporary subjugation to the Norman-French, from losing "that power of adapting itself to new ideas and forming new words which it originally possessed in common with all Teutonic languages, and which the German has successfully preserved to this time" (p. 40); and here and elsewhere something which we are constrained to call folly. In a paragraph on the use of abridged words, such as cab for cabriolet, we read: "This is all the more to be regretted, as the loss of a part of the form almost unavoidably involves the loss of a part of the meaning, and in language, as in society, half-words are the perdition of women, and not only of women, but of all who employ them" (p. 200). And again, under the head of words in less, like fatherless, reckless: "It is not much to the credit of the people, if we may judge them by their language, that the idea of loss should have produced such numbers of derivatives, whilst the opposite idea of holding fast is met with but rarely. We have but a few like steadfast" (p. 227).

We will conclude with a sentence which strikes us dumb with a sense of an utter unfitness to sit in judgment on this book: "What is true of words is equally true of the whole language; it ever bears on its surface the impress of the mind of the people by whom it is spoken, and he who studies it with history by his side and philosophy coming to his aid, will soon find that it leads him directly to the most retired and inmost parts of the soul of a nation, the secrets of which no other key can unlock" (p. 5).

MR. PARTON'S NEW VOLUME.*

THE service which Mr. Parton has rendered by supplying us with readable and interesting biographies of many of the most distinguished Americans has not been as yet fully recognized. The defects of his literary style and the unimaginative quality of his mind have offended our more fastidious critics, and have to a certain extent prevented his receiving the credit which belongs to him for the essential merits of his books. Happily, however, the uncritical public has overlooked his defects, and his writings have a popularity which they, on the whole, well deserve.

This new volume, made up mainly of the striking series of biographical papers which he has contributed, during the last two or three years, to the pages of The North American Review, is likely to be as popular as any of its predecessors, and forms a capital supplement to his lives of Franklin, Jackson, and Burr. These brief essays display Mr. Parton's peculiar powers as a biographer on a smaller scale, and afford, for this very reason, an easier field for the analysis of those qualities which have secured for him the distinguished place he now holds in American literature.

First among these qualities—the fundamental requisite of any biographer—is the disposition and the ability to tell the truth about the men of whom he writes. All his books show that Mr. Parton takes pains to acquaint himself with facts, and that no theory in regard to his subjects prevents him from stating the facts as he finds them. His interpretation of the meaning and bearing of facts as illustrative of character is, at times, undoubtedly open to serious question. He is not, in any sense, a philosopher; he has few intuitions of truth; there is no subtle, spiritual insight in his view; he is not a prophet before whose eyes the souls of men lie bare. But he has a shrewd, honest intelligence; and while he looks at men with the eyes of common sense, his strong sympathies with certain intellectual and moral characteristics enable him not unfrequently to enter into motives and to discover the intimate traits of personal character. It deserves to be remarked, however, that his sympathies, as they are shown in his books, appear to be not so much with the individual as with the race as represented in the America of the present day. He is at heart a moralist and a lover of mankind, to whom special persons are interesting mainly in their influence upon others and their relations to the general progress of man in intelligence and in virtue. His estimates of men are essentially humane. The good side of his Americanism shows itself in this spirit of humanity, and it is not a bad side which is displayed in his confidence, not self-confidence alone, but confidence in man generally, and in man particularly as developing in the liberty and equality of American society.

A ruling moral idea may, we think, be traced running through all his biographies—the superiority of goodness to talents, of principle to will, and the dependence of serviceableness of character and of right principles of action upon the enlightenment of the understanding. His aim is to make this plain not by direct enforcing or technical moralizing, but by a straightforward narrative of the lives of men conspicuous enough to serve as examples, and by the honest statement of the results of those lives, so far as they can be estimated, to the men themselves and to their generation. Mr. Parton's creed is essentially utilitarian, and "the greatest good of the greatest number" is the formula of his religion. Hence, all that limits the free and just action of the natural faculties of man is hateful to him. He is an enemy of tyranny, bigotry, and superstition, whatever guise they may assume or whatever claims they may assert.

* "Famous Americans of Recent Times. By James Parton." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867. 12mo, pp. 473.

For instance, it becomes obvious, we think, to a discerning reader, in reading "Aaron Burr," that it not only affords Mr. Parton an opportunity to enter a strong protest against the narrowness and hurtfulness of many current notions in morals, but that the character and fate of Burr had a special attraction to him as exhibiting the reaction against the harsh despotism of the theology and morality of the religious school which had Jonathan Edwards for its chief master. Nature is fond of compensations, of balances, of equivalents of force; and having produced such a character as Jonathan Edwards, she set him off by producing in the same family such a character as Aaron Burr. Burr was the outcome of Edwards; an illustration of a general law. There is much in Mr. Parton's estimate of Burr from which we dissent; we think we can observe in the biography traces of Burr's well-known power of fascination; Mr. Parton is forced sometimes, in defending the unhappy old man from unjust charges, almost into the position of his partisan. But the general moral effect of the book is what it ought to be. No one, not already corrupt, could learn from it a bad lesson.

Another marked quality in Mr. Parton's books is their eminent readableness. As Mr. Fairchild says (in the "Surgeon's Daughter"), "The style is intelligible, Mr. Croftangry, and that I consider as the first point in everything that is intended to be understood." Mr. Parton, whatever be his faults of rhetoric, is never obscure and never dull. His manner, indeed, errs rather by over-alertness than by over-quietness. It is a great advantage that biographers possess, in common with travellers, that they have a true story to tell; the mass of the world is always so prosaic that it prefers to hear facts, or what it may in some way believe to be facts; any story about one man interests other men; but the art of telling a true story at all is possessed by very few writers. Mr. Parton is an excellent narrator, and has cultivated his talent for narrative in the widest sense. But, through defect of the fine historic imagination, he rarely presents a scene to his reader; his pages are seldom picturesque, and he never reproduces in actual presence before us the living, breathing, real man. His characters always belong to history. This is no fault of Mr. Parton; it is but a limitation of power which he shares with the mass of biographers and historians. There is no historian or biographer in our country superior in this respect to Mr. Parton; and at present Carlyle is the single imaginative and representative historian in England.

Mr. Parton's papers, in the volume before us, on Clay, Webster, Calhoun, and Randolph, form a capital supplement, as we have just now said, to his lives of Jackson and Burr. Nowhere else can the reader of our political history find so graphic or so lucid an account of the chief figures on our political stage during the last generation. Contrasted in character, in principles, and in the circumstances of their lives as these men were, they each stand for something more than themselves. They are types and expressions of the ideas by which the nation was impelled, and of principles by which its course has been greatly determined. They are representative men; representative equally of the strength and of the weakness of America; of the excellences and the defects of American politicians and statesmen. Each life serves to illustrate the other. Calhoun died in 1850, Clay and Webster in 1852; and yet, as Mr. Parton says, the period to which they belonged has already been so far removed from us "that we can judge its public men as though we were the posterity to whom they sometimes appealed." The passions which their names once roused are no longer burning. Deeper feelings have succeeded to them. And Mr. Parton has judged these men with as much impartiality as if they had lived in another century. The judgment is severe, but kind. One reads these lives with sadness; with regrets for noble powers wasted, noble opportunities misused. Each of these three lives was a failure. Mr. Parton says of Mr. Clay: "He originated nothing and established nothing;" of Mr. Webster, that "he was one of the largest and one of the weakest of men, of admirable genius and deplorable character;" of Mr. Calhoun, that "he failed in all the leading objects of his public life except one." It is a miserable record, and one which should be made familiar to the people who loved and trusted, admired and honored these men. The secret of their failure was, that neither of them cared more for his country than for himself; no one of them had virtue to resist the temptations of place and the deceits of flattery; no one of them can be called a good man, and no one of them was a happy man. All of them desired, sought, labored for reward; none of them was inspired with pure motives; all of them forsook their honor and their virtue for the sake of winning the Presidency. "American statesmen," says Mr. Parton in an excellent sentence, "are called to a higher vocation than those of other countries, and there is nothing in the politics of America which can reward a man of eminent ability for public service. If such a person feels that his country's happiness and greatness will not be a satisfying recompense for anything he can do for her, let him, as he values his peace and soul's health, cling to the safe obscurity of private life."

But although in writing these lives Mr. Parton has had the advantage of nearness in time to his characters together with that of what may be called historical remoteness, so that the memory of facts is still fresh while the passions connected with them have been in some degree quenched, he has yet been, as it were, "walking upon ashes under which the fire is not extinguished." His paper on Webster, which is perhaps the best of his minor biographies, and which, in our opinion, is distinguished not more for its vivid delineation than for its rigid impartiality and fairness of judgment, has been exposed to severe criticism, and has excited a tempest of rebuke from the self-constituted supporters of Mr. Webster's reputation. To such critics Mr. Parton might well reply in the words of Dr. Johnson:

> "There are many who think it an act of piety to hide the faults or failings of their friends, even when they can no longer suffer by their detection; we therefore see whole ranks of characters adorned with uniform panegyric and not to be known from one another but by extrinsic and casual circumstances. 'Let me remember,' says Hale, 'when I find myself inclined to pity a criminal that there is likewise a pity due to the country.' If we regard the memory of the dead, there is yet more respect to be paid to knowledge, to virtue, and to truth."

Two statements in the life of Webster have been the special occasion of complaint. The first is that "he had no religion—not the least tincture of it. . . . What he called his religion had no effect whatever upon the conduct of his life." It has been asserted that this charge is wholly false; but if religion mean anything more than a vague sentiment, if religion mean a principle rooted in the will, moulding the character and exercising supreme control over the conduct, then it is true that Mr. Webster had no religion. He was open to the influence of the religious sentiment; he was often known to shed tears in listening to an effective sermon; he was not unfrequently visited by emotions of contrition and regret; he was accustomed to use religious phraseology; he even on one occasion wrote some verses full of piety; but of that religion, that love of God and man, which is the source of all genuine and permanent political improvement, as it compels a man to the disinterested service of his fellows, Mr. Webster had none.

Worthy people have been shocked, also, that Mr. Parton should not have refrained from mentioning that Mr. Webster was not ashamed to indulge his appetite for strong drink, and even to appear before large audiences in a state of intoxication. The fact is notorious, and it is an illustration of Mr. Webster's character which Mr. Parton could not properly omit. The open faults of public men, of men whose talents render them conspicuous, are not to be overlooked or to be easily condoned. In a democracy the virtue of public men is of the first importance; their individual vices become political offences and public calamities.

We might say much more of Mr. Parton's books, but we close with a cordial recommendation of them to those who have not read them, and who would acquire easily a knowledge of the chief characters and events of our political history. We might point out passages in which we think his opinions erroneous, or his style reprehensible. "A large portion of ill-nature," says Dryden, "guided by a small quantity of judgment, will go far in finding the mistakes and inelegances of writers." We will not expose ourselves to this just rebuke.

The general worth of Mr. Parton's biographies may be estimated by comparing them with others of the same class—with Lord Brougham's "Lives of British Statesmen," for example. The comparison is greatly in favor of our American biographer. His best work is so good, and its defects are so obviously the result in large measure of haste of composition, that we cannot but regret to see him at present devoting himself to writing for the magazines. It is a pity that his talents should be employed in providing monthly entertainments.

DU CHAILLU IN ASHANGO-LAND.[*]

THE time has long gone by when it was sufficient preparation for writing a book of travels in Africa that one had been cast away on the shores of that continent. Nor is it by any means enough that the traveller can command an indefinite supply of glass beads, red woollen caps, and parti-colored raiment. These he still wants; but he wants very much more. So when M. Du Chaillu, after recreating himself for three years in the civilized communities of Europe and America, made up his mind to go once more to the realm of his friend King Quengueza, and forward thence as far eastward as he might—even, if possible, to the Nile itself—he at once resolved to enter on a preparatory course of study. He went, then, to England and put himself into the hands of Staff-Commander C. George for instruction in the use of instruments, that he might be able to project his route by astronomical observations, and to take the altitudes of places. Under M. Claudet he learned the art of photography. He conferred with geographers and zoölogists. And he provided himself with a formidable outfit—a load for a hundred porters. Not to mention the beads and powder and cloth and sardines and canned meats and musical boxes and liquors, he took out with him two aneroids, two prismatic compasses, a magnetic-electro machine, artificial horizons, four or five watches, skeleton maps, a hypsometrical apparatus, magnifying glasses, protractors, sextants, rain-gauges, photographic apparatus and materials for taking two thousand pictures, boxes and glass tubes for worms and insects, seven pounds of mercury, fifty pounds of arsenic, and other articles in numbers numberless.

[*] "A Journey to Ashango-land, and Further Penetration into Equatorial Africa. By Paul B. Du Chaillu." American reprint. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

Having got himself ready, M. Du Chaillu embarked at Gravesend on the 10th of August, 1863, in a schooner which he had chartered, to set out for the mouth of the Fernand Vaz. We may inform our readers, in case of their being ignorant of the whereabouts of this river's mouth, that it is to be found on the western coast of Africa, somewhere near the ninth meridian of east longitude, and not far from 1° 15′ of south latitude. Exactly where it is to be found at any given time only persons resident near it can tell, for it shifts and changes from year to year, so that M. Du Chaillu when he arrived in the vicinity on the 8th of October could not discover the entrance. He succeeded at last, however, and was at once welcomed by his old friends, among others by his friend Adjouatonga, who may have known his duty under the circumstances; he did it, at all events, after the orthodox fashion, embracing "Chaillie," who, as is usual, regretted the warmth of savage friendship, inasmuch as Adjouatonga was redolent of the familiar mixture, perspiration and palm-oil. As we go on a boat is upset in the surf, a grand palaver is held, there is something about fetishes, the King of the Rembois much delighted with a beadle's coat that is given him by the traveller, this head man is greedy, that head man is drunken, and other things are seen and suffered which are in nowise different from the regulation pattern. By-and-by, however, we come upon the famous gorilla. Thus much Du Chaillu modifies the statements about this monstrous ape which are made in his former volume: The gorilla is rather more gregarious than he formerly thought, for he has seen groups of ten gorillas together. The adult female gorilla can be captured alive, though Du Chaillu formerly thought not, for in this journey he had in his possession an adult female gorilla which some negro hunters had wounded and taken. These two modifications of his previously expressed opinions he has put on record in this volume. His readers will be apt, such of them as have been holding in their fulness M. Du Chaillu's former opinions, to make yet other modifications after weighing the later testimony here laid before them. For instance, as to the high courage and ungovernable ferocity of these animals—they seem to have always run away when Du Chaillu came upon them. As to the terror with which they inspired the negroes—several of them were brought in to him as soon as the negroes found that he wanted them. As to the gorilla's habit of beating its breast like a drum before it makes its onset—the captured gorillas did not do so; "Tom" did, indeed, strike his fore-paws against the ground and against his legs when he was angry, but he did not beat his breast. As to the gorilla's habitual or frequent upright posture when upon the ground, M. Du Chaillu in this book says nothing directly in regard to this, and doubtless what he might have said would have supported the theories and statements of his antagonists. One live gorilla, a young one, M. Du Chaillu shipped for England, but it died upon the way. It is thus described in a passage which seems to have got a little coloring from the imagination of the writer:

> "Besides these collections I embarked a live gorilla, our little friend Tom, and had full hopes that he would arrive safely and gratify the world of London with a sight of this rare and wonderful ape in the living state; unfortunately he died on the passage. He did very well for a few weeks, I am told, as long as the supply of bananas lasted which I placed on board for his sustenance. The repugnance of the gorilla to cooked food, or any sort of food except the fruits and juicy plants he obtains in his own wilds, will always be a difficulty in the way of bringing him to Europe alive. I had sent him consigned to Messrs. Baring, who, I am sure, never had any such consignment before. I promised the captain that he should receive one hundred pounds if he succeeded in taking the animal alive to London.
> "During the few days Tom was in my possession he remained, like all the others of his species that I had seen, utterly untractable. The food that was offered to him he would come and snatch from the hand, and then bolt with it to the length of his tether. If I looked at him he would make a feint of darting at me, and in giving him water I had to push the bowl towards him with a stick for fear of his biting me. When he was angry I saw him often beat the ground and his legs with his fists, thus showing a similar habit to that of the adult gorillas which I described as beating their breasts with their fists when confronting an enemy. Before lying down to rest he used to pack his straw very carefully as a bed to lie on. Tom used to wake me in the night by screaming suddenly, and in the morning I more than once detected him in the attempt to strangle himself with his chain, no doubt through rage at being kept prisoner. He used to twist the chain round and round the post to which it was attached until it became quite short and then pressed with his feet the lower part of the post until he had nearly done the business.
> "As I have before related, I took photographs of Tom, and succeeded very well. These photographs I was unwilling to send home, and kept them until I should have completed my whole series of photographs of African subjects. They are now, unfortunately, lost for ever, for they were left behind in the bush during my hurried retreat from Ashango-land, as will be related in the sequel."

In the same vessel with "Tom" M. Du Chaillu sent to England a stuffed specimen of a new species of ant-eater, the Ipi, and fifty-four skulls of negroes, in addition to ninety which he had sent before, and these, having been examined by Prof. Owen, form the subject of an essay, of interest only to the scientific reader, which is given in an appendix to this volume.

As we have spoken of the gorilla controversy, we may as well say a word about the chimpanzee's nest, for concerning this also there is a controversy between M. Du Chaillu and other observers. The Frenchman says that the chimpanzee makes himself an umbrella-like nest under which he sits to protect himself from inclement weather. Du Chaillu's antagonists deny the truth of this statement; Mr. Winwood Reade, for instance, in a late number of The Galaxy, asserts that the chimpanzee, like the other anthropoid apes, lives in trees, that he makes no such shelter for himself as Du Chaillu fables, but that he does build for the female chimpanzee a bed, which she occupies temporarily, but which is deserted as soon as the period of parturition is over. Du Chaillu in this volume sticks to his former statement:

> "I found here also several of the bowers made by the Nkengo Nschiego of branches of trees, and they were somewhat different in form from those I found in my former journey. I had two of them cut down and sent them to the British Museum. They are formed at a height of twenty or thirty feet in the trees by the animals bending over and intertwining a number of the weaker boughs, so as to form bowers under which they can sit, protected from the rains by the masses of foliage thus entangled together, some of the boughs being so bent that they form convenient seats; on them were found remains of nuts and berries."

These observations of the apes were carried on very near the coast while M. Du Chaillu was impatiently awaiting the arrival of new instruments from England, the instruments which he had brought out with him having, by mischance, been wetted with salt water and very much injured. At last, though at the end of fourteen months after leaving England, the traveller loaded his canoes, marshalled his hundred porters, armed his ten body-guards—Igala, Macondai, Mouitchi, Ngoma, Retonda, and five others—and, escorted by King Quengueza, set out up the river. Soon, however, he parted with Quengueza and struck off through the bush towards Olenda, at which point the unknown country began. He journeyed through Ashira-land, where the small-pox committed great ravages on the villagers and on his own men, and procured for him an evil reputation as the bringer of the plague; and through Otando-land, where he finds that he has lost much property by the knavishness of his porters, and where he makes a long stay studying the habits of ants; and through Apoño-land; and through Ishogo-land, where he met with the Obongos, a tribe of dwarf negroes, who are what we may call a tribe of African gipsies, and where he noticed the wonderful waterfalls, swarming with insect life, of Ishogo belles; and on into Ashango-land, where, at the fatal village of Mouaou Kombo, Igala accidentally kills a villager, an attack is at once made by the natives, who before were not too friendly, and on the 26th of July, 1865, the expedition is brought to a disastrous end by a retreat so precipitate that all the photographs and specimens, and many of the notes which M. Du Chaillu had collected with such expense, labor, and hazard, had to be flung away into the jungle.

In a general description, the country through which he travelled may be said to be an almost impenetrable jungle, with few and difficult paths leading from one village to the next, the villages being small and the country thinly peopled. The traveller is struck by the intense solitude and quiet of this tremendous forest, in which few men and but very few of the larger wild beasts are found. As for the people, they seem to be not bloodthirsty, but more densely ignorant perhaps than most other African tribes, for they have never been in any degree under the influence of the white man, and for the rest, they are, of course, grossly superstitious, drunken, inclined to thievery and filthiness, and regardless of the truth. Polygamy and slavery flourish among them. The form of government is patriarchal, but the power of the head men or kings is not despotic, as is that of the kings in Eastern Africa whom English travellers have described. Their religion is, of course, idolatry.

On the whole, M. Du Chaillu's attempted journey was a great attempt and gallantly prosecuted, but not brought to a successful end. It has added something but not much to what we knew before. These seem to be the results: The map of equatorial Africa, about midway between the first and second parallels of south latitude, from about 10° 30′ to 12° 40′ E. long., in what is commonly called Loango, is considerably improved by M. Du Chaillu's explorations; we suppose, scientific men must decide, that it is to him belongs the honor of having discovered the Ipi, a large scaly ant-eater, of a new species, and the Ibola or Otolicnus, a little nocturnal animal of the Lemur family; he has also verified his former discovery of the otter-like Potamogale Velox, which, when he first described it, some scientific men considered a mythical creature; he has given us additional testimony in regard to the gorilla, and as for the chimpanzee bowers, he has honestly sent to England two of them, so that the scientific world can form its own conclusions; and finally, he has done something towards dispelling what little of mystery still lingers over the tribes of Africa, and has set for the imitation of other explorers an example of such industry and endurance as, with better luck, will yet carry some traveller across that continent and make his journey of value to the world.

ECCE DEUS.*

THE title-page of this book is sufficient to explode the absurd statement that has been going the rounds of the newspapers, to the effect that it was written by the author of "Ecce Homo." A man would not be apt to offer to the public "controversial notes" upon a book of his own writing, nor, speaking of himself, to say: "The writer has rendered inexpressible service to the cause of free religious enquiry by his magnificently intellectual discussions of fundamental truth." By the whole tone of the volume, its basis and its superstructure, it differs from its predecessor very widely. But it is quite as difficult to fix the author's place in the religious world as if he were identical with the author of "Ecce Homo." Indeed, it is more difficult; for the importance attached to forms rather than to dogmas; the stroke of policy by which he made legitimate the sacraments of baptism and the supper, which the general tone of his book seemed not to require, indicated very plainly that it was to the Established Church of England that the author of "Ecce Homo" owed his allegiance. But in the case of "Ecce Deus" we have no such positive clue, and can only say with certainty that the writer is not a Calvinist. His strictures on the doctrine of election are of themselves sufficient proof of this.

"Ecce Homo" was an able book; "Ecce Deus" is a smart one. By those who differ widely from the opinions that distinguish "Ecce Homo" it is agreed that it evinces much ability. But ability is too large a word to characterize the present work. It is simply smart, volatile, alert. If possible it is more uncritical than "Ecce Homo." If "Ecce Homo" ignored criticism, "Ecce Deus" affects to despise it. It troubles itself with no questions of authenticity or credibility. It takes for granted that the Gospel narratives are uniformly correct in their statements. There were statements in "Ecce Homo" which presupposed a certain amount of critical research. From those statements "Ecce Deus" hastens to dissent, remanding the whole question of what actually took place in Judea in the reign of Tiberius to the realm of tradition and faith. The way in which this is done, if not altogether satisfactory, is infinitely amusing. If it makes our author less convincing, it almost always saves him from the curse of being dull. If "Ecce Deus" is not a true book, it is certainly a bright one, and if "Ecce Homo" had never been written it would be worth while to peruse it.

The method of "Ecce Deus" is the exact opposite of that pursued in "Ecce Homo." The author of "Ecce Homo" was original in many of his views of Christ's character and position, but conventional in his explanation of these views and in his estimate of their practical bearing. The author of "Ecce Deus" is always conventional in his leading views. In no respect is he heretical. He could, no doubt, recite the creeds and articles without a bit of hesitation. But having recited them, he would go about to explain them in his own way, which oftener than not is quite original. The author of "Ecce Homo" was like the man who said "I go not," and then went; the author of "Ecce Deus" like the man who said "I go," and went not. The author of "Ecce Homo" found the Gospels very ready to conform to all his predetermined views of Jesus; the author of the work we are considering is equally successful with the creeds. As that book had a pet horror, so also has this. But in that case the horror was dogmatism and in this case it is sectarianism. "Christ founded no sect," we are told; "he established a church." To belong to that church nothing is necessary but love to God and man. To this theme the author constantly recurs. Taken altogether, although the book adheres in form more closely to the current dogmas than its predecessor, in reality it departs from them quite as widely. On account of its title and its formal adhesion to the dogmas of the Church, it will doubtless be considered orthodox in many circles where "Ecce Homo" was felt to be heretical. But this opinion will have little warrant. There exists between the two books this marked similarity: they are both better in parts than in their total result. Almost every page of either contains something that is suggestive or inspiring, but neither of them contains a life of Jesus that will satisfy the cultivated intellect, be it ever so little given to be critical.

The Shenandoah; or, The Last Confederate Cruiser. By Cornelius E. Hunt. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co.)—Our chivalry were very unlucky in their salt-water representatives. Semmes was first and the second was Waddell. We all know about Semmes; but Waddell is even a more striking proof of the general truth in regard to Southern cavaliers—that obscurity is their best fame. He is in more need of being made a professor of ethics than even the Alabama man. Waddell, it will be remembered, commanded the Shenandoah, and is the man who burned whaling vessels in the Arctic Ocean a long time—five or six weeks—after the rebellion had really ended. It will be remembered, also, that he would not take his ship into Sydney or Cape Town, but kept on round the Cape of Good Hope to Liverpool. One of the Shenandoah's officers—Cornelius E. Hunt—has written, and written quite well, a book called "The Shenandoah; or, The Last Confederate Cruiser," which displays this sea-king in a light that makes Semmes seem an object of envy and a respectable man. Says Mr. Hunt:

> "Among the many excellent and high-minded gentlemen who, first and last during the war, acted as Confederate agents in England, Mr. J. D. B—— stands pre-eminent. For the many and valuable services he rendered to his native country during the hour of her trial he steadfastly refused to receive any compensation. A short time prior to the final collapse, several thousand pounds of the public fund came into his hands, which he laid aside, not knowing how else to dispose of it, to provide for the immediate necessities of such naval officers of the Confederacy as the close of the war should leave homeless and proscribed in England. Two hundred pounds from this fund were appropriated to each of the officers of the Shenandoah as a just recompense for the long service they had rendered, and for which they could never hope to receive any other compensation. At two different times this fund, with directions for its disbursement, was privately conveyed to Captain Waddell after he landed in Liverpool, it being of course presumed that no more trusty custodian could be found for it. The event proved that this confidence was shamefully abused. Before any of his officers had learned of this provision that kindness and forethought had made for them, he summoned them to his quarters—George's Hotel, Dale Street, Liverpool. One at a time they were admitted to his presence, and, as the humor actuated him, he presented them from fifty to one hundred pounds a-piece out of the two hundred that was justly theirs. A few of his favorites, I believe, received their full bounty. The balance he coolly appropriated to himself, probably as a commission for transacting the business, nor was this the whole extent of his peculations."

Mr. Hunt's book is evidently the work of a man of "Confederate" principles, if men like him can be said to have any fixed political principles; but its tone is not grossly offensive to the Northern reader, and it is possible to read the book. There is an hour's reading in it.

Mosby and his Men. A Record of the Adventures of that renowned partisan ranger, John S. Mosby, Colonel C. S. A. By J. Marshall Crawford, of Company B. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co.)—There is a sweet simplicity about J. Marshall Crawford that has given us great pleasure. Thus he describes the Southern situation before the Military Reconstruction bill was passed: "At the end of four years of almost superhuman exertions they find themselves a conquered people, with the loss of everything but their honor, seeking restoration to their former position under the Federal flag." Crawford, it seems, is a man who went South for the purpose of fighting in the rebel army, is not a very clever man, and is apparently an unpractised writer. We have just the volume that might have been expected. It will make any old soldier who reads it wish that Mosby's men had less frequently been farmers, and had done more open field fighting. The pictures are worthy of the text.

The Papacy: Its Historic Origin and Primitive Relations with the Eastern Churches. By the Abbé Guettée, D.D. (New York: Carleton. London: S. Low & Co.)—The Abbé Guettée is a somewhat well-known French priest who, having become discontented with the Roman Catholic Church and its teachings, has recently entered the Greek communion. To him "the Papacy" means "the Papal sovereignty," and the object of the work is to show that the Papal prerogatives are not of divine origin. This is accomplished to the satisfaction of the Protestant reader, or, in submission to Bishop Coxe, who edits the book, of "the truly Catholic" reader. It is not a book for the ordinary reader.

THE CONNECTICUT CATASTROPHE.

THE papers have been for a week filled with disquisitions on the cause of the Republican defeat in Connecticut, but without throwing much light upon it. Much of the difficulty which we all experience in getting at the true significance of elections is due to the extremely nebulous condition of mind into which the contest throws those who have borne a leading part in conducting it, and especially the writers. Their thoughts do not cool down and get dense enough for ordinary apprehension for some weeks. During the first few days we get little from them but similes, metaphors, and war-whoops, and there is, perhaps, none of the metaphors which breeds as much misunderstanding as the comparison of parties to armies. When, for instance, the New York Tribune informed the public, by way of accounting for the Connecticut defeat, that "an army never fights a battle in bivouac," it uttered an unquestionable truth; but it is one of those truths that suggest error. A party is not like an army. The essential characteristic of an army is its unity, its obedience to one will, the certainty with which it may be counted on to do a certain thing at a certain time with all its might. A party has none of these characteristics. It is a voluntary association, which anybody may leave at any time he pleases; it obeys nobody; it cannot be counted on with certainty to perform any act whatever, as those know who bet on elections; its only bond is common attachment to ideas, which no two of its members hold in exactly the same shape or are attached to in the same degree, or estimate by the same standard. It may seem, at first sight, that all this is rather irrelevant; but we hope to show, before we close, that it is really a contribution towards the solution of the Connecticut mystery.

The habit of regarding a party as an army is not confined to newspaper writers; it has worked its way into the mind of most politicians, and although during the canvass before elections they recognize the individual freedom of will on which parties are based, they are apt to forget it when they are legislating, and to act, talk, and enact with as much confidence and independence as if they were generals in command, and to the great host behind them had only to say Go to make it go, and Come to make it come. A considerable portion of every party is in reality made up not of blind followers, but of critics, who are not affected as much by the stump speeches and documents furnished to them before elections as they are by what they see of the use the majority makes of its power, and who, if they do not like it, instead of taking their place in the ranks on the day of battle, as the leaders seem to expect them to do, coolly go over to the enemy—and sometimes in close contests, such as take place every year now in New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut, they are strong enough to turn the scale. When there is what is called a "reaction" in any of these States, such as there was in 1862, it is not due, as the newspapers try to believe, to any sudden increase of wickedness on the part of the Democrats, or of any accession to their powers of mischief, but to the defection of a number of persons who were the year before on the Republican side, but who have been disgusted or alienated in the interval, and, not being enlisted soldiers, consider desertion no crime. Until the majority in Congress get this view of the case thoroughly into their minds, the party will run constant risk of reverses. How much of its present strength it owes to the stupendous folly of Andrew Johnson and the South during the past year it is impossible to say, but it is safe to say that it owes a great deal.

In so far as the party has lost in Connecticut, it has lost not through "cowardice," but through courage; not through hanging back, but through going too far; not through having done so little for negro suffrage, but through having done so much. The plain, naked, ugly reason why little over one half the Republican vote of the State was cast for negro suffrage in 1865, and why it was defeated by a majority of 6,272, was, that a considerable body of the Connecticut Republicans do not want negro suffrage; and if the party had been more courageous at the last election and made negro suffrage a still more prominent plank in its platform and in its speeches and documents, the chances are that English, instead of a majority of 900, would have had one of three or four thousand. To say that the party lost the last election because it did not carry negro suffrage in 1865 is what logicians call "an identical proposition," and has about as much value as an explanation as a statement that a man died from want of breath would have as a theory of the cause of his death. It did not carry negro suffrage in that year for the same reason that it has not elected Hawley in this—because it was not strong enough, or, in other words, because the number of people who were willing to vote the Republican ticket on election day in 1865 was not large enough. It is, no doubt, safe to say that the Democracy owes most of its strength in Connecticut to ignorance, to prejudice, and to bigotry, and that the more diligent the Republicans are in preaching the doctrines on which the party is based, the more Democrats will they win over. But we fear the first effect of a decided advance on the part of the party of equal rights will be to diminish its own following, and that much still remains to be done before either its arguments or example will begin to make much impression on the enemy. It is as well to understand this beforehand. The first condition of a patient's recovery is the discovery of what is the matter with him.

One other unfortunate result of the "army" simile is its effect on Congressional action. The Republican majority at Washington has unfortunately, as we think, acted all through the session as if the party at its back could be counted on as surely as a colonel counts on his regiment. It has consequently not always made a discreet use of its power, and it has allowed a great many of its members to say very indiscreet things. It has treated the small Democratic minority in the House as if the latter only represented a small and insignificant fraction of the Northern people, when in reality it represented three-eighths of them, and has acted about the tariff, about the impeachment, about divers other matters as if nobody but friends were looking on, and as if such a thing as a party in power being defeated at the polls was never heard of. For ourselves, we have criticised the majority freely, because we hold that the criticism of the body which administers the government of a country, and particularly when, as in this instance, it is armed with almost unlimited power, is the main function of the press. But we have been well satisfied on the whole with its work, and in consideration of what there is that is valuable in that work we are very willing to overlook its errors. We only mention them now by way of warning. But there is in every party a large body of people who are not so enamored of the party principles as to care nothing for anything but fidelity to those principles. They are easily disgusted by even the minor errors and mistakes of statesmen, by faults of manner, by haste, by insolence, by recklessness, by extravagance, and the first thing you know they are in the enemy's camp. There are other people, too, who get tired of seeing the same men in power year after year, and if things do not go very well are apt to change sides through sheer weariness. These are facts which leaders cannot too constantly bear in mind, and if they were borne constantly in mind great parties would live longer than they usually do.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE UNIVERSAL.

GOVERNOR ORR has given frequent proofs, since the close of the rebellion, of a degree of good sense rarely to be found among Southern politicians. Naturally enough, he has desired to secure the best attainable terms for himself and his white neighbors; but he has had wisdom enough to comprehend the situation of his section of the country, and the folly of useless resistance to the will of the victorious North. His efforts to secure justice for the colored people in the courts of his State have been earnest, though fruitless before the passage of the "Sherman bill." He discerned very clearly that the constant denial of simple justice under the existing law was certain to lead to changes in the mode of government unpalatable to his people. But he could not make them see it; and now that their own folly and perverseness has brought upon them the evil (as they deem it) of universal suffrage, Governor Orr sensibly advises them to make the best of it. He accepts the law in good faith, declines to join in any attempt to overthrow it in the courts, and urges the whole people to act under it.

Further evidence of the governor's common sense is contained in his anticipations of the tendency of the colored vote. He puts no faith in the prediction that the new electors will be controlled by personal influences (in other words, by their masters), and expresses his belief that, like other men, they will be guided by what they believe to be their interest. Their real interests, he justly says, are identical with those of their white neighbors. How strange that one wise enough to see this now should not have seen at an earlier day that the converse of the proposition was always equally true!

On the very day that the provisional governor of South Carolina thus avowed his submission to universal suffrage, the news had reached him that Connecticut had voted against it. The impression produced upon him may be inferred from his sarcastic comments upon the refusal of New Jersey, Ohio, and Michigan to admit colored men to the right of suffrage. The Legislature of Ohio has reversed its action; but of this Governor Orr was not aware. The people of Michigan have just elected a convention which will undoubtedly correct the error of that State. But the main point of the criticism is unaffected by these circumstances, since the fact remains that in a majority of the Northern States negroes are still excluded from the polls. South Carolina, though sorely against the will of her white population, is henceforth under a more equal system of government than Connecticut.

The inconsistency of the North in excluding the negro from its own ballot-boxes while forcing his vote upon the South, is not quite so glaring as its critics assume, and, in any case, is imputable only to a small portion of its people. A large majority of the Republicans in every State favor equal suffrage everywhere, while the whole Democratic party is as much opposed to enacting it for the South as for the North. The only inconsistent persons are the one or two hundred thousand Republicans who have helped to impose universal suffrage upon the South while opposing it in their own States. This inconsistency is more apparent than real, since there are obvious reasons for deeming equal suffrage more essential to a republican government where the majority would without it be excluded from political influence, than in States where the exclusion does not affect one per cent. of the population. So it is easy to see that universal suffrage may be necessary to keep South Carolina in the Union, while scarcely any restriction of the suffrage would affect the loyalty of New York or Indiana.

We do not care, however, to dwell upon this argument, since we are fully convinced that it amounts to nothing more than an excuse for a policy essentially unwise. As an answer to the complaints of Southern men it is sufficient; but we should be ashamed to use it as an answer to the demands of the disfranchised race, or as a vindication of Northern justice towards them. It is far worse to deny justice to half the people of a State than to do so to one-tenth of them; but, after all, the exclusion of even one man in a thousand from his natural rights is inexcusable.

The logical and inevitable result of the change at the South is to extend the same rule of equality over the whole country, and the sooner it is done, the better it will be for all classes, sections, and races. Whenever the Southern States are reorganized upon the new basis, they will be perfectly willing to join in making equal suffrage universal throughout the Union. If they are controlled by those who approve of the principles upon which they have been reorganized, they would of course vote for an extension of the same rule to other States; and if they are controlled by the opposite class of politicians, they would vote in the same way from motives of revenge.

We look, therefore, with confidence for an early amendment of the national Constitution prohibiting discriminations against color in respect of political rights. The opinion of some senators that the last amendment includes such a prohibition is entitled to consideration; but in view of the unquestionable fact that it was not so understood by the people when it was submitted to them stands in the way of such a construction. The controversy should be settled beyond all doubt, and the existing legislatures of the North, with those to be elected at the South, will readily endorse any amendment on this subject that may be proposed by Congress.

The fatuity of the Democratic party is so intense that we cannot reasonably expect it to join in this the only possible final adjustment of our national troubles, although it would evidently open the way to new political issues, and thus give that party a better chance for success. If by any means of resistance left to them the Democrats could prevent the establishment of equal suffrage at the South, it might be worth their while to resist it at the North; but when they cannot save Mississippi from the votes of 50,000 negroes, it becomes ludicrous to see their strenuous opposition to the admission of 2,000 in Ohio. It certainly seems hopeless to expect any good from a party so wedded to obsolete theories of oppression.

By making equal suffrage the universal law we should remove all ground for complaint of invidious distinctions between the North and the South. We should be able to prove to the world that the conquerors in this great civil war had imposed no other terms upon the conquered than they submitted to themselves. We should demonstrate that the war had been one of liberation, and not in any sense one of subjugation. Such, we are confident, was the wish of the Northern people, and although we cannot expect the present generation of Southern whites to comprehend or believe it, we do not doubt that the fact will be recognized by their posterity as well as by our own.

Without waiting for the action of Congress, we will not permit ourselves to doubt that the people of New York, Ohio, Michigan, and Iowa, who will be required to pass upon this question in their respective States this fall, will decide to adopt the principle of equality. The struggle may be hard, especially in this State, but the prize of a clear record is worth all it may cost. We must at all hazards vindicate our good faith, and be able to look every Southern man in the face, with the assurance that we have required nothing of him which we were not ready to submit to ourselves.

"SCRATCHING."

We have been asked frequently why we did not postpone our comments on the impropriety of nominating Mr. P. T. Barnum for Congress until after the election, and thus avoid the risk of injuring the Republican party through our opposition to him. The answer to this question, which some good Republicans seem to consider a poser, is very simple. Remarks on the value of character in politics, apropos of Mr. P. T. Barnum's nomination, would, after the election, had he succeeded, have been so much empty declamation, and would have made about as much impression on those to whom they were addressed as a dissertation on astronomy. Everybody who took the trouble to read them—and only very few would have done so—would have answered with a melancholy smile or a pleasant chuckle, according to the nature of his moral constitution, that the nomination of such a man as Barnum was certainly pretty bad, that the politicians really ought not to do such things, that the people ought not to allow them; but that the fact was, his opponent was such a dreadful Copperhead and Barnum was such a good fellow, that there was nothing else for it; true, he had been guilty of a little humbug in his time, but then we were all guilty of more or less humbug; besides which there were men in Congress already fully as bad as he. Then, as the thing was done and could not be undone, those who moralized about it would be voted bores and sent about their business. By the time another election came round and a fresh opportunity was thus offered for choosing good men, all the previous admonitions called forth by Barnum's case would have been totally forgotten; and were any one to attempt to revive them, he would be silenced by the same argument that is now used—the necessity of waiting until the election was over; and so on, in infinite series. Before each election it would be too soon to say anything, and after each election it would be too late.

In the eyes of those who argue in this way, to recommend the "scratching" of a regularly nominated candidate is a mark either of dreadful folly or dreadful depravity—generally the latter. When anybody who is troubled with a conscience begins to declaim about the corruption of our politics and the necessity of sending men of high character to the legislature in order to save the Government from ruin, he will hardly ever find anybody to dispute his statements as to the magnitude of the evil and the necessity for a remedy, and nobody will join him in making a dismal uproar about them more readily than the party newspapers. But when he comes to enquire what the remedy is, he is always told with a triumphant air that he must attend the primary meetings; that there is the source of all our woes, the "everlasting bunghole" that has to be stopped; that the "good citizens," if they want to see the Government reformed, have simply to go and vote for the delegates to the nominating conventions, and then all will be well. Now, if there be anything well ascertained about the great body of good citizens, it is that primary meetings they will not attend, no matter what happens. In the first place, they feel no certainty that if they did attend, they would, owing to the juggling which is carried on there, be able to exert any influence; and, in the next place, they are too busy, or the elections occur too often, or the machinery of politics is too repulsive to them, or they are too lazy, to do more than vote for the candidates presented to them. This is not matter of opinion; it is a well-ascertained fact; and therefore to keep on crying out for them to attend primary meetings, as a great many of our "practical" moralists and politicians are doing, is really about as "practical" as it would be to keep repeating to them that virtue is its own reward, or that to be happy we must be good.

Nominating conventions are, we believe it will be acknowledged, not generally composed of saints. Perhaps one of the last places in the country to which an intelligent American would go in search of a respect for character as a qualification for public life would be one of the assemblages of gentlemen who meet every year to tell us what governors and legislators we ought to vote for. Moreover, it is not the best portion of the convention which does the real work of selection, but a small minority whose chief qualification for the task is skill in that species of jugglery called "management." There is no earthly means of knowing beforehand on whom they will fix as a candidate for any office, as they are governed by considerations of all kinds, most of them very low, of which the public outside can see or learn absolutely nothing. So that the voters never know what species of animals they are expected to swallow until a week or two before the election, and after the announcement of the ticket no qualms or hesitation are allowed. You are expected to open your mouth and shut your eyes. If any officious bystander steps in at this point in the performance, as THE NATION did when Mr. Barnum appeared on the scene, and says that any of the candidates is not a fit and proper person, that he is a drunkard or swindler, or a gambler, or a pugilist, or professed "humbug," or a charlatan, he is received by the party organs very much as Peter Funk would receive anybody who dropped into his mock-auction store and warned a simple countryman against bidding for "a splendid gold watch" jewelled in twenty holes which Peter is just about to knock down for the small sum of twenty dollars.

Now, we are not such visionaries as to expect that the government of a free country can be carried on without parties, or that parties can be kept together without discipline and without the constant sacrifice of individual tastes and preferences and even opinions. In politics, however high our thoughts or aspirations may soar, we must always keep our feet on the solid earth, and take note of the material facts in our path. Men have to be governed as men, and not as either angels or wild beasts. But then the end of party organizations, the reason of their existence, is to put good men in office. A party which does not do this, no matter what fine doctrines it may insert in its platforms, becomes a pest and a nuisance. Unfortunately, however, it seems to be the constant tendency of parties to fail in this the very first of their duties. We have only to look at the history of the Democratic party to see how the process of moral decay begins and ends. That party started with noble principles. Its mission was to root out whatever of feudalism there was left in American society and government, and to make the freedom and happiness of the individual man the first of considerations. The work was a great one, and it enlisted for many years the best men in the country. But to succeed the party had to become disciplined, and it made its discipline so perfect that it carried everything before it. All the ambitious knaves crowded into its ranks in order to share in its victories and spoils. Having accomplished the objects for which it was first organized, it then began to use its discipline and organization for the promotion of every species of wickedness and rascality that its unscrupulous leaders chose to take up. Of course this moral decline was slow, but one of its first symptoms was the adoption of the doctrine that the interests of the party ought to be the voter's first consideration, and that his highest duty was to vote "the regular ticket," until at last John Cochrane avowed frankly in New York that "if the devil incarnate were nominated he would vote for him." This creed killed the party at last, but it did not kill it until it had done infinite mischief and diffused a spirit of political profligacy through the whole community from which we are still suffering. No party can long survive in a Christian country in this century an open repudiation of the great laws of morality, an open denial of the dominion of conscience over every field of human activity. The Democratic party could not have lived as long as it did if it had not been recruited by ignorant foreigners and backed up by the tremendous material interest of slavery.

The Republican party, made up as it is of the best class of Americans, of men who try to carry moral ideas into the domain of politics, could not survive the deliberate adoption of the devil-may-care theory about character one year; and therefore it is the duty of all its friends, of those who wish, as we do, to see it live and reign, to combat from the first moment every symptom of a downward tendency. To decide that character is of no consequence in a candidate, as was decided in Barnum's case in Connecticut just as the Democrats decided in Fernando Wood's and Morrissey's cases in New York, is unquestionably a symptom of downward progress, particularly when it is endorsed and applauded by the great party organ, the New York Tribune. This journal praised Barnum to the skies, denounced loudly the idea that his election was not of vital importance to the party, and informed decent Republicans that if they "scratched" the great hero, as THE NATION recommended, they would be guilty of something very shocking. Nevertheless, three days afterwards, when he had been effectually "scratched" and the election lost, it coolly informed its dupes that the election was not of any consequence, that the Republican majority in Congress could not only very well do without Barnum, but without two other members from Connecticut. There is about all this the old Democratic flavor of unscrupulousness. The Republicans of Connecticut were here asked on Friday to send a "professed humbug" to Congress as a matter of vital importance, and on the following Tuesday informed that it was all gammon and that the party majority was large enough without him.

Now, what has occurred in Barnum's case may serve as an illustration of what may be done in other cases by even a small body of conscientious and patriotic voters. "Scratching" is really the practical remedy for the vices of the whole system of nomination for office. It takes no trouble, involves no inconvenience, takes no more time than voting only. It puts it in the power of every man who values political morality to keep the nominating conventions in order. "Availability" is their god, and if they once find that character is a strong element of availability, and that if a candidate's cheating, swindling, drunkenness, or quackery would risk the loss of even a few hundred votes, especially in evenly divided States, they will rule him out. Barnum ran hundreds behind his ticket—200, we believe, even in his own town—and undoubtedly was a dead-weight on the ticket throughout the State; and it is quite safe to say that the lesson will not be lost on conventions hereafter, and that gentlemen of similar callings and antecedents will, in Connecticut at least, be henceforth excluded from Congress. There are, of course, occasions—there have been such in the history of the Republican party—when the issues involved are so tremendous that it will not do to stop to look narrowly into the qualifications of any man who offers to fight under the party flag. Victory or death is sometimes the only alternative, and, when this is the case, even the highest morality is forced to concede that it is well to accept help from any quarter for a good cause. But these cases are rare. The darling device of politicians is to persuade voters that they occur at every election regularly. The truth is, that it is not over once in a century that it becomes either excusable or expedient to put a knave in a post of honor. The thousands of voters—farmers, mechanics, teachers, clergymen, and lawyers—whom the spoils of office never reach, and whose interest in politics is due solely to their desire to see their country well governed, should remember, when the big war-drum begins to summon them to the polls at every election, and the newspaper prophets tell them that the foundations of the round world will be broken up unless they swallow whatever dose the nominating conventions may prepare for them, that parties as well as nations live by righteousness, and that in politics as well as in trade honesty is sure in the long run to be the best policy—that Providence has not made any good cause or great interest dependent for either its safety or its triumph upon popular countenance of any form of vice or immorality.

THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF NEW YORK.

THAT some reform is needed in a system of administering justice under which a final decision cannot possibly be obtained in a cause within seven years from its commencement has never been denied since Lord Eldon retired from the bench. That such a system exists in the courts of this State is undeniable. The calendar of the Court of Appeals is constantly accumulating, and the prospect of reaching its end is every year diminishing. The causes preferred by statute are the only ones that are now heard in less than six years from the date of the appeal. Even in the general term of the Supreme Court, held in this city, an appeal from an ordinary judgment cannot be reached in less than eighteen months; and here, too, matters are growing worse rather than better.

In this city, moreover, there is a general want of confidence in the capacity of some of the judges, and even in the integrity of some, especially in the inferior courts. In the country we believe that the judges are generally regarded with respect and confidence, though we have heard vague expressions of suspicion concerning a few of them. Upon the whole, the elective system is thought to have worked tolerably well outside of New York and Brooklyn. But these two cities furnish an immense proportion of the business done in the courts, and it should be a fatal objection to any system that it does not work well there.

The questions thus arising are among the most important of those which the Constitutional Convention will have to consider. How to secure a judiciary that shall be so far independent of the people as not to fear to render an unpopular decision, without becoming so indifferent to public opinion as to feel free to neglect duty or to assume an arrogant demeanor, is a problem that needs much reflection to solve it successfully. The old system of executive appointment did not produce unexceptionable results. Much complaint was made of the delay and arrogance of judges thus appointed. But, with rare exceptions, universal confidence was placed in their integrity and ability.

The elective judiciary system failed in this State at the outset, through the introduction of strict party tests into the elections. The nomination of candidates for judicial offices by party conventions, on party grounds, inevitably tended to make such offices the reward of political services rather than of legal ability, while the prospect of a new election in a few years kept before the eyes of the judge the necessity of so shaping his course as not to injure his reputation for fidelity to his party. For no degree of honest independence would secure a renomination from the opposite party, while a very moderate degree of it would risk the judge's prospects for a renomination from his own friends. The clamor lately raised against Mr. Justice Davis, of the United States Supreme Court, for rendering a decision which no respectable judge in the land will impugn (whatever may be said of the dicta in his written opinion), is a strong proof of the incapacity of the best political party to deal fairly with an honest judicial officer. The almost unanimous refusal of the Republican convention held in this State in 1857 to nominate Chief-Justice Denio for re-election, immediately after he had rendered a decision extremely obnoxious to his own party, and extremely acceptable to his Republican opponents, was a discreditable fact; and it was all the more marked from the circumstance that the chief leaders of the party and of both its contending factions strove to secure its support for Judge Denio. The Democratic party had, of course, previously acted upon the same principle; but we lay less emphasis upon that fact, because less was to be expected from that party than from its more intelligent and progressive adversary.

Among the various plans which are talked of, the election of judges by the legislature is one that has been adopted with success in Vermont and Connecticut, and perhaps in other States. It has, however, owed its success to the early determination of the legislatures to give both political parties a representation on the bench; and where usage has guided the executive of a State in the same path, appointments by the governor and senate have been found equally satisfactory. Indeed, there are some grave objections to legislative elections. The responsibility of an appointment is very much divided when made by a large body; and the temptation to trade votes is very great. On the other hand, no man would have much chance before a legislature unless he was in some way widely known; while a governor is occasionally influenced by private motives to appoint an obscure man, whose incompetency soon becomes painfully evident.

Another plan suggested is to give the governor the selection from among a list of candidates recommended by some fixed number of lawyers. Thus it might be made a prerequisite to the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court that he should be recommended by at least five hundred lawyers, all of them having practised at the bar for three or more years. Bad as is the state of the bar in this city, we do not believe that either Judge Russell or Judge McCunn could have secured such an endorsement when they first presented their claims for elevation.

The real reform that is needed, however, is a distribution of judicial offices among both political parties, extending in the same proportion throughout the State, yet without resorting to any coalition of hostile parties. Machinery of various kinds has been used for this purpose, but we are not sure that a direct recognition of the principle in the constitution would not be the best, as it is the simplest plan. It could, of course, be evaded quite easily; but we doubt if it would be. The constitutional requirement that the State engineer shall be a practical engineer could be easily evaded, but we believe it never has been.

If the judges were chosen from both parties there would not only be more general confidence in their decisions, but a higher grade of lawyers would be selected for these positions. A governor, in appointing one of his political opponents to a high judicial office, would be under the strongest inducements to prefer the most high-minded and impartial of them. Having done so, he would rarely venture to put a weak and incompetent man from his own party by the side of an able and widely respected opponent. Thus, as it seems to us, the character of the whole bench would be sensibly raised.

A large increase of the judges' salaries seems indispensable to secure the services of the best lawyers, and it is very clear that the best ought to be on the bench, although in this country they rarely or never are. In Europe a lawyer greatly improves his social position by becoming a judge, and receives everywhere marks of respect which are gratifying to human vanity. In America a judge is little better than any other man, and the honor of the position is felt to be small. Yet the salaries of our judges are far less than those of English judges, and even much less in proportion to the incomes of practising lawyers in the two countries respectively. We are quite aware that several judges in New York city are receiving much larger salaries than they would ever earn at the bar, but none of them have an income which a first-class lawyer could afford to accept; while the country judges receive much less. By a rare combination of circumstances, John K. Porter has been induced to accept a place in the Court of Appeals; but every man of his ability and learning ought to be made willing to do the same thing after he has turned fifty years of age.

The division of the State into eight judicial districts has tended to create as many different systems of law. This is, of course, very undesirable; yet it is better than the delay of the old system. It might be practicable to maintain the eight districts, yet to equalize their business by providing for the transfer of causes from an overburdened district, or by a constant interchange of judges, so that the business of each district should be conducted by fresh judges every quarter.

The only remedy for the present delays in appeals is to limit the number of appealable cases, or to provide two or more courts of last resort. The former measure could be carried out by the Legislature; the latter only by a constitutional convention. To any arbitrary limit to appeals we are opposed, but it would be proper to compel every appellant to satisfy a judge of the appellate court that he had a good primâ facie case before allowing him to appeal. A double court of last resort is an extreme measure, leading inevitably to confusion in the law, yet as a temporary relief it has become indispensable.

The whole of this subject merits the careful attention of legislators and lawyers. All possible light should be cast upon it before the convention assembles; and we earnestly hope that some measures may be devised by which the courts of New York shall be made an honor to the State, leading, as they ought, the whole American judiciary.

FIRE-PROOF BUILDINGS.

The American people adopt with great readiness any new method of accomplishing an object of practical utility, after its advantages have been so thoroughly developed as to be plain to an ordinary mind. The rapid extension of the street-railway system, the almost universal use of the sewing machine, and the liberal and at the same time comparatively inexpensive employment of the telegraph for newspaper purposes, are conspicuous among the developments of the past few years in which we excel other nations, which are behind us not in the imperfect character of the means which they employ, but in the relatively limited use which they make of them. To this general rule, however, there are some important exceptions, the existence of which is highly discreditable to our reputed good sense and prudence. And of these the neglect on the part of property owners in large cities to avail themselves of the means at their command for the protection of valuable buildings and their contents from destruction by fire is one of the least excusable. Not many years since the construction of a fire-proof building involved an enormous expenditure both of time and money, and the sacrifice of many valuable qualities in the building when completed. But such has for some time ceased to be the case, and a structure of this character can now be produced which shall be as commodious, as easily erected, and in every respect equal to the flimsy affairs whose existence yesterday is so frequently indicated by the blackened shell of to-day. It is idle to suppose that any system of insurance can fully compensate for losses of this character. The loss of the building and its contents is usually the most formidable item, but it is closely followed and sometimes surpassed by the cessation of rent which results from the delay of rebuilding. There are several structures in the lower part of this city which could be replaced for a smaller sum than their annual rent. In Nassau Street, near the Post-Office, is a marble building which has been occupied but little more than a year, whose reputed rent is half its first cost; while in Wall and Broad Streets there are single floors which cost their occupants enough each year to build a very substantial edifice. And the same is true to a greater or less extent of certain portions of Broadway. Another evil consists in the obstruction of the street for months by huge piles of brick and lime, crowding the already overwhelming traffic through a narrow gorge, and often involving a loss of time and temper which is incalculable. It is enough that such obstacles must exist where old buildings are being replaced by new ones, but when to this we add the rebuilding which necessarily follows a conflagration, the evil becomes excessive. And, finally, we must not overlook the loss, often very large and always annoying, which follows the entire disarrangement of business plans, which, however carefully matured, are often rendered worthless by a fire of short duration. For this loss no insurance company can provide a remedy, expectations of future success, however well based, not being considered rateable commodities. To guard against these evils it is only necessary that a building whose walls are of brick or stone shall be provided with floors of some incombustible material, that a fire may be confined to the locality in which it originates until it is extinguished. In many cases the fire is largely fed by the woodwork of the floors. Many of the finest fronts on Broadway cover a network of timber, some of it saturated with resin, and all of it ready to flash from floor to floor with a rapidity which must be witnessed to be fully appreciated. The method of constructing fire-proof floors which has been most fully developed and has given satisfactory results consists in spanning the interval between the walls with wrought-iron beams of sufficient strength, and filling the intervals between the beams with low brick arches.

As it is customary to finish the wall without the use of lath, it is easy, by observing whether the ceiling consists of a series of parallel arches, to ascertain whether a building is fire-proof or not. Of course no building can be safe which contains substances capable of furnishing their own oxygen, such as fireworks; while the presence of such combustibles as petroleum, which cannot be extinguished by water, but floats merrily along on its surface, is inadmissible; but as these materials usually occupy separate warehouses, and not the slightest necessity exists for their storage in the midst of valuable property, we need not consider them here.

Inasmuch as woodwork must be supplied with air from below to burn readily, a plank covering can safely be laid upon the more massive foundation which we have described. Such a floor could be laid at a large profit to the contractor for one dollar and a half per square foot. At this rate the loss sustained by the burning of a large warehouse on Broadway a few weeks since would have provided over fifteen acres of flooring, or enough for a five-story building one hundred feet deep and thirteen hundred feet long; and when we consider that this fire was preceded at intervals of a few months by others of approximate magnitude, and will doubtless be followed by the same, it will be apparent that in a few years the losses of this character will exceed in amount a sum which, if properly expended at the outset in brick and iron, would secure entire immunity from such conflagrations throughout the business portion of the city. A fire-proof floor can readily be made water-proof as well; and, by a proper arrangement of the staircases, any story could be flooded with water without affecting those below, just as a roof can be flooded without injuring the loft which it covers. The cotton mills of Lowell, which are ensured by a mutual arrangement among their proprietors, are provided with a simple but effective system which enables any story to be flooded in a moment. An elevated reservoir of sufficient capacity is kept constantly filled by suitable pumps, and from this a pipe is led which includes all the mills in its circuit. The various departments in each establishment are provided with perforated iron pipes extending along the ceiling. These pipes remain empty until a fire is discovered, when the water is turned on and it is speedily extinguished. This plan has endured the ordeal of several years' practical working, and this under circumstances peculiarly fitted to test its powers, owing to the presence of large masses of loose cotton in the various stages of its manufacture. There is no reason why the same means would not prove as effective elsewhere.

Although iron has been mentioned as the material best adapted to the construction of fire-proof buildings, wood can be so prepared that it will not burn, but at the most will only smolder and char when intensely heated from without by the flame of other substances. A process for effecting this result has been practically tested in England with good results, and nothing but the absence of a demand for inventions of this character prevents our chemists from investigating the subject thoroughly, and producing a simple but effective plan by which the desired result may be simply but effectively attained, should the means already proposed prove in any manner defective. The whole subject is one of the deepest interest to the American people, not simply to those in large cities but to the residents of the thousands of hastily-constructed towns and villages which cover the country, some of which are almost constantly reported in the telegraphic columns as having lost their entire business quarters by a fire of a few hours' duration. Nothing is required to secure the universal adoption of an effective remedy but a careful investigation of the subject by those who are most deeply interested.

MORDECAI.

Make friends with him! He is of royal line
Although he sits in rags. Not all of thine
Array of splendor, pomp of high estate,
Can buy him from his place within the gate,
The King's gate of thy happiness, where he,
Yes, even he, the Jew, remaineth free,
Never obeisance making, never scorn
Betraying of thy silver, and new born
Delight. Make friends with him, for unawares

The charmèd secret of thy joys he bears;
Be glad, so long as his black sackcloth, late,
And early, thwarts thy sun; for if in hate,
And haste, thou plottest for his blood, thy own death-cry,
Not his, comes from the gallows fifty cubits high!

HOW NOT TO GO ABROAD.

MANY of those who are now setting their faces toward the Old World go this year because their friends are going, of whom they hope to see much. They will quarter themselves at Paris, in hotels or boarding-houses which are frequented by their countrymen, to whose society they will confine themselves. The head of the family will pass several hours every morning during his stay in the rooms of his American banker (whom he fully pays for the privilege), where he can peruse the latest New York or Boston newspapers, and can discuss home politics or home gossip with the heads of other families. His wife and daughters will wear away the period of his absence in paying or receiving calls from the wives and daughters of other Americans, or in endeavoring to communicate with a dressmaker whose knowledge of English is equal to their knowledge of French. In the afternoon they will all join parties of their American fellow-boarders for a visit to the Louvre or the Luxembourg, or will devote themselves to shopping, in company with friends who have been a week longer in the city than they, and who know where to find "English spoken." They will spend many agreeable evenings with their American acquaintances, reposing from the fatigues of the day, planning fatigues for the morrow, exchanging congratulations that this or that "sight" has been "done," inveighing against the ill qualities of the French character, as displayed in the tardiness of a dressmaker or in the extortions of a cab-driver, and talking over the last letters from home. When they go to the theatre it will be with a party of their countrymen, in order that they may keep up their English between the acts, if not also during them. If they dine at the Maison Doré or the Trois Frères—a luxury rarely permitted by the holder of the family purse—it will be in a private room. If they breakfast now and then at the Grand Café, it will be at an hour when they are sure of not being elbowed by foreigners. They will study the manners and customs of the nobility during their drives in the Bois de Boulogne, and will draw from their observations abundant evidence of the superiority of republican institutions and of the shocking immorality of the best classes in France. Many days will be consumed in endeavors to get a glimpse of the Empress, and many more in promenading the halls of the Exposition at hours when they are crowded with Americans. On Sunday they will religiously attend divine service at the American chapel. The son of the house may push his curiosity a little further, but will not talk of his discoveries; and the children may, if allowed, scrape acquaintance with French playmates in the gardens of the Tuileries or the Champs Elysées; but the rest of the family will always move in a body impregnable to the enemy, as did those English people, whose adventures at the last French Exhibition have been set forth with so little exaggeration by the author of "Dr. Antonio."

But a time will come when these agreeable winter quarters must be broken up and the column must move upon the grand tower, as we have heard it called. Several trunks filled with the toilettes of Paris have been added to the baggage brought from America, and all these impedimenta are put in charge of a courier, who pays the bills, which his presence doubles, who precludes the necessity of personal contact with the inhabitants, who knows just enough of the cities to be visited to be able to find a valet de place for a guide to their wonders, and who fixes the amount of the fees for hotel servants and of the bribes for custom-house officers. Whenever the courier, becoming an avant courier, goes forward to secure quarters for the night—the convenience of the telegraph being unknown on the Continent—the commander-in-chief undertakes in person to arrange the details of railroad transportation. His "combiang" is translated to the official's ear by the open pocket-book, and he is pleased to find on subsequently examining his "Bradshaw" that he has not been cheated, and that dishonesty is not always the handmaid of courtesy. In difficult cases the eldest daughter, who has been to a Franco-American boarding-school, takes part in the colloquy, but soon pronounces the French of the railroad station impure, and wishes that the courier, who understands the patois of this province, would return. In default of a good American guide-book, Murray is studied day and night. In default of American hotels, those frequented by the English are selected. The company is reinforced from time to time by American gentlemen and ladies, who congratulate each other that they were born in a free country; who echo each other's pity for the deplorable ignorance and superstition of the poor Old World; who remind each other that there is no word for home in the French language, and that the Italian face is invariably expressive of beggary, brigandage, or Borgiaism; who unite in declaring the scenery of the Hudson far finer than that of the Rhine, and might unite also in thinking the beauty of ancient works of art exaggerated did not their guide-books reassure them. Custom-house examinations serve to indicate the boundaries between different countries, which the interposition of the courier between the traveller and the changes in currency and dialect might otherwise obscure. Their baggage slowly but steadily increases in bulk, and their wrath at the imposition of an extra charge upon baggage increases in the same ratio. At length they return to Paris to make a few last purchases, which they stow away in a few more trunks, and then sail homewards with wardrobes full of clothes and garrets full of curiosities, that have cost (taking into account courier's per-centage, expense of transportation, custom-house duties, and premium upon gold) from one-third to one-half more than they could have been obtained for in America.

But they will have paid still more dearly for the very little that they bring home in their heads. Such travellers—and there will be more of them than usual this year—do not increase to an appreciable extent their stock of information. Groping blindfold through fields teeming with harvests, they glean more stubble than wheat. Their prejudices are apt to be hardened. The fallacies which they sucked in with mother's milk and lecture-room pap still form their mental diet. They return to business, the caucus, and the sewing society, thanking God that they are not as the other men and women are with whom their travels have acquainted them. It was something, doubtless, to have changed the locus in quo of their lives for a few months, something to have seen new faces, even if they were the faces of Americans, something to have broken up the daily routine. A new experience, though intrinsically less valuable than the old, may stimulate the mind far more, even the mind of a man who tries his utmost to derive the least possible good from it. A native of Buffalo may get more pleasure and profit from a first visit to the Staubbach than from a third or fourth view of Niagara. But having taken the pains to go to Switzerland, why not take the further pains to improve his opportunity by gaining some knowledge of the nature of the country, the habits of the people, and the peculiarities of the language which they speak?

ENGLAND.

LONDON, March 22, 1867.

WHEN I wrote to you last the chief excitement of the day was the renewed Fenian outbreak. The results were a little less ridiculous than on the last occasion, for there were actually two or three attacks upon scattered police barracks. But it is hard to know whether to laugh or to cry at their performances. Their plan of campaign is an organization of two expedients, at both of which they are tolerable proficients—running away and lying. A report is raised that the Fenians are coming; the troops or the police move after them; they generally find the report to be simply false; sometimes they catch sight of Fenians in the distance; once, a company of infantry had the luck to make a charge; but the alacrity with which they disperse generally baffles all pursuit. They have ransacked a few houses for arms, attacked one or two isolated stations, and suffered considerably from severe weather upon the mountains. But gradually the disturbances have become more mythical; the military operations are reduced to what are dignified by the name of "flying columns," that is, squads of a dozen men and an officer sent out upon cars with a hamper of sandwiches and a whiskey-flask. But the Fenian in arms is getting as rare as the proverbial dodo, and "suspicious strangers" are taking flight across the Atlantic. I wish you joy of their company. This is, in one sense, absurd enough; but it is also not a little melancholy. The Fenians can do little injury beyond the shock to confidence. The priests are against them; the peasantry remain generally passive; and the police have behaved admirably. But, feeble as the explosion is, it testifies to chronic social disorder which it will take generations to remove. I only hope that, when the Reform bill has been settled, our statesmen will take some decided steps towards dealing with the land and the church questions, which are the opprobrium of our present system.

"When the Reform question is settled," I have said. When will that be? At present we seem to be plunging deeper and deeper into quagmires and fathomless quicksands, across which no mortal man can see his way. To explain all the ins and outs of party squabbles—how the cabinet first went one way, then in ten minutes (as Sir J. Pakington confessed, to the infinite amusement of his constituents) turned in directly the opposite way; how they have gone backwards and forwards and abandoned every position directly it was attacked—would be probably wearisome to you to read. I will only say that after immense affectation of mystery, destined to cover an absence of all plan, they have at last been driven to reveal their last bid for office. They will consent, if only they may retain their seats on the Treasury bench, to give us household suffrage, but with conditions. Household suffrage was, a year ago, beyond the hopes of the most ardent reformers; it is now accepted by even lukewarm reformers, and has become so popular that the Tories try to conjure with its name; but they try to add conditions which will make the name empty. They confer a number of franchises upon ministers, university graduates, and others of the wealthier classes, hoping by this lateral extension to overbalance the effect of the vertical extension. Then they give two votes to every man who pays a certain sum in direct taxation; and, finally, they disfranchise what are called "compound householders," which means persons who live in the smaller houses and are allowed, for convenience of collection, not to be rated separately, the landlord of a number of separate houses paying the rates and collecting them from his tenants. Without troubling you with mere technicalities, these are all devices for withdrawing with one hand what is given with the other; for gaining the praise of liberality and keeping the convenience of stinginess; and, in short, in one way or other, for taking the wind out of reformers' sails under false pretences. The Liberal party have agreed to allow the bill to pass a second reading, and to attempt to throw out these modifying clauses in committee. They have strength enough for this; but the question is, What will follow? Will the ministry resign or dissolve? In either case, will reform be any nearer a settlement? Time will show; but I confess that I look forward to a long contest. Fond as the Tories are of their places, they can scarcely submit to the degradation of passing a household suffrage pure and simple.

Any of your readers who care to see the subject treated by some of the more thoughtful amongst our younger Liberals would find it worth while to look at a volume of "Essays on Reform" just published by Macmillan. Another volume will follow, treating of the questions in urgent need of treatment by a reformed Parliament. I will here only quote a few rather curious figures given in an essay by Mr. Cracroft, which show the hold preserved by the aristocracy upon the Government of the country. He analyzes the present composition of the House of Commons, and brings out the following facts: In the first place, the land-owners return directly as county members 256 out of the 658 members. But out of 396 borough members 246 are also connected directly with the lands either by actual ownership or close connection with owners. The remaining six members represent the universities. This leaves 150 members only from the purely mercantile and professional to 500 from the land-owning classes. Again, the peerage and the baronetage together return 226 members (meaning by the "peerage" the sons or grandsons of peers, or Scotch and Irish peers), and there are 100 more members at least closely connected with the peerage; 326 in all, or about half the House. Taking another mode of reckoning, there are 227 members from the great public schools, 292 graduates of Oxford and Cambridge, 584 members of the Church of England, and at least 222 naval and military officers. All these facts point in the same direction, and imply that the aristocratic classes and those immediately connected with them have a perfectly overwhelming power in the House of Commons. They showed it curiously last year, when every other business was postponed and the Government fairly bullied to pass through the House a measure for compensating the land-owners for their losses by the cattle plague. And, indeed, when any topic affecting the class is started, they are perfectly irresistible, not merely by the community of interest, but by the fact that they are bound together by so many family ties that a large number of them form what Mr. Cracroft calls one great "cousinhood." To break this compact, impenetrable phalanx will be a work of time; and to set against it the working classes have at present two representatives at most; meaning by that, two men who would really be authorized in some degree to speak in their name and express their views. These two are Mr. Thos. Hughes and Prof. Fawcett, the blind member for Brighton, young man of very remarkable power.

Turning from this, I will notice two incidents which have lately occurred, and which may throw some light on the present condition of the House of Commons. The first is that there has at last been a vote carried against flogging in the army. The question still waits for a final settlement, but flogging is undoubtedly doomed. The utter impolicy of the practice is as conspicuous as its brutality. We have the utmost difficulty in keeping up our army by voluntary recruiting. A conscription is impossible. Meanwhile, the feeling against flogging in the army is so strong that in the metropolitan constituencies no member would have a chance of election who did not immediately pronounce against it. It is no wonder that it is felt as a social stigma upon the private soldier, for no one would venture to flog an officer. But the ruling powers have hitherto hesitated to remove it, strongly as it has operated against recruiting. They have clung to the power, and sneered at all opponents as sentimentalists. The rapid change of opinion is curious, and shows the coming ground-swell of reform. Till this session there have been large majorities in favor of retaining it.

The second scene I have to mention was more dramatic. A certain Mr. Churchward has had a long notoriety for bribery. His last performance was to vote for a Government candidate in return for an advantageous contract from the Admiralty. The House of Commons investigated the affair, convicted Mr. Churchward, and repudiated the contract as obtained by corrupt means, after a number of debates. The Lord Chancellor has just appointed Mr. Churchward magistrate for Dover. When the ministry were called to account for this, they excused the Lord Chancellor by saying that he had never heard of Mr. Churchward. Lord Chancellors never lie; indeed, as "keepers of the royal conscience," it would be monstrous, and, therefore, this statement must be true; but if any one else had made it, it would have been almost as easy to believe that the Lord Chancellor had never heard of Mr. Bright, for Mr. Churchward had been for three sessions the great stumbling-block of his party. Hereupon, an address was moved in the House of Commons praying the Queen to remove Mr. Churchward from the magistracy. The Tories could not in decency meet this directly; but they found out that several persons were so far in the same case with Mr. Churchward that they had been convicted of bribery—though in far less notorious cases, and not by a vote of the House of Commons—and been subsequently made magistrates. Consequently, to divert the attack, they moved to amend the motion by extending it to the removal of all these gentlemen. It was decided after a fierce debate, by a majority of twenty, that the motion should be amended. Then Mr. Disraeli proposed, with his usual plausibility, that the discussion of so serious a measure should be postponed; by which means the whole affair might have been shelved. It never occurred to these experienced tacticians that they might be forced to swallow their own dose. Mr. Gladstone immediately sprang up and, with a force and fire which were quite startling, insisted that the general motion should be put, and the proposition which they had intended as a mere blind converted into a reality. They were fairly caught in their own trap, and the motion was passed amidst great excitement, the supporters of the amendment not daring to divide against it. It is seldom that an engineer is so neatly "hoist with his own petard," and the House of Commons entrapped into a vigorous motion against bribery.

Apropos of this, I may mention that Mr. Gladstone has gained wonderfully by his conduct in opposition, and is certainly becoming the most powerful man in the country. His manner has been a trifle too vehement at times; but it speaks rather of enthusiasm than ill-temper, and he is the most undisputed head that the Liberal party has seen for years.

WHY DO THE TONKAWAS EAT THE COMANCHES?

To the Editor of The Nation:

But few persons are aware that we have cannibals among us. Yet we have them. The Tonkawa Indians of Texas are cannibals.[*]

Many years ago, ex-Governor Runnels, of Mississippi, informed me that the notorious Col. James Bowie, the inventor of the bowie-knife, assured him that once, when he was with the Tonkawas, they killed a Comanche warrior in a skirmish, who was duly cooked and eaten up by them. He added that the Tonkawas, out of compliment to him as their guest, offered him a piece of the arm of the broiled Comanche, which he from curiosity tasted, and found tender and palatable.

Some time afterwards, Dr. Powhatan B. Archer, of Brazoria, stated that after the Plum Creek fight, at which he was present, and in which the Texans, aided by the Tonkawas, routed the Comanches, he saw the Tonkawa warriors cook and eat some of the Comanches that had been slain and left on the field.

Still later, divers of the rangers who were in the raid against the Comanches in the Wichita Mountains in 1857, where the Texas troops were accompanied by a considerable band of Tonkawa warriors, who acted as their allies and guides, stated that they saw the Tonkawas cook and eat Iron Jacket, a noted chief of the Comanches, whose iron scale-armor, pierced by the rifle bullets that slew him, now hangs in the State Library of Texas.

[*] The Carancalmas, a tribe of gigantic Indians that inhabited the coast of Texas, were also cannibals. The word carancalma is said to signify "man-devourer."

The Tonkawas pressed them to participate in the feast made upon their foe, holding up choice morsels to them, and saying, "Comanche meat good," and seeming hurt because they indignantly declined to partake.

Only last week an ex-lieutenant of the rangers assured me that, after a successful fight on the part of the Texans and Tonkawas jointly against the Comanches, the Tonkawas, as was usual with them, cut up and broiled and roasted a Comanche chief who was among the slain, and annoyed him by their importunities, insisting that he should eat a slice from the leg of the Comanche, which was done to a crisp and was displayed before him in order that he might be tempted to partake. The Tonkawas told him that, while they ate the Comanches and vice versa, neither of those tribes ate white people or other Indians. He added that there are now not less than twenty disbanded rangers living in or near Austin who could testify in court, of their own personal knowledge, that the Tonkawas are cannibals.

Testimony to the same effect has been given by officers of the regular army of the United States who served on the western frontier of Texas before the rebellion.

The proofs are cumulative and are unquestioned. The fact that we have caribes (cannibals) among us must be regarded as established beyond a doubt.

Not very long ago the Tonkawas, who have ever been the deadly enemies of the Comanches and the fast friends of the Texans, lived a roving sort of live along the frontier. The Comanches surprised them. Placido, their first chief, was killed, and with him a majority of the tribe, including the women and children. In consequence the Tonkawas, who had always been distinguished for their bravery, and who, within the memory of men not yet old, had been quite numerous, but had for years been continually losing in their unequal contest with the Comanches, who are the most numerous and powerful of the tribes of the South-west, were suddenly reduced to some 140 or 150 souls all told, and thus were compelled to leave the frontier and come to Austin, where they now are, to claim succor and protection from their white friends. They want rations and clothing for the present, and a reserve of land, farming implements, stock, seeds, and instruction as to how to use them, for the future. Their first chief, Castillo, and their second chief, Chiahoke,* have stated their condition and made their requests. The commander of the U. S. military post at Austin furnishes them with subsistence. The Legislature of Texas has made an appropriation sufficient to supply them with blankets and clothing.

The Tonkawas, in their intercourse with each other, speak their own language, though most of the warriors speak Spanish, and some of them English; but their acquaintance with the last-mentioned language is very imperfect.

Chiahoke, the second chief of the Tonkawas, and myself have become very good friends. He understands English quite well; better than one would suppose from his mode of speaking.

While going to dinner to-day, I saw Chiahoke walking briskly up Congress Avenue in the direction of the camp of the Sixth U. S. Cavalry, which lies beyond the capitol. Thinking it a good chance to satisfy my curiosity, and to get a truthful answer to a delicate question by putting it to him when he was off his guard, I joined my cannibal friend, who seemed to be in a good humor, being dressed better than usual, wearing for the occasion a cavalry hat, and being painted with care, and after exchanging salutations, walked along with him and enquired where he was going. He answered, speaking by jerks, Indian fashion, "I go—camp—draw rations." I requested him to stop a moment, which he politely did.

"My friend Chiahoke," said I, "I have always regarded you as a very clever sort of a native American, and hence ask you to do me the favor to answer a question: Why do you Tonkawas eat the Comanches? Is it because their flesh is good to the taste; because you think that by eating a great warrior you acquire his courage and sense; or is it from an insatiable feeling of revenge?"

My friend Chiahoke leered upon me, and with a cunning smile (such as you may have seen a little boy assume when questioned by a playmate as to the quality of preserves confidentially confessed to have been pilfered from his mamma's pantry) and an inward chuckle replied, "Yes—good."

The enquiries made had evidently at first brought vividly to his memory savory morsels of broiled Comanche wherewith he had been wont to regale himself, but immediately it seemed to flash across his mind that, in the estimation of white people, cannibalism was disreputable. He stopped short. Upon being pressed to give a further and more definite answer, he would only say, "Two bits—whiskey," meaning thereby that he would give the information sought if he was supplied with twenty-five cents worth of whiskey.

The noble savage had become deboshed! He craved the "fire-water" that no less than pestilence and war had wrought ruin upon his race. This disgusted me, so I took leave of my friend Chiahoke, who went his way. I had seen from the expression of his countenance that his suspicions were aroused, and that the adage, in vino veritas, would not hold good in his case. No fact had been elicited from him save that, in his judgment, the flesh of Comanches is emphatically good to eat.

My curiosity is unsatisfied. None but the chiefs and principal warriors of the Tonkawas can give authoritative answers to the enquiries stated. I shall watch each one of them when he comes from his camp to town, and when an opportunity offers for a private and confidential chat, will propound to him the question that disturbs my mental repose.

"No poetical work of modern times stands forth so prominently and peculiarly a representative of the literature of a race and language as the 'Frithiof's Saga.' Immediately upon the appearance of the poem, its claim to be placed at the head of the imaginative literature of Sweden was recognized. No one attempted to controvert the decision, and it has only been strengthened during the forty-three years that have since intervened."—Extract from Mr. Taylor's Preface.

Ohio Educational Monthly.

THE OHIO EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY is strictly an educational journal. It has no "mathematical," "literary," or "juvenile" department, and few articles are admitted to its pages that do not bear directly and practically upon school organization, management, or instruction. It comes to all classes of teachers with improved methods of instruction and discipline, with articles elucidating thoroughly the elementary principles of education, and with interesting summaries of educational intelligence. The "School Officers' Department" is filled with plans and suggestions for the improvement of our schools, instructions respecting the requirements of the school law, and other important information of great value to all school officers.

"If the testimony of many leading educators, East and West, may be accepted, there is no educational journal in the country that bears more directly and practically upon the duties of teachers and school-officers of all grades."—Springfield (O.) Republic.

"THE OHIO EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY is one of the potent instrumentalities from which the cause of education in our State derives incalculable good. Its editor is Hon. E. E. White, our late and most efficient School Commissioner, and its pages are enriched by contributions from the most successful educators in the country."—Stark Co. Republican.

The Week.

The Senate remains hard at work at the appointments till the last moment. It is apparently, in spite of Mr. Motley's resignation, impossible to oust him, as Mr. Johnson is unable to find any one fit, in the eyes of the Senate, to take his place. Considering the circumstances under which the vacancy was created, it is to be hoped, for the sake of the country, that his resignation may not take effect. Mr. Raymond, of The Times, would fill the post well; but the man whom Mr. Johnson is bound to nominate, in all decency, is George McCracken. If this gentleman is a fit and proper person to inspect the whole corps of American diplomatists, and make reports to Washington on their walk and conversation, he is certainly fit for a first-class mission, and the President is bound to give him one.

We are all so much inclined, in view of the present hope of a speedy reconstruction, and a reconstruction from the foundations, to let bygones be bygones, and to forgive and forget whatever may have been wrong in the conduct of the Southern whites, that we shall be in danger of condemning too severely the negroes who, it is possible, have been perpetrating some high-handed crimes in Southern Georgia. But if it is true that negroes "in one county" (name not given) have broken open the jails and allowed negro prisoners to escape, and "in another county" (name not given) have hung men to trees by the roadside; and "in Southern Georgia" generally have revived "the wildest days of St. Domingo," let us recollect that there are numbers of white men "in Southern Georgia" who, since the negroes were emancipated, have, first and last, drunk and sober, killed without compunction from one to half a dozen negroes apiece. There are some young men in Central Georgia who, if even they are living now, cannot and ought not to expect to live more than a month or two longer. They are known to whites and blacks as wanton murderers. As for the jail deliveries, the negroes, as Dr. Nott says, are an imitative race. It used to be white mobs that took negro prisoners out of jail. Hanging the most notorious of the white ruffians to trees by the roadside is, we fear, even more certainly impolitic on the part of the negroes than it is wrong; but that we should have much reason to be surprised if the thing were done no one can pretend to say who considers the customs of the Southern country. As for "St. Domingo," it comes as naturally to the mouth of the Southern cavalier when his pen is in rest as "St. Iago" to the mouth of a Castilian bent on slaughter; it is a war-cry and no more, and a war-cry that is not believed in by the men who kill under it. Fortunately, Georgia is just now in pretty good hands, and much may be learned by both blacks and whites before the working of the new system is left entirely to them.

There is no doubt that the House will vote the money to pay for Russian America, and that we may be said to own that region. Our title is without encumbrance, too, though it was supposed to be saddled with reservations in favor of certain English and Russian trading and trapping companies. From the best accessible information we gather that we have got some very large and more or less valuable forests of pine and spruce; probably we have got some coal mines, be the same great or small; possibly—to this question no one of his own knowledge can say yes, and no one can say no—we have got some mines of gold and silver and copper; the fisheries we have got as much as we had before, and no more, for the fisheries of that region are out at sea, and after we have caught our fish we must take them to California or Oregon to cure them, for on that rainy coast the weather is too moist for drying fish. Senators Ferry and Fessenden, it is said—the ratification was done in secret session, and no one is supposed to know how senators voted—voted against ratifying the treaty. Mr. Nye is reported to have said frankly that the people would not forgive the Republican party if, when so big a slice from another man's farm was offered, it was not snapped at. So, to get hold of more land, to cut away the ground from beneath Mr. Seward's feet, and for other such reasons, the Senate voted aye, and we are lords of a colony. We are lucky that as yet we have no colonists. But they may come in time; if not in this, then in other dependencies, which will be all the easier of acquisition now that we have set ourselves this example.

We urged, at a very early period in the discussion on reconstruction, the vital importance of making some legislative provision for the education of the freedmen who were about to be invested with the electoral franchise, and expressed our strong sense of the danger of overlooking the political value and even political necessity of knowledge in a country like this. At that time, however, the mention of anything but the ballot being necessary for the regeneration of the Southern negroes was treated in many quarters as proof of unsoundness or lukewarmness. Now, however, at the eleventh hour, when the country is weary of the reconstruction question, and ready to dismiss it as settled, Mr. Sumner is asking to have the Southern States forced to provide popular education. Mr. Phillips is supporting him in The Anti-Slavery Standard, and Mr. Beecher is lecturing on the political necessity of education. We are glad of it, but we wish it had come in time. A year ago the ballot was talked of as if you had only to give a South Carolina freedman a ticket to enable you to get from him a clear précis of Aristotle's "Politics and Economics," and a lucid commentary on the American Constitution. We are satisfied that infinite harm has been done by the light and somewhat sneering way in which education as a qualification for citizenship has been spoken of during the past two years, by men who ought to know better.

The nominations of both parties for delegates at large to the Constitutional Convention of this State have a sinister appearance. It is a significant fact that the candidates at the head of the two tickets are partners in business. It is not less significant that one of them is the confidential agent of Commodore Vanderbilt, that George Law is on one ticket, and that the railroad interests are largely represented on both tickets; while the nomination of Mr. Prosser by the Republicans, and the desperate efforts of the canal men to get a larger representation, indicate that special claims are to be made for canal enlargement. It looks very much as though a combination of railroad and canal men would attempt to break down the salutary restrictions of the existing constitution upon the creation of public debts, and defeat any proposition intended to prevent the Legislature from throwing away valuable franchises, as it is now doing. We regret that suspicion should thus be fastened upon the convention at the outset; though it is possible that the very jealousy with which its doings will be watched may make the result of its labors more acceptable, by deterring the schemers from carrying out their plans.

The New York Tribune, in a friendly mention of Henry Ward Beecher's name as a candidate for the New York Constitutional Convention, characterizes him as "positive and fallible." We hope modesty and infallibility will not, however, be generally exacted of the Republican delegates.

The mistake of the New York Legislature in refusing to authorize equal suffrage at the election of the constitutional convention is already producing material results. The loyalists of Maryland justly claim that all citizens have a right to vote at the election of a convention soon to be held there; but the example of New York is an immense obstacle in their way. The cause is much indebted to Senators Low, Gibson, White, and others, as well as to Messrs. Pitts, Hoyt, and others in the Assembly, for their able support of the right doctrine. But the dead-weight of members unable to comprehend the law of the case, combined with the discreditable indifference of the leading Republican journals, was too much for the logic of the minority.

A grant of one side of Union Square, in this city, has been made by the Common Council to the Roman Catholics, for the erection of a building in which to hold a religious fancy fair. No other denomination would have asked for such a favor, and the Common Council confesses frankly that no other denomination would have received it. The building has raised the rate of insurance on the houses along the entire block, but the owners have applied in vain to the courts for an injunction. The experiment of Fenian government is, in fact, being tried in New York so thoroughly, that we cannot for the life of us imagine what causes the Brotherhood to risk their pence in trying to wrest Ireland from the British. When people can butcher policemen on Patrick's Day, and raise money for the church by blocking up the public streets, they must be great fools to go fighting for "liberty" elsewhere.

Almost every good cause which needs material aid has sustained a severe loss in the death of Mr. George L. Stearns, of Boston, which occurred last week. He was an enthusiastic reformer, one of John Brown's earliest and best friends, and one of the most liberal givers the country has ever had to every movement which commended itself to him as a movement in advance. Although he was for years an active worker in the anti-slavery cause, he was probably best known out of Massachusetts through his energetic labors in raising negro troops in Tennessee, and through a conversation he had with Mr. Johnson in the earlier days of that gentleman's backsliding on the subject of reconstruction, which at the time attracted considerable attention.

It is very much to the credit of an excellent public servant and very much to the credit of the people of the First Congressional District of Rhode Island that the Hon. Thomas A. Jenckes has been for the second time re-elected without organized opposition. Out of 5,413 votes cast he received all but 101. Not to mention his other services, he deserves the thanks of every honest man and good citizen for his labors in the matter of the bill for fixing the qualifications of office-holders, a bill which he was almost successful in getting made a law, and which, we trust, he is not done with yet. It is the country and not he that is to be congratulated on his return to the House.

The severest battle yet fought between the friends and enemies of legislation to enforce total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, or, to put it briefly, between Maine-law men and anti-Maine-law men, has just come to an end in Massachusetts. If, as some think, it resulted in defeat for the prohibitionists, the fact does not as yet appear; it may have been a Gettysburg, but it was not a Waterloo, and the defeated party will continue campaigning. The Legislative Committee, it is said, will make a majority report in favor of a license system, and if they do, we suppose it will be the effect of a change brought about in the minds of the committee by the argument of Mr. Andrew and the testimony of many witnesses; for a majority of the committee must have been friends of the "Maine Law." But whatever the report is, the Legislature, it is expected, will give the law another year of trial. The next Legislature may do the same thing, and it may not. For the temperance question will be likely to have some effect on the elections in Congressional districts as well as in the State at large.

The State of Mississippi has been refused permission by the Supreme Court to file its bill for an injunction against the President. But the State of Georgia, which did not aim so high, and only asked to have General Grant and other commanders restrained, has got permission to file, so that the whole question of the power of the court and of the constitutionality of the Reconstruction bill will now be argued, but it is not likely that the court will pass upon the latter point. A denial of its own jurisdiction will probably relieve it of this necessity.

We learn by telegraph that the ministry have carried the Reform bill in England by a small majority, after ineffectual opposition from Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Disraeli has given up the dual vote, which was the worst feature of his bill, and exhibited a readiness to give up anything else the House chose, which seems to have conciliated the majority. The real reason of Mr. Gladstone's defeat seems to have been the dislike of him as a leader felt by one portion of his own followers, coupled with the dislike of all reform felt by everybody except the extreme Liberals. A large section of the Liberal party are consequently willing to vote for any bill which bids fair to get the question out of the way, without too seriously damaging the present order of things. The exclusion of the "compound householders"—that is, of all who do not pay their poor-rate directly, but pay it in their rent—is, perhaps, that feature of the bill which makes it most objectionable to Liberals. The artisans of the large towns are generally "compound householders;" those of the small towns are apt to pay their rates directly, and are almost always inferior to the former in intelligence and independence. But in any event the bill will make a sufficient change in the electoral body to hasten another and more sweeping measure of reform.

The "special correspondents" are hard at work at the Paris Exhibition, and their compositions already begin to lighten up the western horizon. One of them last week "came out of the innumerable crowd—the Malthusian world—in which the journalist ever moves" to "put his pen across the fulcrum of his inkstand," and heave up the great Exhibition into view. He then goes on to call Charles X. "a licentious and bloody Bourbon," Louis Napoleon a "crowned Barnum;" and, taking his stand on a bridge, makes all the remarkable men and women in France defile before him, describing them all by their cartes de visite except the Turkish ambassador, who evidently has not been photographed, as the correspondent makes him wear a "turban, cashmere, and scimitar," a costume which no Turkish official has worn for forty-odd years.

The Franco-Prussian imbroglio remains much where it stood last week. Nothing has occurred to shake the opinion we expressed in our last number of the improbability of immediate war. The present excitement in France is due to the publication of the Prussian treaties with Bavaria, Baden, and Würtemberg. These treaties were all signed last August, very soon after the battle of Sadowa, and create an alliance, offensive and defensive, giving Prussia the complete control of the South German armies in case of war. The treaty was communicated to Austria at the time, but it seems not to have reached the ears of the French Government. If the latter really knew of it, M. Rouher's speech in the Corps Législatif, in reply to M. Thiers, was a most extraordinary and barefaced attempt to deceive the French public, as in that speech he tried to make out not only that France was not afraid of Germany, but had no cause to be, inasmuch as the latter was more divided than before the war, and treated South Germany as really a separate state. It is hardly possible that all this can have been said with a knowledge of the real facts of the case, but, under the circumstances, most Frenchmen will consider ignorance as bad as lying. Bismark retorted by publishing the treaties, and the result is that the knees of the French nation are shaking as they have not shaken for fifty years. There is, however, not the least probability, in our judgment, that France will attack Prussia now, for the reason we gave last week, that in the present condition of the French army and armament the result would be pretty sure to be disastrous to France. The chances of Prussia taking the initiative we have discussed elsewhere. The probability that Bismark has "ordered" Louis Napoleon to disarm, as The Tribune has been trying to persuade people, is hardly worth discussing. Bismark would address no "order" to the French Government about the organization of its own army without putting the Prussian army in motion close behind the courier. Louis Napoleon may have been out-manœuvred, but the day has not yet come when a French monarch dare receive an insult like this without taking the field within a week. It is only on the stage that statesmen indite despatches of this kind.

Things in Italy are in a bad way. The failure of Parliament to supply a working majority to the ministry, or to develop, in fact, any marked capacity for either leading or being led, has led to a great deal of intriguing on the part of different factions. There is a Piedmontese faction which labors for the dissolution of the kingdom, and the restoration of the old Piedmontese autonomy; and there is a reactionary faction which seeks to induce the King to perform a sort of constitutional coup d'état, by availing himself of the provision of the constitution which permits him, on a pinch, to dissolve Parliament and govern for six months by royal decrees. To cast such a slur on parliamentary government at this moment, in a country in which it has just been established, would in all probability be fatal to it, and it would be a great calamity for the whole of Europe, as well as for Italy, if the attempt were made to dispense with it.

NOW.

Now, the sun is supposed to be in "Aquarius," and the Water-bearer, in consequence, seems to have forgotten that we need rain, for it is no end of weeks since he has fetched us a drop. Now, whoever goes into the woods expecting to find flowers will find none at all, unless by good luck, such as we had to-day, he come in a sunny corner upon some pallid hang-head adder's-tongues, or conclude to make shift with a few pussies from the willows. Now, in the country towns, where there is only one man who makes gardens, everybody is after him, and those who think they have secured him find to their sorrow that 't is their neighbor instead, who has inveigled him away over the fence with indefinite hints of higher pay. Now, fields are being ploughed, and early potatoes planted, and windows are left open in the middle of the day, and people go out in slippers to watch the gardener's progress, and coughs abound, and the doctors are busy. Now, the cocks and hens that have been shut up all winter are let out to scratch in anybody's garden they can get into, and eggs are cheaper, and the tempers of people who do not like to see their fresh-sown lawns scratched up ten times or more a day are sorely tried, and even gentle women swear at the feathered trespassers. Now, Chaucer is read, and Milton's "L'Allegro," and more poetry than ever is sent to the magazines and newspapers. Now, the fat saucy robins, as big as pigeons, hop about over the newly-turned-up ground, and the bluebirds glance from tree to tree, and the steady little sparrows sing their chick-a-de-dee as of old, and the wild-ducks glide in a pretty procession on the river, and the crows squabble in the woods, and, walking among the cedars, you send the whirring crowds of yellow-wing-tipped cedar-birds flying before you at every step. Now, the voice of the peeper is heard in the land, one of the sweetest, mournfullest sounds in nature, and the turtles bask by the hour on the rocks at the edge of the pond, and flies crawl about feebly in the sun, and spiders throw their mysterious threads across the roads, and the water-spider has begun his never-ending monotonous jerking dance on the pools in the woods. Now, the bird-fanciers thrive, and enthusiastic boys buy pigeons—pouters and fan-tails—and the girls get canaries, and even mocking-birds find credulous purchasers who fondly believe they can sing. Now, the hardware shops take in their coal-scuttles, and door-mats, and skates, and sleds, and put out refrigerators, and bathing-tubs, and rakes, and hoes. Now, the seed-shops are in their glory, and their windows are enchanting with azaleas, and cinerarias, and hyacinths, and Chinese primroses. Now, everybody begins to ask the price of spinach and lettuce, and finding how dear they are concludes to hang on to mashed potatoes and maccaroni a week or two longer. Now, strawberries grown in hot-houses, with the flavor of cold potatoes, appear at the stylish restaurants, and are bought by over-rich people at twenty-five cents apiece; and young women of a credulous turn of mind buy rose-bushes in the city markets, full of buds, and believe they will open; and the first shad is sold for five dollars and goes to the gridiron as proud as St. Lawrence, and the shad-tree that waved him up stream with her white pocket-handkerchief sighs when he comes not. Now, the dear female sex comes out as one man in little round hats with pigeon wings, and their brothers' jackets, and chignons like orioles' nests, and the tidiest, prettiest short dresses, and the roses of June in their cheeks, and the violets of May in their eyes, and the gold of the sun himself in their hair. Now, Easter is coming, and the milliners are going to open, and new bonnets are to be bought, and organdies appear in the windows, and the sun will dance with joy at the beauty of the new fashions, and the inventiveness of the female mind will strike everybody for the thousandth time. Now, the parks are full of pretty children, and the little paddies in the country are beginning to go in swimming, and the school-girls are getting tired of their books, and the teachers are getting tired of the school-girls, and the boys forget to come in when the noon bell rings, and the teacher wishes that there were no bell to ring. Now, all the boys are flying kites, excepting those who are playing marbles, and Mr. Van Tine is asked a hundred times a day, "How much for them Japanese kites?" and the kites grin like demons when the poor little shavers with ten cents are told that the kites are forty. Now, all the boys are dying for fish-hooks, and cord, and sinkers, and dobbers, and the fish are uneasy in their minds, which they would n't be if they knew anything about boys. Now, the fares on the railroads are reduced, and butter is down, and milk is cheaper, and hope is diffused, and amiability is in the air, and plans are formed, and the winter is abused behind his back, and a good peach crop is anticipated, and the papers are full of stories of the profit people made last year off a half-acre of strawberries and grapes. Now, rents are raised, and house-hunters are aghast, and painters are busy or pretend to be, and carpenters have so much to do in getting jobs secured that they have no time for immediate calls, and servants in the city are looking out for places in the country, and hod-carriers develop a preternatural and unsuspected talent for gardening and the care of horses. Now, spring has come, and winter has gone, and the heart is renewed, and life is quickened, and under the blue sky nothing seems so fit for the day as love-making, and all young things, from babies to goslings, are in season, and the faces of the sick are sadder than yesterday, and the sight of a little lame child makes the tears rush to the eyes—and, that death should be here in the very bursting and fulness of life, is more than ever a dread and a mystery.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Contrary to general expectation, the trade sale which has just come to an end in this city was about as much of a success, as regards both the number of books sold and the prices obtained for them, as the sale of last autumn. Everybody seemed to think that no one else would be there, and that books were going to be very cheap; so everybody went, and books brought tolerable prices. But the opinion gains ground that the days of trade sales are passing away. Some of the great houses were not represented, we see—Appletons, for instance—and others, as Ticknor & Fields, make a very small show in the catalogue.

—Messrs. Mohun & Ebbs, 546 Broadway, have just issued a catalogue (unpriced) of a private library which they offer for sale. It contains something like eight hundred works, some of them rare, but many of them common and modern; most of them English, and nearly all of them fine editions. The collection seems to be richer in valuable illustrated works than in any other particular department. We notice a two-volume edition, on large paper, of "The Royal Gallery of Art; being the Private Collections by her Majesty and the Prince Consort, and the Art Heir-looms of the Crown at Windsor Castle, Buckingham Palace, and Osborne," which consists of 144 line engravings, with descriptions by S. C. Hall; "Selected Pictures from the Galleries and Private Collections of Great Britain;" "Galérie du Palais Pitti;" an illuminated quarto copy of the "De Imitatione," with an appendix, forming another quarto volume, which contains curious old portraits of the presumed authors of the work; "The Turner Gallery;" "Museo Borbonico;" "The London Art Journal," in 18 vols.; "Waring's Masterpieces of Industrial Art and Sculpture at the Great Exhibition," and other similar works. Each work, it is promised, will be sold separately, much below its value, and catalogues can be had upon application.

—From a statement made, as we suppose, on the authority of Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers, it appears that Mr. Dickens has received of two American publishing houses, Harper's and Peterson's, not less than $60,000 in our paper currency. For the "Tale of Two Cities" he had £1,000 in gold; for "Great Expectations," £1,250; for "Our Mutual Friend," £1,000, and other sums for other works. Harper & Brothers paid the money to Mr. Dickens, and, having made such use of the works as they pleased, transferred their interest in them to Messrs. Peterson & Brothers, who shared with Harpers the expense of getting the engravings made (transferred from steel to wood), and of the payments to the author. This statement is put forth to prevent wrong inferences been drawn from the recently published extract from a letter written by Mr. Dickens to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, who had sent him £200 as his share, so far, in the profits of the "Diamond Dickens." "I think you know," he says, "how high and far beyond the money's worth I esteem this act of manhood, delicacy, and honor. I have never derived greater pleasure from the receipt of money in all my life." We are compelled to suppose, in the present state of our knowledge in regard to this matter, that one would draw a wrong inference from this letter who should infer that Messrs. Harper and Messrs. Peterson had not treated Mr. Dickens fairly, with "manhood and honor." But, then, the sum sent him by the Boston house was not expected by him; that got from the other firms was got in pursuance of a bargain; and while Messrs. Peterson do well to explain that they are not open to the charge of pirating the works of Mr. Dickens, yet probably they have no just cause of complaint against him for this letter, of which, by the way, only a part has been seen by the public. We may remark here that the rival Philadelphia and Boston cheap editions of Dickens come out regularly. The third party in this triangular duel, Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, are very nearly ready with the first of the cheap "Globe" edition, or, to give it a name from their advertisements, the "Save-your-eyes" edition.

—Several American authors are noticed in late English journals. Mrs. Akers is praised by The Spectator for writing some lyrics that have the true ring of poetry. Of Mr. Whipple's "Character and Characteristic Men" it is said that the author "writes or lectures pleasantly, and has always an anecdote at hand to keep his audience in a good humor, but he shows a sad want of grapple and roams vaguely over the surface of character." Geo. P. Fisher's "Life of Silliman" The Spectator thinks rather a collection of letters "than a life." Washington Irving's "Spanish Miscellanies" the same paper pronounces dullish, and the other volume too fragmentary. Mr. Ward, in his "Life of Percival," is said to have "labored not wholly in vain." The Pall Mall Gazette takes the trouble of anatomizing the "amorous and operatic Muriel," Mrs. Edwin James's foolish novel.

—From the first number that we have seen of The Galveston Medical Journal we learn that, as might have been expected, in Texas literature contends with difficulties. The magazine is a year old, however, and, though not issued with regularity, has paid its expenses. The delays in its appearance were due, we fear, to a distrust of the publisher's ability to pay for his printing, for he remarks: "We have paid for all published, and can and will pay for what we order," and if the work cannot be done at one office he intends to have it done at another. "We have always had plenty of copy," the editor says, "but by delays some has been lost, others stolen out of our office, and our electrotypes, which we had been keeping to accompany articles, were also stolen." In this number before us "The Metric System of Weights and Measures" occupies twenty-five pages, and besides this there are articles on "Diptheria" [sic], "Hypodermic Medication," "Urticaria from the use of Quinine," and "A Case of Retained Placenta." Apparently the editor intends to rely mainly on his exchanges.

—We confess to having been hoaxed by the unprincipled young man who wrote for The Pall Mall Gazette what purported to be a suppressed passage of Swift's "Gulliver's Travels." We read with unsuspecting, credulous haste and were imposed upon by the cleverness of the forgery and the fact of its appearance in the Gazette. However, we freely forgive both editor and writer for the sake of the irresistible impudence with which the secret is made known—impudence beyond the efforts of one man, we suppose, for the explanation is the joint work of the pair of them. "M. F. T.," a correspondent and an accomplice, in The Gazette of March 25, begs the editor not to withhold from the public any of the new discoveries. The editor and the discoverer reply as follows:

> "We have done what in us lies to gratify 'M. F. T.' We have written to the young man in the Temple who supplied us with the suppressed passage from Gulliver last Wednesday, and his reply runs as follows: 'I am just starting from my dad's place at Ballynabraggan, so that I can't write anything immediately. If the public would like another suppressed passage or two from Gulliver, of course they can be done; but I am in doubt whether a man who is pronounced by so grave and acute a critic as The London Review to be as admirable a satirist and as good a writer as Swift ought not to set up on his own account and wear his own laurels. There is a fine opening for a satirist just now, and if the close and accurate critics of the L. R. can find no difference between my genius and that of the lamented dean, I suppose I may count with certainty upon success with the mere public.'"

—Goldsmith has arrived at the honor of a "centenary commemoration," but in what may be called a characteristic way. For it is Germany that thus honors our Irishman, and it is not the hundredth anniversary of his own birthday which was celebrated, but of the birthday of his "Vicar of Wakefield." The novel was first published in 1766, and in 1866 a commemorative edition was prepared in Berlin and is now issued. The translation was made by Ernst Susemihl, and a biographical and critical introduction furnished by Otto Roquette. The rendering of the "Vicar" itself is excellent, but some of the minor works, which also are given in the new edition, seem to have fallen into less skilful hands. For instance, in the translation of the "Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog," the lines, are turned into German which declares that the charitable person extolled was in the habit of clothing the naked every morning before he dressed himself! If a surgical operation is necessary before a joke can be got into a Scotchman's head, one would say that a German to appreciate a joke must be born again—and of foreign parents.

"The naked every day he clad,
When he put on his clothes,"

—The paternal government of the Hapsburgs has always stood in rather stepfatherly relations to literature, at any rate to journalism. We have a recollection—not so perfect as we could wish—of a sample specimen of the sort of paragraphs in which the Viennese editor exercises the pen which is forbidden to expatiate freely over politics. It set forth the interesting fact that, as the editorial we was walking down a certain street, he was overtaken by a shower of rain, and, having no umbrella, took refuge in a certain doorway, without in the least thinking that it was the doorway of a house in which lived a friend of his. Nevertheless, a friend of his did live there! and came out and spoke to him! Accustomed to reading of this kind, which perhaps does not regularly keep it in a whirl of nervous excitement, all Vienna may be cheated into supposing that it is just now in possession of a veritable Count Gurowski. Aranyos Kakay, a member of the Hungarian Chamber of Deputies, has lately published a book ("Licht- und Schattenbilder zur Characteristik des ungarischen Landtags") which pleases the anti-liberal party in the Austrian capital very much, and is said to have kept them in roars of laughter for some weeks. He is hard on the Liberals. "Kemeny," he says, "always wears a dusty coat, because his servant is busy among the editors of the Pesti Naplo (a Radical journal), and so never has time to brush it." Thus he describes the working of politics in Hungary: "Our countrymen feast and drink and cudgel their brains three months, and then go to vote for deputies. Fighting all over the country. Then come the elections for county offices. Fighting in every county. Lastly, the election for village magistrates. Fighting in every village." Deputy Kakay apparently has something of Gurowski's way of speaking his mind; of his witticisms we shall have to say that witticisms lose almost everything in the process of translation.

—Lowell says that Lessing's "Nathan the Wise" is "an Essay on Toleration in the form of a dialogue." The German critic and novelist Spielhagen, in his lecture, "Faust and Nathan," asserts that those two poems are developments of the same fundamental thought, and, further, he asserts the essential likeness of the character of Lessing to that of Goethe. Spielhagen is, however, to be described as paradoxical and ingenious rather than ingenuous. A novel by him, "In Reih und Glied," is among the new books just now widely read in Germany. It is popular principally for the critical opinions incidentally delivered, though no doubt Spielhagen is one of the best of contemporary German novelists. Another new issue of the Berlin press is Dr. Wieland's "Collection of Klopstock's Letters," which contains a note written by the poet's sister Meta to Richardson, the novelist. We hear, too, of a new edition, by Hartenstein, of Kant's complete works, in eight volumes. It is now appearing, and will contain nothing not certainly Kant's, all the spurious and doubtful writings attributed to him being omitted.

—Among other works, perhaps of less general interest, recently issued at Berlin, we notice a second edition of Curtius's "Outlines of Greek Etymology" is published, and shows as the result of an entire revision many improvements on its predecessors, "Hephæstion and the Minor Versifiers" and "Poems of Catullus." In the latter he has endeavored to portray the life and adventures of Catullus from his poems. Though the biographical attempt, like similar ones based on Shakespeare's sonnets, seems unwarranted and far-fetched, one cannot avoid praising the beauty and elegance of the German translation. But its stilted style and its desert of learned observations make much of it wearisome. The latter part does not suffer so much in these respects, and the section devoted to Machiavelli's drama is most readable. Two volumes of Rudolph Nicolai's "History of Greek Literature" are published, and give promise that the work will be a good compendium. Adolph Nicolai's "Origin and Nature of Greek Romance" is a fluently written examination of the influence of the Sophists on the development of the later narrative poetry, and gives the substance of all the Greek romances. Edward Gerhard has issued a collection of his smaller treatises, which embraces his historical art essays previous to 1847. The second volume of Peters's "History of Rome," treating of the period between the Second Punic War and the fall of the Republic, and a new edition of Mommsen's "Roman History," are also prominent on the archæological list. Worthy of mention is A. W. Zumpt's "Criminal Law of the Roman Republic," a book of strict method, in which the philological side is most ably handled. The judicial side, which will ever leave scope for many conjectures, cannot be satisfactorily treated before the collection of the inscriptions.

PHILANTHROPY IN AMERICA AND IN EUROPE.[*]

ALTHOUGH the word "philanthropy" is of good Greek origin and has come down to us through the Latin of Ulpian, the great lawyer of the third century, we do not find it in use in England before Addison's time. A contemporary of Addison, the Abbé de St. Pierre, in 1725 introduced into French the corresponding term bienfaisance, "for the sake of exactly expressing the idea of doing good to others." So modern are terms which have become the commonplace of the two languages, and they are so because the thing which they express is itself modern. For, without subscribing to the reproaches which Dr. Bigelow heaps upon Homer and the Grecians in general, we must allow that charity and philanthropy in our sense of the words were unknown to them. Even the early and the middle ages of Christianity, though furnishing the highest motive and some of the best examples of these virtues, by no means saw them generally practised. It was reserved for an age when religious faith seemed to be weak, when scoffers and worldlings held sway, to witness a general revival and extension of philanthropy. It was a poet by no means devout who then said:

> "In faith and hope the world will disagree,
> But all mankind's concern is charity;"

and what Pope announced the next generation proceeded to verify. Franklin labored to prevent pauperism and to organize philanthropy in America; his countryman, Rumford, did the same work for Bavaria; De L'Epée generalized the instruction of the deaf, and Haüy that of the blind; Howard set forth on his voyage of discovery among the dungeons and lazar-houses of Europe—"a circumnavigation of charity," as Burke said; Pinel opened and ameliorated the horrors of the Bicêtre and the Salpêtrière; and the foundations of the whole modern structure of charities were laid amid the convulsions preceding and accompanying the French Revolution.

The work thus begun has been zealously carried forward in the present century on both sides of the Atlantic. In England, France, and the Low Countries the whole system of public relief to the poor has been revised, enlarged, and clearly defined. In the other countries of Europe the same thing has been partially done. In the United States the process is now going on. Together with this, and often antecedent in time, a great amelioration of prison discipline and of the criminal law has taken place. The barbarous codes of Great Britain and the Continent of Europe have given place to mild and even sentimental legislation. Over a large part of the civilized world the punishment of death is practically abolished, so rarely is it inflicted and so repugnant has it become to the humanity of the people. Numberless establishments of private charity of great variety and increasing usefulness have grown up. Whole departments have been added to the province of public charity, which has only grown more liberal as it has been more appealed to. In America, in France, and in Germany the deaf and the blind are educated at the expense of the state in whole or in part. In Great Britain and elsewhere a strong effort is making for the same wise legislation. Boards of health and bureaux of registration are busy with the thousand details of sanitary legislation. The evils of intemperance have introduced the most perplexing questions; the kindred mischief of licentiousness is claiming increased attention. The results attained in this great philanthropic movement have never yet been aggregated and formulated so as to exhibit precisely the state of charitable activity at any given time. Something has been done in this direction, however, by the three International Congresses of Philanthropy ("Congrès Internationals de Bienfaisance") which met at Brussels in 1856, at Frankfort in 1857, and at London in 1862. The volume under notice is a report of the discussions and a portion of the papers read at the last session in London. No more interesting collection of facts and opinions on these subjects has ever been made, coming as they do from the researches of philanthropists in all the principal nations of the civilized world. Great Britain, France, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Austria, Prussia, the smaller states of Germany, Norway, Switzerland, Italy, the United States, Russia, Denmark, and Portugal were all represented at the congress, and statements were made or papers read concerning charitable enterprises in most of these countries. Among the speakers were Lord Shaftesbury, Dr. Farr, and Florence Nightingale, of England; Augustin Cochin, of France; MM. Carton and Ducpétiaux, of Belgium; Alfaro and Nieto-Serrano, of Spain; Carvalho, of Portugal; and C. L. Brace, of New York.

[*] "Congrès International de Bienfaisance de Londres. Session de 1862." Tomes I. et II., pp. 423, 227. Trübner et Cie., Paternoster Row, 60, London. 1863.

A fourth session of the congress is proposed in Paris during the coming summer, and no doubt will be numerously attended by our countrymen. Among them we trust there may be somebody competent to point out the contrasts and the resemblances between the charitable activity of Europe and of America.

It would be presumptuous in us to undertake such a task, but there seems to be an occasion furnished by such volumes as the one under notice and those on the charities of France, the charities of Europe, etc., which have been reviewed in these pages, for saying a few plain words about the matter.

First of all, we notice that the division of philanthropic labor, like that of labor in general, is carried much further in the older countries, and, consequently, that they have whole classes of charitable institutions which we lack. For example, there are no foundling hospitals in America, and but few of the hospitals for special diseases which are found in Europe. We have a less marked gradation of prisons than most of the European countries; a far less perfect comprehension of the labor question and the requisites for public health. Our collections of statistics are less exact and valuable; our social science associations less frequented and less worthy to be frequented. The supervision exercised by government over charitable establishments is more perfect in most European countries than with us, although the aid rendered by government to these establishments is greater in New York and New England than in any part of the Old World. The reason of this appears to be that the class of persons in Europe familiar enough with questions of charitable administration to advise or direct in such matters is much greater than among us, and that such persons find their way more easily into bureaux and departments and boards, and remain there more permanently than has hitherto been the case in the United States. Take Belgium for an example: the country of all the world where charitable efforts have been of late years conducted with the most system, and where their operation and results have been most usefully set forth in a statistical form. With an area only one-fourth as large and a population not much greater than the State of New York, Belgium began her national existence thirty-seven years ago with burdens of pauperism, crime, and ignorance among the mass of the people such as no American community has ever known. These burdens have by no means been all removed, but they have been greatly lightened, and the true way of removing them has been pointed out by men like Quetelet, Ducpétiaux, Visschers, Rogier, Carton, and Arrivabene, who for many years were, or still are, employed by the Government for the very purpose of investigating or administering the numerous departments of philanthropy. In the whole extent of the United States it is hardly possible to find so many enlightened, patient, and successful students of social evil and reform as this little kingdom of Belgium has produced, graduated, and promoted.

If we pass now from Belgium to France, with its thousand writers on the thousand questions of philanthropy; or to England, with its endless parliamentary reports and discussions on the same topics, we see a much greater contrast between them and us in respect to the matter of which we are speaking. An inconspicuous and by no means remarkable member of the Tory party in Parliament, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, a year ago succeeded the veteran Villiers as president of the Poor-Law Board, at the very moment when the latter was about introducing some radical reforms in the management of the London workhouses. Soon after the change of ministry, Parliament adjourned, and did not again assemble until February, when, behold, Mr. Hardy comes forward with a scheme of reform quite as radical as that of his predecessor, and which he is prepared to support with all the facts, all the arguments, and all the details necessary to carry it through a House of Commons abounding in members conversant with the question. And no wonder that Mr. Hardy is so well prepared, for within the past year there have been issued in London several cart-loads of publications discussing the subject in all its relations. Commissioners have consulted, inspectors reported, physicians prescribed, counsellors advised, clergymen preached, able editors fulminated, correspondents contradicted each other, novelists spun their webs of glaring fiction over and about and concerning every point in question. Now, there is nothing extraordinary in all this—it is the English way; but we mention it as a contrast to the way in which such questions would be dealt with here, where not one person in ten thousand would have any knowledge, however great his interest might be, in regard to the matter, so great is the neglect into which we have allowed topics of this kind to fall.

It was not always so in the United States. There was a time when the relief of the poor, the interests of labor, the discipline of prisons, the amelioration of the criminal law and kindred questions were better understood here than in Europe, and when the practical application of sound principles was far more common here than there, as is still the case to some extent. Our Franklins, Livingstons, Quincys, Rantouls, Manns, Liebers, Grays, Sumners have either died or ceased to write on these themes; but thirty years ago they were quoted in Europe as authorities, while we are now quoting authorities almost exclusively European on topics which they discussed. Our best example of prison discipline comes from Ireland, the co-operation of labor is best carried out in England and Germany, France and Russia teach us how to keep motherless infants alive, and we are yet to take lessons of Belgium in the care of the insane poor. From the Calvinists of France and the Lutherans of Germany we have much to learn concerning establishments of private charity, such as De Liefde describes, and which are best illustrated by Wichern's Reform School at Hamburg and Bost's university of charity at Laforce, in Southern France. The ease with which public endowments and State aid can be obtained for charitable enterprises in America is drawing us a little out of the divinely appointed course of philanthropy. That requires the personal inspiration of some large-hearted man or woman, such as gave birth to the noble charities of Zeller and Fliedner in Europe, of Joseph Curtis and Charles Brace in New York.

It would be more curious than profitable to trace the causes which have reduced our country to the second or third rank in philanthropic activity when we ought to hold the first. Some will dispute the fact, some will ascribe it to our long struggle with slavery, some to the debasement of our population by foreign alloys, some to an alleged decline of religious faith and an increasing worship of material things. If we were to offer any explanation, it would be that the vast scale on which the vital forces of our society are acting to transform all castes, from the highest Brahmin down to the lowest Pariah, into equal orders of accordant citizens, has made us less and less attentive to the more external forms of philanthropy. For several generations we have been converting the peasant of Europe into the freeman of America, the present and the next generation will apply the same process to the lately servile population of the South. In this reconstruction, as in chemical reaction, the secondary products are not always agreeable; but the disgusting and noxious fumes of the laboratory ought to bring contempt on the chemist quite as much as our present social condition ought to draw down censure upon our country and her institutions.

The remedy for the partial defects of which we have spoken will consist in a more earnest consideration of the questions involved, a greater willingness to be instructed from abroad, and the devotion of a larger number of our able men to the work of organized philanthropy. Evidence that we are advancing in all these ways may be found in the increasing interest felt here in such books as those we have mentioned, in the creation of important organizations like our Board of Health and the proposed Board of Charities, in the rapid formation of public associations for philanthropic work or discussion, and in the readiness of our people, who are none too modest, to admit the superiority in certain things of the European charities. The present year, which carries across the Atlantic an unusual number of our philanthropists and persons concerned in charitable establishments, will do much to extend our knowledge of what is doing abroad. May it also arouse us at home to the necessity of regaining and maintaining our just position as the foremost country of the world in all that relates to the relief of misery, the education of the people, and the general welfare of mankind.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR APRIL.

One is apt to say so of each new critical essay by Lowell, still we shall say that the essay on Lessing in the last North American is the best piece of literary criticism yet written in America. Emerson's "Representative Men" are men not treated of from the literary point of view. Some of them, indeed, Swedenborg, Napoleon, are men hardly belonging to the world of letters. But the consideration first stated suffices to remove Emerson's work out of the region of comparison with this, and we are not called on to speak at large concerning the "Goethe" and "Shakespeare." Besides the "Representative Men," no other work will be offered for comparison. In the "Lessing" that quality of Lowell's which, probably, will be in the opinion of succeeding generations the characteristic by which to describe him, his wit, abounds. We have called this essay his best, and we have not now the space nor the means at command for a full exposition of reasons, but let us say that in this essay the wit does not, as sometimes it does, superabound—the reader delighting in it, the writer delighting in it, and the work in hand meantime standing still for awhile. The tone, in this case, is throughout critical, both as the old critics understood the word and in the new shade of meaning which it is sought just now to give it, that is, the writer examining, testing, and passing judgment seems duly to subordinate himself to the author with whom he is dealing, not taking him as a point of departure, whence starting to expatiate over this or that, no matter how foreign, field of thought; and on the other hand the mere reviewer may see, may at any rate partly see, how the true critic applies "the best thought extant" to the elucidation and weighing of an author's works and influence. Of the style, in the narrower sense, we need only say that it is and is to be classic. Discoursing of a writer of Lessing's weight, Mr. Lowell of course has need and opportunity for criticisms of many men, and we get his opinion of Heine, or one aspect of Heine's character; of Herrick, "the most Catullian of poets since Catullus;" of Goethe, whose "poetic sense was the Minotaur to which he sacrificed everything; all that saves his egoism from being hateful is that with its immense reaches it cheats the sense into a feeling of something like sublimity; a patch of sand is unpleasing; a desert has all the awe of ocean;" of Montaigne; of Milton, "a pedant in his prose and not seldom even in his great poem;" of Dr. Johnson, "manly old Dr. Johnson, who could be tender and true to a plain woman, knew very well what he meant when he wrote that single poetic sentence of his, 'The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him to be a native of the rocks.'" Both Damon and Dr. Johnson, we fancy, would have been a little surprised to see the turn here given to their complaining. We make room also for this remark in regard to Shakespeare's "small Latin and less Greek":

> "It should be considered by those sagacious persons who think that the most marvellous intellect of which we have any record could not master so much Latin and Greek as would serve a sophomore, that Shakespeare must through conversation have possessed himself of whatever principles of art Ben Jonson and the other university men had been able to deduce from their study of the classics. That they should not have discussed these matters over their sack at the Mermaid is incredible; that Shakespeare, who left not a drop in any orange he squeezed, could not also have got all the juice out of this one, even more so."

The other editor of The Review, Mr. Norton, besides several book notices —"Parton's Biographical Writings," "The Book of the Sonnet," and "Samson's Elements of Art Criticism" we take to be his—contributes also a thoughtful article on "Religious Liberty." Religion he defines in these terms:

> "If we use familiar phraseology, we may say that in an enlightened man this attitude of the will results from his recognition of what is called the spiritual nature of the soul, and finds expression in endeavors to meet the responsibility of leading a life conformed to the highest attainable conceptions of the duty of man as a spiritual being. But, in more exact terms, we may define religion as a man's devotion—that is, the complete assent and concentration of his will—to any object which he acknowledges to have a right to his entire service, and to supreme control over his life."

Mr. Medbury, in the paper on "The New Jersey Monopolies," lets in a flood of light on the practices of the dozen or so of men who for thirty years have contrived to govern a State of the Union and rob the country at large to fill their own pockets. Jokers have talked about the "State of Camden and Amboy" and gibed at the "foreign country of New Jersey" for a generation, and newspapers have all the time inveighed against the rascality of the corporations that tyrannize over the traveller; in short, the subject is wearisomely familiar and hackneyed; but we think the whole nefarious business has never before been so thoroughly made plain as in this excellent article, which is as easily readable as an article by Parton. It is shown how, in the beginnings of the monopoly, there was some excuse for New Jersey, and some sense of decency in the managers of the roads. A graphic description is given of the wars in which Livingston, Fulton, Vanderbilt, Ogden, and Gibbons were principals, and States were partisans, and Addis Emmet, Daniel Webster, and William Wirt were counsellors. Stockton's career and character are described, and we are made to follow intelligently the process which has among its incidents the making and unmaking of governors and senators, the buying and selling of legislative majorities, the corruption by wholesale of the press and the bar, the thievery of directors, the falsifying of the public records, and a thousand other disgraces, and which has for its results overgrown wealth for a few men, the comparative decay of New Jersey, and the oppression of every man who travels southward from New York, or comes from the southward to the commercial metropolis of the country. Mr. Medbury points out the remedy which has often enough been pointed out before, but never before in connection with an exposure of the evil so complete and so striking that it seems as if Congressmen would be compelled to notice it and act on it.

The paper by Mr. C. F. Adams, Jr., on "The Railroad System," likewise has something to say about the means of making the great corporations less the masters and more the servants of the power which gave them existence. Mr. Adams hardly believes it true that "the present rule of corporate railroad management is sustained by the community in its most essential lines at a cost in excess of possible necessity of some five hundred per cent." But that the cost is very much greater than is necessary he fully believes. He thinks the various States ought to establish bureaux for the collection of reliable statistics, and by-and-by proceed to intelligent legislation. As regards the power to legislate effectually, whether derived from the common-law power of eminent domain or elsewhere, there can be no doubt, and the present duty is to collect statistics and establish principles of action. The vast importance of this matter becomes obvious when we reflect how steam has changed the world within the last thirty years, and that as yet the system of locomotion by steam is, as you may say, in its early infancy. Both Mr. Adams's article and Mr. Medbury's relate to a question not only important, but which for various reasons presses for a solution, and this discussion of it is very timely.

Mr. Howells describes and criticises Manzoni, Silvio Pellico, Carrer Aleardi, and Carcano, giving us another paper, which it is well to have, of his "Modern Italian Poets." They are minor poets, and known to most of us by name only—and only some of them even by name—and in such of their verses as Mr. Howells here translates make no very strong impression. Mr. Howells also furnishes, apropos of the appearance of a complete edition of Longfellow's prose and verse, published by Ticknor & Fields, the brief essay entitled "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow," which is written in his most graceful style, and as if he were doing himself a pleasure to write it. It seems to us stronger where he speaks of Longfellow's service as an influence in American literature than in its judgments of the poet's works. It is not, we suppose, precisely what will be written of Longfellow twenty years from now. But, then, neither is it just what used to be written of him in America twenty years ago. It is "not so much question as acknowledgment" of the poet's excellence, Mr. Howells says. After all, one would as soon quarrel with a rose, or harshly criticise a heliotrope, as with the books that have pleased us all so much, and in making his own acknowledgment Mr. Howells spoke for us all.

Mr. Adams S. Hill, in an article which has a vein of brisk snappishness in it, undertakes the rather unnecessary labor of saving Charles Lamb from his friends, who have, it seems, been over-praising him, certain biographers of his whom we do not know "turning him into an uninteresting saint." In particular they have fulsomely lauded him for his self-sacrifice in devoting his life to the care and comforting of his unfortunate sister. The fact is that Lamb, when he was about twenty-one years old, was man enough deliberately to give up such plans, or fond dreams, or chimeras, or whatever one chooses to call them, as youths of that age cherish, and to resolve to make his sister's life as happy as he could. The generosity of the youth was equalled by the unvarying cheerfulness with which the man bore his self-imposed burden—a burden which, as burdens will that are borne with courage, grew lighter the longer it was borne. Just how much he gave up it is not possible to tell—not a little, we imagine, or he would have given us the means of knowing more about it. However this may be, looking at what we can see, and remembering other brothers, John Lamb for instance, Charles Lamb's life is an example honorable to mankind and, we dare say, not too easy of imitation. It is funny to see how Mr. Hill fails to take the joke when Lamb interrupts the "superfluously solemn Wordsworth" (who was denouncing a gentleman reputed to be a loose liver), by audaciously crying out, "Pretty fellows we are to abuse him on that score, when every one of us, on going out into the Strand, will make up to the first pretty girl he sees!" The article is long, however, and in it may be found a good deal of what one and another have said about Lamb, and some things well enough said by Mr. Hill himself.

"British Finance in 1816" is a paper of whose value we can hardly speak it is made quite interesting to the general reader. Mr. Sanborn is the author of "Deaf-Mute Education," an essay which recounts the history, since its invention three hundred years since in Spain, of the articulation system of instruction for deaf-mutes. We have already in these pages spoken of this system, and our readers will find Mr. Sanborn's article one of much interest.

We must not forget to speak of another of the short notices of books besides those above mentioned. Every one interested in the controversy between the friends of classical education and its enemies will be glad to read a too brief review of Dr. Jacob Bigelow's recent pamphlet entitled

"Remarks on Classical and Utilitarian Studies." The literary notices in this number are, as a whole, unusually good, though not very numerous. They are followed by two letters from aggrieved authors, Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Greeley, who review their reviewers. Mr. Bancroft is silly enough to show ill-temper, but he chooses a very amusing way of doing it; he calls Mr. Greene "the grandson" throughout. "You 're another," suggests itself as an appropriate retort to this bit of abuse. In fact, Mr. Bancroft is a great-grandson. He has laid himself open to a most damaging reply. But we trust the editors of The North American will decline to lend the review to the contestants. When Mr. Greene comes next quarter and wants his revenge, he can be pointed to the fact that the editors suffered Mr. Bancroft to print this epistle.

NO. XIII.—STATISTICS OF THE VOCABULARY, CONTINUED.

BEFORE proceeding to state numerical results, we must fix rules to be followed in assigning words to their respective etymological sources, and I shall avail myself of this occasion to make an observation or two on the coinage and composition of a certain class of new words in the modern languages.

The English vocabulary is derived chiefly from Anglo-Saxon, and from Latin either directly or through French, and we have adopted some French words which cannot be traced to Latin. We have also Greek words, some of which have come to us in a Latinized form, others have been taken immediately from Greek. These latter are principally technical terms of science, and, in most cases, they are compounds unknown in ancient literature, but formed in modern times from Greek roots. A large proportion of these words are too special and restricted in their use to be justly considered as properly belonging to the common English tongue; but some of them have been adopted in general literature and speech, and may fairly be regarded as a part of our verbal patrimony. Our Greek scientific terms are often framed without regard to the rules of a sound etymology, and are very distasteful to the ear of a Hellenist; but there are considerations which entitle them, as a class, to much indulgence. The languages of the Gothic family are the only modern tongues of learned Christendom which afford facilities for the derivation and composition of new words from significant roots. But those languages are not generally widely enough known, even to scientific men, to be accepted as a universal storehouse of the raw material of philosophical terminology. New words, therefore, framed from German radicals, would not easily find currency in England, in France, or in the United States, and still less among the nations of Southern Europe. Besides, German words do not readily adapt themselves to the orthographical systems of any of those countries. On the other hand, Greek is more generally, if not better, known than German. It possesses unlimited facilities of composition, and every European language has its settled rules for the accommodation of Greek words to its own alphabet. Latin has also been freely used for the same purpose, especially by Linnæus and his followers, and it has supplied a great number of convenient descriptive epithets which are recommended at least by ready intelligibility. In composition, however, Latin fails, and naturalists are often driven to employ Latin radicals with Greek terminations or other barbarous forms of Greco-Latin hybridism.

Proper names, also, have contributed largely to the vocabulary of natural science, of industry, of commerce, and of fine and mechanical art. Organisms and minerals new to science are named after the discoverers, or after eminent naturalists. Many species of goods derive their names from the city or country from which they are imported, and various articles of familiar use have been christened after the first introducer. One of the oddest examples of this sort is that of cudbear, a powder prepared from certain species of lichen and used in dyeing, which is said to be so called because Cuthbert Gordon first brought it into notice.

The adoption of Greek, by general consent, as the philological basis of scientific nomenclature would have the advantage of making the philosophical dialect of modern times a universal language, an advantage very poorly compensated by the supposed convenience and fitness of a special coinage of domestic technical terms, in languages admitting the process, which the Germans, the Dutch, and the Danes have carried to so absurd a length.

I have discussed this subject in the eighth and ninth lectures of my course on the English language, and it will, perhaps, not be thought altogether irrelevant to the subject to introduce here some additional observations on the extravagance just referred to.

The practice of the Greeks has been appealed to in justification of the formation of modern scientific terms from native roots; but it must be remembered that the Greeks had no still more ancient repository of words common to the whole civilized world to draw from, and they, of necessity, employed the only material they possessed, namely, the familiar everyday words of the market and the fireside, as elements of a distinctive nomenclature. There is a still better reason for departing from their example. In the days of Aristotle physical science had not been organized, and the philosophical conceptions of genus, species, and their distinctions by fundamental characteristics can scarcely be said to have existed. Natural history was little better than appellative—a mere mode of cataloguing—and indeed it hardly advanced beyond that stage till after the time of Linnæus. Objects in all the kingdoms of nature were distinguished by external characteristics, just as in rude stages of society, and especially in a sparse population, men were named from their occupations, from some conspicuous incident in their lives, some deformity or other special feature of their physical structure, from their favorite weapon, or some habitual mode or article of dress. All nomenclature, in short, whether of persons or of things, was descriptive. But when society advanced in numbers, it was found that pictorial or representative epithets were susceptible of application to so many individuals that they ceased to be distinctive, and as society advanced in refinement it became distasteful to be reminded, by one's name, of his defects or other singularities of figure, of his personal habits, or his former humble occupation or that of his ancestors. When, in the village of Newbridge, the wants of an increased population required the services of ten smiths instead of one, John Smith became almost a common name instead of a professional appellation, and the first of that calling who rose to the proprietorship of a seignory assumed the style of John of Newbridge, or John Newbridge, instead. So when geology associated itself with mineralogy, and mineralogy again with chemistry; when zoölogy and botany enlisted the aid of animal and vegetable anatomy and physiology, and, consequently, species and characteristic distinctions of species were almost infinitely multiplied, a descriptive nomenclature became inapplicable from the very poverty of language; for all the tongues of many-voiced man could not furnish descriptive epithets to individualize the species of plants alone. Hence, as ordinary speech, originally imitative, or at least sensuously representative, has now everywhere become arbitrary, as family names have ceased to have any but a conventional application, so the vocabulary of science must conform to the same law, and content itself with a positive instead of a reasoned nomenclature. No word in the dialect of modern science has been more readily or more universally accepted, none has rendered better service, than gas. Etymologists, ignorant of the history of this word, and observing a certain resemblance between it and the German geist, Dutch geest (spirit), have fancied that it was cognate with these words; but there is not the least reason to suppose that Van Helmont, the inventor of it, had either geist or geest in his mind when he coined it. He makes no allusion to them in proposing the new term, but treats it as a pure suggestion of his own imagination.

Besides all this, the swift progress of knowledge is constantly rendering that which seemed an appropriate designation yesterday entirely inapplicable and even misleading to-day. The vocabulary of science must follow the course of personal nomenclature and become, at last, as arbitrary and conventional as the names of families or individuals. In spite, therefore, of the sound philosophy which in general predominates in the material science of the Gothic nations, their scientific nomenclature is eminently unphilosophical, and is suited only to the very infancy of knowledge. But even if we admit that a descriptive nomenclature is sound in principle, the practical application of the principle must always be exceedingly vague and uncertain from the want of any criterion of selection between the multitude of characteristics which every new object apparently presents. Some illustrations of this will be found in the lectures above referred to, and I will offer at this moment only a single additional exemplification, the new names proposed by Oersted, whose high claims as a physicist will be disputed by none, for hydrogen and oxygen. The Germans had adopted instead of these convenient names words of similar compositionfrom native roots, Wasserstoff, waterstuff, and Sauerstoff, sourstuff. These the Danes had translated into the etymological equivalents vandstof and suurstof, the former indicating a certain substance, supposed to be a simple body, as the principal constituent of water, the other another substance, also assumed to be simple or elementary, as the acidifying principle in sour fluids or solids. To Oersted these nicknames—for they are no better—did not seem sufficiently "descriptive," and he sought in these substances qualities more exclusively characteristic as the ground of new self-interpreting designations. Hydrogen is eminently inflammable. Accordingly, Oersted proposed to name it brint, a noun coined by himself from the Danish verb at brænde, to burn. Oxygen on the other hand, is eminently promotive of combustion or burning, and, in fact, the presence of oxygen is a necessary condition of the phenomena of burning as ordinarily manifested. To oxygen the philosopher gave the name of ilt, coined from the Danish noun ild, fire, and, accordingly, these two so unlike substances are known in his nomenclature by names derived indeed from different roots, but both expressing the same radical idea, namely, combustion, as the reason of the appellation. Can it possibly be supposed that the Danish pupil in chemistry arrives at a nearer approximation to the scientific conception of hydrogen and oxygen by the use of two words suggesting the same image and involving the same notion?

Fortunately, the modern form of our rigid English does not readily lend itself to this learned toying and trifling, and we shall retain hydrogen and oxygen until plain common sense brings Northern Europe back to them. At the same time, it must be admitted that where a term is meant to express obvious sensible forms or properties only, instead of some hidden and mysterious quality or essence, the use of words really descriptive and derived from familiar and humble roots is less objectionable. Thus, it may be argued that horseshoe, as an epithet indicative of the form of the Saracenic arch, and watershed in geography, expressing purely tangible and visible forms, are at once self-explaining, picturesque, and free from all danger of misleading those who use them into false theory or erroneous scientific notions. But these cases are at best but exceptions—exceptions, too, of the kind which proves the rule; and, after all, nothing would really be gained by employing these terms in place of Greek or even purely arbitrary names, if such had ever been adopted to designate the same objects.

It is obviously desirable, for a reason already suggested—universality, namely, of the scientific dialect—that some common source of terms for individualizing the objects of natural knowledge should be agreed upon by the general consent of the scientific world. Greek has, as has already been pointed out, advantages for this purpose which no other language possesses. Doubtless, as in the case of hydrogen, oxygen, and the like, technical terms forged from Greek material would, when first introduced, attempt description, but their etymology would never be familiar enough to have the vulgar suggestiveness of such words as waterstuff, sourstuff, chokestuff, and the other puerilities of a nomenclature which may be suited for the nurseries and infant asylums of science, but ought to be abandoned as soon as the pupil advances beyond the baby-jumper and the go-cart.

Although in the revolutions of science a Greek nomenclature apparently truly descriptive at the time of its introduction would soon be found to be based on partial knowledge or mistaken theory, it would not need, when once established, to be rejected for that reason, for its inapplicability would not continually force itself upon men of science, as in the case of terms coined from trivial radicals of their own household tongue. The first of the Browns, living in a smoky cabin, acquired an olive tint which gave him his name. When his children improved the draught of the chimney and indulged more freely in ablutions, it was discovered that the complexion of paterfamilias was only skin deep, and did not pass by inheritance; but the family name was retained, and nobody is now perplexed by hearing a blonde young lady addressed as Miss Brown, or a tall gentleman saluted as Mr. Short.

The Greek term would become no longer the designation of some single quality once erroneously supposed to be characteristic of the substance, but a conventional expression, a technical symbol representing the sum of all that science has yet taught respecting the object to which it was applied, and besides to those who know its etymology it would serve as a document in the history of philosophical opinion, a mile-stone in the path of knowledge.

To the employment of proper names of discoverers to designate genera or species in natural history there is no other objection than the awkwardness of the words which are usually framed from them, a difficulty which might be removed by the diffusion of a little more philological culture among naturalists.

There is still another source from which many scientific terms have been lately borrowed with advantage. I refer to the local terminology of miners, quarrymen, hunters, herdsmen, and other persons obliged by the nature of their daily occupations to distinguish between objects which science has but recently begun to discriminate. Thus geology has borrowed no inconsiderable part of its vocabulary from the native dialect of Cornwall and other districts rich in minerals. Pastoral Russia and Siberia have given us steppe and tundra, the seal-hunters of the Polar Sea have made us familiar with polinje, from Sweden we are introducing fjäll and ăs (or in our orthography os, pl. osar), Arabic wadi is very properly coming into use in geographical description, and the Hispano-American cañon is indispensable as the designation of a new species, if not genus, of ravine.

Hand-books of Iowa and Minnesota, with Maps. Guide Map for Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, etc. By Rufus Blanchard. (Blanchard & Cram, Chicago.)—These hand-books contain, more than any gazetteer, what the emigrant to the North-west would desire to know. The author professes to have travelled extensively over the regions described, and, in Iowa at least, has done so, making careful observations. In matters of which he was not competent to speak he has introduced very respectable authorities and given every proof that he has written in good faith and for the public interest only. We confess to a weakness for books of this character, and having read these with some little attention and a good deal of instruction, we cannot forbear quoting Mr. Blanchard's account of a community which appears to have escaped the notice of Mr. Hepworth Dixon. In the Hand-book of "Iowa," page 45, may be read:

> "Iowa County is noted as being the location of a large and wealthy colony of Germans, settled on both sides of the Iowa river, in the north-west corner of the county. This settlement is in six different groups, each of which resembles a thrifty Western town, substantially built, mostly of brick. The colony is conducted on a community system peculiar to themselves, which, as far as I could learn, no one uninitiated can fully understand. Albeit, they give abundant evidence of pecuniary prosperity, cropping out in broad heaths of waving grain and substantial Dutch barns to store it in. Almost every necessary article of use is manufactured among themselves, leaving them little to buy, while they have much to sell. Do you have a constitution and by-laws to govern your colony? I asked. By-laws—What are they? was the simple reply. The most I conversed with did not seem to see a necessity for any theory, but were quite contented to labor and accumulate wealth, with the certainty that all their physical necessities until death would be attended to. They are a very religious people, mostly Lutheran, with some slight modifications adapted to their isolated condition. Should any marry outside of the colony, they would be excommunicated; but, as a consolation to any adventurous young man who might think one of their cherry-cheeked maidens indispensable to his happiness, I would inform him," etc., etc.

But, for the remainder of this extract, in which the Yankee spirit is pleasantly manifested (by the italics), we must refer the "adventurous young man" to the book itself, only adding that Mr. Blanchard's maps are the best we have seen of the North-west, clearly engraved and as accurate as maps may be of States that grow so rapidly as these.

The Artist's Married Life. Being that of Albert Dürer. Translated from the German of Leopold Scheffer, by Mrs. J. R. Stodart. Revised edition, with Memoir. (New York: James Miller. 1867.)—This book is a reprint of an English translation which has already been before the public several years. The present edition differs in no respect from the preceding, which was also "revised." A little more revision would not be amiss, beginning at the title-page, where the motto of the volume—is ascribed to Fellow; Longfellow it should be. The introduction is superfluous, while the memoir and the translator's preface go over pretty much the same ground. The memoir, however, says that Dürer was born on May 20, 1471; the preface says that April 6 had this great honor. It is a little matter, but it shows carelessness on the part of somebody. The translation is, we doubt not, very fine, considering that it was a first attempt, as in the preface we have due confession. There are many passages which a more skilful hand would probably have rendered more intelligibly. The story is beautiful enough, but very sad. In the main, it is a faithful shadow of the leading facts in Dürer's life. But the child Agnes, whose part is quite important in the little household drama, is a pure fiction, and Dürer's wife is much idealized. Not but that she is represented as the peevish, mercenary, ill-tempered character that she was; but, at the same time, she is represented as loving Dürer with a deep-concealed affection. The power of the story is in the evolution of this twofold character, and in the creed asserted and implied, that for the true artist "a hard life is better than an easy one." But the skeleton facts peep out too visibly through the thin garments that the novelist has thrown loosely over them. The unreality of the book is shown by its continual substitution of monologues in place of conversation. These monologues contain much that is very tender, true, and beautiful. But one of them contains a theory of marriage that is getting to be out of date. According to this theory, the one thing for a wife to do is to obey. She must sink her individuality and become the echo of her husband's taste and will. This is sheer nonsense, and many merits scarcely atone for one such glaring fault.

> "Here, where art was still religion, with a simple reverent heart,

The American Law Review. April, 1867. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.)—This number of the review contains an article on the interesting and difficult question of what acceptance is necessary to take a sale of goods out of the Statute of Frauds; a sketch of the life of Chief-Justice Marshall (by Prof. Parsons); an article upon the new law of Massachusetts by which the testimony of accused persons is received on their own behalf; a review of the power of legislatures over railway charters; an entertaining résumé of the "leading cases" in which law has been made to do service in novels; and the usual compilation of digested cases, notices of law books, and summary of events pertaining to the bar.

The character of the review is well maintained. Its criticisms of men and books are fearless, without being harsh. The original matter is well written, and the digests of cases are carefully prepared. We trust that the enterprise of the publishers is rewarded by the liberal patronage of the profession.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE PROBABILITIES OF WAR IN EUROPE.

IT will make a good deal of difference to the commercial world, at least, in this country whether a great war breaks out in Europe during the coming summer or not. A struggle between France and Germany would raise the price of our produce, lower the price of our bonds, and raise the premium on gold, send home the great mass of our tourists, and produce divers other consequences, social, financial, and even political, too numerous to mention. The chances of the speedy outbreak of such a conflict are, therefore, a very interesting subject of discussion. But when it rests largely with either of two reticent men, both of dark and tortuous counsel, and each wielding the forces of a great empire with but very feeble control or supervision from public opinion, to say when the fight shall begin, or whether it shall begin at all, all efforts to calculate probabilities are, of course, attended with great difficulty, and, what is of more consequence, a boundless field of mischief is opened up to stock-jobbers and sensational reporters and correspondents. We indicated very briefly last week our reasons for thinking that there is, at present, no danger of an outbreak of hostilities between France and Prussia, and that the present tendency to panic on this subject is due to an unscrupulous or reckless use of the Cable by speculators and "enterprising" and imaginative news collectors. Nothing has since occurred to induce us to modify our opinions, and there can be no harm in stating the grounds of it fully, as we are satisfied they will be found sufficient to justify us, even if we should prove hereafter to be mistaken.

It is stated on very good authority that the idea of taking Luxembourg as a counterpoise to possible Prussian expansion in Germany was first suggested to Napoleon by Bismark himself at that early interview at Biarritz before the late war, when Bismark was to the Emperor little better than a troublesome visionary. The probabilities are that the hint made at the time very little impression on the Imperial mind, and that, judging from the calm manner in which the refusal of the Rhine provinces has since been received, we should not now witness the revival of the idea if Napoleon were not goaded into action of some kind by the late assaults of the Opposition in the Corps Législatif. There is feeling enough in France about Prussian aggrandizement to make it necessary that the Government should do something, or appear to be doing something; and the opposition to the new scheme of army organization is so strong that hardly anything but the prospect of a great war at no distant period will carry it through. For the left bank of the Rhine there is no use in asking. It has been refused decidedly and peremptorily; and there is no Frenchman who does not know that an attempt to seize it would be met by the whole of Germany in arms, and resisted to the last man and the last thaler. Of protracted negotiation about that there is no chance. Bismark would not talk about it, and dare not if he would. But about the cession of the Duchy of Luxembourg there is use in talking. That is a small bit of territory, valuable only for its fortress. It has belonged to the house of Nassau since 1815; and although it is thoroughly German, and has furnished more than one wearer of the old imperial crown, and was a member of the Germanic Confederation, the dissolution of the Confederation by the battle of Sadowa has left it more under the control of Holland, stricti juris, than ever it has been before. Moreover, Holland is just now in mortal terror of Prussia. Bismark is the bugbear of both the Dutch King and ministers, who, whatever the material advantages of absorption into the North German Confederation might be, naturally shrink from what would unquestionably be the virtual termination of the Dutch national existence, proud and illustrious as it is. Therefore it is not at all unreasonable for France to hope that Holland may be induced to purchase, by the cession of a patch of land which has for her no earthly value, the protection and alliance of Prussia's great enemy. True, the duchy is already occupied by Prussian troops; the population is almost exclusively German, and it is only amongst the upper classes that French leanings are found; and amongst the mass of German Liberals there would be strong opposition to its transfer to France. The speech of Herr Benningsen, an able and sensible man, in the North German Parliament, of which we received the report last week, reveals this clearly enough. On the other hand, the reply of Count Bismark showed plainly that the Prussian Government does not deny the sovereign rights of the King of Holland over the duchy, does not deny the unwillingness of the inhabitants to enter the German Confederation, and admits that if Prussia interferes at all with the discretion of the Dutch Government in the matter, it should only be after taking counsel of the four other great powers which concurred in the treaty of 1839, by which the duchy was, at the partition of Holland and Belgium, annexed to the former. In short, it is abundantly clear that, however much German sentiment may be opposed to the cession, Prussia does not claim the right of peremptory prohibition; and the whole question is, for the present at least, a debatable one. It affords plenty of ground for any quantity of negotiation; and this we make bold to say is the very thing which at the present moment France needs.

It must be remembered that France has no material advantage to hope for through war with Germany. Jena and Austerlitz cannot be repeated; no Frenchman dreams of it. What France would fight for would be the retention of the leadership in European politics which she has lost by the events of the past year. To fight for this, without having made the victory as sure as organization, arms, numbers, and leaders can make it, would be a piece of folly Frenchmen, with all their impetuosity, are not likely to commit. A defeat in the field now would fix France irretrievably in a second or third-rate position. Whenever, therefore, she challenges Prussia to a struggle for the ascendency, we believe it will be when she is able to put all her resources into the hands of her generals. That hot-headed counsels do not prevail at the Tuileries is, we think, clearly proved both by M. Rouher's reply to M. Thiers and by the recent article in the Moniteur. In fact, it would be very hard to discover the "wild thirst for instant war" anywhere but in the London telegraph offices.

Of course, the expectation of a speedy beginning of the contest is partly based on the supposition that Prussia, knowing it had to come sooner or later, would not wait French convenience, but would at once avail herself of her present superiority of strength to put France hors de combat before she got her army reorganized or rearmed. Those who hold this theory are generally possessed with the idea that Prussia is a military monarchy like Austria, and that Bismark has been so elated with his late success in the field that he now stands ready to engage all comers. The fact is, however, that there is no country in Europe to which war, and, above all, a war of even moderate length, such as a war with France would be sure to be, would prove so burdensome as to Prussia, because in none would so little of the fighting be done by professional soldiers, and so much by men drawn suddenly from all the trades and professions. Other nations hire men to fight; in Prussia the whole community may be said to lay down its tools and go to the field; and no statesman who has to arrest the social machine whenever he mobilizes the army would ever think of doing so with the recklessness or alacrity with which the Emperor Napoleon or the Austrian Kaiser pours his forces into foreign territory to fight for a province or an idea. Prussia, though one of the most warlike of the great European states, has had a more peaceful history than any of them. In fact, from the foundation of the monarchy to the present day, a period of one hundred and fifty years, including the reign of the great Frederick and the wars of the French Revolution, she has enjoyed one hundred and twenty-five years of peace. Of which other of the great powers could this story be told? The last great war, too, cannot in any sense of the phrase be called a war of ambition or of aggression. It was but the expression in action of the desire of the German people for unity; and yet, tempting as the prospect seemed which it opened up to them, the hardships and sacrifices which the struggle seemed likely to entail were such that the popular opposition to it up to the moment when the army took the field was exceedingly fierce and bitter. And as to the prospect of a war of aggression, a war of pride or suspicion or of ambition, or, in fact, a war of any kind except a defensive and a strictly defensive war, we cannot do better than quote the words of a distinguished Prussian Liberal, Professor Sybel, now a member of the German Parliament, addressed last September to M. Forçade, and to which subsequent events have lent every month fresh force:

> "With such an army [the Prussian] incredible things may at any given moment be accomplished; but what cannot be reached through it at any price is a state of prolonged war, such as a dynastic passion for conquest might create. With us the mobilization of the army is a calamity which strikes every farm, every counting-house, every fireside; there is not a single branch of the public service or of industry which the calling out of the landwehr does not touch. The country, you may be well assured, cannot impose such sacrifices upon itself except in supreme crises; our military organization is incomparable for strong defence or for energetic offence of short duration, but it is utterly incapable of serving the purposes of a policy of war and durable conquest. You recommend to the French Government the adoption of our military system. I can assure you that such a measure would be received by all Germany with the greatest joy as a pledge of peace and security."

LEGISLATIVE CORRUPTION.

The legislatures of New York have had for years past an unenviable reputation for corruption, but the present Legislature has attained a bad pre-eminence in this respect. The sessions of 1857, 1860, 1863, and 1865 were scandalous to a degree that could hardly be surpassed, yet all accounts agree in representing that bribery is more flagrant at this session than ever before. A few voices protest that the bribes are really consumed by the lobby, and do not reach the legislators themselves; but this is a poor excuse, amounting only to this: that the Legislature, though honest itself, blindly obeys the wishes of corrupt men. It requires more faith than we can command to believe that a body of men should allow themselves to be controlled by a lobbyist whom they know to be heavily bribed without asking any share of the bribe for themselves.

The evil has been longer and more deeply seated in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania than in the other States, though it is spreading over the whole country. It is notorious that no measure can ever be carried through the New Jersey Legislature without the consent of the Camden and Amboy Railroad corporation, nor through the Pennsylvania Legislature without the consent of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company. Those great corporations own the legislatures of their respective States, and can pass or reject bills at their pleasure. The New York Central Railroad Company has long exercised a powerful, though not undisputed, control over the legislation of its State, and its power is constantly increasing. In some of the Western States the influence of great corporations is plainly visible, and the tendency of the legislatures to general corruption is proportionably apparent.

Corruption does not necessarily or exclusively take the form of pecuniary bribes, though these are becoming more and more common. A member of the Legislature has almost always from one to a dozen pet measures upon the success of which his political future may depend. He soon finds that he can do nothing with these, however just they may be, without pledging his support to other schemes which may not commend themselves to his judgment. Thus he is driven to take the first step in trading his vote, and soon finds himself ensnared into the support of bills which he knows to be opposed to the public good. Having gone so far, it is plausibly urged upon him that, since he must sacrifice the public interest, he might as well gain some little private advantage. And having once voted for a bill because of a "friend" in it, or in the expectation of a share in its profits, it is easy to take the next step and accept a direct bribe. In this way many respectable men who commence public life with a horror of bribery gradually sink into habits of corruption.

The rapid growth of this evil does not necessarily prove that we are inherently worse than our ancestors. Fifty years ago there were few men or corporations of great wealth in America. Bank charters were almost the only prizes for which it was worth while to bribe a legislature; and it is matter of familiar history that these were granted upon terms as corrupt as the franchises of horse railroads are at the present day. Wealth has rapidly increased among us. Legislatures have the power of granting privileges immensely valuable, and great corporations, or men who, like Vanderbilt or Law, are corporations in themselves, are eager to purchase such privileges. They can better afford to offer $50,000 for a grant than their fathers could afford $1,000. Their agents crowd about the legislature, sometimes co-operating, sometimes competing with each other. Meanwhile the State legislatures are composed of men who are in the main no wealthier, relatively to the present condition of society, than the legislators of fifty years ago. Indeed, the growing urgency of business has drawn the most prosperous classes out of politics; so that legislatures consist chiefly of small farmers, village lawyers, and city adventurers living by their wits. To all such, the offer of $100 for a vote is a sore temptation, and a profit of $1,000 a session is more than they hope to make during the rest of the year.

The existence, extent, and gravity of the evil are scarcely disputed by any one. None dilate upon it more than professional lobbyists; since the more thoroughly their clients are convinced of the avarice of legislators, the greater will be their readiness to advance fees, of which the lobbyists retain the lion's share. But there is more impartial evidence than that of these men, and all the testimony on the subject is substantially one way. Indeed, the reckless grants of valuable franchises without reserving any compensation to the State or any protection to the people, the obstinate resistance offered to measures of the clearest merit, the sway which men having nothing but money exercise over legislatures, are utterly inexplicable on any other theory than the existence of wholesale corruption.

The great question is, What remedy can be applied with reasonable hope of success? Many remedies have been tried and have failed. One or two new ones are now suggested, which at least deserve consideration. The first is a great increase in the number of every legislature thus infected. The Legislature of New York consists of 32 senators and 128 assemblymen, all chosen by single districts. It has been found easy to control a majority of these bodies, and even to obtain a two-third vote when necessary. But it would not be so easy to control a Senate of 64 or 100 members, and an assembly of 300. Massachusetts has all the elements of corruption which New York has, with the additional temptation of a party majority so strong as to be impregnable; yet we have never heard its Legislature charged with subjection to corrupt influences. Its lower branch has 240 members, and formerly had over 400.

A return to the old system of election by counties is also strongly urged, as likely to secure a higher grade of members, and not without reason, as the list of candidates for the New York convention shows. The delegates are elected in groups of four, and in almost every district one or two of the four are very strong men whose reputation is depended upon to elect their associates. But the system of election by counties on a general ticket would put into the Legislature none but Democrats from one end of the State of New York, and none but Republicans from the other end, unless some plan for giving a representation to the minority were adopted. If this were done, all our objections would be removed. Thus, if New York city elected thirty assemblymen, an elector voting for only ten members might be allowed to give each of them three votes by marking a desire to that effect on his ballot. One who voted for only five might give to each six votes, and so on. In this manner the advantages of an election by the whole county might be secured without depriving the minority of representation.

On the same principle the State might be divided into eight Senate districts, as it was before 1847, and eight or ten members be chosen from each. This would relieve senators from the dictation of local politicians, which is rarely exercised for good purposes, while it would bring into service men of high standing without depriving younger men of an opportunity to come in upon their merits.

An extension of the rule forbidding special legislation where general laws are possible would undoubtedly do some good. Bad as affairs are in New York, they would be far worse if the Constitution of 1846 had not laid restrictions upon special charters. A similar but more stringent rule should be applied to legislative grants of all kinds to the utmost practicable extent.

The suggestions here made mainly refer to the State of New York, in which a Constitutional Convention is soon to be held. But the same principles apply to all States. Pennsylvania is probably in a worse condition than New York, the Legislature there being smaller, more easily purchasable, and more habitually corrupt. The Western States will do well to take warning in time, and not run the risk, through a mistaken economy, of bringing the same evils upon themselves.

OUR LOVE OF LUXURY.

THE anecdote related of the King of Prussia in another column will probably astonish a great many republicans who think the free spending of money one of the essential attributes of royalty. The fact is, however, that in this age wild and reckless expenditure, without rhyme or reason in it, is now more frequently seen in republican circles than in royal or aristocratic ones. Until within the last forty years the wealthiest class in the greater portion of the civilized world has always been the landholding class, and one of the peculiarities of this class has always been the uniformity and even monotony of the lives of its members. Their income was generally fixed and varied very slightly from year to year. They were exposed to no striking or extraordinary vicissitudes; most of the calamities which afflicted other people, except wars and revolutions, did not affect them. The calm of their existence and the certainty and invariability of its revenues were, of course, very favorable to the formation of fixed habits, of fixed ways of dressing, eating, going about, and spending money, which naturally came down from generation to generation. The result was that they were not, on the whole, an extravagant class. They have in most countries become impoverished, but only in one or two, Ireland and Poland, through sheer waste of money. In others they have been borne down by political troubles, and by the difficulty of providing for the younger members of families, owing to their rigid exclusion from the privilege of earning their own bread by any kind of honest labor except military service. Everything considered, we believe that the landed aristocracy of every old country would be found to have been on the whole a careful, prudent, and thrifty body of persons, resisting the influences of idleness, of imperfect education, and the temptation to display as a means of impressing "the lower orders" with great persistence and, on the whole, great success.

It has, however, ceased to be the richest class of the community. The English lord or Russian prince is no longer the fat goose which the Continental hotel-keepers long for and love to pluck. The animal now generally presents himself in the shape of an American or English cotton-spinner or contractor or inventor or trader. But then the rich European of the commercial class is a good deal influenced in his mode of spending his money by the example of his aristocratic neighbors. Of late years the landed aristocracy, finding they were ceasing to be the richest portion of the community, and that in mere external display, whether of equipages or clothes or furniture or plate, large numbers of people who have made their money in trade find no difficulty in outshining them, have affected great sobriety in all these particulars. A duke's carriage and harness are now pretty sure to be amongst the plainest to be seen in any crowd of equipages; and the duke himself, instead of going about in pink or blue satin, belaced, beruffled, and bespangled as his great-grandfather did, is probably one of the most quietly dressed men to be seen in street or park.

Of course this influence is only an imperfect one; on the Continent particularly, where the line between the nobles and bourgeoisie is strongly drawn and cannot be rubbed out even by wealth, it is very imperfect; but still it exercises some influence. Moreover, it is so difficult in the Old World to make a large fortune that very few men do it without undergoing a good deal of discipline and chastening in the process, and without having their imaginations tamed, their desires cooled, and their nerves a little shaken, so that when they reach the summit of their ambition they are apt to be willing enough to sit down and live as they have always lived. In America, however, men reach great wealth every year in the full vigor of their powers, and without having any models before their eyes for imitation, and without having lost on the way a particle of their energy, and with an untamable desire to "enjoy their money." This is generally no easy matter, and the devices by which they seek to extract pleasure from "the pile" are amongst the most amusing and singular phenomena of our time, and it is the oddity of these devices, particularly as practised in this city, and the somewhat lavish expenditure of money by Americans travelling in Europe, which have created and spread abroad the notion so prevalent both here and abroad that Americans are a wildly extravagant people. This impression is strengthened, too, by the dismal outcry which one of our leading newspapers makes every year over the enormous amount we spend in "foreign luxuries," silks, wines, and so forth, and the sapient assertion which it makes year after year that we are running in debt to Europe for them.

Now the fact is that, judged by the only rational test of economy, the difference between income and expenditure, the Americans are the most economical people in the world. There is a popular fallacy that extravagance in living is good for trade, and that the poor are helped by rich men's spending a good deal in food and drink and clothes and plate. Every cent spent in any of these things is, however, on the contrary, subtracted from the national capital, as if not spent in this way it would, if left in bank or invested, be used in employing productive labor. But it is also a fallacy to suppose that the nation as a whole spends more in luxuries than it can afford to spend. When wiseacres run down to the Custom-House, examine the tables of imports, and come back wringing their hands over the general extravagance, they forget that, although silks and satins are imported or manufactured in bales and boxes, they are intended to be cut up into single dresses, and are bought by individual women who, as a general rule, know how much they can afford to lay out on such things, and lay out this and no more. At the bottom of two-thirds of the lamentations we hear about the luxury of the times there is the feeling that nearly everybody is living beyond his means. The truth is there is hardly anybody who does not live within his means. Political economists have called man "an exchanging animal;" they might with almost as much accuracy call him a saving animal. It needs very little reflection to see that if the majority of people, or any but a very small minority, spent more than, or even as much as, they earned, the growth of wealth in every country would cease altogether, and not only this, but positive decline would soon begin. Every house and church and bridge and road and aqueduct and work of art and ornament and book in the United States is due to the general habit of saving something out of the yearly income. The enormous increase in the total wealth of the country which is recorded in each census report is due to the same cause. In fact, there is nothing which people do more generally, more zealously, more eagerly, and more anxiously, than save; there is no instinct in human nature, except the parental instinct, stronger than the instinct of accumulation. Therefore, when we take up the Custom-House returns, and read that this year and last year we bought an enormous quantity of champagne and diamonds and lace and silks and pictures, it is very absurd to rush to the conclusion that we are ruining ourselves and getting these things on credit. These things are brought over for the use of separate families, and these families will not, as a general rule, spend one cent more on them than their income allows them to spend, after meeting all debts, dues, and demands and making a comfortable provision for the future. We should never think of walking into Stewart's store on Broadway and rebuking the ladies we saw there buying expensive dresses, on the ground that they were purchasing things they could not afford; and yet this would be the same folly, on a smaller scale, of which an editor is guilty when he berates the nation at large on this ground for purchasing "foreign luxuries." The process which is witnessed every day at Stewart's is going on in every other town and village. Men and women who find that they have money to spare, go and spend it in the nearest store on dress or jewellery or food, which they do not absolutely need, but which they do not choose to do without. However, let business become "dull," or, in other words, incomes diminish, and forthwith a great portion of the outlay ceases. The mass of people, not being "born naturals," on seeing their surplus dwindle, begin to save more zealously than ever, and cut off all superfluous outgo. Gentlemen who write moral articles on luxury in the newspapers flatter themselves that their warnings are necessary to bring about this result. This is a mistake. People save in hard times without hints from the newspapers, just as naturally as they put up their umbrellas when it begins to rain. When they begin to retrench, of course the sale of luxuries begins to fall off and importers cease to import. Some importers, of course, are pretty sure to be caught with a large stock on hand; but this is the result of their own imprudence or want of foresight.

Whether it is well for people, even for those who have money to spare, to spend money in luxuries, is another question which has been discussed for four or five thousand years. In the ancient world luxury was the horror of the philosophers, and in the earlier ages of Christianity it was the horror of the fathers of the Church, whose indignation never glowed with so fierce a flame as when they denounced it. It is becoming the fashion in our day to think that both were mistaken; but we confess we do not think they were. In the ancient world both moral and intellectual culture were in so low a stage that luxury almost always assumed the form of gross sensual and selfish indulgence, which was gratified at any cost of suffering to others, and there was hardly any wealth which was not the result either of plunder or unrequited toil. Whenever any community of that age grew in wealth, it was almost always as the result of conquest; and the pleasures of the great were apt to bear a very strong resemblance to the orgies of a bandit's cave. And we do not deny that luxury in our own day, in any community or set or circle which has not been prepared by moral and intellectual culture to place a just value on merely material comfort, and to make it what it should always be, the accompaniment or casing merely of more subtle, more refined, and more lasting enjoyment, is apt to be about as repulsive as luxury in the days of Sardanapalus or Lucullus. There are circles in Paris and in this city of New York whose pleasures, if they were not surrounded and held in check by a Christian public opinion, would become as animal, and would display as little evidence of sentiment or taste, as any which disgraced the Lower Empire. But then to the luxury to which the great mass of the people both here and in Europe treat themselves, and to the measure in which they enjoy it, no just objection can be made. The end of labor and the end of economy and the end of art and science is to promote human enjoyment. If we saved for the mere purpose of heaping up dollars, our industry and forethought, in their moral and social aspects, would be in no respect superior to those of the beaver or the squirrel. We save that we may enjoy—that we may have the means of gratifying all innocent tastes and desires, for the delight of our senses, within the limits prescribed by religion and morality. It is, in fact, to the love of luxury that we owe nearly all our progress in civilization. It is it which keeps art and invention alive and busy, and gives each generation nearly every material advance on its predecessor; for it must not be forgotten that the luxuries of one age are the necessaries of the next. If we destroyed it, we should destroy what is in our day and generation, and must have been in all times of progress, the great spring of human activity.

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, March 22, 1867.

A MATRIMONIAL alliance worth a passing mention, as showing how "the ends of the earth" are being brought together by the increased facilities of inter-communication which form one of the most characteristic features of the day, is that of a young widow of this city, daughter of a defunct architect, a Frenchman, who began life as a teacher of French in London, where he had the honor of assisting the late Richard Cobden to the knowledge of the French tongue which he afterwards turned to such good account for both nations, with the grandson of no less a potentate than the Sultan Muley-Soliman, Emperor of Morocco, Prince Abdallah-El-Gueunaorï. The father of the new Princess Gueunaorï made a good income by his teaching, and, having married a thrifty English wife, invested his savings in the wild land outside the now vanished Barrière de l'Etoile, which was then the limit of Paris in the direction of the Arc de Triomphe. Having become the owner of a large part of the waste land which has now become the Avenue d'Eylau, the ex-teacher of French built a couple of handsome houses, from which, even at the comparatively low rate of rents then prevailing in a region but vaguely known to the Parisians, he got an income that covered the costs of his land. As the ground, on the extension of Paris by the pushing back of its "barriers," has since risen enormously in value, the family of Mr. Cobden's old professor are now many times millionaires; and it is one of these ladies—a young, charming, and unencumbered widow, whose first "wentur" was a baron, who died soon after his marriage—that has now become the granddaughter of the Emperor of Morocco!

The leading events of the Parisian world during the past fortnight have been M. Thiers's great speech in the legislative chamber—as usual, a fine "wind-bag;" the performance of Verdi's new work, "Don Carlos," at the Grand Opera; that of Ponsard's drama of "Galileo" at the Gymnase Theatre; and of that of Alexander Dumas, Jr., "Les Idées de Madame Aubray," at the same brilliant temple of scenic fiction.

The excitement created by the new plays of the two eminent dramatists has been about equal in both cases. The Emperor and Empress went early to both, were among the most energetic in their demonstrations of satisfaction, and remained in both cases to the very end. "All Paris" was at both in its most splendid toggery, and the enthusiasm of the crammed and brilliant auditory was equally roused by both. Critics object to the first that the Galileo of the popular author of "Les Vieux Garçons" is not the Galileo of history, but they admit that, assuming the illustrious astronomer to have been in private life the exalted hero of M. Ponsard's imagining, nothing could be more magnificent, in its way, than the drama in which he figures as the principal personage.

In regard to the last triumph of the author of "La Dame aux Camellias," the myriad-headed monster which makes and unmakes the artistic reputations of the day has but one voice as far as concerns the talent, the charm, the scenic skill, and brilliant imagination displayed in the development of the ideas of which the new play is the vehicle. In regard to the ideas themselves, though considered as "utopian," "socialistic," and quite out of reach of the practical acceptance of humanity in the present stage of the world's progress, they are admitted to be fine, generous, and noble. The new piece is thus a great success, and its appearance ranks as one of the leading events of the season. On the fall of the curtain the author was called for with the most enthusiastic demonstrations, and as Alexander Dumas, Jr., having no taste for ovations, had modestly hidden himself and refrained from appearing, the house turned to the box from which Alexander Dumas, Sr., with his daughter, had witnessed the new triumph of their relative, and gave vent to its enthusiasm by shouting "Vive Alexander Dumas, the son!" "Vive Alexander Dumas, the father!" "Vive all the Dumas, from generation to generation!" The elder Dumas, who adores his son and is extremely proud of him, and who also greatly delights in ovations, was radiant with satisfaction at this demonstration; and being surrounded, as he descended the steps of the theatre on his departure from the house, by a crowd of applauding friends and acquaintances, was near being beguiled, by the depth of his emotions, into a speech. In fact, he had just opened his mouth and apostrophized those about him as "My dear friends! my children!" when his son, shooting out of the house, in his desire to escape the congratulations of his friends, much as a bomb does from a cannon, encountered his father, and put a period to his incipient eloquence by clasping him round the neck and kissing him, and then leaping into the carriage that was waiting for him and driving away before the assembled crowd had had time to recognize him. Whereupon the elder Dumas, with an expressive wave of his hat, hastened to get into his coupé, with his daughter, and followed his son's example by driving off without further delay.

But if public opinion is unanimous in praising the two brilliant dramas now alternating on the affiches of the Gymnase, a word war has been raging here as to the merits of Verdi's new opera. The truth of the matter is that Verdi, infected by the Wagnerian virus, has tried hard in "Don Carlos" to turn a deaf ear to the melodic prompting of his genius, and to produce, instead of music properly so-called (that is to say, the result of musical science employed in giving a harmonious body to a divinely-inspired soul of melody), an imitation of the pompous cacophonic emptiness for whose glorification the bewitched young King of Bavaria is actually building in his little capital, at Wagner's suggestion and according to the plans drawn for the building by Wagner himself, a "Wagner-Theatre" that is to cost between six and seven millions of francs! Every now and then Verdi's genius has been too strong for the fetters by which he has tried to confine it, and has burst forth in lovely airs, delicious duos and trios, and glorious choruses, equal to anything that has ever issued from the teeming brain of the most fertile of operatic composers. The whole of the third act is magnificent, an admirable sequence of the most charming musical creations from beginning to end, equal if not superior to anything he has ever written. The rest of the work (in five acts, be it remembered!) is a dreary mass of mere noise, shapeless, colorless, soulless, worthy in all respects of the wind-bag of "science, falsely so-called," whose hollow inflation Verdi has unwisely been striving to ape. The admissions of friends, as well as the denunciations of foes, will probably not be without their effect on the brilliant genius which, if only true to itself, may justly claim the foremost rank among the operatic writers of the Italy of to-day. Before leaving Paris Verdi entrusted to one of his friends the work of cutting down the Wagnerian portions of "Don Carlos," and the opera, like the leaves of the Sibyl, becomes shorter with every successive representation. People go in crowds every night in time to hear the beautiful third act, unceremoniously leaving the fourth and fifth to be played, like the first and second acts, to empty benches.

The excitement of the opera-going world on the first night of the new work was unprecedented even in the annals of Parisian dilettanteism. For days beforehand every place was taken, and as the hour of opening drew on, two hundred francs and even larger sums were given for single places. Boxes innumerable changed hands to the tune of a thousand francs, and just before the time for beginning one hundred and fifty francs were joyfully paid for standing room. The Imperial pair, with a brilliant court, were in the house before the first note of the new work was struck; the Emperor in ordinary evening dress, the Empress in white muslin, but her head and neck ablaze with diamonds so magnificent that they seemed to light up everything about her. Every part of the house was crammed, with the exception of the box of the Marquis du Halley-Coëtquen, a man of high birth and fashion deceased a few hours previously, a noted duellist, who, as a matter of fashion, had rented the same box for many years, showing himself in it regularly every evening for a few moments, but who, it is believed, never heard the whole of any opera in the entire course of his life.

The speech of the historian of the First Empire, who is so hearty a hater of the Second Empire, created fully as great an excitement as the first representation of "Don Carlos." More than ten thousand demands for places in the Strangers' Gallery were sent to the President of the Chamber, Count Walewski; over five hundred similar prayers are said to have been addressed to a single member of the legislative body! Of the lucky applicants who obtained the tickets so eagerly sought after, many passed the night and the early hours of the morning at the doors of the building in order to make sure of obtaining eligible places, just as, by a curious coincidence, people were doing in London, at the same time, at the doors of the House of Commons, in their wild desire to be present at Disraeli's exposition of the intention of the present Government in regard to reform; and, as was done in London, larger prices were paid for tickets to persons willing to sell than were ever before known to be paid for a similar purpose. Of course neither the Emperor nor the Empress was present at a speech which it was known would be covertly aimed against the Imperial dynasty; but all the princes and princesses of the reigning house were there, with as many of the lions and lionesses of the day—diplomatic, official, literary, artistic, and financial—as could be squeezed into place within the four walls of the building. The speech, very splendid as a piece of oratory and occupying four hours in its delivery, was a mere iteration of the one idea of its distinguished author, to wit: that the glory and aggrandizement of France is and should be the one sole aim of French statesmen, and that the glory and greatness of France is lessened by the growth of her neighbors; and that, therefore, the first duty of all French governments is the prevention of such growth; the summing up and conclusion of the orator being that the Emperor Napoleon has weakened France and dimmed her glory by not preventing Italy and Germany from constituting themselves respectively into a powerful nation upon her borders. M. Thiers, of course, never stopped to explain by what means the Emperor could have prevented the events in question, nor to remind his hearers that France is herself a mere agglomeration of former jealous and hostile tribes, the result of just such a nationalizing process as is now converting into two homogeneous and powerful nations the peoples of the fair southern peninsula and the long divided Vaterland. After the blowing of this soap and water through the pipe-stem of his "fixed idea," amidst the tokens of admiration elicited by the skill with which he performed the feat and the iridescent eloquence with which he adorned his bubble, the ex-minister who did so much towards achieving the overthrow of his royal master hurried off to his home, where he dined in great haste, and then drove to the office of the Moniteur, where, rolled in warm flannel, and comforted with basins of hot soup, he passed the night in correcting the proofs of his oration, as he did after his great speech of last session, with the difference that last year he got back to his home by three o'clock in the morning, whereas this time he did not get home till seven. M. Thiers, who at seventy-four is the adored husband of a young and wealthy wife, and is equally adored and petted by his mother-in-law, lives "in clover" in his beautiful hotel of the Place St. Georges. His study is the most delightful place of its kind conceivable; an oblong room, whose many windows open upon a gallery looking out upon a garden so skilfully laid out and planted that it produces the effect of a park. Clumps of trees and shrubbery, fountains and statues, and in the centre a fine old tree, up which climb a mass of creeping plants, add to the illusion, and seem to transport you from the densely populated and noisy quarter which you quitted on entering the house into the very depths of the country. This study is a happy blending of the library, picture gallery, and curiosity shop. Masses of books, pamphlets, plans, and atlases; copies in water-colors of Michael Angelo, Raphael, Titian, and the other great lights of Italian art; marbles, bronzes, and artistic objects from every corner of the world, adorn the room in which M. Thiers has received so many distinguished visitors of every nationality.

M. Berryer's study, less sumptuous, but occupied by him for forty years, is threatened with demolition, to the intense grief of the aged barrister, who says that it would take him twelve months to get his pamphlets and books into order, and plaintively asks, "What amount of indemnification could compensate me, at my age [he is over eighty], for the loss of a year of my life?"

M. Victor Cousin, who was equally attached to his rooms at the Sorbonne, has left his magnificent library to that ancient seat of learning, with a handsome sum of money for keeping it up, on the express condition that his beloved books shall never be removed from the equally beloved rooms in which they have been gradually collected, studied, and enjoyed by their late owner.

CRETE.

Canea, March 10, 1867.

One month from to-day ends the first year of the great Cretan revolution, the most desperate, apparently unequal, and eventful of all the struggles for freedom which that pugnacious and much-enduring people has passed through since the fall of Constantinople. On the 11th of April, 1866, met the nucleus of the assembly which has earned immortality as far as human history can give it. In one sense among the most powerless, in another it has shown itself the most powerful of all legislative bodies, for the implicit and unfaltering obedience of the people to this assembly is truly marvellous. A band of fugitives flying from one mountain fastness to the other, unable to defend itself from direct attack, without money (until very recently), without any command of supplies, often obliged to abandon its enterprises for want of ammunition and provisions, unable to enforce its will in any district of the island, has yet maintained order, directed and controlled the whole population, counteracted all the intrigues of the government, and now compels the diplomatic consideration of the world.

And as conclusion to this glorious episode in the life of the Greek nation we shall be told by the governments that this people cannot be trusted to govern itself, that they have not yet developed the qualities necessary to constitute a stable government, and that they must be relegated awhile longer to a system of political swaddling-clothes and be bolstered and laced and weighted into a deformity according to the pattern set, and then after a few years more, finding that their régime has perverted the noble qualities, sapped the native vigor, and checked the healthy development of the political character of the people, they will find another apology for the continuance of that "protection" which to-day is the cause more potent than any other of the Greek national feebleness. Grant that the Greeks are not yet capable of self-government, how shall they become so? By a course of meddling and marring which shall effectually prevent the nation from following its own bent towards such institutions as they would naturally develop, or by a little judicious letting alone? I know that there are people, who ought to know, who do not see any political future for the Greek race, and while I respect the opinion they hold and express, I beg to differ toto cœlo and on two grounds: 1st, The general characteristics of the race are pre-eminently the coherent qualities, love of national glory, high courage, thirst for intelligence, money-getting, and administrative energy; and 2d, The obstacles against which the little Hellenic kingdom has so far struggled and the amount of meddling and intriguing it has survived satisfies me that there is more political vitality in it than in any race south of Prussia and between the Channel and the Danube, except the Swiss. I am sick and weary of the twaddle of the nameless and numberless who cannot cease to harp on Greek brigandage and demagoguism, as if all of Southern Italy and most of mountainous Spain was not in a state far worse; and as if a worse demagogue than there is in Greece had not a long time governed without serious opposition one of the principal countries of Europe and was not supported by the majority of his subjects unmurmuringly in what he chose to do. Will any man whose memory goes back to the days between Feb., '48, and Dec., '52, pretend that Greece is an anarchy? Will a Frenchman tell us that she is incapable of order? Or will even an Englishman, remembering the Chartist riots, twaddle about the mob of Athens? Can we, looking breathless into the abyss from which eternal wisdom rather than our own virtue saved us, say that there are only in Greece men so lost to all patriotic feeling that they would have sacrificed their country's glory and future to their personal and party ambition, or whose party spirit could endanger the common weal?

I entertain no delusion on the Greek race, or honor dead virtues in the living breed. I do not idealize it a bit. I know the common people to be in general disposed to lying and stealing in a small way, and some of them in a large way, but I know few races of Southern Europe who do not add to these vices others that dwarf them; and I know, too, that the Greeks have, for some three thousand years, had perverted notions of the utility of honesty and conventional notions of truth. But in what they accept as a solemn and binding engagement few people are more strictly responsible.

Captain Boutakoff, of the Grand Admiral, told me a curious case in illustration of this which occurred when he was embarking the families on the coast of Selinos. The old people who came down to meet the boats had been so often deceived by the Turkish ships that they would not believe that the Russians were Russians, and no ocular proof would convince them. They demanded a declaration in writing that they were Russians and not Turks; receiving this, they called to their companions in hiding to come out, when in a moment the whole coast thereabout swarmed with Cretans issuing from clefts in the rocks, caves, bushes, etc., until thousands came down. A Cretan does not feel hurt at your disbelieving his word; but if you won't accept his written declaration, the insult is of the gravest, and rarely merited. The Cretan reverence for an oath or any formal declaration surpasses that of any other nation I know. "I'll give it to you in writing" is the final declaration of the Cretan, and one may generally accept it.

I have been accused of confounding the modern Greeks with the ancient ones, and asking sympathy for them accordingly, and I unhesitatingly plead guilty, but because I do not overrate the latter. I believe they were worse canaille than the moderns, that in no civic virtue did the ancients ever surpass or, perhaps, equal their successors of to-day, and that no more signal proof of the progress of national character can be shown, out of America, than the contrast between the divided and belligerent states of Crete of B. C. 100 and the orderly and united action of the Cretans of to-day. Even in the last great revolution the Cretans would not fight under the "Hellenic" chiefs, while now not a sign of jealousy has so far appeared, though all the military chiefs are from Greece. Corakas follows Coroneos as his lieutenant, and Crearis and Hadji Michali Zimbrakakis; and the whole people, deaf to all allure, respond to every proposition or question, "Annexation to Greece." Is Saul also amongst the prophets? one is disposed to say, thinking of the hundred cities and their century-long wars. I am afraid my accusers got their idea of the ancient Greeks from the friezes of the Parthenon, and that of the modern from the pages of English travellers; about as intelligent judges of the Athenians as of the Illinoisans. I believe the Hellenes were never better in any respect than now, and once were in many respects worse.

The thirst for knowledge is something amazing. A physician of Canéa assured me the other day that he found in Karamia, a village on the borders of Sphakia, a class in French; and, oppressed with taxes as they are, the Cretans still keep up their schools by their voluntary contributions in almost all the villages of the island—a devotion to learning of which, I am sure, no country town out of New England, and few in it, are capable.

And here one strikes the dividing line between the native Mussulmans and Christians. The former rarely read and write, and seem indifferent to schools or any acquisition of information, while the latter are insatiable; the faces of the former wear a heavy, stolid expression, as if without hope and without future, souls being slowly embruted, retrograding. In my journeys in the island before the war I scarcely found a Mussulman village that was not dilapidated and decaying. The Christians are like another race, though only a few generations divide them from the Mussulmans. The latter are sinking into barbarism, the former emerging from it.

The war has given place to a virtual armistice in most parts of the island. The troops, thinned and demoralized, are inefficient, and we shall probably have little to record in future in the way of fighting. The suffering of the families is still great; for, though spring has come (the children are eating the green almonds from the trees at my door), there are few of the comforts of life left here, and many of the people in the island have not seen bread for six months; few have eaten any for three. We have not yet seen the ships of our navy which THE NATION reports as carrying off the families. At one time, one of our ships leading off would have carried the whole fleet in Luda after her—Russian, Italian, Austrian, English—no one durst be the first; none would willingly be the last. Many days we looked and hoped, and the Cretans came to me, like the Ancient Mariner to the wedding guest, button-holing me to know when our ship was coming. Meantime the affair is terminating in another way. Thus far the Porte has gained nothing; the Cretans have lost nothing but their lost ones.

NOTES OF PAINTERS AND PICTURES.

THE LATE WM. H. FURNESS.

THE recent death of Wm. H. Furness, once of Philadelphia and more lately of Boston, is a heavy and a sad loss to those who knew the man or his pictures. It is as an artist that we speak of him here and now; but the personal character of the man is hardly to be forgotten in thinking of the probable future of his art. He was still young, and although what he had done was much, there was promise of greater things in the future. He had given his attention almost entirely to portraiture. His pictures exhibited in the New York spring exhibitions since 1860 have all been worthy of study. The portrait of a lady in the exhibition of 1865 was perhaps the most noticed and most admired; but other portraits have shown as admirable qualities and as great technical skill. He was in many respects the best portrait painter we had. His work showed, what is rare, a respect for his pictures and for his branch of art as profound and as sincere as it could have been had he painted sacred subjects only. But his art was sacred to him as a worthy pursuit which he followed worthily. His strength and his heart were put into every portrait.

We know but little of other work of his besides that which has been publicly exhibited in this city. It would be of great use to the student's art and the community if a collection of his pictures could be made and exhibited at least in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia.

MR. HILL'S ETCHINGS.

Mr. John Henry Hill, a landscape painter, of whose work we have often spoken and always with the greatest respect, has published a set of twenty-five etchings of landscape subject. It is perhaps unnecessary to mention the peculiar advantages of etching over all other forms of multiplying a work of art. But the process is so unfamiliar here that it may be well to remind the reader that this alone of all processes for the reduplication of art is entirely in the hands of the artist himself. The etched plate is as much his own work as a single drawing on paper would be. Nothing is left that other and inferior hands can mar, except as the printing of impressions from the plate may be more or less carefully done. So that if one values the slighter work of an accomplished artist—whether it is the rendering of his minor thoughts, more simple inventions and wayside notes, or whether it is the translation into black and white of his more elaborate work done before—a collection of the painter's etchings is the desirable thing. And it often happens that a great thought finds its first expression on the small plate of copper and in the needle lines brushed with acid. One who buys the etchings of a master is buying his autograph sketches with all the chance of finding wonderful things here and there half hidden from less careful eyes, and the sketches in this form are imperishable.

Of the twenty-five etchings before us one is of a bird and one of a nest and eggs. The rest are all of landscape subject, though they range from an out-of-doors stone oven and a cluster of wild flowers to a distant view of Mount Washington and a twilight scene on the Androscoggin. Some of the pictures will be recognized by those who have looked at Mr. Hill's pictures in the exhibitions. But as he has never exhibited much, and of late years hardly anything, this set of sketches will be the first introduction to his work of many who will love it as it deserves.

Accompanying the plates there are a few pages of letter-press giving brief descriptions and briefer comments. In these few words is curiously and unconsciously shown much of the painter's feeling for nature, and much of his way of looking at nature. It will be useful to any student of drawing to read these two pages carefully and repeatedly.

No publisher's name appears on the pretty title-page etched by the author and bearing a vignette "Scene in the Androscoggin Valley." The words of the title are, "Sketches from Nature by J. Henry Hill, Nyack Turnpike, N. Y."

VERY "POPULAR" ART.

Mr. Charles A. Barry has drawn "five American ideal heads" which have been lithographed in Paris by Lafosse & Fuhre, "the most eminent lithographers in the world." The heads are of life-size. They "are typical of the faces of American women, and represent with infinite fidelity their charities, their devotion, their sympathies, their attachments, and their heroism, and, as pictures, they show most distinctly that artistic skill can no further go."

The circular from which we have gathered the facts and opinions given above mentions no name of publisher. The pictures are offered for sale by peripatetic "agents" at the price of twenty-five dollars for the set of five. We do not know that they have been advertised otherwise than by circular and by personal application, but presents of money are freely offered to writers for the press who will "notice favorably." The lithographs are really very well executed, though they are not at all "surprising" to those who are familiar with fine French work of the kind. They are as good as would need to be if the originals were very much better. The heads have very little expressional or artistic merit. Some are worse than others; the "Color Bearer" in particular is vulgar—what a New Yorker means when he says "Bowery"—and the "Before the Battle" is the weakest one of the lot; but all are weak and commonplace enough. The childish accessories, as the little cream-pitcher held by "The Angel of the Hospital" and the fire-cracker pistol in the grasp of "At the Front," help the pictures to be the toys they are. They belong to the weakest department of "popular" art, harmless except as they represent a waste of labor and money, but wholly powerless for good.

The circular contains short letters of ardent praise from O. W. Holmes, B. P. Shillaber, Harriet Prescott Spofford, H. B. Stowe, Charles D. Warner, and Benson J. Lossing. It is to be hoped that the too common recklessness in giving recommendations of the sort will disappear by-and-by. Among a people rather famous for their self-esteem it ought to right itself.

MR. ROTHERMEL'S "REPUBLICAN COURT."

Eighteen months ago Mr. Huntington's "Republican Court in the Time of Washington" was exhibited in New York, and was described and criticised in THE NATION (Oct. 12, 1865, Vol. I., page 472). Mr. Rothermel has painted a picture called "The Republican Court in the Time of Lincoln," and this second chapter of a sort of history of society at Washington is now on view. It is introduced with less flourish than its prototype, but it has a better claim to be considered a historical picture, for the costume and accessories are a little more authentic. It is also brighter in color than Mr. Huntington's picture, and less disfigured by unnaturalness of gesture and pose. On the other hand, it is less happy in pictorial treatment, and less fortunate in its subject, on account of the extraordinary ugliness of the upholstery and decoration which disfigures the room in which the reception is held.

The portraits are not very striking likenesses. In some instances there is strong evidence that the heads have been studied from photographs and not from nature; thus General Meade and the ex-general McClellan looked a year ago very unlike the portraits of them here, while the photographic portraits of them, on account of the great change made by the reduction of natural colors to chocolate brown, are also very unlike the men and very like Mr. Rothermel's abstractions. So it would have seemed easy to portray General Burnside, whose strongly marked face and head, once seen, can never be forgotten, but the picture seems to us to give a caricature and not a likeness of the beloved governor of Rhode Island. The flesh painting and face painting are very feeble. The picture would hardly bear the light of day and is properly doctored by the glare of gas-light.

WATER-COLOR PAINTING.

We learn from the papers that a Water-Color Society has been established, of which Mr. Samuel Colman is president. It is reported that they propose to have an exhibition next fall, from which we infer that the Artists' Fund Society will be prevented from adorning their galleries with such a collection of water-color drawings as that which they had the good sense and originality to get together last fall. The Artists' Fund Society will have the consolation of having done a world of good to the art of painting in water-colors, in the way of making it a more recognized and esteemed branch of art. It has been very strange to see how indifferent to water-color work, how ignorant of its importance in other countries and of its possible value, the herd of picture buyers, picture fanciers, and picture-sale frequenters has always been in New York. The oil paintings are sold with deliberation and respectful tenderness; the auctioneer and audience "stand 'round" when the more admired pictures are put up; the Churches and Bierstadts, the Schesingers and Frères elicit applause, the bidding is interested and interesting. But with the knocking down of the last canvas all is changed. The grave auctioneer forsakes his throne, two-thirds of the audience retire, there is a rush of the small remainder for the chairs and stools, and a closing up around the stand of exhibition; a sprightly young salesman jumps up on a chair with a "Now, gentlemen, let 's sell these drawings," the bidding is quick and in single dollars and half dollars, the drawings are handed over for what they will fetch in a minute's or two minutes' contest. Successful bidders call out "cash," collar their purchases, and walk off with them. The auction room is a fair test of the popular regard for the fine arts. It is indeed true that water-color drawings are little considered, and are not liked as well as velvet painting and decalcomanie, nor ranked much higher in the order of the fine arts.

It is to be hoped that the influences now at work may bring about a change, and that people may learn to look to painting in water color for those beauties and the rendering of those facts of nature which are so peculiarly its own to give, and which are not within the reach of painting in oil. To the art which is the most successful and generally influential in America, landscape painting, the one medium is as important as the other, each having its own peculiar power and grace.

PRUSSIAN ECONOMY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Yesterday my tailor sent me a waistcoat which had been lengthened. This is not historical, I own; but what it reminded me of appears to me to possess this character.

Prussia is rising in greatness. Prussia is distinguished by Sadowa no more than by her financial system and total absence of extravagance. Well, then, my boyhood fell in the period of Prussia's deepest humiliation and oppression. After the peace of Tilsit, in 1807, the whole country was impoverished to a degree of which our generation has no conception. One day, in the year 1811, when I was a pupil of one of the gymnasia (the royal classical schools) of Berlin, I visited a fellow-pupil of mine, to work with him at our Latin "exercise." He was the son of the King's tailor, and while we were engaged in our learned pursuit the royal tailor entered the room and said: "There, boys, this is your King's waistcoat; it was too short for him, and it has been sent to me to make it longer."

I was but eleven years old. I lived in the midst of scantiness; yet the impression made by Frederick William Third's sending to his tailor an article of dress to be patched seems to have been so strong that the occurrence came back to my mind when my tailor returned my vest in the new-born year of 1867.

It is true that progressive modern civilization and population stand in need of ever increasing wealth. Education, roads, religion, literature, national existence and grandeur, individual safety, the constant changing of rare comforts into common necessities, the wants of existence and of culture—all require increasing amounts of general wealth.

It is equally true that the greatest, the most heroic periods of nations have often proceeded from periods of great poverty and suffering, as the lives of most great men have been preceded by a youth of poverty and suffering, Martin Luther like.

It is equally true that there is nothing so enervating as national and individual extravagance. All nations once great have gone down, in antiquity and modern times, with elaborate cookery, superb furniture, costly pearls, gaudy dresses, and refined licentiousness. Assyria, Rome, France in the last century. Fearful revulsions alone can then resuscitate.

A FRIEND OF "THE NATION" AND THE NATION.

THE NEST-BUILDING APES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

The reviewer of M. Du Chaillu's "Journey to Ashango-land" states very clearly the opposite views entertained by that traveller and myself respecting the use of the chimpanzee's nest. He says it is an umbrella; I say it is a bed. But I am very anxious that naturalists should also understand that it is not only the chimpanzee which builds a nest, but also the gorilla. In the first place M. Du Chaillu has not, to my knowledge, yet allowed that even the common chimpanzee builds a nest. In 1861 he informed us, through his first work, that he had discovered a nest-building ape. It was the nshiego mbouvé, or bald-headed chimpanzee. He distinguished it from all the other apes (the common chimpanzee among the rest) as the nest-building ape. In his "Journey to Ashango-land" it is not the nshiego mbouvê only, but also the nkenko nshiego, or yellow-faced chimpanzee, which builds a nest. These nests, he says, "were somewhat different in form from those I found in my former journey."

Now, one day (in 1862), when walking in the forest in the neighborhood of Goumbi, I saw a large nest, and the natives who were with me said that it was made by the chimpanzee (nshiego). They added that the gorilla (ngina) built one, too, and the next day they took me to see a nest which was built like the other one, only a little larger.

These nests were flat structures; the nest figured in M. Du Chaillu's book is umbrella-shaped. The nests sent to the British Museum I have not seen, but I will venture to assert that they are bed-like nests; that they resemble the nest of the English wood-pigeon on a much larger and wider scale, and that they will not suggest to any unbiassed zoölogical mind the idea of being built to answer the purposes of an umbrella.

The chimpanzee's nest which I first saw was within half an hour's walk, the gorilla's within two hours' walk, of a town in which M. Du Chaillu resided for several months. These are facts which speak for themselves. Professor Owen, also, who has announced this pretended discovery of a nest-building ape, and who defended it lately on the platform of Burlington House, does not come out of the matter with clean hands. No one is better acquainted than Professor Owen with the memoir on the gorilla, by Messrs. Wyman and Savage, which was read before the Boston Society of Natural History in 1847, and afterwards printed in The Journal. He could scarcely have forgotten this passage:

"Their dwellings, if they may be so called, are similar to the chimpanzee, consisting simply of a few sticks and leafy branches," etc. And again, "In the wild state their habits are in general like those of the Troglodytes niger (chimpanzee), building their nests loosely in trees," etc.

I have, therefore, simply confirmed by my own observation a fact of importance in zoölogy, which had been previously asserted by Dr. Savage, the discoverer of the gorilla. The African ape is a nest-building animal. M. Du Chaillu and Professor Owen have done their best to retard the recognition of this fact, and to confuse it with an element of fiction; but it is, happily, one of those facts which can be readily investigated, and when investigated it will be again confirmed.

The Week.

IF the process of reconstruction should be completed satisfactorily during the coming summer, the question of legislative corruption, and, in fact, corruption of all kinds, will probably engage a good deal of attention during the next two or three years. Much appears on this subject in print, but not half what one hears in private. The legislatures of several States—and the number is increasing—are plunging deeper in the mire every year, and the last Legislature in this State is said to have surpassed all its predecessors. In fact, men now go into politics as a rapid mode of making a fortune, and brag of their gains by the sale of their votes without shame or hesitation. The New York Legislature is lucky in having a wealthy city under its thumb, and the way in which it extracts money from the "solid men" here is sometimes very amusing. The Broadway Railroad scheme, for instance, now brings in as regular an income to the members as if they drew it from Government bonds. Every year there is a bill introduced regularly granting authority to make a railroad in Broadway; every year regularly the property-owners raise a fund to resist it; the bill is pressed on; the property-holders send up the money; the parties haggle and bargain, and finally come to terms, and the bill dies. If the same members sat in every legislature, much time and money might be saved by paying them a salary; but, as they change from year to year, special arrangements have to be made with them each session. Moreover, the sin is no longer confined to the legislature. The judges have fallen under suspicion at least, and there is now said to be wholesale corruption in the courts. The bar is afraid to speak of it, and so is the public; for nobody knows the day when he may be in court himself, and be paid off for his love of judicial purity. The great difficulty in the way ot reform is the difficulty of getting the public to believe the facts. The press, as well as orators, have indulged so much in exaggeration of language, that, now that the wolf is really here, nobody believes them. Every rascal has so constantly been the greatest of rascals; every fraud the most gigantic of frauds; so many politicians have been thieves of the deepest dye, and so many judges corrupt politicians, that there are no epithets left to describe the real villains and villanies which are now at last under our noses. And yet something must be done. There is no national enemy like widespread corruption. It is a subtle poison, against which the courage which shines in the field is powerless. To keep Jefferson Davis shut up, or disfranchise Toombs, while some of the politicians of this State are running about with erect and patriotic brow, is a sorry and disgraceful farce. No private individual can face the evil; but we are glad to see that the Union League Club has taken it up; and if it wants to make a clean sweep, it will begin with the law courts in this city, and get a few lawyers to tell what they know about the whole administration of justice, civil and criminal.

THE Senate adjourned on Saturday, leaving, all things considered, very few vacancies to be filled. Nothing has been done about the Austrian mission, but General Rosecrans is now talked of for it. It was hoped that Mr. Johnson would have left Mr. Motley undisturbed, if that gentleman chose to remain; but it appears that this is not to be, and nothing has yet been heard of Mr. McCracken, who has probably been appalled by the disturbance he has created.

THE ease and success with which Senator Wilson is making his tour in the South, besides suggesting some amusing reflections as to the fate which would have overtaken him had he attempted anything of the kind seven years ago, suggest very strongly the propriety of other Northern politicians following his example. There is, in our opinion, not much chance that the Republican party will long retain its hold over the colored voters unless, by some means or other, it keeps itself in constant communication with them either through the press or the platform; and this can only be done effectually through Northern speakers and papers. Moreover, there is no question that Southern whites of Republican tendencies would find their courage quickened and their views enlarged by visits from prominent Northern politicians.

MR. JOHNSON is preparing for another trip, but this time in the South, and will be accompanied, as before, by Mr. Seward. It is to be hoped that both have learned something from the experience of last summer, and that the speeches made on the road will be chiefly devoted to the history of foreign countries and questions of political economy. These subjects are not exciting, and Mr. Johnson can acquit himself very fairly upon them. In discussions of questions of home politics he is neither so clear nor so able. Mr. Seward must be aware that some of the oratorical efforts of the tour of last summer were wanting in perspicuity, although not in force, and perspicuity is the first requisite in a popular oration.

THE election of delegates to the Constitutional Convention of this State passed off quietly on Tuesday, apparently exciting little interest, and the vote was very light. None but Democrats go from this city and Brooklyn; few but Republicans from the rest of the State; but the Convention promises, on the whole, to be an able and honest body. Henry Ward Beecher, we are sorry to say, was defeated in Brooklyn. This is the same Beecher of whom The Tribune said yesterday morning: "We regret that Henry Ward Beecher will not be a member of the Convention, and that the voters of the Second District had so little regard for the claims of independence and ability, so much for those of party." We mention this for the benefit of the clergymen who, according to Mr. Greeley last summer, would sooner have been dead than have been Beecher. They now see the use of living on, even in this vale of tears.

There has been a somewhat amusing correspondence between the insurance companies of this city and the Jews; or, as it is the fashion to call them on solemn occasions—we never exactly knew why—"the Hebrews," touching the refusal of the companies to ensure "Hebrew" property. Mr. J. Lorimer Graham, for the companies, defended them on various high grounds; but the gist of his letter was that the companies have found that German Jews have more ensured property burnt in proportion to their numbers than any other class of the community. A simple statement of this fact is all that an insurance officer need make by way of answer. Neither ethnology nor moral philosophy nor religious toleration has anything to do with the matter. Insurance companies exist not to set examples of liberality or of any other virtue, but to make money; and if they find they cannot make money out of Hebrews, why they must refuse to deal with Hebrews—and there 's an end on 't. Nobody can appreciate the force of an argument of this sort more readily than a gentleman of the Hebrew persuasion.

Messrs. Weed and Greeley have resumed hostilities, and are now exchanging broadsides three or four times a week in the columns of their respective papers. Mr. Weed no longer labors under the disadvantage of having to borrow a medium for his retorts, and now has as much space at his command as Mr. Greeley's case seems to require, while Mr. Greeley, for some unexplained reason, treats "T. W." with unwonted courtesy. The war thus far has reached the year 1837, and the precise point under discussion is Mr. Weed's feelings towards the negro race, as illustrated by his comments in that year on the conduct of William C. Bloss in taking the communion in company with a number of colored persons in a church at Albany. We have no doubt that the period on which the combatants have now entered, 1837 to 1840, will prove unusually interesting, and will furnish many points in the career of these two gentlemen which we should all like to have cleared up. Where Mr. Weed boarded, for instance, in the winter of 1839, or whether he boarded or "kept house," is a question about which this generation knows very little, and on which Mr. Greeley can, no doubt, throw some light.

Dr. Sears, general agent for the Peabody Educational Fund, announces by circular the principles which will govern him in distributing money at the South. The fundamental condition is, that the people there must take the initiative, must show schools already established and needing aid, or an intention and effort to found them worthy of encouragement. Such we felt very sure would be the plan adopted, since it inspires no false hopes or disastrous dependence in those to be benefited, but accords plainly with the tenor of the political "situation" in urging the South to exchange its rebelliousness and vis inertiæ for the active service of liberty, if it would obtain first sympathy and afterwards restoration to political autonomy.

A correspondent of The Times, writing from the Sea Islands of South Carolina, talks very plainly and sensibly of the gross immorality which prevails among the colored people there resident, and says truly that it is an evil which calls loudly for a speedy remedy. One would make a mistake, however, who should suppose this to be an evil entirely or in any great part of recent growth; and this one might be led to suppose by the correspondent's mention of the two plantations which adjoin his, and on which there is scarcely one young woman of more than fifteen years old who is not the mother of an infant—of these natural children the large majority being half white, and born during the war. The fact is that these evil practices may be said to spring rankly from the African character, and to have been cultivated to a very high degree in generations of slavery. The army going to the Sea Islands found there a race the affectional and passional elements of whose nature are probably as well developed as those of any race in the world. And these people had in many cases been, as you may say, paid to gratify their naturally strong appetites by a system of rewards and immunities to the woman whose children were most numerous. Add to this, that the liking for one woman or one man which might in a certain number of cases have kept wives and husbands virtuous, was very often prevented from being operative for good by a decree which forbade any woman to have a "'broad husband," or any man a "'broad wife"—that is, a husband or wife who was not owned by the master and did not live on the plantation. Of course, as soon as the negroes were freed, there was wholesale divorcing going on in all such plantations as these, and before the divorcing there had been plenty of cause for divorcing. In short, slavery conspired with the temperament of the slaves to debauch very completely the manners and morals of the Sea Islanders, and the mischief was long done when Dupont took Port Royal. As to the cure, the correspondent seems to have an indistinct idea. He says he personally refuses to hire laborers whose conduct is notoriously bad. So far, so good; but, unfortunately, the conduct of nine in ten Sea Island negroes is privately bad, and the whole body of them must be reached or little is done. The elevation of the general mass of the population is the only sure and permanent cure. Meantime, till that can be done, the whole business of marriage and divorce ought to be taken out of the hands of the elders of churches, at any rate to the extent of giving them power only to reaffirm a marriage entered into before a magistrate. One law for whites and blacks in this respect, and the law enforced by every means possible, with appropriately heavy punishment, would do much to check the evil. Now everybody is indifferent, and there is practically no law and no penalty.

The Massachusetts Legislative Committee, whose duty it was to report on the expediency of passing a bill to equalize bounties, have reported unfavorably, and we fancy not very much more will be heard of the scheme at the State Capitol, at any rate, though demagogues may use its name to conjure with for a year or so longer. As a writer in the Boston Advertiser points out, those honest men who believe in the equalization bill are men who look on the bounty paid the soldier as a reward for his military services. But this is altogether a mistake. In fact, the bounty money, or a great part of it, was usually paid the enlisted man when he enlisted, and before his military duties were begun. All know that when the war broke out there came immediately stagnation in business, wages were low, there was little work for any one, and the prices of the necessaries of life for the family which the volunteer left behind him were also low. It is true, too, that very many of the early volunteers were not men with families. And it should also be remembered that with the business stagnation came an unnatural excitement, which it was not well should last, and which, in fact, soon went down. But as the war went on there was an immense increase in all industrial activity, workmen were in great demand, and the State, unwilling to draft, had to pay the later volunteers more than the earlier to compensate them for the sacrifices which they necessarily made in entering the State's service. Still later volunteers were paid still more, and the bounty rose with the rise in the price of labor and everything else bought and sold. Massachusetts, by the mouth of Mr. Banks, has said some exceedingly foolish things about soldiers' claims to any amount of their own and other people's money. But all that may have been because Mr. Banks was speaking, and not because he was speaking for Massachusetts, and it will be a very remarkable thing if the State burdens herself with a debt which neither in law nor equity is due from her.

The eight-hour men have, in Illinois and Wisconsin, succeeded in having eight hours declared to be a legal day's work, in the absence of any agreement between the parties; but so many classes of laborers are excepted from the operation of the law that it may be said practically to have no effect. Large numbers of employers, however, seem disposed to accept eight hours as a day, provided there is a corresponding reduction made in wages; but eight hours' work does not seem to have much attraction for the employed when saddled with this condition. Strikes still continue in all parts of the country, and their prevalence is a striking illustration of the difficulty men often have, when suffering from any cause, in finding out what is the matter with them. The trouble all over the country just now is to find profitable employment for capital—and to ask it, under these circumstances, to pay more for labor is, for the laborer, suicidal.

The Rhode Island Legislature has passed a bill prohibiting the publication of the atrocious quack advertisements—of which there is such an abundance in the New York papers—offering, in one guise or another, to procure abortion. There is no State in the Union in which such a law is as much needed as this, and there is no kind of villany easier to prevent. The publishers of newspapers can always be got at, whether the quack doctors can or not; and the nuisance might, under the stimulus of even a fine, be made to disappear in a day. In fact, this city is the headquarters of quack doctors and quack medicines. The great remedies for "the cure of consumption" and of "general debility" are mostly made here, and so are the bitters which give "tone to the system." There is, of course, no means of preventing the manufacture and sale of drugs to those who are dissatisfied with the condition of either their stomach or their nerves, but nothing can be easier than to diminish the amount of incentive to crime or suggestion of crime which is furnished by the class of advertisements against which the Rhode Island enactment is aimed.

The rush to Europe, which was expected to be so great during the coming summer, is apparently not to take place. None of the steamers which have sailed, so far, have been much crowded; the Great Eastern may be said, considering her accommodation, to have had hardly any passengers on board; and in the Cunard line large numbers of persons who had taken berths are trying to get rid of them. One reason—and no doubt the principal one—of this falling off is the condition of business in this country. In the winter, it was supposed the opening of navigation would lead to a revival; but no. The spring is here, and the dulness is deeper than ever, and is deepened still further by the horrible stories of legislative corruption and heavy taxation with which the air is filled. Then, also, the Exhibition in Paris has not thus far answered the public expectation. The opening was a failure; nothing is ready; and there is a widespread belief that it will not be worth seeing. On the top of these two causes of discouragement has come a slight war panic, and the travelling public have, of course, no fancy for a tour on the Continent with the Prussian and French armies in motion all around them.

Mr. Gladstone's defeat in the House of Commons has led, we learn by the telegraph, to his withdrawal from the leadership of the Liberal party. This has been impending for nearly a year. The half-hearted support which he received in the debate on his own bill last session made it evident that he had lost the confidence of a large portion of his followers, and his strength has ever since been rather with the people out of doors than in the ranks of the Liberals. His resignation is of no great political importance at present or as long as Lord Derby remains in office, while it commits him for the future more decidedly than ever to the popular cause.

All the news from Europe tends to confirm the opinion that Prussia will fight whenever she is attacked, and France will attack her as soon as she is ready. But France is not ready. Not over a third of the army is yet provided with the new breech-loading rifle, and the army is as yet in no condition to meet the force that Prussia can bring into the field. There is evidently a good deal of popular irritation over the Luxembourg check—for check it is now generally admitted to be—and it is stimulated by the opposition press and orators, who are goading the Emperor into fury by their taunts; but no amount of popular irritation will send French marshals into the field to fight for French supremacy in European councils one minute sooner than they think they are prepared. They would find themselves within a fortnight after taking the field with a million of men on their hands, led by confessedly the best strategist in Europe, General Moltke, not, too, as at the opening of the war with Austria, doubtful of their powers, and only half satisfied with the quarrel, but flushed with victory, confident of their superiority, and, instead of fighting against Germans, having the whole German race at their back. Under these circumstances, we shall probably have some months to wait for the war.

The North German Parliament completed its labors on the 17th, and the constitution which it finally adopted now goes to the several states of the federation. Their sensibilities and the fear of fatally offending one or other of them have contributed more than anything else to prevent modifications of the draft submitted to the Parliament by Prussia. It has, nevertheless, been extensively and materially amended, and, so far as we have been able to observe, always in a liberal sense. More than once Bismark needed all his personal and official influence to withstand the propositions of the extreme left, but also more than once he was outvoted; and there were many changes, as was to be expected, for which the Government can afford to be grateful. Whether Bismark exaggerated the chances of discord and disunion, it is not possible to predicate with confidence. For ourselves, the fact of the treaties effected with the South German States so soon after Sadowa, and the general complexion of Continental affairs, indicate as complete a mastery of the situation, on the part of Prussia, as that possessed by the North at the close of the rebellion, though on grounds only partly analogous. We anticipate, therefore, the unanimous acceptance of the new constitution, as we should if it had resembled the Prussian far more closely than it does.

THE LATEST NOVELTY IN MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

The public may have noticed during the last week condemnatory allusions in the New York Evening Post, as well as in the New York Times, to a certain bill which has just been passed by the Legislature, authorizing the governor to put most of the chamber business of the Supreme Court in this district into the hands of one judge, thus giving him the exclusive right to hear ex parte motions, appoint referees, grant injunctions, etc.; in other words, to lodge in the hands of one man an amount of power over the fortune, reputation, and comfort of the people of this city such as has never in any free country before, we venture to assert, been entrusted to one man; for it must be remembered that from most decisions on these motions there is no appeal. The Post opposed the scheme outright; The Times opposed it gently, and hoped that if it were to be carried out, the judge appointed would be some peerless person, a mixture of the great lawyer and saint. It was well known, however, by the bench and the bar and the politicians, that the person for whom this office was intended was Judge Barnard, of the Supreme Court, of whom it is safe and polite to say, that he is about the last judge on the bench whom any good lawyer or good citizen would wish to see in any such place. He has, it is true, quarrelled with "the ring;" but then a man may quarrel with "the ring" and be very ready to counteract their schemes without being fit to monopolize the chamber business of the Supreme Court. His appointment, however, receives the hearty support of The Tribune, and, if we are correctly informed, has had the private support of Mr. Greeley. This, we believe, is due, in part at least, to the belief on which The Tribune has long acted, that by pandering occasionally to Democratic prejudices or passions, and shutting its eyes occasionally to Democratic knaveries, the Republican party may be helped out of the slough of despond in which it lives in this city. There is no difficulty, however, in predicting how this will end. The great laws of morality have not been suspended, and cannot be suspended, for the benefit of any party or any cause. There might be a good deal more said about this Supreme Court job if the bar and the press had a little more courage. The story is a highly interesting one, and will well repay the investigation of the Union League Club, or of any other patriotic body of men rich enough and influential enough to do the duty which the press ought to do, but—such are the times we live in—dare not do. We commend it to the attention of that body, and we commend it, above all, to the attention of the Republican papers of other States that are interested in seeing the party survive the establishment of negro suffrage and assist in saving the nation from corruption, which is now invading all branches of the Government, and which has already succeeded in establishing in this city one of the foulest of despotisms. The sudden conversion of the New York Times to the support of the present scheme, as soon as Judge Barnard's name was mentioned in connection with it, is an interesting and instructive phenomenon, and so is the silence or applause of the rest of the press, when the press has only to speak unitedly to put the plan out of sight for ever,

Notes.

LITERARY.

ANNOUNCEMENTS by our American publishers are not numerous. Messrs. Scribner & Co. and Messrs. Roberts Brothers have both advertised an American edition of "Liber Librorum: its Structure, Limitations, and Purposes; a Friendly Communication to a Reluctant Sceptic;" but the work will be issued by Messrs. Scribner & Co., the Boston house having withdrawn on its being shown to them that the announcement by the New York house was made a little before their own.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are going to issue, but probably not till the fall, an "Encyclopædia Theologica et Ecclesiastica," a compendium of all theological knowledge, which will be prepared under the editorship of the Rev. Isidor Mombert, of Lancaster, Pa., and will contain contributions by "the most distinguished divines of Great Britain, the United States, and other countries." It is intended to make the work Christian as against rationalism, Protestant as against Romanism, Catholic as against sectarianism; every Christian communion will be allowed opportunity to speak, and, so far as possible, by the mouth of its own sons. English or American scholarship hardly undertakes such works; this is based on the cyclopædia of Hagenbach. Hurd & Houghton will also issue, almost immediately, a book called "The Champagne Country," written by Robert Tomes, Esq., for some time U. S. Consul at Rheims; and in the fall will publish "A Treatise on the Law of Insurance," by Willard Phillips.——W. J. Widdleton, a publisher whose imprint is on a good many very good books and but very few poor ones, is about to issue—if, indeed, it is not already out—"Poe's Tales," in two volumes, each of which is complete in itself, and can be sold apart from the other. The rest of Poe's prose—criticisms, lectures, and so on—is little worth buying, unless to amuse one's self with an idea of the fluttering which the writer must have caused among the American literary men of twenty-five or thirty years ago; but for his remarkable fictions—some of them true "Tales of Wonder," almost all of them truly wonderful tales—there will long be a steady sale. Another book to be published by Mr. Widdleton is "The Financial Economy of the United States Illustrated, and Some of the Causes which retard the Growth of California Demonstrated," by John Alexander Ferris, of California. The book is dedicated "To the friends of our constitutional currency—gold and silver coin."——Messrs. Roberts Brothers, of Boston, announce "The Waves of This Troublesome World," a tale by Miss Christina Rossetti. Miss Rossetti is, we believe, now writing the story, which is in course of publication in The Churchman's Shilling Magazine, an English monthly.——Messrs. Ticknor & Fields will, perhaps, hardly be ready with the "Inferno" till April is gone; but it will not be delayed longer than the first week in May. In the same month, Mr. Emerson's "Poems" will be issued. The new volume will go a long way back, we suppose; back far enough to take in the "Bramah" which sat portentous on the forehead of the first Atlantic.

—The following bit of literary history is of some interest just now, when there is so much talk about Dickens and his American publishers. Up to the publication of "Dombey and Son," Mr. Dickens had never received anything from this side of the water for any reprint of his books. It was understood that he was rather more angry with Messrs. Harper & Brothers than with any other American publishers. They had just begun publishing their New Monthly Magazine, and the publishers of The International Magazine were contesting with the Harpers the first place in our periodical literature. After a severe and indecisive struggle of a year, one of the conductors of The International conceived an idea which, if successfully carried out, would have given the victory to that magazine; one of its publishers was going abroad, and was authorized to secure from Mr. Dickens "advanced sheets" of his next novel for publication in The International. The steamer on which he sailed had hardly got out of sight before Dr. Griswold, of The International, had given to The Evening Post a sensational paragraph stating that Mr. Dickens had been engaged to write for The International Magazine a new novel, for which he was to be paid $2,000—a sum larger in 1850 than in 1867, and considered very large for the favor demanded. The watchful Harpers sent out on the next steamer a messenger who went directly to Mr. Dickens and found him ready for any reasonable offer. The Post with Dr. Griswold's paragraph being shown him, he at once decided to hold the Yankees to the terms therein set forth, and agreed for the two thousand dollars to furnish Harper & Brothers with advanced sheets of the next novel, which was "Bleak House." The messenger of The International had made the very great blunder of going to Mr. Dickens's publishers instead of to Mr. Dickens himself, was told that Mr. Dickens was busied about private theatricals which would probably absorb his attention for an indefinite period, and that no new novel was in contemplation. In fact, it is very probable that, on account of the bargain with Harpers, "Bleak House" was written before it otherwise would have been. However this may be, the gentleman who represented The International rested satisfied with what he had been told, and, without seeing Mr. Dickens, proceeded to the Continent in search of health, while Harpers' shrewder messenger secured the coveted prize, and the publishers of The International soon transferred their subscription list to their competitors. It appears then that Messrs. Stringer & Townsend took the first step, albeit an abortive one, in the business of paying English authors for advanced sheets, a good custom, and one which seems to have benefited Mr. Dickens alone to the extent of about $60,000. To this let us add, as connected with the subject, that one of the firm of Hurd & Houghton, being in England a few years since, offered to pay Mr. Dickens a certain share of the profits on the "Household Edition" which they publish. This Mr. Dickens would not receive, considering himself debarred by his agreement with Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

—If a majority with a conscience and an ideal respect for the rights of the minority were alone needed, Mr. Hare's scheme of representative government would not seem so impracticable as it does. The Puritans of Massachusetts Bay had, in regard to church government, almost a conviction "that the whole body must agree, else nothing proceeds;" but some stood up for "the major part" carrying it against the lesser part, and they brought this practice under the general rule in this wise:

> "If the lesser party dissenting neither can give satisfaction to the greater nor will receive satisfaction from them, but still persist in dissenting, then doe the major part (after due forbearance and calling in the counsel of some neighboring churches) judicially admonish them; who being thus under censure, their voyce is now extinct and made voide. And so the rest proceed to vote," etc.

The quotation is from W. Rathband's "Brief Narration of some Church Courses in New England." It may be coupled with the following, which we take from a pamphlet published nearly two centuries later, in 1825, containing articles of agreement drawn up and recommended by the London Co-operative Society "for the formation of a community on principles of mutual co-operation":

> "We engage to abide in all cases by the votes of the majority, but the majority engage never to require the concurrence of the minority in any measures but those in which the interests of the majority are incompatible with the gratification of the wishes of the minority."

From these examples it would appear that the minority is as little secure, in the last resort, from a majority that takes account of it in theory as from one by which it is utterly disregarded except as inferior and submissive.

—Mr. Howard Challen has bound the first six numbers of his "Uniform Trade List Circular" into one volume, containing the complete lists (priced) of no less than ninety-eight American publishing houses. It is Mr. Challen's intention, if "the trade" will support him in the undertaking, to put into the hands of each bookseller semi-annually every trade list in the country, with corrections to date of publication, bound in a substantial volume, which will be sold at a low price. It is not necessary to say that if he does this Mr. Challen will do a great service to all who have to buy and sell books, and to all whose business or a part of whose business it is to know exactly what books are published, who are their publishers, what are their prices, and other such information. Among the ninety-eight firms whose lists are to be found in the first volume are nearly all the large publishing houses in the country, D. Appleton & Co., G. W. Carleton & Co., and Little & Brown being the only prominent names that we miss from the collection.

—The fourth volume in the "Library of New England History" of Messrs. Wiggin & Lunt, of Boston, is Thomas Lechford's "Plaine Dealing; or, Newes from New-England," with an introduction and notes by Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull. Mr. Lechford was the first lawyer—we were going to say, that Boston ever boasted, but his profession was decidedly looked upon with suspicion by the magistrates of Massachusetts Bay, and his religious tenets (since he could not easily hold his peace) had nearly brought him into trouble. His "news," when first published abroad, was very recent news, being published so soon after the founding of the colony as 1642, upon his return to England. It related chiefly to the ecclesiastical polity of the Puritans, which gave him an opportunity for "plaine dealing." Cotton dubbed him a plain dealer in falsehood, but this must be understood in a theological sense, for Lechford seems to have been a man of integrity, and to have commanded the respect of those even who thought him a heretic and grudged him a living. His testimony as to matters of fact and observation is corroborated in a remarkable manner, and his temper is Christian and almost affectionate throughout. No one can omit to read him who wishes to penetrate the church history of Massachusetts, and incidentally will be found some curious information about early settlements and their pastors, about the Indians, and the general location of the colonies from Maine to Florida. Mr. Trumbull's notes are admirable in being apposite, instructive, and totally devoid of pedantry. We do not recall one that we thought superfluous. There are two pages of fac-simile, and the rest of the book is printed in last century type, on excellent paper with broad margins, with great clearness and beauty. The press-work is that of Messrs. Geo. C. Rand & Avery, who did some notable printing in the days of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," but none so good as this, we think. A partial view of New England forty years later, which has also considerable value, is contained in Vol. I. of the "Memoirs of the Long Island Historical Collection," just published by Joel Munsell, of Albany. This is a translation from the Dutch of the journal of Jaspar Dankers and Peter Sluyter, who visited New York and other of the colonies in 1679–80. The Apostle Eliot "deplored [to them] the decline of the church in New England, and especially in Boston, so that he did not know what would be the final result;" but he was able to speak hopefully of the conversion of the Indians, the lack of attention to which had seemed so scandalous to Lechford, although the controversial lawyer professed not to see how it could be undertaken except by the Established Church.

—The sub-masters of the grammar schools of Boston, convened recently in regular meeting, thought it expedient to pass a resolution expressing their "strong disapprobation of an editorial notice in the March number of The Massachusetts Teacher commending an article in the January number of The North American Review on the 'Life and Character of Daniel Webster.'" The sub-masters, doubtless, had a right to express their disapprobation of the course pursued by the editors of their own peculiar periodical, and for that matter there is nothing to prevent their regularly each week passing judgment on Mr. Parton's latest article or any other conceivable thing; but they seem to have gone a good way further than a simple expression of their disapprobation. "The article in The Review," they say, "and the notice in The Teacher we regard as alike expressions of rancorous political hatred which not even the grave has power to soften." Resolutions are generally so dreadfully highflying and so little to be believed that we suppose the sub-masters, when they imputed this savage and wicked motive to four or five respectable gentlemen, were not saying just what they really thought. Probably they were saying only what they believed it would be very well to pretend that they thought. Certainly, if in this preposterous statement they told the truth as to their opinion, their opinion is of the least possible account. It must be a miraculously stupid person who honestly believes that Mr. Parton in writing, and the editors of The North American Review in publishing the essay on Webster, were actuated by "rancorous political hatred." The editor of The Teacher remarks that he presumes "that if the sentiments of teachers were canvassed" there would be as many to take his view of Mr. Webster's character as to take the sub-masters' view, "nowadays, at least." We have thought so too, but it seems likely that among the elderly, respectable citizens of Boston, the school committee-men, merchants, and so forth, Mr. Webster is still considered not only a lawyer and orator of great ability, but a worthy exemplar whom youth may imitate and the instructors of youth praise.

—Among their new English books Messrs. Scribner & Co. have the last English edition of the "Essays of Elia," "the only complete edition," as Mr. Moxon says, for it contains a preface and dedication written by Lamb, and never before published. Both dedication and preface bear date December 7, 1822. The latter is a very brief note addressed to J. Taylor, the publisher, and reads as follows:

> "I should like the enclosed Dedication to be printed, unless you dislike it. I like it. It is in the olden style. But if you object to it publish the book as it is.
> "Only pray don't let the printer mistake the word 'curt' for 'curst.'
> "C. L."

Seemingly Mr. Taylor did object to the proposed dedication, which he probably thought not sufficiently respectful to the injudicious reader. In fact, it is not ceremoniously polite. And the reference to the fourth glass might alone frighten a publisher:

> "DEDICATION.

The book is a very neat little volume, and, considering the prices that English books now command in the American market, is surprisingly cheap.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.[*]

Two prevalent misconceptions straiten Swedenborg's just renown. One is, that he is a mystic. He is thus classified even by Mr. Emerson, who has otherwise dealt him so fair an appreciation in his "Representative Men." Now the mystic is, above all things, a specialist in his conception of the Divine action and providence; while Swedenborg was, above all things, a universalist. The mystic proper is a man who claims a private and exceptional access to the Divine heart—a regenerate access, so to say—and he is out of all sympathy accordingly with the common mind, with minds of a humbler conceit than his own. He has reached, in his own opinion, a vantage-ground with respect to Divine truth from which the mob of unregenerate persons are excluded, and which they are incompetent to estimate. Swedenborg was an utter stranger to this devout vanity. He was all his life, early and late, a devout aspirant to Divine knowledge; but he was also a disinterested one. He sought it for its own pure sake alone, and with no view to his own personal distinction. That is to say, he never pursued it by the occult and unwholesome methods of a private, assiduous court towards God, but only by the open, serene, impersonal ways of science and philosophy. Even the extraordinary claim he makes to have had his spiritual sight opened (in order that he might testify from experience how entirely and intensely human the world beyond the grave is) is remarkable for its utter freedom from personal pretension, and puts forth only a public or scientific significance. We cannot imagine, indeed, how any one familiar with his books can fail to perceive that the mystical pretension—the pretension to enjoy some private or personal consideration at the Divine hands—must have been infinitely revolting to his modest soul.

The other misconception in question is, that he was of an ecclesiastical turn of mind and was ambitious to add another and more rapacious sect to the number already existing. This notion is more obviously preposterous than the former, since the sectarian temper is what makes to him the precise difference of hell from heaven. If he succeeds in making any conviction clear, it is that the ecclesiastical life of the world had reached its term; that is to say, had so fatally lowered the religious mind of the race, at all events in Christendom, as to cut it off evermore from celestial succor, and imperatively to call, therefore, upon the Lord not for any new and more egotistic sect indeed, but for the establishment of an altogether new—because, for the first time in history, living and spiritual—church upon earth in which his benignant name should never fail to be glorified. Swedenborg was apparently inclined to speculate whether any marked political or ecclesiastical complications would result from the disclosures which he conceived himself commissioned to make of the spiritual contents of revelation. But the angels rebuked his solicitude, teaching him that what he calls the Last Judgment, and describes as having taken place under his own observation in "the world of spirits," would have no direct outward effect upon states or churches, but only an indirect inward one by releasing the human mind itself from the bondage of priestcraft and superstition. "To outward appearance divided churches would exist as before; their dogmas would be taught as before, and the same religions as now would exist among the Gentiles. But thenceforth the man of the church would be in a more free state of thinking on matters of faith, or on spiritual things which relate to heaven, because spiritual liberty had now been restored to him by the reduction of all things, whether in heaven or in hell, to order." The angels of whom he sought light upon these questions told him that "they knew nought of things to come, for that such knowledge belonged to the Lord alone; but this much they did know, namely, that the slavery in which the man of the church had been hitherto held was now abolished, and hence that he could, if he were so inclined, freely perceive interior truths, and thus be made more internal. They observed, however, that they had slender hope of such results in the men of the Christian Church" ("Last Judgment," 73, 74).

If, then, Swedenborg was as far as possible from being either a mystic or an ecclesiastic, what in truth was he? Mr. White's book was written to answer this question. He has accomplished his task with great care and elaboration, and though we think he has perhaps bestowed too much attention upon certain persons who style themselves receivers of Swedenborg's doctrines, but whose unfounded ecclesiastical ambition does much, as he conceives, to imperil in the world's regard their master's beautiful human lustre, we are, nevertheless, free to say that his book is in all points a most readable one. Let enquirers betake themselves, then, by all means, to Mr. White's very handsome volumes just issued in London, or else to the smaller biography, by the same hand, issued by Messrs. Lippincott. And when they shall have thus got their outside curiosity appeased, they will find in the very beautiful edition of Swedenborg's own writings now passing through the press of the Lippincotts an ample quietus to any profounder intellectual question they may entertain in the premises. One can ask no better introduction to Swedenborg's personal acquaintance than Mr. White offers. He is free of any servile or superstitious reverence towards his author, and has no ecclesiastical biases to deflect his honest philosophic judgment. But as to what Swedenborg practically teaches, as to the great public scope and influence of his books upon the future of thought, Mr. White, while he assuredly does not balk enquiry in this direction, is not at sufficient pains, in our opinion, to disengage the elements which go to its solution. Let us briefly indicate our own view of the subject.

The startling news which Swedenborg professes to have learned in angelic converse is calculated to produce a revolution in the metaphysic sphere, the sphere of thought, no less signal and complete than that produced by Copernicus in the physical realm, the realm of science. His news amounts in substance to this: 1. Our conscious life, whether physical or moral, in place of being the absolute thing it seems, is most rigidly conditioned every moment upon spiritual laws which invariably determine its complexion. 2. Hence, of course, both our sensible and our rational judgments—our judgments alike of simple pleasure and pain, and of composite good and evil—are liable to the very gravest fallacy unless they are duly rectified by spiritual observation. This revolutionary logic is fundamental to Swedenborg's system of thought, and pervades every word he utters; but it attains to its full philosophic dimensions only in his doctrine of the "Lord; or, Divine Natural Manhood." For if it be true, as he alleges, that our life in nature is purely subjective or phenomenal, as having in itself no objective reality, then obviously Nature must either confess herself an unqualified illusion, which is abhorrent to thought, or else consent simply to reveal a love, a wisdom, and a power truly infinite and creative. Accordingly Swedenborg compels all nature into this divine vassalage; into a literal unswerving imagery and correspondence of the spiritual creation. Nature is no longer worth one jot in itself or on absolute grounds, but only as a revelation, adapted to a finite intelligence, of the otherwise inscrutable creative perfection. Thus the truth of God's natural humanity, i. e., of his plenary abode and operation not merely in this, that, or the other spiritually rarefied intelligence, but also, and much more, in the common mind of the race—in our actual flesh-and-blood consciousness in short, or in all those appetites and passions of our nature which ally us organically with beast and plant and stone—becomes in Swedenborg's hands not only the consummate flower of a true theology and philosophy, but the underground root or fundamental datum of all true science as well. It is astonishing to note the childlike good faith and serenity with which, amidst universal unbelief and derision, the devout and solitary scholar pursued for long years his sublimely humane studies; but whatever opinion we may form of the conclusions to which he comes, no one familiar with his books can doubt that they furnish to future speculation—religious, scientific, or philosophic—a storehouse of facts and experiences inestimably precious.

It must not be inferred, however, from what we have said, that Swedenborg's books are anything like a mere reassertion of the ordinary orthodox dogma of the incarnation. On the contrary, and in spite of a superficial resemblance between the two doctrines, they exhibit a lively rational contrast; so that, in point of fact, Swedenborg's cosmologic scheme is far more germane to our modern scientific or "sceptical" tendencies than it is to the technical "religious" reaction those tendencies provoke. The orthodox theories of the incarnation allow it a purely accidental, never an incidental, relevancy to creation. They always represent it as a mere event in time and space, like the rise of Mohammedanism or any similar event, long foreseen, no doubt, and entailing endless consequences to the race, but still a mere historic event destined to obviate a purely historic catastrophe. The human race, instead of maintaining its original integrity as it might have done, had grossly degenerated, and would ere long have descended to pure unmixed diabolism, had not the Divine power violently interposed to avert the dire calamity. Swedenborg's view, whether it be true or false in point of fact, is incomparably superior in point of philosophy to this, as the most cursory statement of it will show. With him the incarnation is no petty historic accident, contingent upon our good or bad behavior, but is itself the spiritual truth or substance out of which all history is woven. It is, in fact, the inmost law or logic—the eternal word—of creation itself. The great creative truth found its due and adequate revelation—found at last its normal and perfect literal expression—in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. But these events, however majestic in themselves, and however magisterial in their sway over all subsequent history, were yet at bottom a most strict derivation from that primitive root, that grander spiritual verity. No doubt Christ's bosom experience, for the first time in history, gave body to what was before mere nebulous or chaotic substance; gave individual or human form to what before was merely universal or naturally-diffused truth; and thus not only exalted every feeblest man of woman born into cosmical width and worth, by compelling all nature and history into the service of human society or brotherhood, but also gave him a consciousness of direct individual and unlimited fellowship with God. But for that very reason this bosom experience of the Christ claimed a far deeper spring than either nature or history, since it obediently reflected the creative law itself.

How so? Why is it necessary, in order to the spiritual or philosophic conception of creation, that the Creator should abase himself to the level of the created nature, or incarnate himself without stint and without repining in the lineaments of the creature? An intelligent answer to this enquiry will afford the reader a decisive test of Swedenborg's intellectual force and veracity, and after having briefly furnished the elements of such answer we shall conclude.

The incarnation, upon which Swedenborg makes the entire truth of creation to pivot, grows, as he represents, out of the necessity the creature is under to have selfhood, which is subjective identity, or conscious separation from the creator; for, unless the creature be self-limited, he would be undistinguishable from the creator. If God were a mere artist or maker like ourselves, and not an absolute creator, this necessity would not exist. If he were a mere maker and not a creator as well; if, in other words, his proper creature were a lifeless statue and not a flesh-and-blood man, there could be no difficulty in creating, since the needful material for that purpose would be at hand. No doubt God is a maker; that is, he gives objective individuality to his offspring, just as the artist does to his. But he is above and before all things else what the artist is not—namely, an absolute creator; and hence he confers upon his offspring what no artist is able or is expected to confer upon the work of his hands—namely, natural or subjective identity, no less than spiritual or objective individuality. That is to say, he is obliged to make himself over to the creature in the plenitude of his perfection, in order that the creature may phenomenally appear, or even seem to be, in himself. And certainly no artist ever communicates himself to his work in such a fashion as to make the work glow with all his proper life, while he himself actually lapses from sight. Thus the Divine power alone is truly creative, because it is the power to make things be absolutely—i. e., in themselves or irrespectively of other things—while our power is at best only artistic or productive, being the power to make things exist not in themselves, but in relation to other things exclusively. He alone confers life or consciousness, because his offspring are really or inwardly created by him, and hence are inevitably instinct with his vital perfection. The work of our hands, on the contrary, not being inwardly created by us, but only outwardly formed or made out of pre-existent materials, does not manage to reflect even our own poor derivative life, but is all unconscious or dead.

Such is the philosophic ground of the incarnation ; the difference between a dead and a living creation. The creature's life or consciousness is rigidly contingent upon it, so that while we simply idealize ourselves in our work, and consequently leave the work itself lifeless, God actually incarnates himself in his work, and by so doing makes it breathe and glow with immortal subjective life and joy. We have no space to pursue the subject here, and must confine ourselves to one brief concluding word. Let no one dread any pantheistic issues to Swedenborg's cosmology. His scheme of creation is, indeed, at a world-wide remove from pantheism. For the incarnation, by his showing, only purports to give the creature that quasi-existence in himself, or phenomenal projection from God, which may fitly base his real or essential conjunction with him. It purports, at most, to confer upon the creature only that natural or subjective identity which binds him to mineral and vegetable and animal, in order that this bondage may stimulate within him an inevitable reaction towards that spiritual or objective individuality which alone truly allies him in eternal fellowship with God.

GOULD'S GOOD ENGLISH.[*]

A MAN once said to his friend, at the end of a discussion, "I maintain my opinion for all that." "Excuse me," was the rejoinder, "you *re*tain your opinion." Thereupon the man, let us hope, took the so-called friend by the ear, led him to the door, and put him on his road home, where only, as a wise Frenchman once remarked, men may be permitted to play the fool. This very small business of word-catching has been of late pushed to an absurd extreme ; to use a phrase which, we trust, will set Mr. G. W. Moon's teeth on edge, it has been run very far into the ground. Mr. Grant White makes some remarks, on the whole judicious and worth making, upon the much praised and too little imitated style of Addison, and publishes them in The Galaxy. At once somebody in Beadle's Magazine applies the microscope to Mr. White's style, and the verbal critic is verbally hypercriticised. In the next Galaxy the verbal critic of verbal criticism is in turn verbally criticised by Mr. White, who replies to his animadversions, which were, indeed, as Mr. White shows, very much more nice than wise, and quite uncalled for. Dean Alford, in papers well enough meant, but which, correcting some errors, afford examples of many others, does indeed fall into an ex-cathedra and rather impudent way of speaking. Thereupon Mr. Moon, who, we should say, requires no provocation to flippancy, with greater self-complacency tramples on the great self-complacency of Dean Alford, increasing the dean's sin by letting it be the cause of his own infliction upon the public patience. Encouraged by his success with the dean's English, Mr. Moon is moved to seek more glory, and breaks some of his teeth on the somewhat different English of Mr. Marsh ; but, in the midst of his onset, finds himself obliged to adopt the defensive. Soon, however, he puts in practice the Hungarian system of defence, and guards his own head by attacking his opponent's. It is easy to see that there need be no end, this side of insanity, to these criticisms, replications to criticisms, rejoinders to replications, surrejoinders to rejoinders, rebutters to surrejoinders, surrebutters to rebutters, and so on and so on, for ever and ever, in infinite series.

For our own part, we have been led by our experience of the past year or so to look upon the poor despised punster as a very respectable member of the human fellowship when compared with the inveterate purist. The man whose trifling with words is avowed trifling, and intended to promote laughter, from him there is sometimes even positive pleasure to be had. But the pedantic purism which would, for example, forbid us to use "maintain" to express a meaning which for centuries that word has been employed to express, what is that but folly of a sort at once ridiculous and very disagreeable ?—ridiculous, because a self-conceited attempt to do the impossible is a thing to be laughed at ; disagreeable, because, after all, we are not so wholly given over to a reprobate mind that self-conceit, at any rate another man's self-conceit, does not give us some pain, and also because another's self-conceit is generally gratified at some slight expense to our own. The punster's foible, like the vain man's, is at the worst a social failing ; the purist's partakes of the nature of pride, and almost always its victim becomes a sad nuisance, pert, a caviller, a seeming vaunter of his own parts, too knowing, busy about nothings, pedantic—in short, a word-catcher, a verbal critic.

At the best, verbal criticism is, so far as concerns its usefulness, a work of rather a low kind ; and, being a barren field that the best men will hardly work in, it is turned over to a crowd of people of small abilities and small attainments. Yet, for its proper performance, it requires great knowledge and ability of a peculiar kind. To be a good verbal critic of English, a critic who should not lead astray quite as often as he sets right, one ought to know well three or four modern and one or two ancient languages, be very well acquainted with the entire literature of a great many generations of English writers, and be possessed of much acuteness of mind. Unfortunately it is true of verbal criticism, what they say of the Italian language, that one may very easily learn it well enough to talk, and may only with very great difficulty learn it thoroughly. So we have Alfords by the hundred, and Moons to show us that we should be very foolish to take the Alfords as teachers, and Goulds and others to point out the stupidities of the Moons, and legions more to darken as much as they enlighten, and to tire us out with strictures, some of them just, some of them silly, most of them finical.

Mr. Gould's book, which is not slightly marked by some of the faults we have been speaking of, deals for the most part with very obvious errors in grammar, orthoepy, and orthography—such errors as have often been commented on. "Looked beautiful" is right, he tells us, and "looked beautifully" is wrong. He reminds us that an epithet is always an adjective and never a noun, and that an epithet may have a good meaning ; that to substitute the phrase "over his signature" for the phrase "under his signature" is apparently to correct and really to commit a blunder ; that the noun "alternative" means a choice between two things, and does not mean one of the things to be chosen ; that "firstly" is not to be used in place of "first ;" that the verb "plead" is a regular verb ; that "progress," as a verb, is neither an Americanism nor a modernism ; that "in our midst" is a common phrase, but one not to be tolerated ; that to say "a mutual friend" is to misuse the adjective ; that for "jeopardize," "leniency," "donate," "authoress," we should say "jeopard," "lenity," "give" or "present," and "author ;" that "wharf" in the plural is not "wharves" but "wharfs ;" that in the phrase "from hence" the "from" is superfluous ; that we all, Americans and Britons, are too fond of big words, and so forth.

Of course he ventures on some new ground. We shall follow him just a step. He very severely and unhesitatingly reprehends the use of the compound conjunction "but that," though its use is no doubt defensible. A low vulgarism he thinks it, and thus disposes of a sentence of Trench's :

> "Trench also says, in the same volume, 'I cannot think but that this is stated too strongly.' Which is not only, as Polonius says, 'a vile phrase,' but it fails to express the meaning of the writer. He means, 'I cannot but think that,' etc. In other words, he says he cannot think, and he means he cannot help thinking."

It is true that Trench meant "I cannot think otherwise than that," etc., or, "I cannot think anything BUT this, THAT," etc., or, elliptically, "I cannot think BUT THAT," etc. As he meant this, we are rather glad that he said it, and, for ourselves, shall feel free to use "but that" as he used it.

There is a large number of other similar cases in which Mr. Gould seems to us a good deal too peremptory and not right. But he will hardly vitiate our usage to any great extent, and at all events we do not propose—"purpose" we fear he would insist on our saying—to become what we have been condemning, a verbal critic. Certainly we shall not turn verbal critic of what is hardly worth other criticism, so Mr. Gould's own faults of style we leave untouched upon.

Besides the philological essays on common errors, on Dean Alford's and Mr. Moon's errors, and on Webster's vagaries in orthography, Mr. Gould prints in this volume a good essay with the title "Clerical Elocution." Much of the matter contained in the "Webster's Orthography" has already done service and good service in the war of the dictionaries.

CONINGTON'S TRANSLATION OF THE ÆNEID.[*]

PROF. CONINGTON's selection of Scott's ballad metre as the medium for his translation will hardly meet with general approval without a thorough questioning of the reasons for such a choice, in addition to the criticism of the way in which he has used it. His reasons he has merely glanced at in the preface. The metre which seems most eminently suited to express in English the flow of Virgil's hexameter is the Tennysonian blank-verse. That has all the dignity, the sweetness, the grace, and the flexibility possessed by the Latin verse. But then we should have no translation of Virgil. The time has passed when great original poets will content themselves with writing translations, except a fragment or two for illustration or amusement; and besides, there are not more than two or three poets in each age capable of writing a poem of even moderate length in readable blank-verse. No one in our generation can do it except Tennyson and Browning. We could wish that Mr. Tennyson would translate a book, at least, of the "Æneid" into that verse on which he has impressed a quality of his own as much as ever Shakespeare or Milton did. It would be a memorial to Surrey, whose fine translations of the second and fourth books are the first specimens of blank-verse in our language. The rhymed heroic verse is easier to employ. Mr. Conington says that a translator using this would fear too much a comparison with Dryden, who, free and paraphrastic as his translation is, has excelled in that verse. But in this metre the sense is too much broken up into couplets and the smoothness and equalness of the original destroyed. As if this were not evident enough in itself, the older editions of Dryden have an altered and unusual spelling of some words, so as to make the lines rhyme to the eye as well as the ear, and even then, distrusting the eye, always bracket a triplet and never divide a couplet at the bottom of a page, thus imparting a strange uneven aspect to the book. This metre has indeed been handled by Shelley and Keats, but by no one else, in a way to produce more continuous effect; "Lamia" and "Endymion" are examples. Here the sense runs beyond the couplets and ends at a cæsural pause, or in the middle of a couplet. The Spenserian stanza which Mr. Worsley used as his instrument in transfusing the "Odyssey," or indeed any form of stanza, would be still less suitable to the movement of Virgil than the couplets of Dryden. His complicated paragraphs could not be contained in stanzas. The only remaining metre, except the one actually used by Mr. Conington—for the unrhymed, irregular verse of Southey's "Thalaba" would assuredly in a translation degenerate into prose—is the hexameter, if, saving Mr. Matthew Arnold's pardon for the question, such a thing exists in English prosody. We are acquainted with the so-called hexameter of Longfellow and Clough and Kingsley, of Dr. Hawtrey, Sir John Herschel, and even of Mr. Arnold himself, but we find nothing similar to the classical measure. In that, as Mr. F. T. Palgrave has well pointed out in a review of this very book, there were two things, accent and quantity, which perpetually crossed or fell in with each other; and "it is this subtle play of the two systems which, like the different vital forces in the corporeal organization, or, better, like the interchange between melody and harmony in instrumental music, gives life to the metre." A strictly accentual hexameter, either in English or German, has nothing of this; it seems forced, unnatural, readily resolvable into a different system of metre. Quantitative verse may become naturalized with us as it did with the Latins, but it has not yet, and an experimental or unnaturalized metre is unsuitable for a translation, as not conveying the desired force to English ears. One experiment might be tried, totally destructive indeed of unity of effect, that of varying the metre to suit the exigencies of the case, but we apprehend a single trial would be more than enough.

[*] "Good English ; or, Popular Errors in Language. By Edward S. Gould." New York : W. J. Widdleton. 12mo, pp. 228.

[*] "The Æneid of Virgil. Translated into English Verse by John Conington, M.A., Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford." Crown 8vo. W. J. Widdleton, New York. 1867.

The octosyllabic verse, the metre of Scott and Byron, in which this translation is written, has some advantages possessed by no others. It has a rapidity of movement which is eminently desirable in a long narrative poem. It makes the translation very readable as a whole. Slight changes in the movement enable it to express the sudden changes of feeling and subject of which the Æneid" is so full. It has much grace, is capable of pathos, and is not without dignity, though its chief fault lies here. It does not have the "majestic sweetness" which especially marks Virgil; the somewhat stilted style is absent; this modern metre is too free and easy. Yet the translator has managed to retain much more of the dignity of the original than would be thought possible by one who got his only ideas of the capabilities of the metre from the moss-trooper epics of Scott or the Oriental rhapsodies of Byron. It is seen far better in reading the work as a whole than in examining chance or select passages. This result is partly obtained by avoiding too much irregularity in the measure, especially any anapæstic movement. Once, in line 673 of Book IV., he indulges in a double rhyme, which might better have been avoided, as it also introduces ideas not in the original.

Mr. Conington has restrained himself from the temptation to diffuseness which this metre especially offers. He is oftentimes as concise as the original, and never so diffuse as Dryden. In style, Mr. Conington has carefully avoided the ballad-slang which Mr. Arnold so contemns. He has sometimes indulged himself in archaisms, such as "eym," "querne," "lorn," ‘prores;" but not so much as Virgil himself has done.

So far as the metre conduces to the general impression produced by the translation, we have already stated that we find it more nearly equal to the rapidity and vigor of the original than any other metre which has been used, though in dignity less suitable to the subject. In fidelity and closeness of rendering this version is unsurpassed. We have Virgil's own words, rarely one more, and seldom less, except in case of a repeated idea, when the conciseness gained by omitting one of the phrases conduces more to the Virgilian effect. In most cases the version is no less happy than faithful. Often it serves the purpose of a commentary on doubtful and disputed points. Indeed, the translation of so excellent a commentator could hardly do otherwise. An occasional expansion of a phrase serves the full purpose of an explanatory note.

"The covenant to which I came Spoke but of guest and host" fully expresses the idea of "aut hæc in fœdera veni," a phrase which Dryden leaves out entirely, and Pitt translates very blindly and loosely "a casual guest to own the bridal bands." A little further on we have

"Accipite hæc, meritumque malis advertite numen."

Dryden gives this

"Attend her curses and avenge her death."

Mr. Conington gives a beautiful example of what he elsewhere calls "embodied criticism" when he translates it by

"Stoop your great powers to ills that plead
To heaven, and my petition heed."

In the following passage the expansion of clauso into a full line cannot be complained of:

"His is that prison-house of stone,
A mansion, Enrus, all your own:
Then let him lord it to his mind,
The jailer monarch of the wind,
But keep its portal barred."

Not always, however, does Mr. Conington express himself with equal felicity. In the first thirteen lines of the first book he has done his worst, and one who gets his impression of a book from glancing over the opening pages can hardly get rid of the idea of frivolity which is then forced on him. The descriptions of nature are in general so well done that we would credit the translator with some poetic touches of his own did we not find on a careful examination that it was all in the original. See the description of Atlas in the fourth book; or still better, the "Est in secessu longo portus," etc., of the first book.

Of a lively narrative the account of the games in the fifth book is the best example, especially that of the boat-race, which is as good in its way as the celebrated one in "Tom Brown at Oxford." It is too long to quote here, but it shows the power of Mr. Conington's verse, as well as the tendency which he sometimes has to be too rapid and to overlook such expressions as "tum vero," which mark the calm spectator rather than the partisan.

In the same way a lyrical pathos is added where the original expressed a mere meditative and pensive sadness more suited to the epic poem. Thus, in where Æneas mildly reminds his companions of their already large experience of ills, Mr. Conington beautifully translates,

O passi graviora, dabit deus his quoque finem,"

"Comrades and friends! for ours is strength
Has brooked the test of woes;
O worse-scarred hearts! these wounds at length
The Gods will heal, like those."

But we have not space to say all that we should like to say in regard to particular beauties and particular blemishes in this version. We have indicated its strength and its weakness, and, to sum up all, would say that Mr. Conington's translation is for us of to-day the best translation of the "Æneid" in existence, and that it is likely to remain the best. The book can be read without the slightest feeling of weariness, but with growing interest from beginning to end. Dryden's translation, on the other hand, is interesting and beautiful only in disconnected single passages.

A WORSE THAN WORTHLESS TEXT-BOOK.[*]

THE plan of this work is very extensive, being nothing less than a universal encyclopædia of the fine arts. It is a thick octavo containing 840 pages of fair size, divided into books, chapters, and sections, and, although without an index, partially unlocked by a very full analytical table of contents. The first book deals with the nature of man and with the influence of the fine arts upon him. It is nearly 200 pages long, and contains an elaborate discussion of the influence of external nature upon the different senses, a review of the authorities who have laid down the laws of perception and feeling, and an essay upon the development of the artistic emotions and power. The second book, of 70 pages, is devoted to drawing, defined as "the representing of forms on a plane." The third book considers sculpture, or "the executing of forms in all their dimensions," and is of 100 pages. Book four has to do with architecture; it is about 100 pages long, and within this space a complete history of the art in all times and countries is essayed. Painting, or "the adding of color to form," occupies 230 pages, Book fifth. The sixth and seventh books, of 75 and 50 pages respectively, are devoted one to landscape gardening, the other to "the decorative arts; artificial accessories and ornaments in nature and of works in art."

[*] "Elements of Art Criticism, comprising a treatise on the Principles of Man's Nature as adduced by Art, together with a Historic Survey of the Methods of Art Execution in the Departments of Drawing, Sculpture, Architecture, Painting, Landscape Gardening, and the Decorative Arts. Designed as a Text-Book for Schools and Colleges, and as a Hand-Book for Amateurs and Artists. By G. W. Samson, D.D., Pres. of Columbian College, Washington, D. C." 8vo, pp. 848. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1867.

The great number of subjects of study and enquiry which surround to his distraction every educated man has made into a sort of proverb the need there is of small books on great subjects. The ideal small book on a great subject is the work of an expert, the crowning labor of a life of study of one branch with its cognate branches of learning. It must contain the essential facts infallibly seized and clearly stated; nothing superfluous or otherwise than necessary to a just comprehension of the whole subject; no comments which a clever reader could make for himself; absolutely no partisanship and no prejudices. This book on art criticism, then, which seems intended to cover the whole ground, ought to be a collection of such compact and complete essays as we have imagined, or else a single composition; an intelligent presentation by a person capable of shrewd discrimination, sound decision, and accurate statement of all the essential facts about the subject in hand. There exists a work on the manifold art of architecture which comes nearer to our ideal treatise than people have any right to expect in this century: Viollet-le-Duc's admirable and exhaustive "Entretiens sur l'Architecture." It is not a very small book, to be sure, but it may be ages before we get a smaller book on that great subject.

Dr. Samson's single "book" on architecture is necessarily briefer in its discussion of tendencies than the French architect's elaborately reasoned treatise. Each of his single "books" had need to be short and abrupt; but there was no reason that they should be marked by the absence of every excellence which goes to make up worthy treatises on such subjects. A text-book for colleges, as this declares itself to be, needs peculiarly to have not only the virtues of accuracy in fact, intelligence in judgment, and clearness of statement, but also the higher excellence of nearly complete presentment of the whole subject. We state beforehand the standard by which we judge this work, because it has received praise in some quarters to which one looks for good judgment; this praise being given, apparently, to the book merely as an American book on the fine arts, not to any actual praiseworthy qualities of the work itself. Judged by any standard, the work is very inadequate; but judged by the standard by which we have a right to try a new and somewhat pretentious setting forth of the elements of criticism, it is very much worse than useless, a very harmful book to any college student or general reader who might take it as an authority.

There is the less danger of this, however, because the most prominent characteristic of the book is a nearly unequalled confusion of thought and vagueness of expression. It is one of the most difficult books to read we ever opened. The mind slips off from its loose, unattractive sentences. After having read a section, the next thing to do is to go back and see what it has all been about. Even when the meaning is evident, the style is very loose and inelegant. "At sixteen he [Sir Edwin Landseer] executed the famous St. Bernard dogs rescuing a traveller from the snow, which his father engraved and made his very best work in that line of art." "From the first Landseer continued to be self-educated." "The rapidly succeeding volumes of Ruskin are at once an indication of the new and native field for criticism now open in England and America, as well as the popular demand for information in this department of liberal study." "Landscape gardening, broad in its sensual appeals, is restricted in its spiritual addresses." "As the masters and instructors of the races peopling Africa, quick and energetic in grasping rudimentary conceptions, docile as learners and untiring in application, Asiatic lords have advanced this art among rude tribes, as they did in ancient Egypt, just so far and so long as their rule has extended."

We have taken pains to note one class of mistakes, not throughout the work but in a section here and there, namely, mistakes of fact. The number of these is extraordinary. They are heaped together in some places; total mistakes of fact, inaccuracies, misconceptions of meaning, and misapplications of critical remarks. If we turn to a place where these mistakes are thickest, as on pages 444 and 445, it is difficult to point out all the wrongness of the text. We find Dr. Samson arguing that "while the Byzantine style was rising in the East to such magnificence, the Roman Basilica was declining in worth and in favor," and this because the Goths had come to Rome; and that, as for the Goths, "though they failed to introduce Gothic architecture into Italy, they arrested the spread of the Roman style northward." In the first place, the greatest Roman (and other) basilicas were built just at the time that Byzantine architecture was, etc.—that is, between A.D. 350 and 550; secondly, the barbarians who came to Rome built those same basilicas, with willing though ignorant energy, in Ravenna and Milan and wherever they wanted churches; thirdly, Gothic architecture was not of the Goths in any sense, the word "Gothic" as applied to the art in question being of the seventeenth century; fourthly, the "Gothic" architecture did spread all over Italy; fifthly, the Roman style had spread all over Europe before the Goths were heard of, and was as common in Britain as in the imperial city; sixthly, it was as rapidly abandoned in Rome as in France, and for the same reasons.

In the next paragraph we are told that "the style of roof in every cottage" in Piedmont and Switzerland is a "style of knife-blade roof as universal as the short petticoat skirts of the mountain women, and as unchanging as the everlasting hills themselves," and that the use of these roofs is to "cut and throw off the deluge of snow falling at the mountain's foot, or the avalanche slipping from its sides!" The fact is that there are no steep-roofed cottages in Switzerland or Tyrol or the mountain valleys of Piedmont. We are next offered the thousand times exploded theory that the vaulting of a Gothic church is derived from the "intertwining of the arching boughs of forest trees;" a theory born during the times when the history of architecture was as unknown as geology, and impossible to be held by any one who understands either the science or the history of vaulted construction. Going on a few lines we find it stated that "the Gothic architecture never penetrated further southward than Milan," leaving us wondering what to call the style of architecture of the cathedral and bell-tower and half the churches at Florence, of the cathedral and town-hall of Siena, and the numerous and lovely buildings of three centuries throughout the peninsula. But Mr. Sampson finds that Milan cathedral, "though truly Gothic in external tracery and pinnacles, is truly Grecian in its window caps and in the statues tipping its pinnacles, showing"—various things. But the mistake here is that the "Grecian" window caps were built in the latter half of the sixteenth century by a great architect of the Renaissance, and that the bastard Gothic of the west front and most of the insipid statues are more modern still, having been entirely built since 1800. All the sections which treat of architecture are as inaccurate as they can well be; but, as is not surprising, this art is the most hardly treated of any. What chance has an American, guided by such authorities as Mr. Samson quotes, and starting with the confounding of the arts of building and of architecture, to ap-proach the truth even accidentally? To Mr. Samson there is really no difference between a beaver's building and a man's, and both are architecture.

There is a little more matter and fewer fatal mistakes in the essay on painting than elsewhere. But this also is made useless to students by the faultiness of the criticisms which it contains—criticisms generally borrowed, it is true, from some one of the writers on the fine arts who from Schlegel to Waagen, from Fuseli to Mrs. Jameson, have done so much to confuse the subject.

We cannot do justice to this book, and may as well stop at one place as at another. It is a matter of great regret that any respectable journals should have carelessly praised it.

Walks and Homes of Jesus. Rev. Daniel March. (Philadelphia: Presbyterian Publication Society. 1867.)—Among Congregational clergymen there are some more learned than Mr. March, there are many whose names are far better known, but the denomination contains few preachers who better unite wide culture with the earnestness without which a preacher is nothing. So he writes a sermon which one cannot help listening to, and which one, after listening to it, willingly reads. This pleasant book, one of the pleasantest of its kind that we have ever read, may be said to be composed of such sermons. We are never suffered to forget the heavenly home and our walk thither while reading of the earthly walks and abiding-places of the Saviour. For the rest, one knows Palestine better after seeing the frequently vivid and always clear pictures which Mr. March draws for us, and a man who has not read the Gospels with the helps that such books as this aim to give, and this one succeeds in giving, has much to learn as well as a pleasure to come.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

THE WORK BEFORE THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

THE three constitutions framed successively by the people of New York have had such an important influence upon the whole nation that we may reasonably expect the action of the convention which has just been elected, in case of its ratification by the people, to have a like influence. Its deliberations, therefore, will be of some interest to the whole country, which has a right to expect from New York an example of genuine reform. The New York constitution of 1777 furnished the basis of the Federal Constitution adopted in 1789; while the adoption here in 1846 of an elective judiciary, of elections by single districts, and of a system of decentralization, led many other States to follow in the same path.

The first duty of the convention will be to secure to its members the amplest freedom of discussion. Already some impatience is expressed in certain quarters at the prospect of much talk and a long session. Against such impatience, however natural it may be, we would most earnestly warn the convention. The subjects for its consideration are few, but each of them exceedingly complex in its nature and bearings, as well as momentous in importance. They have been scarcely discussed at all in public; and the members of the convention will find within two weeks from their assembling that not twenty of them are of one mind upon any one point, owing to the lack of that comparison of views in public which enables parties to harmonize and unite in support of definite policies.

Thus, for example, a majority of the delegates from the interior are likely to be satisfied with the workings of the elective judiciary system in their own neighborhood, while fully convinced of the evils produced by the same system in the city of New York. The few Republican members from the southern part of the State will feel more interest in the abolition of the elective judiciary than in any other question; while the Democrats have nominated some of their worst men for the purpose of securing the retention of that system at any cost. There will thus be four or five sections in the convention upon this point, one desirous of the entire abolition of the elective system, another desirous of its entire preservation, another wishing to abolish it in the cities, while retaining it in the country, another proposing to elect judges by the whole State instead of by districts, and still others of different views. Many days of earnest argument will be needed to develop out of such conflicting ideas a theory which will command the necessary assent of the people. Discussion, then, of the fullest and freest nature, is the first necessity of the convention.

In the next place, courage is imperatively required. The convention meets in the midst of gigantic evils. There is no doubt in the minds of well-informed men that our legislators are bought and sold like cattle, that our public prosecutors are habitually bought off or menaced off the line of duty, that our jails are hot-beds of crime, and that a large number of inferior judicial officers, with several judges of high rank, are more vile than the thieves whom they sentence. Yet no one dares to attack these plunderers openly, or to say in public a tithe of what he knows. The convention, in order to command popular support for the radical reforms which it will desire to effect, ought to search out these iniquities. It will have plenty of members who can expose them if they will, and a few who have both the ability and the disposition to do so, if encouraged by their associates. But the danger is that timid counsels will keep these men silent, or persuade them to speak in such euphuistic language as to leave no impression upon the public mind. If the legal members from the cities of New York and Brooklyn would only tell in plain words half that they know of the frightful corruptions that prevail there, we should have no doubt of the result, either in the convention or upon the popular vote.

There are abundant indications of a design on the part of the railroad and canal interests to break down all the barriers interposed by the present constitution to the creation of debt and to schemes for squandering public property. It is to be hoped that all such efforts will be resisted to the last. The restrictions of the constitution of 1846 upon the creation of public debt, upon the loan of the public credit, and upon all measures expending the funds of the State upon private or local objects, need tightening rather than relaxing. The provision making revocable all grants to corporations should be extended to grants of every kind, so as to prevent the repetition of the disgraceful trick by which valuable franchises have been given away by irrepealable acts to groups of individuals, who immediately afterward organized themselves into corporations. But these very men are strongly represented in the convention, and will, we fear, be able to defeat this just and necessary amendment.

The local nominations have, upon the whole, been of such a character as to give us more hope of a good result from the labors of the convention than we felt immediately after the nominations had been made for the State at large. There will be many able, experienced, and honest men in the convention; and if they will but bring courage, patience, and perseverance to their work, we believe that the new constitution may disappoint the enemies of reform and prove a triumphant success.

THE LABOR CRISIS.

WHAT with strikes, trades unions, and the eight-hour agitation, the labor market is unsettled to a degree never before known, and not in this country only, but in France and England. The English artisans have not only brought their own organizations to great perfection, but they have succeeded in effecting a union with those of France and Belgium, so as to prevent the masters resorting, as they have frequently done, to either of those countries for labor during strikes at home. The bronze-workers and tailors, who are now on a strike in Paris, are actually assisted in holding out by contributions from the English trades unions, and the control of these trades unions over their own members offers one of the best illustrations yet witnessed of the force of democratic government, of the completeness of the obedience which men will render to authority of their own creation, even when it has no physical force at its back. It is quite true that these organizations do exact on all questions affecting the relations between employer and employed a complete sacrifice of individual tastes, opinions, and interests, and do inflict on anybody who disobeys their orders that most terrible of punishments, the reprobation of his own class; and this apparent tyranny has called down on them the unsparing denunciation both of English and French economists. But then it must be remembered that nothing short of this kind of discipline will effect the object in view. Nothing but perfect union amongst the workmen can give them their way as against the capitalists, and no penalties less severe than those now enforced would ensure this union. To abuse the trades unions, therefore, for tyranny, is to abuse them for existing at all, and this, of course, leaves the main question untouched.

The extension of the English organization to the Continent is perhaps the most striking result of the wonderful power of combination developed of late years amongst the working classes. It is partly the result of a congress held a year ago at Geneva, which was mainly managed by Englishmen, but which contained delegates from most of the Continental countries. The congress, however, was but a meeting of an association founded three or four years before and called the "International Association of Working-men," which now numbers over 150,000 members in England, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy. Capital, wages, hours of labor, the condition of women, and various other subjects interesting to working-men, were freely discussed at it; an enormous amount of nonsense being talked, as might have been expected, the French and Italian workmen contributing the greater portion of it. But although they came to some very well defined conclusions on a variety of topics, the only practical result of the meeting was the establishment of unity of action as well as of sentiment between the English and Continental working-men, so that the English can strike now with a tolerable certainty that they will not be broken down by importations from France and Belgium.

The great strikes in England hitherto have been amongst the iron workers, carpenters, and masons. Within the last month the engine-drivers have struck on some of the principal lines of railroad, causing such inconvenience to the public in the neighborhood of London as almost to throw the whole machinery of business out of gear. They struck for higher wages, for equal wages for all capacities, and for promotion by seniority and not by merit. The rise in wages they carried, and compromised on the other points—a man passed over by the traffic manager having the right of appeal to the board of directors in case he thinks he has been unjustly treated. But they revealed in the course of the strike an amount of ability, good sense, moderation in statement, and power of combination which has astonished all England and alarmed a considerable portion of it. They published a paper, too, called The Train, which presented their case with remarkable cogency and yet with great self-restraint. The result was that they were met and reasoned with, both by the daily and weekly press, with an amount of respect and consideration such as, we believe, no body of strikers has ever before received. In fact, the art of combination is being brought to such perfection in all the trades that there will very soon not be one left in England which will not be able to make its terms with employers as one man while backed up by the resources of hundreds of thousands.

In America the trades unions are almost as powerful and strikes are as general if not as effective as in England. But the American workmen wield one weapon which is not within the reach of their European brethren, and that is political power, and this they are now using very freely to secure what no strike would ever induce capitalists to agree to, and that is the withdrawal from employers and employed of the power of fixing their relations by contract. The eight-hour movement, when it was first started two or three years ago, was laughed at by most men of intelligence outside the class who have appropriated to their exclusive use the title of "working-men." For a while it was little more than mentioned in the press, and was pooh-poohed by employers as something utterly wild and chimerical, which was hardly worth serious opposition. But it has, nevertheless, grown steadily, and is in most States either producing legislation or in a fair way to produce it. By holding aloof from the two great political parties and using their votes solely with reference to the eight-hour scheme, the "working-men" have brought the political leaders to their feet, and now no convention ever draws up a platform without inserting in it a small parcel of twaddle on the "rights of labor," advocating legislative interference with contracts. In every canvass, too, desperate efforts are made to fasten on each candidate the charge of hostility to this delusion, and the candidate makes herculean efforts to repudiate what is in reality a tribute to his intelligence. The thing has, as might be expected, a wonderful fascination for some philanthropists and reformers who confound sympathy with the working classes with participation in their errors and fallacies, and people who insist that the working-man will be injured by the forcible curtailment of his hours of labor are denounced either as selfish "aristocrats" or cold-hearted monsters. At first we were informed that the object of the eight-hour restriction was to give the working-man more time for "self-culture," and that if this involved diminution of wages, why, he was ready to submit to it as the less of two evils. But we now hear from the West that this stage of the agitation has been passed, and that in Chicago, for instance, it is demanded that the same wages shall be paid for eight hours' work as for ten, or, in other words, that while production is diminished by one-fifth the laborer's share in the product shall be raised by one-fifth. What is more extraordinary is that there is a whole army of orators and writers all over the country who persist in believing or affecting to believe that if every laborer in the country works less than he ever did before, he can still have just as many comforts as he now enjoys. In reality, we might as well attempt by legislation to prevent people from being hurt when they fall as to make the amount of comfort they enjoy independent of the amount of work they do; but, from present appearances, there is no way of convincing working-men of this short of actual experiment.

We confess that, in spite of the demonstrations of the folly of strikes which political economists offer every day, and the homilies which the press so frequently delivers upon them, we believe they form as good a means as can at present be devised of fixing the rate of wages and the nature of all other relations between employers and employed. In most of the dissertations we listen to on the "identity of interest" which exists between labor and capital, it is assumed not only that the laborer's share of the product of labor will reach him through the natural working of economical laws, but that it will reach him at once. The fact is it does not. All the economical laws work surely no doubt, but they work slowly, which is tantamount to saying that for awhile they do not work at all. When labor is scarce and capital plenty and profits high, laborers ought immediately to receive higher wages, but they do not. Employers do not go to them and say, "We can afford to pay you so much; here it is." They go into the market and give as little as they can. The workmen are poor, often ignorant, know little of the state of the markets, and live from hand to mouth. They have not any of the means which the employer has of ascertaining what profits are likely to be, or what labor is worth. He gives them no access to his books, and they have no time to watch and listen and figure and calculate as he does. All they know of what profits are or wages ought to be is what he pleases to tell them. If they were to go to him singly and tell him they thought the state of the market entitled them to an advance, he could dismiss them, and dismissal to a man acting alone might mean ruin or great inconvenience. So that the only way they have of ascertaining what their wages ought to be is by "striking," that is, abstaining from work in concert, and ensuring this concert by the pressure of opinion on their fellows. If their wages are as high as is fair, employers will not give in; if they are not as high as profits will warrant, employers will give in; and the laborer gets his due. Such a mode of settling a dispute about an economical fact—for such it really is—is no doubt rough and even barbarous, but it is the only one we have at present. The interests of labor and capital, no doubt, are identical; but neither employer nor employed believes them to be so, and act as if they were sure they were not. Each mistrusts the other, not altogether through ignorance of political economy, but because both are human.

We therefore confess that we think strikes and trades unions are the best, and—until the co-operative system is generally adopted, and workmen are treated as partners, their wages made dependent on profits and not on the extent to which the employers can conceal the amount of their profits, and are allowed access to the books—will continue to be the only mode by which contracts between laborers and capitalists can be based on justice. The abuse of them at present is due to the ignorance and want of culture, moral as well as mental, of the people who strike. But a whole trade abstaining from work by concert, and aiding the members to hold out by savings previously accumulated for this express purpose, is, we think, not only a gratifying spectacle, but the only means by which the contract between the laborer and capitalist, as laborers and capitalists now are, can be made really free, and by which the laborer can be enabled to treat on equal terms. There is still in the relations of labor and capital a large amount of feudalism. The laborer is still in Europe, and to a certain extent here, in the position of a feudal servant, and has not yet reached the dignity which political economists assign him (on paper) of a party to a contract. The growth of manufactures, too, in all countries, has thus far tended to perpetuate, in a modified form, it is true, and on a different sphere, the relations of lord and serf. The mode in which all the great manufactures are carried on in England, France, Belgium, and here, by a few great capitalists employing small armies of operatives of all ages and both sexes, who live by fixed daily wages and are dependent for their bread on the employer's pleasure and on the ups and downs of the money market, and who cannot, by any forethought or vigilance or influence they can exert, give any certainty or stability to the business in which they are engaged, is one which, we do not hesitate to say, is hostile to free government, and which will, if nothing better can be substituted for it, prove disastrous in the end. No community is in a sound or healthy condition in which any large portion of the community is forced to commit its fortunes to the caprice or the ability of a few individuals, and in which the principal result of great production is the multiplication at the same time of very large fortunes and of day laborers. We shall never see again a society so sound as that which is passing away in New England, composed of educated and intelligent men who had nothing to fear from anybody's frown, to whom labor and its resources were always sure, and whose fortunes were always in their own keeping, until operatives and capitalists become partners in fact as well as in theory, and until wages are fixed not by a trial of the workman's ability to stand starvation, but by an inspection of the books.

It is because we see in the present disturbance in the labor market signs that this good time is coming, that workmen are really tired of being servants, and are determined to be ruled, as far as possible, by law and not by individual will, that we do not regret it. But better means of postponing this result indefinitely could hardly be resorted to than the invocation of legislative interference with contracts. This would simply be the substitution of one kind of slavery for another. The cause of the workman's condition now is that he is not fully master of his own destiny, that he is ignorant of most of the facts which affect his condition, that this condition depends largely on the foresight or skill or honesty of persons over whom he has no control, and that there is little or no field offered for the display of extraordinary industry or ability. If the law once steps in to fix the number of hours he shall labor, his complete independence will be further off than ever; it will next fix the amount of his wages and who knows what beside, and all business will every year be at the mercy of politicians, who will use their power of regulating labor, as they now use their power of granting franchises, for their own ends. From such a state of things capital would take to itself wings and fly away, and labor would soon be glad to follow, to escape the very "leisure" for which laborers are now clamoring so loudly. The great enemy to short hours is not capital but the laws of nature. As long as the soil bears only one crop a year, and cold and hunger kill, and everything we eat, drink, or wear has to be procured by so many hours of somebody's toil, the attempt to get more by working less will be as futile as an attempt to lengthen the days by altering the figures in the almanac.

THE STARS AGAIN.

We have received from an eminent mathematician the following criticism of our review of Mr. Ennis's book in The Nation of March 21. We have only space for one extract, but it contains all that is really criticism of our critique; the rest is a discussion of the nebular hypothesis:

> "The able writer in The Nation for March 21, who exposes the fundamental blunders of a book that nevertheless contains chapters of some real merit and value, will, doubtless, on reflection, admit that he himself has fallen into one hasty but rather important error, against which it is worth while to caution his own readers. Let us quote him:
> "'An insurmountable defect in the nebular hypothesis . . . [is that] gravity cannot account for the motions of revolution in a system of bodies.'
> "It certainly cannot, unless the system has been influenced by others, and perhaps without something like the nebular hypothesis we could not expect such influence; but admitting that hypothesis, the wonder would be if suns and systems did not revolve."

Our critic appears to have interpreted the words "insurmountable defect in the nebular hypothesis" as synonymous with a "fatal objection" to it; but it was far from the scope and purpose of our criticism to prove this hypothesis untenable. We only showed that it was not established, as it was claimed to be, by the book reviewed. We did not review the nebular hypothesis itself. The defect attributed to it by the best previous writers whom Mr. Ennis quotes may not be a serious one. The mutual actions of nebulous masses on one another may have originated the motions in a system which the mutual actions of the parts of the system itself were incompetent to produce, and this incompetency is not therefore fatal to the hypothesis. But the invalidity of the objection is not attributable to any deficiency in the mathematical insight of the writers quoted in Mr. Ennis's book, as his reasonings imply; and it was only in this sense that we ventured to pronounce it "insurmountable."

The solution proposed by our critic is a very important one, and is the same as that suggested in a more general discussion of the subject by the critic of Mr. Ennis's book in the current number of The North American Review.

"ADVERTISEMENTS FROM PARNASSUS."

Several of the learned historians and philosophic observers of society who are employed to write the ablest foreign letters in our American journals receive in payment of their services a pittance so miserable that, being quite unable to visit the countries of which they write, they are compelled to pursue their researches in this city. The expenses of a journey to Western Pennsylvania are not great, yet we have been made privy to the fact that a very clever statistician and prose poet, employed "to do" the oil regions for the journal to which he belonged, found it advisable to collect what meagre information he could from hand-books and the relations of travellers, and to construct from the materials thus more cheaply gathered such an account of Pithole and the adjacent country as might satisfy his penurious taskmasters. People have endeavored to discredit the proverb, but there is too much reason to fear that history does repeat itself. Perhaps the state of literature reached its lowest depression some century ago, when the unfortunate Smart, who once translated Horace—indeed, he does it yet in those places where youths recite Latin lessons—actually executed in favor of a publisher a regularly signed and sealed ninety nine years' lease of himself, the lessor receiving by way of rent what would suffice to keep his soul and body, or rather the lessee's soul and body, together and in reasonable repair. After his time the profession of literature began to look up, and by gradual improvement not only became to some extent reputable, but even has been a source of emolument to some authors, and probably to some publishers a source of honest gains. In our own day we have even seen a historian received as a valued friend, with the respect due to his genius, at a most genteel soirée in an Emperor's palace, where Imperial condescension was so displayed as to bring tears to the eyes of its happy object. But this case must be allowed exceptional. An Emperor who has written books "to prove that the sheep was created for the wolf" may well honor the "simple republican" and brother author, whose books seem to show one and his letters a second and more convincing proof of this unpopular truth. But, as we have said, there are what appear to be plain indications that our men of letters are going back to the position which the fraternity held in the days of Smart. Already we have mentioned some instances which show how far on this retrograde track some of the men of letters living among us have been forced to go. We suppose that in every department of literary activity examples equally depressing could easily be found. But the writer has neither spirits nor opportunity, nor is there space in an essay necessarily brief, to pursue the subject through all its manifold ramifications. But we may be able to present properly some considerations growing out of facts to be observed in one particular walk of literature to which we have had occasion to pay a good deal of attention.

We are not of those who hold Mr. Dallas's theory that the end of the fine arts, poetry and prose among the rest, is pleasure. We do not, therefore, claim for advertisements the highest, nor even a high place, in literature, though they do delight one entire half of the human race, and though even among men the number who derive unalloyed satisfaction from the perusal of ship news, prices current, and other forms of prose closely allied to the advertisement, is probably indefinitely greater than the number of those who seek their pleasure in less useful prose literature. But, we say again, pleasure is not the end of the fine arts. And if, turning from the object of art, we look to the intellect which is implied in each performance of the artist, we think it cannot be denied that both in the matter of imaginative power, and as regards labor of the understanding, the writer of advertisements is surpassed—in our opinion he is very far surpassed—by many of his fellows. Indeed, the advertisement has, as a matter of fact, been a field of literature always rather despised and disregarded by the ablest hands, and hitherto—though, of course, almost all writers have at one time and another employed their abilities in the production of advertisements—no able writer, either in prose or in verse, has made his reputation by them, or devoted himself to them, as Milton, for instance, devoted himself to epic poetry, Gibbon to history, Boswell to biography, Blackstone to law, Jeffrey to critique-writing, and other men each to some special literary pursuit. On the whole, we are persuaded that on any true æsthetic theory, as well as historically, the advertisement must be pronounced a form of literature of little merit and of but little consideration among writers.

Thus it has been. Thus it is not now; thus, at the least, it is now ceasing to be. It is evident to the student of our contemporary literature that some of our most learned, some of our most fanciful and sprightliest, some of our wisest and most religious, and, finally, some of our most influential, writers have been compelled to give themselves up to the drudgery of inventing and polishing advertisements. Philosophy, which in a happier era, within the recollection of men not old, procured for its expounders on the platform of the lecture-room and in the printed page not only honor but a competency, no longer is seen in "Letters to Young Men," in "Counsels and Comforts for Mothers," in all those works which have made famous the names of A. K. H. B., Mr. Tupper, and certain Americans whom we will not here vaingloriously name. Historical insight, erudition, imagination, eloquence, piety, which once depicted for us the man of destiny scaling the Alps, with his profile of classic harmony, or shuddering and raising his orbs to heaven when the ambitious Pitt resolved to break the Peace of Amiens and plunge France and Europe into the tremendous waves of a sanguinary conflict; which led us to the city of the great king; which showed us the sacred mountains and the Adirondacks, and the shapely limbs and imperturbable calmness of Washington and his generals; which have revealed to us every land and people of the Old World—these have all betaken themselves, or begun to betake themselves, to the cultivation of the once despised advertisement, the literature of publishers.

Why should some certain social philosophers live in ceiled houses, with couches of curiously carved ivory, be honored wherever the schoolmaster or the principal of the seminary is abroad in the land, while the author of the passage following, as like the workmanship of the masters above alluded to as one Springfield musket is like another, is the obscure "hired help" of a bookseller—Samson toiling for the Philistines? It is only because of the lapse of years. Since the Abbotts and Headleys and Country Parsons made their entrance on the American and English stage literature has steadily declined. The former days were better than these. But here is the passage. It is about "a perfect little romance," "How I Managed my Children from Infancy to Marriage":

> "A noble Christian mother here tells us how she successfully reared up eight children, directing and developing their physical, mental, and religious natures, and prepared them for useful and creditable positions in life. The joys, sorrows, and trials which are the common lot of every loving household are feelingly told, and the benediction, 'Well done, good and faithful' mother, springs up in every reader's heart as the book is closed."

And again, in an advertisement of "Comfort for Small Incomes," we are reminded of the same breed of philosophers, and perhaps even more strongly than by what we may respectfully call the dry-nurse vein in the sentences just quoted. Evidently the mind behind the pen of the advertiser is the full mind of the born preacher and teacher and the acute mind of the social philosopher. We admire his tact, we submit to his government.

> "Profit by it," he says—he means the work which it is his fate to puff—"profit by it, and many a perplexity will vanish, many an anxious heart grow calm, and many a home bright with peace and plenty. Of all traits of character, none goes further or wins more than tact. This the advice of these books, if followed, will develop. Of all attractive spheres, none is more so than that of government; and of the order, system, and managing faculty requisite for government Mrs. Warren gives a thorough exposition."

Once such writing would have gained for its author an assured place in letters, and book agents would be selling his biography of Grant or his "Battles of the Republic" in every county of the West.

We take space for another excerpt from the works of the same or a fellow-workman, who is employed to advertise novels. To throw a charm, a human interest, round the trivial objects of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms (our critic will agree with us) is to exercise the God-given faculty, man's highest endowment, of imagination. The object of his eulogy is the creature, to most men contemptible, which has been designated "The Cockney Chatterer." To the genial eye of the artist whose hand is visible in the advertisement he is fine and worthy, and is thus exalted. The critic gracefully goes back to the days of Swift, Smollett, Sterne, and Fielding, whom he contrasts with the author of "Broken to Harness;—'" "their barbed satire," he says, "fell upon peasant as well as upon prince, upon the duchess no more than upon the maid; while now the ink-marked messenger of sneers seems levelled entirely at the higher and presumed to be more criminal orders of society, while the lower ranks, though drawn with a rough pencil, are endowed with rough virtues;" and the author of "Running the Gauntlet" is declared a social satirist, whose "subtle exposition of great facilities to crime in the higher ranks of life passes from the small amusement of novel-reading into the conscious heart of the struggling people."

We have given specimens enough, but we dislike to withhold this one, which is far superior to the others. It opens with a philosophic stroke: "The supremacy of taste is the genius of social, as patriotism is that of political, communities." The next sentence is of woman, the whole, by the way, being an advertisement of "Madame Demorest's Mirror of Fashion" and some similar works. But no milliner wrote it; more likely some decayed art critic or metaphysic philosopher who ought to have lived before the evil days:

> "It requires a high order of the inventive faculty to originate judicious ornament, and none but our Supreme Master could create so much perfection, adaptable as woman is to be illustrated into more expressive social and intellectual influence, by those suggestions of the student of ornamentation."

Everywhere we see similar proofs of decadence in the estate of literary men. To think that it is literature itself which is rising in the demands it makes upon its followers; that even the humblest of her servants must be an accomplished scholar and an able thinker; that she requires the advertisement writer to be a philosopher or a poet—to think this, which would indeed be as encouraging as the view we have taken is discouraging, is as impossible as it is to dream because one wishes pleasant visions. None would more gladly than we welcome the day when literature should be so exalted that the maker of an advertising miscellany should be required to be an Admirable Crichton. That day is not yet. We see, rather, in the signs to which we have hastily referred, proofs that we are advancing backward to the days when Mrs. Warren, wife of Warren's Blacking, said, "We keeps a poet." Our Mrs. Warren keeps, as we have seen, a philosopher. And there is an ominous story told of Mr. Longfellow and a persevering manufacturer who invaded him at Nahant.

HOW SHALL WE SPELL?

How our English words shall be spelt is a matter concerning which the great mass of those to whom the language is native appear to have pretty fully made up their minds. They intend to tolerate no change in the present orthography. Those who put forth proposals for its alteration, whether in certain words and classes of words only, or upon a wider scale, are set down and laughed at without mercy. The public sentiment is perhaps stronger and more unanimous upon the subject than ever before. There was a time when the movement toward a consistent spelling, of which the Fonetik Nuz was a conspicuous exponent, wore in the eyes of many persons a threatening aspect; but it now seems dangerous to nobody. Reaction, even, is the order of the day. The orthographical "improvements" made by that unscrupulous radical, Noah Webster, have been one by one abandoned and ignored by his editors. The writing of honor for honour, and the like, was once pretty well established throughout America, and making progress in England itself; at present it is quite crushed out in the latter country, and many American scholars and publishers are giving it up, in shame and confusion of face. And yet there are, from time to time, voices raised also upon the other side of the question; even efforts seriously made—doubtless with some hope of a successful issue—to bring about that sweeping revolution which we, the English-speakers at large, are determined neither to encourage nor to allow. To mention only one or two of those which have last come under our notice: a company has been formed at Mendota, in Illinois, "with a capital of $35,000," for carrying through the great national reform in spelling and introducing a new and strictly phonetic alphabet; the American Philological Society (in and of New York) has put forth, as a feeler of the public pulse, if not as the direct suggestion of reform, a phonetic allegory on the late war and its causes, the "History of Magnus Maharba" (Abraham); and a senator of the United States has moved to devote a part of the superfluous public funds to paying a mixed commission, who shall devise and report a plan for a consistent orthography. The subject, then, is still in some degree an open one before the public mind. Or, if we are to regard the influence of these few unquiet spirits as too insignificant to be made much account of, we may at any rate take a satisfaction in reviewing the position we hold against them, and realizing anew its strength and security.

No one, we presume, will be found to question that one very important reason why we cleave to our present modes of spelling is the simple fact that they are ours. We have learned them by dint of diligent study, if not of painful effort; we are used to them; our spoken words in any other garb would look to us strange and quaint, or even ridiculous. To give them up would imply a revolution, such an overthrow of a grand institution, firmly rooted in the usages and predilections of a wide community, as no race or generation has ever yet been willing to permit, save under the pressure of some great and profoundly felt necessity. But we acknowledge no such necessity; far from this, we think we see a variety of reasons why our favorite institution is preferable to any that could be put in its place. Precisely here, however, we ought to feel most distrustful of the ground we stand upon. It is so easy to overvalue, or even wholly to misinterpret, reasons apparently favoring conclusions which we are already determined to reach! Let us, then, enter into a summary examination of the alleged advantages of our present English orthography, for the purpose of determining both what is their actual worth, and how far we rely upon them in our defence of the institution.

First to be noticed among the advantages referred to is the convenient discrimination to the eye of homonyms, or words which are pronounced alike, but have a different origin and meaning. A familiar example is afforded us in the written distinction of meet, meat, and mete, another in that of to, too, and two; such triplets, as every one knows, are not very rare in our language, and couples of the same sort are to be counted by scores. Now, we have to observe that any credit which is given to our written language in this particular must be taken away from our spoken language. We gain nothing by writing the uttered syllables meet and too in a variety of ways, unless, when uttered, they are of ambiguous meaning. If our minds are for even the briefest moment puzzled by such expressions as "he goes to Boston," "he goes two miles," "he goes too far," not knowing which too is meant in either case, then it is worth while to avoid a like difficulty in our reading by spelling the word differently. But who will consent to make so damaging an admission? There is a language in the world, the Chinese, where the words are so few, and their meanings so many, that orthographic differences are brought in as an important aid to comprehension, and the writing follows, upon a grand scale, not the utterance alone, but the signification also. Thus, there are more than eleven hundred ways of writing the word ĕ, and other words count their representatives by hundreds, by scores, or by tens. A host of devices have to be resorted to there in spoken speech to get rid of the ambiguities which are wholly avoided in written. Our English, however, is not afflicted with such poverty of expression as to be brought to this strait. We have also three different founds—found from find, found meaning "establish," and found meaning "cast, mould"—between which, we venture to say, no soul ever thought of making a confusion, though they are all spelt with the same letters. Is there any one who cannot tell, by the ear or by the eye, when cleave means "stick together," and when it means "part asunder?" Who ever finds any more difficulty in separating bear, "bruin," from bear, "carry," than in separating either of these from bare, "naked?" Of how infinitesimal value, then, is the Chinese principle, as introduced into English usage! We may blot out every vestige of it from our vocabulary to-morrow, and it will never be missed; the written language will still continue to be as good as the spoken: and if any one is not content with that, let him migrate and learn another tongue. If the principle is to be kept and made much of, let us agree to give it a more consistent application: let us not spell alike words so different in history and use as the three founds; when the same vocable diverges into meanings widely dissimilar, let us vary its spelling a little to match, not writing in the same way "she became ill" and "her dress became her," nor letting the lawyer and the lover go to court in the same orthographic fashion; yet more, when there has been a divergence of pronunciation as well, as when a minúte portion of time has become a mínute; let us separate he rĕad from he rēads, as we have separated he lĕd from he lēads; above all, let us not confound together in spelling words distinct in every other respect—derivation, sense, and utterance—like the verb lēad and the metal lĕad.

Consistency, however, of any kind in English spelling we have taught ourselves to regard as of little or no consequence; its value is quite overborne and thrown into the shade for us by that of the "historic" principle. If there is any one thing more than another that makes us content with, even proud of, our orthography, it is the fact that it is "historic." But wherein, again, lies the worth of the historic principle? Why, in its interesting suggestiveness, of course; in its exceeding importance to etymology. Very extreme claims have been made in its behalf in this latter respect by the enemies of the Fonetik Nuz party. Thus, an English Quarterly reviewer, taking Max Müller to task for the few words in favor of the inherent desirableness of a phonetic mode of spelling boldly spoken by him in the last series of his lectures on language, asks "who would have either time or energy enough to master the history of this single language" if we strike out the traces of the origin of its words still preserved in their spelling? and he adds that the introduction of a phonetic system "in the second generation would break the backs of philological students, and in the third render their existence impossible" (the latter catastrophe, as we may remark, being a very natural consequence of the former). And the latest American writer on the English language (Professor Schele De Vere) echoes these sentiments, maintaining that "if the form were to follow the sound, there would soon not a single trace be left of the language used by our forefathers;" and that, "if the Fonetik Nuz had been started a thousand years ago, it is safe to assert that nobody would have had either the courage or the time to attempt mastering the history of our language." Now, we doubt not that these gentlemen conceived themselves to be making a stout fight in defence of the guild of etymologists, threatened with the cutting off of one of its chief sources of gain, and to be winning a title to its collective and profound gratitude. But, save us from such champions! they may be allowed to speak for themselves, since they know best their own infirmity of back and need of braces; the rest of the guild, however, will thank them for nothing. If the English were like the Tibetan, for example, a dialect of unknown history and of exceedingly obscure character and relations, the philologists who first came upon it would naturally be delighted to find its words, like the Tibetan, crowded full of silent consonants and built about mispronounced vowels—all relics, or at least presumed ones, of former modes of utterance. But the two cases are not, in fact, altogether parallel. Of the English we have abundant monuments coming from nearly every century since before the time of Alfred, or say for eleven or twelve hundred years; and the chief fault which we have to find with them as illustrations of the history of the language is that they are so little regardful of the phonetic principle. The confused orthography of the Anglo-Saxon itself is an obstacle in the way of our fully understanding its orthoepic aspect, and the difficulty grows constantly worse from that time to the present. Painful researches into the history of the changes in English pronunciation are now in progress which would be rendered unnecessary if the written literature of each period had represented in an orderly and consistent manner its own modes of utterance. There is in existence a manuscript poem, the "Ormulum," of the Semi-Saxon period of our literature (A.D. 1150–1250), apparently in the author's own hand, no one else having ever thought well enough of it to copy it; and a tedious work it is, indeed; but for us it has a high and peculiar value, just for the reason that its author was a phonetic fanatic, and wrote it out in a consistent mode of spelling of his own devising, one that throws a deal of light upon the condition of the spoken language of his time. While we have the sources of our English fully within our reach in the Anglo-Saxon and old French literatures, it is the height of unreason to assert that our reading of English etymologies is in any manner dependent upon the current historic orthography.

But, further, were this dependence as great as is claimed, we are still puzzled to see how it should have any bearing upon the present practical question of a reform in spelling. Should even the Tibetan people desire to carry through such a reform—to write, for example, dag instead of bsgrags, mre instead of smras—the philologist would rather admire their good sense than quarrel with its results; having once obtained a record of the old written form, he is indifferent as to whether it be or be not longer kept up in popular usage. Do the writers whom we have quoted above imagine that the moment we adopt a new mode of spelling all the literature written in the old is to pass in a twinkling out of existence and out of memory? Certainly there are agencies which might be made use of to avert so bewildering a catastrophe. A society for the preservation of English etymologies might perhaps be organized, which should make a provident selection of old-style dictionaries and grammars, and store them away in a triply fire-proof library, for the young philologists of future times to be nursed upon until they could bear stronger food. It might even be found practicable, by ingenious and careful management, to procure the construction of a dictionary of the new-fangled idiom in which the former spelling of every word should be set alongside its modern substitute, in order to render possible the historic comprehension of the latter. Thus, to take an extreme case or two, the new word sam (a as in far), by having the explanation "anciently, psalm," added to it, would be sufficiently ensured against any such shocking suppositions on the part of the future student of English as that it pointed to Samuel instead of David as author of the sacred lyrics, or that it was a development out of the mystical letters "S. M." placed in the singing-books at the head of so many of their number; him (hymn) would be, by like means, saved from confusion with the personal pronoun—and so on. We do not wish to show an unbecoming levity or disrespect, but it is very hard to answer with anything approaching to seriousness such arguments as those we are combating; "absurd" and "preposterous," and such impolite epithets, fit them better than any others we can find in the English vocabulary. They are extreme examples of the fallacies to which learned men will sometimes resort in support of a favorite prejudice.

More of this, however, in a future article.

ENGLAND.

London, April 5, 1867.

There is just now a lull in the wearisome Reform debates; wearisome because they have this session turned upon such small and technical points that special knowledge is required to follow them. A good deal of such interest as they have possessed has been due to the personal contrast between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli—a contrast between genius and talent; between florid and elaborate, and yet impetuous, eloquence and clever, close parliamentary fencing. Mr. Gladstone is frequently run away with by his too fervid imagination, and Mr. Disraeli is sometimes duped by his excessive cleverness. The lovers of ingenious tactics are attracted by Mr. Disraeli and repelled by the too fiery temperament of Mr. Gladstone; whilst Mr. Gladstone is the idol of the popular enthusiasm everywhere outside Parliament and "society." Last night the contrast was curiously brought out. When Mr. Gladstone brought in his annual budget his aim, apparently, was to make arithmetic as amusing as fiction; his discursive eloquence carried him into all kinds of allied topics, and he delighted in showing his skill in manipulating complicated figures, sometimes for four or five hours together, as a juggler delights in keeping any number of balls in the air simultaneously. Mr. Disraeli last night apparently desired to give a specimen of the most opposite style. He was short, simple, and compact; the whole statement was given in an hour; and the greater part of the hour was devoted to explaining a device inherited from Mr. Gladstone. This I need not attempt to explain, further than to say that it was a plan for reducing our national debt; for at last our system of taxation seems to be tolerably fixed, and, as the revenue yearly rises, we have a fair surplus to dispose of. Although our military and naval expenditure has risen in sympathy with the increased continental armaments, there is this year about £2,000,000 surplus, owing to increased returns from the regular taxation. I cannot say that the reduction of the national debt promises to be anything surprising; but we are promised that by the year 1885 we shall get rid of £24,000,000; that is, I presume, if no wars intervene to raise it by a more than corresponding amount. What the chance may be of such a catastrophe passes not only my powers of prediction, but those of any chancellor of the exchequer. In truth, we cannot hope to imitate your example of a speedy reduction, much as it was praised last night by Mr. Gladstone, until we are able to retrench our warlike expenditure in peace, and our neighbors across the Channel seem little likely to help us in that direction.

Whilst the political debates of the hour excite—or are conventionally supposed to excite—the greatest interest, and, of course, occupy the greatest space in newspapers, there are signs of approaching social developments which are perhaps of greater real importance. The agricultural laborers, for example, have suddenly given signs of waking from their lethargy of years. We have become accustomed to strikes in most other classes. A week ago the engine-drivers and stokers of the Brighton Railway struck, to the immense inconvenience of travellers. The trains had to be driven at a slow pace by such inexperienced substitutes as the managers of the line could hastily provide; and it was rather unpleasant to feel that your life depended upon the skill of a man who, perhaps, knew nothing of the line, nor, for all you could tell, of engine-driving. However, after a day, a compromise was fortunately accepted; and the only result to the public has been the knowledge that another large class of working-men are gradually beginning to learn the power of combination. This, however, was comparatively to be expected. But it struck every one with all the force of novelty when it was announced that certain agricultural laborers in Buckinghamshire—one of the most backward districts of England—had actually ventured to strike. The astonishment could scarcely have been greater when Oliver Twist scandalized Mr. Bumble (if I recollect rightly) by "asking for more," nor, indeed, would it have been much greater had the cows or horses of the farmers stopped work. However, the laborers of Gawcott have actually struck; they have demanded 12s. a week; they have formed a committee and written to the papers, and they have even to a considerable extent succeeded; for money enough has been sent in answer to their appeal to enable them to emigrate to better paid districts. A similar movement has taken place in Devonshire, where it occurred to a clergyman that it might be as well to try to give his laborers bread as well as doctrine. They were habitually in the receipt of from 7s. to 8s. a week—a sum upon which it is hard to understand how the laborer's life can be supported, to say nothing of the laborer's wife and children. This clergyman (a Mr. Girdlestone) advertised that he was ready to supply laborers to employers, and speedily drafted off a large number of his parishioners to Yorkshire, Lancashire, and other counties where the presence of manufactures causes wages to be considerably higher.

The importance of this movement, if it spreads as it is likely to spread, it is difficult to overrate, and for a simple reason. The agricultural laborers, especially in the South and West of England, have hitherto been in a singularly backward condition; as a rule it may be said that they have only received enough wages to keep body and soul together, that anything like saving has been out of the question, and that their only hope for their old age has been in the workhouse. I need not ask what were the primary causes of this evil; but the remarkable thing has hitherto been that they have never adopted the obvious remedy. The Irishman, as you have good reason to know, has found a land of promise in America; but, without going so far, there have been plenty of English districts within easy reach where a great improvement of wages was to be obtained. By merely going as far as Manchester or London, the laborer might certainly have risen a step in the social scale. Yet his most striking peculiarity has been his sedentary disposition. He stays where he was born, takes the wages he can get, and looks up to the squire, the parson, and the farmer as parts of the eternal system of things in which it would be presumptuous to expect any alteration. He has never looked beyond the little corner of the earth which has bound all his hopes (and they were few enough!) and fears. Now, if the laborer once begins to realize the fact that he can strike, or that he can move easily to a place where he will be decently paid and perhaps even get meat for dinner, the transformation will be astonishing. From a stationary vegetable he will become a moving human being, and then what will become of the landlords and the farmers? They must certainly do something to retain him, or it is within the bounds of possibility that an English exodus may set in, rivalling that from the sister island.

In the small indications hitherto given of the growth of this spirit every one has sympathized with the laborer. We are glad that he is plucking up courage and showing himself a man, and there has been a strong approval of the agricultural strike in curious contrast with the general condemnation of all others. If the movement should take larger proportions the feeling may change, but it will be long before our agricultural laborers can in any way rise to the level of the surrounding populations. A parliamentary report has just been published which strikingly illustrates some of the difficulties to be surmounted. There has grown up in certain districts what is called the "agricultural gang" system. It is chiefly a device for making use of the labor of women and young children. The "gangmaster" collects his gang of thirty or forty hands in one of the small towns and marches them out to do such work as weed-picking and other simple labor for the neighboring farmers. It was proved that children of eight or nine often walked as much as six miles to their work and six miles back, besides laboring all day, for perhaps 4d. or 6d. It is evident that, besides the severity of the work, this was totally destructive to the children's chance of education; even if they have been to school they rapidly forget all they have learnt. Still worse than this evil was the temptation to gross immorality. The elder part of the gang consists chiefly of big boys and young women whose bad character prevented their getting other work, who are associated promiscuously without supervision of any kind. The consequence has been that the children have generally grown up totally ignorant, coarse, brutal, and morally corrupt.

How this evil should be dealt with is being discussed in Parliament, and I hope that some efficient remedy may be found. Meanwhile, it is important to remark what is at the root of the whole system. Landlords have generally objected to building cottages on their estates on account of the arrangements of the old poor law. When a laborer became old or infirm he was thrown upon the parish; that is, the landlord had to pay for his keep. Hence, in parishes which perhaps belonged almost entirely to one landlord, or where the landlords chose to combine for the purpose, no cottages were built, and the laborers were entirely driven off into some neighboring town. Of all the hardships that they had to suffer this was one of the severest: they were crowded into miserable villages, perhaps some miles from their work. The gang system has grown up in some of the eastern counties where this disgraceful plan had been most fully carried out. Its evils, physical, intellectual, and moral, are merely an exaggerated shape of evils which exist more or less in all our agricultural districts. It is, consequently, only too common for the poor to be miserably ill fed and ill paid, to be either untaught or compelled to forget their teaching by early work, and to be subjected to all the demoralizing influences of overcrowding.

When one part of the system is touched, others must follow. Parliament will probably try to meet some of the evils produced by gangs by legislation, possibly by compulsory education; but the radical remedy will be, that the laborers should begin to feel themselves independent and in a position to insist upon better treatment, instead of begging for it. The first step towards this is that they should acquire powers of locomotion and become free agents, instead of being practically ascripti glebæ, not indeed by legislation but by habit, ignorance, and poverty.

SCHOOLS FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

To the Editor of The Nation:

An article in your paper of March 28 brings into very conspicuous notice the labors of Dr. S. G. Howe, and a few ladies and gentlemen who are specially named, in behalf of articulation as a method of instructing the deaf and dumb. A few thoughts on the subject from a teacher of this unfortunate class may not be unwelcome to the readers of THE NATION.

The deaf child, prompted only by the mind which his Creator has given him, contrives by certain descriptive gestures to express his wants and his feelings. The outlines of objects are given by picturing them in the air, the characteristic forms and motions of men and animals are noted and reproduced. By the countenance or other bodily expression the inward movements of the mind and heart are betokened and represented. The language of signs is not taught. It comes spontaneously from associations and contact.

Down to the time of the Abbe De L'Épèe the notion was firmly rooted in the minds of thinkers and scholars that there could be no ideas except in connection with vocal sounds. Accordingly the deaf, if taught at all, must be made to speak. If they could not speak they could not think. To De L'Épèe, however, there came the bright conception that a written word, or a gesture, or an expression of the countenance could be the vehicle of a thought or feeling as easily as an uttered word. He proceeded to put his idea in practice, and its immense advantages over the old method were soon apparent. For though with herculean labor a child born deaf had been taught to utter words, unless signs were employed there could be no certainty that he knew what the words meant. Children who hear are constantly receiving wrong ideas respecting the meaning of words. In time these mistakes may be corrected or they may not. A little girl within the writer's knowledge who lost her hearing just after she had learned to talk always called a carriage, funeral. The servant, or the mother, perhaps, as the long train of carriages filed by, said in condensed speech, "It 's a funeral." The child saw only the carriages.

By signs the meaning of written language cannot only be explained, but circumstances and events themselves can be created and brought into the school-room and presented to the eye of the mute child. By signs the religious instruction of the mute can be attempted with certainty and effect while as yet he knows scarcely anything of written language. All the wonderful facts of the Scripture history can be made known to him long before he is able to receive or communicate his ideas in words. In fine, by means of signs, the deaf-mute's own natural language, we can educate better a greater number, with less expense of time and labor, than by any other method. If the instructors in the twenty-six institutions for the deaf and dumb in this country were asked why they adhere to this method of instruction, their answer would be: "Because it is the best in theory, and has proved itself also unspeakably the best in practice." It is not denied that deaf children, who, when their education is commenced, have not lost their speech, should be placed under instructors who will endeavor to retain and improve it, and this is the uniform practice at the American asylum. It is not denied that such pupils may, with sufficient labor, be taught to read, more or less well, from the lips.

But let us notice some of the objections to articulation, considered as a general method of instruction for the deaf and dumb: 1. It appears, by the free admissions and positive statements of the best schools in Europe, where this method has been practised from the first, that only about one-fourth of the deaf and dumb are capable of receiving benefit from it. The remaining three-fourths must be left in ignorance, and are so in those countries where articulation is the established method. 2. The voices of the deaf, even of those who have once heard, much more of those who were born deaf, having no ear to attune and regulate them, are usually harsh and disagreeable. 3. Even when, after long toil, communication is established between teacher and pupil, the ability to converse in general society is not attained except in a few rare instances.

As to the propriety of commencing the education of the mute child at an earlier period than that now fixed (eight or ten years), it is to be remarked that the deaf and dumb, as a class, have less vigor of constitution than those who can hear and speak. The attacks of disease which they have experienced, or the scrofulous habit which may be natural, make it imperative that while children they should have the freest run in the open air, and that their education, or that part of it which demands earnest and continued study, should not be commenced too early. That a mother of wealth and leisure can do much for her deaf child without unnecessary constraint is unquestionable. But is it the duty of the state to attempt everything conceivable, or only that which a wise economy and a generous liberality both require? Nor should we deem the time absolutely lost to the child who remains at home without special instruction till he is eight or ten years old. His habits of observation are being constantly cultivated, and his mind stored with images of the things which he sees, all of which can be made available when the work of giving him language is begun.

In taking leave of this subject, we would respectfully suggest to Dr. Howe and his associates that, while we fully appreciate the difficulty of the work they have undertaken, we cannot think it will be promoted by stigmatizing Mr. Gallaudet as a "Yankee enthusiast;" by covert sneers at Mr. Weld and Prof. Day as the victims of unconquerable prejudice, or by making a demi-god of Horace Mann, by exalting him to a position of extraordinary intelligence on a subject concerning which he was, in fact, very poorly informed. DIDASKALOS.

THE SUPREME COURT AND ITS FUNCTIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Please assist a wanderer back into the Republican fold by removing what (I conceive) is quite a common difficulty. When the rebellion was subdued which branch of the Government was the proper one to decide the legal effects of that rebellion?

Was not this within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, or at least to decide where the jurisdiction lay? Was it not for the court to enlighten Congress as to its powers and consequently its duties, and to inform the people lately in rebellion of the legal effects of their acts? Mr. Stevens believes the States to be conquered territories. Mr. Sumner thinks they have committed State suicide. Is it not for the decision of such questions as these that the Supreme Court was instituted? Is Congress right in legislating without that decision? Yours, CONSERVATIVE.

PHILADELPHIA, April 8, 1867.

1. Congress, as the legislative branch of the Government, and the only one which has any power of initiative.

2. No. Neither the Supreme Court nor any other court known to common law or the Constitution has any right to offer an opinion or decision on any subject whatever till asked for in a boná-fide suit between real parties and brought in proper form.

3. No. Congress is the sole judge of its own powers, and all its acts are presumed to be constitutional until decided to be unconstitutional in the manner described in the last answer. But the Supreme Court has already decided in a well-known case that it cannot determine which of two or more contending state governments is the legal one, but is bound in all such matters by the decision of Congress.

4. The Supreme Court is not bound to pass upon the correctness either of Mr. Stevens's opinions or Mr. Sumner's, unless these gentlemen should bring them before it in a regular suit.

5. If Congress were to admit that it must wait for the Supreme Court to decide beforehand on what questions it might legislate, it would virtually transfer to the court most of its own power, convert the court into a branch of the legislature, and bring it so thoroughly into the arena of party politics that we might look forward to seeing it abolished as a nuisance before ten years were over. The obiter dicta of the court in the Dred Scott and Milligan cases were simply attempts on the part of the majority of the judges to do what "Conservative" appears to think a part of their regular duty—enlighten Congress beforehand as to the subjects on which it may and may not legislate, and he knows what the result has been as well as we do.—ED. The Week.

THE only event of the week in domestic politics of much importance has been the argument in the Georgia injunction case before the Supreme Court. Mr. Stansberry, the Attorney-General, acquitted himself very well, although prefacing his argument with a confession that personally he was opposed to the Reconstruction bill. This has called forth some discussion as to the propriety of an avowal of this sort, and a writer in the New York Times, while acquitting him of all blame in this particular, cites, as apposite, certain English precedents which refer solely to the avowals of counsel touching matters of fact in criminal cases before juries, and therefore possessing no bearing whatever on Mr. Stansberry's case. He simply confessed to judges sitting in banco that his real feeling would not appear in his argument on a point of law—a circumstance about as likely to affect the mind of the court as the color of his hair. Every judge knows that in half the cases in which a lawyer argues points of law he argues against his personal convictions or doubts. But when a lawyer tells a jury he believes in a prisoner's innocence, he drops the character of an advocate and assumes that of a witness to character, and this no judge who knows his duty will for one moment permit.

THE leading points in Mr. Stansberry's arguments were the insufficiency of the parties; the absence of cause of action, owing to the absence of controversy; and the purely political character of the case. Mr. O'Connor was more discursive, more French, and relied more on the "eternal fitness of things." The exceedingly small amount of interest which the public takes in the discussion shows clearly that nobody expects it to result in anything, or believes it to be anything but a trial of wit.

MR. THADDEUS STEVENS has written a letter rebuking Mr. Wilson for the conciliatory speeches he is making in the South, and particularly for saying that if they elected Union senators and representatives, under the Reconstruction bill, they would be admitted to their seats, and that there would be no confiscation. Mr. Stevens asks by what authority Mr. Wilson made these statements, and wants to know who is authorized to travel and "peddle out amnesty." Mr. Wilson might reply by asking who is authorized to "peddle out" confiscation, as Mr. Stevens says he would do. There is nothing to our minds better settled than that there is to be no confiscation, and why Mr. Stevens keeps talking about it, unless it be by way of playing bugaboo for recalcitrant Southern politicians, we cannot imagine.

SCHUYLER COLFAX is to deliver his lecture, "Across the Continent," in this city on Monday evening next, for the benefit of the Southern Relief Commission, which, though it has done reasonably well, needs to do better. We consider the relief of Southern distress, and not confiscation, to be the Christian close to the process of reconstruction, and we therefore hope the attendance may be good.

POOR debtors make a majority of the total white population of the Carolinas, and General Sickles did a very politic as well as a very good thing in marking the beginning of his military rule by the promulgation of a stay law. There may as well be a stay law as general burning of writs, summonses, and judgments. The general ought to be just now the most popular of all the military governors. In North Carolina the "conservative" negroes seem to be very few indeed—the North Carolina negro slaves, by the way, used to be called the most enlightened slaves in the South. Governor Worth makes no headway at all in getting the colored vote for himself and friends. Governor Orr is more successful, and succeeded in getting "conservative" resolutions passed by a mixed meeting of blacks and whites. In the other State of Gen. Sickles's District, Florida, the negroes are Radical. At Tallahassee they listened civilly enough while Gov. Walker pointed out to them that the white men had exterminated the Indians, that the black men might be exterminated too, and that they ought to cultivate friendship with the true friend of the negro, the Southern gentleman, and at the end of the oration passed resolutions expressive of gratitude to the North for emancipation and of their intention to look to the Republican party for friendship and help. In Georgia General Pope signalized his first days of authority in a way quite different, but equally characteristic. Governor Jenkins, who for months and years has been commenting on the Constitution with perfect impunity, General Pope, to the joy of Georgia, we presume, brought up with a very round turn. Though, as nobody minds Mr. Jenkins much, it might have been as well to let him go on. In Virginia almost everything moves smoothly. General Schofield has, however, been compelled to warn Mr. Wynne, publisher of the Richmond Times, that it is not permitted to speak of the loyal people of the United States as "the blood-stained authors of our ruin." The negro vote in the coming elections in Virginia is morally certain to be given for the Radical candidates wherever there are Radical candidates to give it to. As for Alabama, it is said that in the northern part of the State the white Radicals are numerous and very well organized, and that in the southern counties, where blacks are numerous and white Radicals few, one-half the candidates will be selected from among the negro voters in order to secure a Republican triumph. Meantime, in the southern part of the State, prejudice against the negroes is reported as still strong, and it is said that Judge Richard Busteed has not as yet appointed a single commissioner under the Civil Rights act. In Louisiana and Texas, Sheridan, it would seem, is held back from doing all he would like to do; for Throckmorton is still governor of Texas, and it is said that the Attorney-General will so expound the Military bill as to prevent Sheridan's removing either Throckmorton or other officials already in office who have committed no act of disobedience to the law since it was actually passed. On the whole, the Military bill works unexpectedly well, and it seems, from present appearances, as if Congress had done just the thing that the South needed.

Judge Comstock, of this State, has written a very melancholy letter to The World about the approaching end of the American Union. He says that if Georgia and Mississippi have no remedy against the Reconstruction bill in an appeal to the Supreme Court, "the law of force must hereafter govern the relations of the Union to the States," and "it requires no prophetic eye," etc. The fact is that "the law of force" not only governs the relations of the States to the Union, but of men to the State, and has always governed them. There is a pleasant legal fiction that all these things are regulated by "compact," but it is only a fiction. Every time a policeman takes a man to jail, he offers evidence that society does rest on "the law of force," and the day on which the Union armies first marched to put down the rebellion the fact that the Union rests on the law of force was as completely recognized as it would be by the refusal of the Supreme Court to interfere for the protection of Georgia and Mississippi from military government. If I stay in a house quietly because I know I shall not be allowed to leave it, I am as much detained by force as if I were all the time making frantic efforts to break the door open. The attempts of Democratic lawyers to make "horrible revelations" about the consequences of the Congressional measures of reconstruction are almost painful specimens of perverted ingenuity, and generally end in the discovery of mares' nests. The whole war was in fact waged to settle the question whether there was or could be such a thing as a Union of mere inclination.

The discreditable attempt to give Judge Barnard a monopoly of the chamber business of the Supreme Court, to which we referred last week, we think we may say has failed, owing to the revelation to the governor of its real motive. It would, had it succeeded, have placed the business, liberty, and reputation of everybody in this city, and some 20,000,000 of dollars of money held in trust and in the hands of receivers, in the control of this one man. Nevertheless he was supported heartily by many editors of the city press—a part of which he owns—and by numbers of wealthy men, including members of the Citizens' Association. The one thing they said for him was that he was "smart," and could despatch business rapidly, and had quarrelled with the "ring"—the very plea which persons of the same class put forward in excuse for their published recommendation of Fernando Wood in 1855 to the suffrages of the people for the mayoralty of the city. Nothing can be more alarming or more discreditable than the seeming concurrence of men of property and standing in the theory that, provided a candidate for a judicial office is likely to wage war on knaves, testimony as to his own character is superfluous If the whole fact of this last intrigue could be told, it would be found to be highly interesting and highly instructive.

We deeply regret to say that the controversy between "T. W." and "H. G." has come to a close, so that the expectation we raised last week of interesting developments as to the leading incidents in the lives of these two gentlemen during the period beginning with 1837 and ending in 1860 will not be realized. Whether "T. W." boarded or "kept house" in the winter of 1839 will now probably never be known, as "H. G." refuses to mention, and the secret will probably die with him. We doubt if there is another man of eminence in the Union privy to it. "T. W.," we believe, has had the last word, but not until "H. G." had pronounced him "an unprincipled juggler." We trust "T. W." will not let the matter rest here. He must not be disheartened; far worse "names" than he has been called may be found in Crabbe's Dictionary of Synonyms, and we trust he will use them freely. They are the property of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Strikes still continue among the mechanics, with little result, but a good deal of violent talk and bitter feeling. The tailors have had a meeting in this city, in which there were some sensible resolutions passed, recognizing the inefficiency of strikes as a method of determining the rate of wages, and recommending arbitration as a substitute. A better substitute still would be the co-operative system. Nothing will ever put an end to strikes but the practical acquaintance of the workmen with the risks and uses of capital.

Two things are noticeable in the third semi-annual report on schools for freedmen by the Rev. J. W. Alvord, general superintendent under the Bureau: the quite exceptional mention of disturbances once so common in almost every school district, and the increased participation of the freedmen in the support of their schools. The report extends only to January 1, and proves that a marked change had already been wrought in the conduct of the Southern people towards the teachers and their work before the reconstruction bills had been passed and a military police appointed to preserve order. Since then, and since the intelligence and political power seemed both about to lodge in the hands of the blacks, what school-house has been burned or teacher maltreated? We have heard of none. The freedmen at least are not afraid to invest their savings in this lately precarious property. "There are," says Mr. Alvord, "623 schools sustained wholly or in part by the freedmen, and 286 of the buildings in which these schools are taught are owned by themselves." Another interesting fact: "15,248 colored pupils pay tuition, the amount of which per month is $11,377 03" (about the cost per capita in Massachusetts); "and these self-supporting pupils are mainly from the recently emancipated population. Only 2,302 of all the above (77,998) pupils, as reported, were free before the war."

The war cloud in Europe seems to have blown over, as we have all along anticipated it would, at least for the present, leaving some of the "great dailies" here in a terrible mess, as they were busy putting the French and Prussian armies in the field, and were promising the public something very bloody in place of the "Fenian outbreak," indefinitely postponed, and which was to have been the leading attraction of the present newspaper season. They are now grumbling over the "special despatches" which were so precious three or four weeks ago, but which nobody now likes to own. They were, however, not so much to blame as they appear to think they were, as there is no doubt that the private commercial correspondence was even more confident of war than the newspapers, and affairs have at times looked very threatening. Our confidence in the preservation of peace, at least for the present, has never been shaken, as our readers know, and we think the later news fully justifies it. The process by which we reached our conclusions is one which, in default of private and confidential information from Louis Napoleon and Count Bismark, we think was a very safe though a very simple one, and we recommend it for general use. It consists in the first place of paying no attention whatever to the opinions or predictions of the sage who sends news to the Associated Press from the other side of the water, and in not being too much affected by "panics" among the stock-brokers. The price of the government funds at the great exchanges of Europe is, of course, an indication of some value of what is going to happen, but then stock-brokers are the most easily panic-stricken class in the world. The great facts in the present imbroglio, which must not be lost sight of in judging of the future, are that the dispute about Luxembourg was clearly not foreseen by either party; it sprang on them both without notice, and we know that neither of them is, in a military sense, ready for war. As we pointed out three weeks ago, the Prussians cannot go to war without a terrible derangement of industry, and need not go to war, having got all they want, until they are attacked. The French, on the other hand, have evidently been taken by surprise, and can at this moment put just enough men in the field, armed mainly with muzzle-loaders, to give battle to such an army as Prussia had at Sadowa. Defeat in one action would, therefore, involve the capture of Paris and the overthrow of the Napoleonic dynasty, and the relegation of France for our lifetime to the position of a second-class power. To suppose that Louis Napoleon and his generals would run such a risk is to suppose them totally wanting in common sense as well as in military ability. So, let the opposition taunt and jeer as they may, the dispute will be settled by peaceful negotiation, if it can be settled, and, in any case, the negotiations will drag on a long time. But when a conference is held, with the heads of arrangement already set down, there need be little fear of miscarriage; so we may fairly consider the danger past for this summer, and, we believe, for this year.

The Eyre faction in England have at last received a crushing blow in the charge of Chief-Justice Cockburn to the grand jury in the case of Colonel Nelson and Lieutenant Brand. The charge was in some parts rather vague, and on some points could hardly have made a very distinct impression on the mind of the grand jury; but on one point it was clear as noon, and that was that Gordon's execution was murder. Nelson and Brand, having only done in an ignorant and brutal way the work that was given them to do, have got off, the bills against them having been thrown out; but the guilt of Governor Eyre is now settled, and the only question is how to get at him. Entrenched behind the country justices he is safe, but if he should show his face in London he will undoubtedly be arrested. The charge has produced such a profound impression on the public mind that there is very little doubt the Jamaica Committee will be more than ever encouraged to follow him up.

One of the notable defeats which Count Bismark sustained in the late session of the North German Parliament was that in which a clause denying pay to the members of succeeding parliaments was replaced by a provision for mileage and salary from the national treasury. The struggle over this was a very stubborn one. Service without compensation, it was asserted by the Conservatives, is the indispensable corrective of universal suffrage. It would give us, replied the National party, a chamber of lords, but no popular representation; it would create a moneyed aristocracy, the worst of all. Bismark protested in the name of the confederate states that the amendment could not be tolerated, but a fair majority of six withstood the menace. Whether the principle is embodied in the constitution as adopted, we do not know. Prior to the final vote, the several governments were to have expressed themselves on the amendments, and it is possible the original clause was in this instance restored. The question is not without interest, and has been discussed even in this country. Under the Confederation, members of Congress were paid by the States which they represented, so that in framing the Federal Constitution the main dispute was naturally not whether Congressmen should be paid, but by whom and how much. Yet Butler and Rutledge, of South Carolina, would have allowed them no compensation, and Gouverneur Morris was opposed to paying Senators anything. Charles Pinckney, who wanted property qualifications exacted of the President and of Congress, proposed that the States should pay their delegates in both Houses; but it was seen that this would place the Government at the mercy of the States, as had already happened, Rhode Island once refusing to support her delegation and so retaining them at home. Hamilton argued that payment by the nation would be a guaranty that the number of acting members would never be reduced to a bare quorum. Madison wanted the Constitution to fix the salaries by some less fluctuating standard of value than money, and thought it indecent and dangerous for the matter to be left absolutely to Congress. Patrick Henry, in Virginia, feared, as did many other politicians, that the Congress would vote themselves too high a salary; Mr. Tyler, of the same State, feared lest the opposite should happen, and as only rich men could then undertake the office, an aristocracy would result. And one of Elbridge Gerry's eight objections to signing the actual Constitution, referring to Art. I., section 6, was "the unlimited power of Congress over their own compensation."

The Mont Cenis Tunnel—an enterprise worthily associated with the Suez Canal and the Atlantic Telegraph, is making favorable progress. Owing to a delay of two years in employing the best boring machines, the northern gallery is considerably in arrear of the southern, besides having encountered a stratum of quartzite which was with the utmost difficulty penetrated. That passed, anhydrite and dolomite admit of as rapid advances as those from the Italian side. The bed of the tunnel is not a plane, but consists of two opposite acclivities, culminating in the middle—say, four and a half miles from each opening—the northern pitch being much the steeper. Down this, under many disadvantages of ventilation, drainage, and mechanical power, the Italians must work, after having completed their half and touched the apex. The two gangs of workmen are now about four miles apart, and it is expected that by the close of 1870 they will have shaken hands sub terra.

THE VANITY OF LUXURY.

We have received from a grieved correspondent in Savannah, Georgia, a vigorous but pathetic remonstrance upon our recent defence of luxury, and he says the direct tendency of our article is to encourage the purchase of "silks, satins, diamonds, and champagne," and the consequence of the possession of these articles in any quantity he pronounces "to be vanity and vexation of spirit," "and bitterness, envyings, and wretchedness." We may as well confess freely that we think the influence of the newspaper press, either in promoting or keeping down luxury, too small to be worth speaking of, and it was not in the hope or expectation of exercising any such influence, but as a contribution towards rational thought on a subject of some importance, that the article to which he refers was written. We always read the newspaper lamentations over the popular appetite for "foreign luxuries" with very much the same feeling that we read the Pope's curses of modern literature and science, and consider them, if we may be allowed to use the poor man's comment on cabbage, as an article of food as "filling at the money." They take up space in a harmless way, which in these days of "enterprise" and "special despatches" is a great thing. People will buy luxuries whenever they have the money to spare in spite of the newspapers. Certainly newspaper editors are not the persons to call them to account for it, as they are not, we believe, celebrated for their ascetic temperament, and in most countries are not found to "lag behind the age," as the phrase is, in pursuit of material comfort. Clergymen might preach on the subject with a better grace, as their congregations seem to enjoy confining them to plain living, we presume with the desire of having in every parish at least one model of Christian simplicity. But both editors and clergymen have preached and will always preach in vain. The love of luxury, that is, of the things which, at any particular period, or in any particular country, are not considered necessary to health or comfort, has always existed and always will exist, and is one of the great springs of human progress. Besides, luxury is a relative term. No such thing as absolute luxury has as yet been discovered; and the luxuries of one generation become the necessaries of the next, and the luxuries of one country are the necessaries of another. In the Middle Ages night-shirts were looked on as a silly piece of extravagance, and people of all ranks and classes from the king down slept in the simple costume in which they were born. We have no doubt that when night-gowns began to come into vogue people were accused of running in debt for them to foreigners. In Queen Elizabeth's time the owner of the plainest ingrain carpet, such as may now be found in the house of every American mechanic, would have been looked upon as an extravagant dog, unless he were a great noble, in which case he would probably have excited the Queen's jealousy and been put in the Tower. Over the greater part of the world, to this day, the spectacle of a man's brushing his teeth will draw as large a crowd as the district will afford, and excite amusement and disgust in about equal proportions. In most parts of Turkey, taking sugar habitually in his coffee would be considered, in the case of a person of moderate means, a sign of riotous living. What is now considered very poor claret would in the fifteenth century have been pronounced a royal drink, and we have no doubt whatever that the delicious "Greek wine" which the Jews used to serve out in their back parlors out of "curious silver goblets" to knights trying to raise a loan was execrable stuff. A bath-tub, which most people of intelligence now think a necessary, is in many parts of the world, and even in many circles in highly civilized countries, looked on as a kind of gewgaw for the use of men and women who have little to do. Tea and coffee were very idle and injurious luxuries little more than a century ago. We might extend this catalogue indefinitely. There is, of course, much to be said against the expenditure of money in champagne and diamonds, as there is against all gratification of the palate and personal ornamentation. The only thing that can be said for it is that it gives pleasure, and the utility of pleasure is a question so wide that we forbear entering upon it, and must refer our correspondent to the leading writers on ethics; but we advise him to betake himself to some more profitable occupation than preaching against luxury.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Russian literature is prolific of novels, but we believe no Russian novelist is at all known to the English-speaking world on either side of the Atlantic. We are, however, about to make the acquaintance of the best of these writers—the best now, at any rate, since the death of Gogol in 1851—by means of a translation, made by Mr. Eugene Schuyler, of Ivan Turgenef's "Fathers and Sons." Turgenef is of the nobility, was born near Moscow in 1818, and was educated at Berlin. His first literary venture was a volume of poems. But he won his first marked success in literature in the five years between the twenty-eighth and the thirty-third years of his age, when he published under the title of "Memoirs of a Sportsman" what may be called the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of Russia—a series of sketches of serf life. The present Emperor declares that this book first turned his thoughts to emancipation. Alexander, however, was then only Czarowitz, and his father Nicholas, not so well pleased at some expressions in the book, ordered Turgenef to his estates. At Alexander's intercession he was, however, soon released. He wrote several other novels between 1851 and 1861, and in the latter year published "Fathers and Sons," the work which Mr. Schuyler has decided to give us first. To contrast two generations of Russians seems to have been Turgenef's idea in the novel, and to draw the character of the typical "nihilist," as the powers that be in Russia call the socialistic agitators who trouble that government and who indeed played an important part in the late assassination conspiracy. Turgenef—the French call him "Tourgueneff" and the Germans "Turgeniew," but "Turgenef" is an exact translation of the Russian,—Turgenef consents to the republication of his novel in this country, and we should suppose the book would find many readers, a good Muscovite novelist being a curiosity among us and a bad Muscovite novelist equally a curiosity.

—Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have issued within a day or two a limited edition of a valuable work by Dr. J. Mason Warren, "Surgical Observations, with Cases and Operations." Under this modest title the author has given the medical profession, in an enlarged form, the substance of the address, entitled "Recent Progress in Surgery," which he delivered some time since before the Massachusetts Medical Society. The volume is illustrated with wood-cuts and with lithographs, colored and uncolored, is of course handsomely printed, and altogether is worthy to contain Dr. Warren's latest and most elaborate contribution to the science of surgery. Another recent book from the same house is a little paper-covered volume containing Swinburne's unsuccessful "Song of Italy." The Spectator declares that the poem is out of breath from the one end to the other, and that the shrill scream of the rhapsodist rarely dies away. The Pall Mall Gazette says that of thought in it there is none, of sentiment plenty—sentiment of the blazing kind, which promises above everything to burn out rapidly. The same journal remarks upon the carnality of ideas which is discoverable in this poem as in the other and better works of the poet, and upon "the delights of a fribble" which Mr. Swinburne betrays after he has personified Freedom and Italy and turned them into women. These, however, are the worst words of the critics; the praise of musical rhythm, eloquent writing of the rhetorical kind, and some imaginative power, is not denied to his work. After the fashion for new poets in England of late years, Mr. Swinburne, having gone up very high and with a great noise, has now come down again and is rated by the critics —we do not say too low, for still they seem to expect from him more than we are able to believe they will ever get from him, but certainly very low in comparison with the estimate set upon him before he had descended from the "Atalanta" to the "Chastelard," and from that to the "Laus Veneris," and from that to this unrememberable and almost unreadable ode.

—Some years since D. Appleton & Co. published Mr. G. H. Lewes's "History of Philosophy," a work with which some fault has been found—philosophers not being absolutely of one mind on all subjects, and perhaps not the mildest-mannered of men, and Mr. Lewes not being the most pacific of philosophers—but a work which must, on the whole, be pronounced excellent. The author has thoroughly revised it and considerably enlarged it, and wishes it to be issued in this country simultaneously with its appearance in England. Properly, it should seem, the republication should be the work of Messrs. Appleton & Co., but they have on hand a part of the old edition. Still it is altogether likely that the revised and improved work will soon be placed by some of our publishers before the American reading public. Books already announced by Messrs. Appleton are "Marie Antoinette and her Son," the latest production, just published in Germany, of Louisa Mühlbach, who is, perhaps, wearing out her welcome among us; "Bible Teachings in Nature," by Hugh McMillan; Maudsley's "Physiology of the Mind;" Prof. Youmans's "Culture Demanded by Modern Life;" and "A Map for Travellers to Europe."——C. Scribner & Co. add nothing to the announcements given last week except a "Life of Carl Ritter," by W. L. Gage.

—We are to suppose that Mr. J. Burroughs Hyde, of this city; Mr. Lewis C. Grover, of Newark, N. J.; Mr. A. M. W. Ball, of Elizabeth, N. J., and numerous other reputable citizens of this State and of New Jersey, are guilty of falsehood, or else we are to believe that the popular poem, "Rock me to sleep, mother," was in existence, in manuscript, in 1856, and well known to many friends of Mr. Ball. But the poem was not written, Mrs. E. A. C. Akers says, till 1860, when she wrote it in Italy and sent it over here to a Philadelphia journal. In a brief argument, prepared by the Hon. O. A. Morse, Mr. Ball seems to us to prove, or rather Mr. Ball's indignant friends seem to us to prove, pretty conclusively that gentleman's claim to the authorship of the poem in question. The weakest point in Mr. Morse's case is that he can show no newspaper older than 1860 with any part of his client's poem in it, although he supposes that it was in some country newspaper that Mrs. Akers must have seen the poem, and although we know that as soon as Mrs. Akers had put it into the Philadelphia paper in 1860 it went into every newspaper and became exceedingly popular all over the continent. It is not, however, necessary that Mr. Morse should account for Mrs. Akers's part of the affair; his business was to show by good evidence that Mr. Ball wrote the poem four years before Mrs. Akers says she did. And if he cared to answer the objection above stated, he might reply that till now, and for the purposes of this controversy, Mr. Ball has never sought publicity or print for any of his many verses; that therefore it is by no means certain that the "Rock me to sleep" really got into print in 1856; that Mr. Ball is, however, so careless of his manuscript that a sheet of it may have been lost by him when he visited New Hampshire, Mrs. Akers's place of residence in that year, or an obscure printer may have got hold of it; and finally, that, manuscript copies of the poem having been freely made, Mrs. Akers may have come into possession of one or a part of one of them. Mr. Morse suggests, and he makes the suggestion in good faith, that by some occult sympathy between the minds of Mr. Ball and Mrs. Akers, or by some secret agency of the spiritual essences around us, Mrs. Akers may have been "impressed" to write verses that Mr. Ball had already written! This is very kind of him, but perhaps Mrs. Akers would prefer to bring forward for herself something in the way of passably good evidence in her favor. We do not see that she can do less.

—An excessively rare book, which it is a pity should go out of the country, yet which is likely to go to England, is offered for sale by Messrs. Mohun & Ebbs, a firm whose special business is the purchase and sale of books rare and handsome. It is six volumes of the "Athenæ Britannicæ" of Miles Davies, a work in seven volumes, of which such a bibliophile as Dr. Farmer had, according to Chalmers, never seen but one, and Baker had seen only three, which the Earl of Oxford sent him as a very great curiosity, and which are now in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. In fact, it is believed that the only perfect copies in existence are one in the Bodleian Library and one in the British Museum, this one apparently wanting a volume. The copy which we have seen is in morocco, five of the six volumes of 12mo size, but varying in thickness, and one of them a thin 4to. Their author, who was also their publisher, was, it is said, their printer as well, and issuing the volumes at various times, whenever best consisted with his convenience or his needs, may be supposed to have given himself a good deal of latitude in all matters relating to the manufacture. He is said to have carried his works about from house to house, selling them in the manner of a pedlar; and it is pretty certain that in these words which we noted in the third volume he refers to himself: "A real scholar that was forced to hawke about his own Books or Writings to pick up a Starving Livelyhood." They occur in a passage where, no doubt very much against his inclination—for he was rabid against all Papists and Dissenters and enemies of the House of Hanover—he speaks well of Pope for favors shown him. The words which we have quoted seem to describe him pretty well. He was a man of considerable erudition, with a very good conceit of his own acquirements and abilities, who nearly starved to death on authorship in London at the beginning of the last century. He came up from Tre'r Abbot, Flintshire, Wales, where he had been a clergyman, to London, where he seems to have turned lawyer, for he calls himself counsellor-at-law. Disraeli thinks that, whether he starved or not, he died insane. He writes like a lunatic in many parts of his work, to which, however, we have given but a hasty glance. The title-page to Vol. IV. (no two of the title-pages, by the way, are alike) may serve at once to give some idea of the author's style and of the contents of his book: "Athenæ Britannicæ; or, The Critical Newes and Parallels of Miscelanies, with the Biographical and Bibliographical Characters of the present Age and Learning and those of the former Archæology. In reference to, and continuation of, The Oxford and Cambridge Writers and Others, with some Freedom of Thought and Newness of Stile. The Whole being a Critical History of Pamphlets, Books, and Authors, especially of Great Britain. Calculated for a new Diversion and Method of Free Thinking and a Novelty of New Writing, with a New Set of Thoughts and Sound Words; or a New Form and Frame of Natural Prayer, and Study or Application and Attention, or with a Novel Set-Form or Form of Novelty of a Nervous Phrase and a Studyed Expression, as well as with an uncommon Command of Thoughts and Words. For proving or approving or reproving of some and improving of others. Vol. IV. by the Author of the three first volumes of the Athenæ Britannicæ. All the Four Volumes by the Laborious Collection and Learned Readings of MYLES DAVIES, late of Trerabbat, in the County of Flint, Counsellor-at-Law, Esq. Sold only by the said Author, Myles Davies, at the corner of Little Queen Street, Holbourn." English and foreign (both Romanist and Dissenting) writers of theological tractates, as well as the champions of the Church of England, are his theme in five of the volumes, and he seems to treat of them with a very great fulness of knowledge. The sixth volume is severe upon the quacks, and gives an account of the quarrels and disputes of the medical fraternity in all countries and ages, of the state of medical science at that time, and of the various ancient and modern schools of medicine. The work may be had for one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

—M. N. Yemeniz, born at Constantinople some eighty-odd years since, of Greek blood, a Frenchman by naturalization, established himself at Lyons so long ago as 1799 as a manufacturer of silk stuffs. He became wealthy, and a great deal of his money he devoted to the formation of a fine library of four thousand volumes. But not many months since his wife died and left the old man so forlorn and unhappy that his library no longer delights him, and he has resolved to part with it. It will be sold during the current month, the days of sale being the last three weeks of May, from the 9th day to the 31st, both inclusive. The collection, says M. Le Roux de Lingy, is to be described not as a cabinet, but as a true library, and he goes on to tell at considerable length what the difference is between the two. Perhaps we give his remarks a good enough interpretation when we say that M. Yemeniz made his purchases on the principle that books were made for the delight and instruction of man, and not on the principle that man was created to hunt books merely as rare books, nor as "tall copies," nor as connected with any particular "line," nor, briefly, for any other reason than the good one above stated. His collection, however, is noticeable in this, that it is particularly rich in first editions. It is stronger in the department of belles-lettres than any other. The catalogue, which we have seen, is a model of order, arrangement, and compression. A copy of it may be examined at the store of Messrs. Mohun & Ebbs, who will take orders for the purchase of any books in the library.

—Among new English books we notice the first volume of a new series of the supplementary "Despatches, Correspondence, and Memoranda of F. M. Arthur, Duke of Wellington." It contains letters and documents covering the period from the beginning of 1819 to the end of 1822. Topics so weighty as the Congress of Verona, the armed intervention of France in Spanish affairs, the independence of the Spanish and Portuguese colonies in America, the affairs of Russia and Turkey, and other high matters, are treated of side by side with topics not so weighty; for instance, this: a certain person who had volunteered to assist the duke through a crowd at the theatre having afterwards requested compensation for a watch which he declared had been lost in the confusion, is duly informed by the duke that "although he has no objection to assist Mr. —— in repairing the loss he has sustained, he must at the same time take the liberty of recommending him in future to omit acts of unsolicited and unnecessary politeness unless he is prepared to bear their possible or probable consequences." "Rich in saving common-sense," indeed, to afford to expend it on gentlemen like that one. Another work recently issued in London is a new edition of "The Poetical Works of N. P. Willis," with a memoir, too laudatory, as we remember it, taken from The Round Table. Sir J. Emerson Tennent's book on "The Wild Elephant, and the Method of Capturing and Taming it in Ceylon," to judge from the commendation given it by the critics and from the fact that this is the sixth time that this account has been reprinted from Sir Emerson's larger work, must be an entertaining book and one that will be republished in this country, if not before, then next November or December, when boys' tastes have to be provided for. Another book that might, perhaps, pay for republication in this country, where Tennyson is, with the single exception of Longfellow, the most popular of living poets, is a book, by an anonymous author, containing "Notes Biographical and Critical on Early Poems of Alfred and C. Tennyson, and In Memoriam Various Readings, with Parallel Passages in Shakespeare's Sonnets." Other sources than Shakespeare's sonnets might have been successfully searched for parallel passages, as, for example, parts of "The Two Voices" might be read in connection with passages in the Book of Job, and a part of "The Palace of Art" in connection with the sixteenth chapter of the apocryphal "Wisdom of Solomon." A recent translation into English is the Icelandic "Viga Glum's Saga" by Sir Edmund Head, the translation being prefaced by a Greek epigram from the pen of Mr. Lowe, whose previous conspicuous displays of classical attainments were made last year in that skilful contest in quotations from Virgil to which he and Mr. Gladstone were parties, and in which the great Adullamite was not worsted. We must not forget to mention Mr. F. A. Paley's "Iliad of Homer, with English Notes." The Iliad is not, in Mr. Paley's opinion, the "Iliad" of Homer, for in the controversy on the unity of the poem he takes the side of Wolf. Mr. Gladstone he accuses of what "is nothing better than a petitio principii."

EDUCATIONAL.

MR. SAMUEL PORTER, formerly of Hartford, and now of the National Deaf-Mute College, Washington, has reprinted in pamphlet form his essay on "The Vowel Elements in Speech," which originally appeared in The American Journal of Sciences and Arts, Vol. XIII., 1866. The attempt is made in a scientific manner to determine the mechanism of speech, and from observing accurately the process of articulating, to deduce first a definition and then the natural order and general classification of the vowel sounds. The author justly remarks in his preface, that "the matter is one which really concerns not only the specialists in phonology and professors of elocution, but every teacher who has aught to do with the training of the voice, either in the vernacular or in foreign tongues, and either in speech or in song. A complete and true system of the vowels is obviously essential as the basis for a course of vocal gymnastics, without which there can be no really thorough vocal training." The pamphlet is published in this city by B. Westermann & Co., and may be had for forty cents.

—In our third issue for January we called attention to a series of four articles then recently contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes, by M. Emile de Laveleye, on "the Instruction of the People in the Nineteenth Century." We recommended the translation and reproduction of these articles in this country, "with suitable notes and additions," as likely to be "of great service to the cause of education." The suggestion, we are happy to have learned, was not only approved in many quarters, but by three at least of our State educational journals was adopted and almost carried out without previous concert. The American Educational Monthly, of this city, having got the start, will probably be the only one to persevere in the undertaking. In its May number the first instalment is given—that relating to America—in the English of Miss Osgood. No notes are appended, for only the introduction is reached, and that scarcely requires notes. We hope that they will not be neglected with what follows, which, by the way, should be dealt out rather more liberally, both in order to sustain the interest of the reader and to facilitate reference when completed. J. W. Schermerhorn & Co., 430 Broome Street, are the publishers of The Monthly.

RITTER'S GEOGRAPHY OF PALESTINE.*

NATURALISTS are familiar with a class of animals called anthozoa, which propagate themselves by a process of germination or budding. The bud when sufficiently matured shoots off from the parent stem, with which it is identical in structure, and begins life as a new and distinct being. Other species of the same general type are reproduced by fissuration or artificial section, just as a plant is multiplied by slips. These phenomena of natural history illustrate the growth and individuation of science, the manner in which it is developed out of an amorphous aggregate of mere facts and becomes a well-defined and independent organism. It is by this individuality and organic unity that science is distinguished from mere knowledge. The materials out of which political economy, chemistry, physiology, and philology are constructed have existed as isolated facts for centuries; but these sciences are called new because it is only recently that their varied phenomena have been systematized and marshalled under law. It was thus that René Just Haüy and Malus revealed the mysteries of crystallography and the polarization of light. It was thus that Goethe discovered the beautiful morphological law which reduces all the organs of the plant to modifications of the leaf. It is thus, indeed, that the human mind proceeds in all its researches. It passes through two stages, observation and interpretation. It first learns, then philosophizes; first garners facts, then generalizes from them; and it is in this final process of sifting, systematizing, and organizing incoherent knowledges that consist the fascination and crowning triumph of scientific investigation. The old astrologists, in their zealous study of horoscopy and planetary influence, observed and recorded the wayward motions of the mocking stars for thousands of years before astronomy was possible. And what Copernicus did for the science of the heavens Ritter has done for the science of the earth.

The publication of his Erdkunde von Asien marks an important epoch in geographical study. In this great work the confused mass of unorganized details gathered from the accounts of travellers and historians of every age and country are collated, condensed, and scientifically grouped. The earth is here considered not merely in itself as a vast area of sea and land diversified by mountains and valleys, but also in its cosmical relations, in its influence upon men and nations as the great theatre of human life and human discipline. Geography thus studied is the true key to history and ethics. Between the physical features of a country and the mental and moral features of its inhabitants there exists a close and vital connection; national character is, in a great degree, the resultant of those so-called brute forces which, although not directly under man's control and sometimes destructive to individual happiness, are incontestably designed to preserve and perfect the race. The unbridled agencies of earth and air, which once brought only terror and death, have been changed by the progress of science into auxiliaries of life and made tributary to the largest growth of soul and character. Winds, mountains, rivers, and plains are not finalities, but ministers to man; they concern us only as they are related to his being and development, as they help him onward and give him new power to fulfil the purposes of his creation. To trace in history the influence of physical phenomena, to show how highlands and lowlands, river systems and the configuration of continents, tend to retard or promote human culture, to bind together isolated details and sporadic groups of facts into organic unity and refer them to some central principle or comprehensive law—such is the worthy task of the scientific geographer.

This intimate connection between land and people is especially apparent in the East among the patriarchal inhabitants of Palestine. Nowhere do we find a closer communion of man with nature; nowhere have geographical conditions exerted a more decisive influence upon the history, religion, and thought of a nation; nowhere do we detect more evident workings of that "subtle but real organic power which the earth puts forth" in giving shape and character to those who dwell upon it. Yet important as is a correct knowledge of this country, which fills so large a place in the heart of the world, and around which cluster the most sacred associations of Christian, Jew, and even Mohammedan, the attainment of it is attended with peculiar difficulties. In ancient times Palestine was a land set apart. The theocratic idea upon which its government was based severed it as effectually from all sympathy and alliance with surrounding nations as its crags and gorges saved it from their rapacity. Consequently the most cultivated nations of antiquity knew little or nothing about it, and we must therefore depend upon its own meagre records and traditions for a knowledge of its early history. During the Middle Ages, monkish legends and absurd fables invented for the credulous ears of pilgrims overran the whole country and increased still more the sources of perplexity. This was especially true of Jerusalem; the masses of rubbish which bury the primitive foundations of the Holy City to the depth of thirty or forty feet do not contribute more to obscure its topography than the multitude of mediæval traditions with which all the sacred sites are overloaded. Of the thousands of tourists who have gone there in modern times and left records of their journeyings, many have looked at the Holy Land through the film of pious sentiment, and, instead of exact information, have given the reader what Tobler so happily characterizes as "a kind of baptized declamation;" very few indeed have brought to the task the scientific preparation and critical acumen so needful for the highest purposes of travel in a country like Palestine. It is evident, then, that if the biblical or archæological student is to derive any benefit from the observations of tourists, their often conflicting reports must be subjected to the crucible of learning in order to determine what is pure gold and what is the mere dross of superstition.

This is what Ritter has done in the volume of which Mr. Gage now offers a translation and condensation to the American public. The original work has no doubt lost much of its scientific value by being thus narrowed down into a commentary on the Bible. The author did not write it with any such purpose in view. Yet, as the great majority of readers in America would be interested in it chiefly as illustrating the Scriptures, we think the editor fully justified in abridging it. The biblical scholar will find here a series of full and well-digested monographs on all the principal topics which he wishes to investigate. The editor's supplementary list of works, papers, and maps relating to the Holy Land which have been published since 1852 is by no means perfect, and is very far from doing justice to the American literature on the subject. Many valuable articles have appeared during the last fifteen years in The North American Review, The Bibliotheca Sacra, and other periodicals, to which no allusion is made. Such neglect is unpardonable in an American editor preparing a book for American readers. Besides, his catalogue contains some trash and no criticism; so that it is impossible for a person unacquainted with the works to discriminate between the useful and the worthless. We have also noticed occasional blunders and contradictions. In Volume II., p. 176, the round Lake Phiala is said to be "about an English mile in circumference;" on page 178 it has doubled its size and becomes "about two miles in circumference;" on page 179 "the lakelet is about three miles in circuit." This wonderful increase in dimensions reminds us of Falstaff's story of the eleven men in buckram. Robinson thinks the lake is about a mile in diameter, and Thompson makes it three miles in circumference. Again, on page 210 "De Berton gives the depression of the surface of Lake Huleh as eighteen and a half feet below the level of the Mediterranean;" on page 226 "the water does not vary much from a hundred feet above the sea, or, according to De Berton, three hundred and twenty-two Paris feet." On page 14 of Volume IV. the map of Jerusalem prepared by Aldrich and Symonds and published by the English Government "is on a scale of four hundred English feet to a mile." We leave it to the reader to estimate the size of this map and to judge whether it is probable that such a map has ever been published outside of Brobdingnag. These volumes contain many defects of this kind in arithmetical calculations which it is not necessary to enumerate. Also, the process of abridgment (always a difficult one) has sometimes led to confusion and obscurity; and in some cases where authorities disagree the editor has taken upon himself to decide these controversies in an ex-cathedra manner infinitely amusing to those who are familiar with the Holy Land from personal observation. But these errors and deficiencies are of minor importance. The work which Mr. Gage offers is of real and permanent value. We heartily thank him for it and willingly recommend it to our readers.

M. CARLIER ON MARRIAGE IN AMERICA.*

THE American husband, says M. Carlier, appreciates while still young the benefits of the married state; he recognizes the sanctity of the conjugal tie, early takes the obligation on himself, and refuses none of its duties. Yet how is it that his wife "is never the confidant of his intimate and real thoughts? With another the heart will overflow under grave and painful circumstances; at home it is hermetically sealed." Is it stoicism that causes this concealment which even the masonic married man of other lands finds it so difficult to maintain? "No; he is very impressible." But it is that he is sensitive; he wears a mask "with which he covers a real trouble that he would not have suspected." Yes, "his natural pride allows this supposition." However, it is true that this husband who habitually has secrets from the wife of his bosom, who evades her enquiries into the amount of his income-tax, who permits not that his pockets should be examined, is yet willing to render his wife, his companion, the preceptor of his children, the one he loves best, "marks of attachment during the short time that he can spare from the affairs of the community, of the parish, of the county, of the State, or of the Union, and most of all his own personal business."

As for the American wife, she, M. Carlier thinks, "is generally attached to her husband, the father of her children." She is faithful. For this there are two causes. "The first is principle; then there is the quiet life she is so often obliged to lead." She devotes herself to the cares of the house, a hard task in a country with such servants as there are in America, so independent, so capricious. "Moreover, this servant being almost always Irish, the antagonism of race is called forth, and the Celt takes a secret pleasure in obliging his American master to take his place by quitting him abruptly." It is therefore not wonderful that to escape the vexations of domestic life the family goes to a hotel or a boarding-house. There the wife forgets the domestic life; nothing is left of the domestic circle but the name; the husband and wife pursue each their own purposes.

As for the married that have a home, their life is twofold—a winter life and a summer life, for the American family goes into the country. "In the hot weather every lady wants to leave the country and to go to one of the numerous and immense hotels that are to be found at the sea-side or the springs." The summer life is full of pride, dissipation, lavish expenditure, and folly. And "this gay world which renders every one constantly conspicuous is relished all the more as the life in winter has been triste and monotonous." For in winter "the husband stays in the city to attend to his business or take part in politics, and does not visit his wife except at intervals, very much as a conservatory act to prevent proscription." What this last sad effect of American winter life is we do not know, but thus much is plain: the American son and daughter come to grief, to extravagance, namely, to flirtations, parties. "The young men easily fall into bad habits, the most frequent of which is drinking to excess."

One need not be surprised that married life in America is such as we have seen it to be. The beginning of it is bad. "The young American girls, it appears, very early take part in the reunions of which they together with the young men of their own age form, either exclusively or nearly so, the nucleus." So young are the component parts of the nucleus of the American reunion "that it has been very wittily said of these reunions that the cradles are the only things wanting." One attending them finds little of esprit; all is small-talk, but small-talk with a view of marriage. If you could see the bottom of these hearts, you would find in each self-interest. Often it happens that in the American reunion the young American girl meets and loves the young American man. Sometimes unforeseen obstacles prevent the union which the two project for themselves; for it is with the greatest reluctance that the young American girl pays to her mother that delicate deference in the matter of choosing a husband which is paid by the young French girl. Unforeseen obstacles, we will say, prevent the projected union; unaccustomed to restraint, unable to cope with this strange resistance of circumstances, the young girl is crushed. "Then what ravages do we not see in her feelings, spirits, heart! There remains only perfect indifference to life and bitter scorn for society." The reunion failing, there are the watering-places, England, the springs, at which the young American girl seeks a husband. And are there not also the primitive settlements of the West? of which M. Carlier remarks that, wives being scarce there, "the gloom and languor which pervade these sections can hardly be described." They advertise for wives; in May, 1857, the Iowa Reporter published an appeal to the women of all lands to immigrate and be married. But, without going West, there is also elopement with the teacher of accomplishments. "In this intimate intercourse, where the teacher seeks to awaken in his pupil the sense of the beautiful, it is so easy to make an indirect appeal to the heart, to vanity, or to weakness of any kind. . . . The language (French?), which itself gives to the art a seductive fascination and which he uses as no other," helps the teacher to persuade to clandestine marriage the young American girl, who, to tell all the bad things about her at once, also has a weakness for titles, and sometimes goes away to be married to a foreign nobleman of doubtful character and, perhaps, of doubtful birth and station. The elopement with the "teacher of accomplishments" M. Carlier admits to be rare, but the newspapers of every State, he adds, will show that such occurrences do take place.

Then the marriage ceremony: an obscure justice of the peace can celebrate it; the want of formality is shocking. In Maine, a conductor—too busy, we suggest, saying "Go ahead!" to be particular about wedding formalities—invited his betrothed and a minister into a car, and while the train was in motion was married; leaving that station a bachelor, at this station he was a married man! "It is but one of a thousand examples of life as it goes in this fast country." In Virginia, in 1855, a minister standing on one side of an unfordable stream married a couple who stood on the other bank and shouted the responses across the stream. In Massachusetts a clergyman married a couple and united with them in a written protest against the injustice of the marriage laws of that State.

On the whole, if anybody is solicitous to defend the Yankee nation against the charge of being thin-skinned, he may truly urge that the skin of no other nation, ancient or modern, was ever in the first tender years of its existence so thoroughly sandpapered as ours has been. The process began when the Federal Constitution was forming, and this little book, the latest published though not the latest written of those works of travellers who scarify us—not dilate on our cathedrals or pyramids or picture-galleries, but scarify us—was issued only the other day. Let us not, however, do injustice even to so slight an essay as this of M. Carlier's. He says some absurd things, on some of which we have laid too much stress, perhaps, but he also tells us plainly, if not very forcibly, what was known before, that the marriage and divorce laws in the United States badly need revision. That he has very probably given those Frenchmen who have read his book an inadequate and often incorrect account of married life among us, we need not resent as if it were of great importance to us, and need not be surprised at his failure to do in a brief essay what a much abler man might fail to accomplish within the compass of a large book. The reader will find the book not a valuable one, but if his attention has been turned to the subject-matter of it by Mr. Dixon's recent work he will find it worth glancing over. The translator has done his work clumsily as regards the manner of it, but seems to have succeeded in generally giving his author's meaning.

HOW TO GET RICH.*

SOME acute genius once published a calculation by which it appeared that if Adam had been the man he ought to have been, and had put out at compound interest a farthing or a penny or some such trifling coin which he might easily have spared from his daily expenditure, it would long before this time have amounted to a sum exceeding in value the worth of a solid ball of refined gold equal in size to the earth on which we live. But we doubt it. If our first parent had been so provident, we may be sure that when Seth and the other heirs came into their property, say after eight hundred years of compound interest, there would have been an end to the increase. To say nothing of litigation set on foot by Cain—and a chancery suit lasting three or four of those lifetimes would have been awfully expensive—the other heirs never could have resisted the temptation to circulate so nice a plum. And even if the antediluvian patriarchs—among whom the law that after a saver comes a spender perhaps had not begun to operate—had been prudent enough to leave the penny to undisturbed growth, and if it had survived the deluge, still when Noah came to make that will of which Eusebius speaks—an instrument signed with his name and regularly sealed, by which he portioned out the earth among his sons—then, at any rate, if not before, the fund must have been broken in upon. As Dr. Nott, of Mobile, a very political economist, could convincingly show any enquirer, Ham and Canaan at least would have insisted on at once seizing and squandering their share of the common patrimony, and, after lying on their backs in the sun till it disappeared, would immediately, in monstrous defiance of common decency, have revived the horrors of St. Domingo, and got hold of all the rest of it in the social and chronological confusion.

Indeed, we may as well leave to the doctor the further pursuit of this profitable subject, and shall say no more about it—no more than this, that in most books which attempt to teach the art of making a fortune there is to be discerned something of that unpractical subjection to the rules of arithmetic which set the genius above-mentioned upon framing his scheme or theory, or whatever one likes to call it. Writers of such works are apt to exact of the millionaire in posse a foresight which is the gift of few, and an ability in the management of capital which is the gift of still fewer, and they presuppose other conditions favorable to the growth of wealth which practically are about as far out of the region of the possibilities as for Adam to have had, first, a surplus income, and, second, a five-cents savings-bank in which to deposit it. The book before us—a far better book than its somewhat catch-penny title would lead one to suppose—is not wholly free from the fault we speak of. For example, Mr. Davies tells us of two hypothetical servant girls, one civil, industrious, and careful; the other (not altogether so hypothetical) inattentive, careless of her employer's interests, anxious only to get her wages and give the least possible work in return. By-and by one of the two is to be discharged and one retained at a higher rate of pay for her increased labor. Of course the one a little better than her place is the one kept, and her next year's wages in money amount to $120, of which $80 are saved. The other is out of work for three months, and when she finds a place gets for her year's wages in money $54, out of which the three months' board has to be paid, so that she can save nothing. "Let us look," says Mr. Davies when he reaches this point, "let us look what this $80 will accumulate to, if put in a savings institution and improved at compound interest at six per cent., when she arrives at fifty years of age." The answer is $469 40. Here he begins to sail straight away from the average servant girl. But he is not done yet; he never is done till he asks a second question of this sort. Suppose she had accumulated the same amount of $80 each year till she was fifty years old, how much would her savings amount to in that case? By this time the average servant girl is hull down, barely visible on the horizon. The tables, of which there is profusion at the end of the book, show that in that case the hypothetical servant girl would be servant no more, but mistress of $6,329 47. The actual servant girl would, we fear, be the mother of seven or eight children and the wife of a husband who would need her help in paying the house bills.

* "How to Make Money and How to Keep It. By Thomas A. Davies." New York: G. W. Carleton & Co.; London: S. Low, Son & Co.

But there is more, an immense deal more, than most men think who most need to think on the ways and means of securing their age against poverty, in the author's plans for making us all well off. The method which we have detailed he carries into the life of the mechanic, the shopkeeper, the clerk, the professional man, and in plain language, with every effort to make himself intelligible, he shows how very many men and women who are probably doomed to live from hand to mouth as long as they live at all, and to be buried at their friends' charges, might with great ease make themselves independent. Besides this the book contains one or two excellent chapters—of course we have in mind the general reader—on "life insurance," one on "banking and insurance," chapters on "investments" and "how money is lost," which show how much more knowledge and ability is required to keep money than to make it; a chapter on "brokerage and commission," on "retail merchandising," on "clerks," on "apprentices," on "the seeds of fortunes," and other kindred topics. There are plenty of crudities in the work. Of course the author of it, quâ author, supposes man's chief good and final end to be the making of money, and his object is to show how, by saving and working and being civil and honest and good, but mainly, after all, by close saving and safe investment, any healthy man in this country may, before he dies and leaves everything, become rich, or at all events put himself above the need of poverty. But, on the whole, it is a book that we should not be sorry to see in the hands of every young man in the United States. We think it would be well for the country if this were so. One need not go so far as to say with a certain voluminous historian that Rome fell because she had not developed a good banking system, but one may say that no nation in the past ever was great, and still less will any nation in the future ever be great, unless possessed of the book-keeping virtues. Mr. Davies, then, even if his exaltation of the ledger and the bank account and the life insurance policy is a trifle too absolute, may be said to have deserved well of his country, having done something towards the making of "well-to-do" citizens, who are generally good citizens.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

THERE is nothing but has its uses. A woman who habitually attends auctions became the other day what we may call an instrument of mercy. She told us that the Grover & Baker sewing machine was seen in auction rooms far less often than any of its rivals. We heard her with delight. Not that we love Grover & Baker above other men, but for a moment we got a glimpse of one fixed spot, as we thought, in the midst of a weltering chaos. For years we had been victims of the sewing-machine muddle—that incertitude aggravated by certificates. Circulars and advertisements by the million had been perpetually renewing and perpetually destroying our faith in this or that, or this other or that other particular machine. To refuse to believe the letter, written, without solicitation, by the clergyman's wife, which we read on Monday, seemed not possible until Tuesday, when the widow of a well-known clergyman wrote, unsolicited, a better letter for the best machine ever made—previously to Wednesday, when it appeared that seven States had awarded each a first prize to another machine which, however, we learned on Thursday had failed in a certain family of our acquaintance. Shortly, however, the fixed spot resolved itself into blind atoms; we learned that the machine owned by our informant was a Grover & Baker, so her usefulness remains to be proved, and we warn all persons against buying a Grover & Baker on the strength of her recommendation merely. Mr. Parton has surely earned the thanks of the world at large for bringing some order into all this direful confusion. His history of the sewing machine given in this month's Atlantic is one of his most workmanlike articles, clear, honest, and marked by that quality of readableness which in this case is the smooth result of laborious investigation that would have confused a narrator less able and less practised.

Having read "The Guardian Angel," one would say that the lion of Puritanism must indeed be dead. Dr. Holmes devotes himself in this instalment of his story to the Rev. Joseph Bellamy Stoker, and rejoices and triumphs and insults over that inflammable man of straw in a way with which the world has become quite familiar. We learn, too, that Miss Cynthia Badlam, a member in good standing, is the mother of the foundling twins. Byles Gridley, A.M., shows his remarkable aptitude for managing delicate affairs by walking into the room of the infatuated Myrtle Hazard and informing her that Mr. Stoker, her revered pastor, is making love to her, and is always making love to pretty women. Dr. Holmes's wit, however, occasionally crops out, we were going to say, through all this rather dreary flippancy. On the whole, it is more accurate to say that in these chapters of his novel his flippancy occasionally rises into wittiness. As, for example, when old Mrs. Hopkins says, "I do n't want to say anything against women, Mr. Gridley; but women are women."

In "Some Unappreciated Characters" Mr. Hazewell indulges himself, after the fashion that De Quincey made so effective in his essays, in a game of "high jinks," and manages particularly well the case of Xanthippe. It is a sort of writing that it is easy to get enough of, and perhaps the sack is in excess of the bread in this instance. "Oldport in Winter" is a fine specimen of the very pleasant style of one of our most finished and agreeable essayists. Who will dispute Mr. Higginson's rechristening of Newport after hearing this scrap from the court reports of that town: "An old fisherman testified in our police court the other day, in narrating the progress of a street quarrel: 'Then I called him 'Polly Carter'—that 's his grandmother; and he called me 'Susy Reynolds'—that 's my aunt that 's dead and gone.'" Mr. Higginson remarks truly that "their very disputes have a flavor of longevity, and involve the reputation of female relatives to the third or fourth generation."

By calling at this office Mr. Whipple may hear of a person who has "the audacity to doubt the existence and reality" of Mr. Boffin, for example. Mr. Whipple's essay on "The Genius of Dickens" shows appreciation of the great novelist's merits, and a sense of his shortcomings, but is not a wholly satisfactory estimate of Dickens's genius. We understand Mr. Whipple to say that Dickens fails of being a great master of characterization not because of his exaggerations in representing—for we see that no one has the audacity to deny the existence and reality of Micawber, Tapley, Boffin, Gamp, Weller, and the rest—but because to be a great master of characterization one must be of a great nature, and must as an artist deal with great natures. Fielding did not deal with great natures, nor even wholly with universal types, but he is a master of characterization; so is Smollett; so is Scott, who dealt with the common stuff of human nature; Lowell has produced two of the most lifelike figures in contemporary fiction, and they are Birdofredum Sawin and Hosea Biglow, men of every New England village. The fact is that if, as Mr. Whipple says, the common objection to Dickens's claim to be considered a master of characterization, an inventor of characters, is a superficial objection, it is superficial only because it is made against his manner merely, while a writer's manner is really of his nature, the man himself. Superficial or not, it is true, what the popular voice objects against Dickens as a creator of characters, that he caricatures; his Micawberism incarnated in Micawber, his fleshification of jolly good humor in Mark Tapley, his other vivid impersonations of single traits, of abstractions, of phrases, are not characters in any true sense of the word.

That they are so vivid, so vivid that we have just said "Micawberism incarnated in Micawber" as a perfectly intelligible way of conveying our meaning, in no way militates against the common opinion that they are unreal, unreal as Mephistopheles for instance. But this subject cannot be treated within these limits.

"The Custom of Burial with the Head towards the East" is a discursive and, of course, inconclusive essay on a passage in Cymbeline:

> "Nay, Cadwal, we must lay his head to the east.
> My father hath a reason for 't."

The author guesses that the Britons may have learned the practice from the Druids, and that these latter may have brought it from India. Incidentally he speaks of a custom obtaining among the negroes of South Carolina of turning the bed of a sick man so that when he dies he may face the East, and the author conjectures that perhaps at the root of the custom is the memory that to the eastward is the cradle of their race. We conjecture that perhaps a certain religious superstition of which we have heard South Carolina negroes speak may have had something to do with it. From some "rice nigger," as the negroes of the rice country call themselves, we have heard that hell lies in the West, and that it is not good to look at the sunset. And we believe it is told of our Saxon ancestors that they accounted for the evening redness of the sun by saying that he then is looking into the abode of the departed. "The Plaintiff Nonsuited" is a lively story, a little out of The Atlantic's line. "Germany in New York" Mr. Shanly describes well. Mr. Winwood Reade makes a very good paper about "The Heroes of Central Africa," and is particularly interesting when he tells us of Captain Burton, the great traveller. "Katharine Morne," after dreadful agonies of doubt and hesitation, all which she might have saved herself, for we could have told her long ago that she was coming to it, at last marries the cultivated Dudley and ends her story. The poetry of the number consists of some agreeable verses on various topics. The book notices are perhaps not quite so good as usual, and the advertising miscellany is overpowering. To bait the publisher's hook with Emerson, a part of whose "May Day" is given, is a stroke of advertising genius.

Hours at Home has another Siamese article by the Rev. George B. Bacon, who might do worse than write a bookful of these entertaining sketches of a country unvisited by Bayard Taylor or other tourists, and so well worth visiting. Dr. Philip Schaff lays before the American reader a new "Stabat Mater"—"Stabat Mater Speciosa"—the joyful companion, newly discovered, of the mournful "Stabat Mater Dolorosa." Dr. Schaff gives both the Latin and the English translation of it made by the late Dr. Neale. Mr. Eugene Schuyler introduces to us Philaret, Metropolitan of Moscow, the Bourdaloue of Russia, the man who drew up the act by which Alexander II. emancipated the serfs. He is the man, too, who was bold enough to refuse when Nicholas requested him to consecrate a certain triumphal arch decorated with Renaissance figures of heathen gods, but with no Christian symbols. When Nicholas ordered him to perform the ceremony, Philaret replied, "You are not Peter the Great;" for which contumacy Nicholas paid him off by keeping him out of the Holy Synod, the convocation which governs the Russian Church. Philaret's orations and works, Mr. Schuyler thinks, reveal clearly that element in the religious mind of Russia which makes the talked-of union of the Eastern and Western Churches a chimera—namely, thoroughgoing mysticism. But, to judge by the extracts given us, a majority of the Christians of the West are as "mystical" as Philaret. Mr. Spurgeon prays against the cattle plague as fervently as the bishops, and the Metropolitan of Moscow does nothing more or different when he declares that prayer saved Russia in the Crimean War. But the question of the union of the Eastern and Western Churches is as far as possible from being a practical one. When the union does come we imagine that not the excess of Russian spirituality but of Russian grossness will put difficulties in the way of our Western materialism. The article is an interesting one, and there is, probably, no American writer nearly so competent to treat of Russian matters as Mr. Schuyler.

Harper's for May is pretty dull; though Mr. M. D. Conway writes, in the style which ought to turn newspaper correspondents green with envy and jealousy, a good article about Disraeli and the reform demonstration of February 11. Miss Kate Field, who has saved her best wine till the last—we presume it is the last—tells in her "Ristori" all about the Spanish soldier, condemned to death, whose life the great actress begged of Marshal Narvaez and the Queen. "Crete" may help the public to understand better the revolution in that island, and, like most other articles on this subject, is not very full of enthusiasm for the Cretans, but, like most of the others, does not tell clearly just the weight of misery that the Cretans are trying to escape from. Dr. Osgood goes through his "New Aspects of American Thought" with the utmost gravity. "The Editor's Easy Chair," for a wonder, is rather dull. Articles not mentioned above are "The Pictured Rocks of Lake Superior" (illustrated); "The Dodge Club, or Italy in MDCCCLIX." (illustrated); more of General Strothers's "Personal Recollections of the War" (illustrated), and these are always good of their kind; "The Five-pins;" "Good Manners," etc. "The Impending Checkmate" we present as a case of petty larceny with aggravating circumstances, the picture being English, and the poetry, one of the prettiest of Owen Meredith's pieces, is stolen bodily and no credit given the author.

The Catholic World has twenty-two articles original and selected. The original are: "An Old Quarrel," which examines the philosophy of the Middle Ages with reference to the question of the reality of ideas; "Father Ignatius of St. Paul," which tells readably the story of the Hon. George Spencer's life as a Passionist; "The Lady of La Garaye," a review of Mrs. Norton's poem of that name; "Mercersburg Philosophy," which appears to be a mild form of Puseyism; and some critical notices of new books. Of the selected articles, readers will find the one on "Mediæval Universities" worth reading and preserving.

Knowledge is Power. A View of the Productive Forces of Modern Society, and the Results of Labor, Capital, and Skill. By Charles Knight. Revised and edited, with additions, by David A. Wells, A.M. Illustrated. (Gould & Lincoln, Boston.)—We judge that the plates from which this book was first printed in 1856 were used without alteration in the present edition—at least we meet no reference to the dates between, and although there is a well-calculated prophecy as to what an Atlantic Cable might do for us, the sewing machine is not described among labor-saving inventions, nor its almost providential adaptation to the necessities of our late war employed as an illustration of the author's argument. It requires a rather steady head to preserve one's nationality in reading, owing to the alternate predominance of Mr. Knight and Mr. Wells, of English and American currency and statistics, and the not infrequent confusion of both. Nevertheless, we are glad of the reprint, and shall hope its success may warrant a still further revision. The central thought or motive of the book is to explain in a familiar way the axioms of political economy, to show that skill increases with the increase of knowledge, and to remove the prejudices against the multiplication of machinery by proving the enormous advantages derived, by the laboring classes especially, from inventions which threatened and sometimes effected the ruin of a few. The chapters which are occupied with this last endeavor are full of interesting information concerning a great variety of arts and manufactures, and can hardly fail to attract and edify the young, according to Mr. Knight's praiseworthy desire. His audience, however, is manifestly the working-men, who, if they will examine what he has to say to them, will count him among their friendliest advisers. We should like to see a copy of this work in the possession or within the reach of every mill-hand or other artisan in the country, and the employer who shall undertake to provide his people in this manner may omit the Christmas charity of the factory turkey. It must be added that the question of free-trade versus protection is not discussed in these pages.

The Last Days of a King. An historical romance. By Maurice Hartmann. Translated from the German by M. E. Niles. (J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.)—It is the misfortune not of the author but of the country with which he has chosen to deal that so many of his characters are killed off without regard to conventional taste or to the feelings of the reader. But in Corsica, the native haunt of the vendetta, one must be prepared for bloody surprises and internecine retaliation in an endless and ever renewing series. The monarch whose last days are here described is Joachim Murat, King of Naples, the Sheridan of the generals of Bonaparte, whose sister he married. He is not, however, as he was meant to be, of central interest in the story, but rather the Corsican character, which shone for a moment in his defence. In him there was not stuff in his declining fortune to make a hero of. Nevertheless, a fair idea is given of the man and of his distinguishing traits, his humanity, amiability, superstitious hopefulness, vanity, indecision; and the incidents of his stay in Corsica and the ill-starred expedition against Naples, being borrowed from Coletta and Franceschetti, are historically trustworthy. A glimpse of the king at the time when the Allies persuaded him to join them against his brother-in-law is to be found in the sixth chapter of Mme. Récamier's "Memoirs;" and in chapters iii., vii., xiii., and xiv. his wife appears as the very affectionate and unaffected friend of the brilliant Frenchwoman. A much more artistic story of Corsican life—though perhaps not more curious nor more real—is one entitled "Colomba," which was published in Boston several years ago, but was received with undeserved indifference by the public.

The Holy Bible. With Illustrations by Gustave Doré. Parts IV.–XIV. (New York: Walter Low. 1867.)—In No. 72 of the third volume of THE NATION we said of Doré, "that thought of his cannot be found which will harmonize with the thought of a poet. His work shows no sympathy with pathetic or quiet or delicate feeling. But as far as energy and dash and power of rapid and changeful designs, and a real delight in and feeling for the ghastly can lift an artist, so high M. Doré has attained." An artist of this kind will hardly make a satisfactory pictorial Bible. We have only to say that these new numbers as they come out confirm us in our opinion previously expressed, that M. Doré's powers are great, and that they are greatly misapplied and make a decided failure in illustrating the Bible.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

HOW A WAR IN EUROPE WOULD CONCERN US.

A DISSOLUTE King of Holland is persuaded by an extravagant French mistress to offer a triangle of territory as large as a New York county for sale to the Emperor Napoleon for a round sum in cash. Mr. Von Bismark, a sturdy, resolute, big-brained, clear-headed German, who, by giving practical expression to the long-time vain dream of a United Fatherland, has laid the whole German nation spell-bound at the feet of King William of Prussia, protests against the sale. Forthwith the "promises to pay" of the United States of North America fall five per cent. in value in the great money centres of Europe, gold rises in New York ten per cent. in a fortnight—thirteen per cent. higher than it stood on May 11, 1865, Wall Street is in a fever, specie payments seem put off again ad infinitum, and the real value of every paper dollar in the United States is diminished by seven cents. Why is it?

There is a law of social science, commonly called the law of the solidarity of nations, to this effect: the loss of one people is the loss of all peoples; the gain of one nation is the gain of all nations; no nation can benefit at the expense of another without ultimate loss to correspond; no people can lose heavily without all other peoples combining to repair its loss. This law is so totally opposed to all ordinary notions about the character of peoples and individuals, and its action is at times so difficult to trace, that it is generally the last law that the student of social science is willing to subscribe to; indeed, some never subscribe to it at all. But it is, nevertheless, truly a law.

When the people of the United States went to war among themselves and prevented the export of cotton, English ships and warehouses and manufactories and manufacturers' depots at all ends of the world were so full of cotton and cotton goods that but for our war half Lancashire, and London too, would have been bankrupt. The outbreak of our war doubled the value of every pound of cotton and every yard of cloth; and good, wise Cobden could rise in his seat in the House of Commons and deprecatingly remark that "Lancashire spinners could scarcely be blamed for wanting the war continued, as it had put £80,000,000 sterling in their pockets." That does not seem like an illustration of the law of solidarity. But mark what follows. First, the Lancashire famine, with 300,000 dependents upon public charity; next, the question what to do with this sudden accession of wealth. The result was the wildest speculation, fabulous investments in all corners of the world, especially in cotton culture, 1,200 new companies with limited liability formed in one year, two or three years of financial rioting, and a few weeks of panic last spring, staggering all England with a blow from which she has not yet recovered.

When the people of the United States went to war among themselves, England was sending 50 or 60 millions of dollars a year to East India for cotton. When the Southern ports were blockaded, England had to send 100 and 120 millions of dollars a year to the East Indies for so much more cotton. Then the people of India rolled in wealth, the Parsee merchants bound their carriage wheels with silver tires, and buried jar after jar filled with Mexican silver dollars and American double eagles, and prayed that peace might never come to the Yankee fools. That does not look like an illustration of the law of solidarity; perhaps not. But the law is true, nevertheless. For the fields that raised all the cotton that brought this wondrous wealth had formerly borne rice, and then food was cheap. Now food was daily growing dearer, until a sudden drouth struck famine into whole kingdoms, just when England no longer wanted all the cotton, and then by the side of the cotton bales and the buried coin-jars there fell 300,000 poor starved wretches, and lay unburied.

When the people of the United States went to war among themselves, they naturally destroyed much property. We have more than once shown that they did destroy much more than they made, and became thereby much poorer. The last year's census of twenty-one States, of which we have the figures, shows the taxable property in those States to have diminished during the war from 7,200 millions in gold valuation to 6,700 millions in currency valuation, a diminution of at least 2,000 millions of dollars in gold. As fast as we destroyed, the peoples of Europe were glad to sell us at a profit whatever they could furnish to replace the loss, and waxed rich and richer thereby, and hoped the war would never cease. But when pay-day came we were, as is apt to be the case with extravagant people, altogether unready, and the people in Europe to whom we owed said, You need not pay us now; we will give you twenty years' time, and perhaps we shall not want the money even then; you can pay us interest meanwhile. In this way those in Europe who had profited by our troubles really lent us their property for an indefinite time to repair our losses by the war, and took from us our "promises to pay."

This is the way in which our promises to pay come to be bought and sold at the European exchanges, and the fact that their price and the price of gold in Wall Street are affected by the quarrels of European princes, is only another illustration of the same law of the solidarity of nations. It may prove a question of no little importance to us in what way a war between France and Prussia would affect our finances.

The first effect of war in all countries is to impel governments, corporations, and individuals to possess themselves as much as possible of the nervus rerum—ready cash. The United States are one of the great sources of supply. Can we be forced to part with our specie? Of course, if our merchants were indebted to merchants in Europe and the European merchants not indebted to us, there is no doubt we should have to send specie in payment of our debts. But an extensive enquiry among importing merchants convinces us that the amount of due or nearly due indebtedness to Europe is at this moment unusually light, a very large portion of the heavy importations of this spring consisting of consignments remaining unsold, and the balance being mainly already paid for. We are not, therefore, likely to witness an important drain of specie in settlement of commercial indebtedness.

The only other means of drawing specie from us is the return of our bonds. Without entering now upon a discussion of the question how far a war in Europe will ultimately increase the demand for our securities, we see that the first effect of the fear of war is to cause large amounts of them to be sent from the Continent to England for sale against gold. It is self-evident that as long as our bonds can be sold in England or any other part of Europe for a better price in gold than they will bring by being shipped here, they will be sold in Europe. The price in gold that bonds will bring in this market depends upon their currency price here and upon the premium on gold. A war in Europe does not in itself present any contingencies likely to affect the currency price of our bonds, and we may, therefore, safely say that the price which our bonds sent here from Europe will bring in gold depends exclusively upon the currency premium in gold. The present premium upon gold is based entirely upon the stock of gold now in the country. Any diminution or prospect of diminution in this stock would immediately advance the price in proportion—and so well is this understood by all Wall Street, that the price is now, and has been for ten days past, regulated entirely by the London price of our bonds, and has been held at a point at which bonds cannot be imported from Europe at a profit, or, in other words, at a point at which there is no probability of the stock being reduced by heavy shipments.

Last year the pressure of public and private opinion upon the Secretary of the Treasury forced him, against his own better judgment, it is believed, to sell large amounts of gold, and thus depress the price. It is notorious that during the whole of last year's panic in Europe it was, in consequence of the low price of gold, a highly profitable operation to bring bonds here for sale and ship the coin against them. To such a point was this carried that we actually sent more gold over than Europe required, so that a large part of it was sent back in September and October, in payment of the very bonds returned in May and June. The utter folly of this course is too well understood now to permit its repetition to be for one moment thought of. Nothing is, therefore, likely to be done by the Government this time to make it a safe and profitable operation for foreign nations to drain us of our coin, and defer again for an unlimited period our return to specie payments. It seems, then, not unreasonable to assume that, in case of actual war, or of continued fear of war, the price of gold here will continue to rule at or near a point at which our bonds cannot be imported from Europe at a profit.

But, apart from any security thus afforded us against the return of our bonds by the advance in gold, we believe that after the first panic our bonds will not only not suffer a very material or permanent decline, but that, on the contrary, the fact of our being comparatively uninfluenced by the war itself will cause our securities to be sought after in preference to those of any European government.

We furthermore believe that in case of a war between two such powerful nations as France and Germany, which would, financially and commercially, involve almost every nation of Europe, we should see a repetition of our experience of war in its influence on one financial movement. During the first year of our war the people of the United States withdrew from banks and hoarded over 80 millions of gold, in addition to the sums already in circulation before the war began. If this experience should repeat itself among the less well-informed peoples of Europe, no bank in Europe would be able to stand the drain.

We might then see the banks of England and France undergo the same fate as our banks in 1861, and, after a period of financial disturbance, see their specie come here for safe-keeping, as ours went to Europe in 1862 and 1863. We might then see ourselves reaping the same harvests on sea and on land that the European peoples reaped during our war, and praying that their wars might never end. But remembering the great law of the solidarity of nations, let us rather hope that, by the wisdom of rulers and the patience of people, peace may yet be preserved, as we have no doubt it will be, in spite of the threatening aspect of things, and that many years may pass before that great messenger of peace, the Atlantic Telegraph Cable, be again perverted to purposes of strife and suffering.

MR. GLADSTONE'S OVERTHROW.

The late defeat of Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons is likely to exercise sufficient influence on English politics and on Mr. Gladstone's fortunes to merit a clearer explanation of it than has yet been given on this side of the water.

The "dual vote," that is, the provision by which a man who paid income-tax, or, in other words, a man of the middle or upper classes, was endowed with an extra vote, while the poor man who had only the house qualification and did not pay income-tax had only one, which was the most obnoxious feature of Mr. Disraeli's bill, was abandoned by him almost as soon as the opposition attacked it. It was so clearly an attempt to retain the real power in the hands of the present holders while nominally admitting the working-men to a share in it, and was so well calculated to excite intense class hostility, that it had to be given up the moment attention was called to it.

The great question which then divided the ministry from the opposition was this: Mr. Disraeli's bill, as it now stands, proposes to establish what is in reality household suffrage in a modified form; that is, to give every householder a vote who has resided in a borough two years, and has personally paid his poor-rates, or tax for the support of the poor. Now, this excludes a very large class who are what is called "compound householders," or persons who, instead of paying their poor-rate directly, pay it through their landlord. There was so much trouble and expense incurred in collecting the rate from the occupiers of small tenements that an act was passed some years ago enabling parish vestries, by which the rate is struck and collected, to require the landlord to pay the rate due on all his property in one round sum, allowing him a deduction of twenty-five per cent. for his trouble, and authorizing him to repay himself by an addition to the rent. Some parishes avail themselves of the act—about 5,000 in all—and others do not; so that in many of the large towns the people living on one side of the street are "compound householders," paying their poor-rate with their rent, while those on the other side are direct rate-payers themselves. To the latter Mr. Disraeli's bill gives the franchise on the simple production of the tax receipt and proof of residence; to the former it only gives it on condition of their assuming themselves the payment of the rate, and thus sacrificing the twenty-five per cent. deduction which is obtained by paying through the landlord.

Mr. Gladstone objected to this as in the first place establishing unequal suffrage, and leaving the distribution of the franchise to be regulated in effect by the arbitrary action of parish vestries, inasmuch as in a parish in which the Small Tenements Act was adopted the poor-rate payers would have to submit to a fine in order to vote, while in the adjacent parish the non-adoption of the act would throw the franchise open to every householder, and he showed that the practical working of the bill would, in many of the large towns, shut out large bodies of the intelligent artisans; in many of the small ones admit the corrupt, ignorant, and very poor wholesale. He therefore proposed, by means of what is called an "instruction" to the Committee of the Whole House, to substitute for Mr. Disraeli's qualification a uniform rate, giving the franchise to all occupiers of holdings rated to the poor at the annual value of five pounds. Many of his followers took alarm at this. They said that if they voted for this amendment they would seem to their constituents to be voting for the establishment once more of an arbitrary line, such as had marred the Reform bill of 1832, making a man's right to the vote depend on the value of his house, and not, as it ought, to depend on his intelligence and share in bearing the public burdens. It might be that a low qualification of this sort would really at once admit a far larger number of persons to vote than Mr. Disraeli's qualification; but it would not seem so to the constituencies, and its adoption by the Liberals would certainly do much to postpone any further extension of the suffrage, while Mr. Disraeli's more elastic measure would be pretty sure to lead the way before long to something better.

Accordingly, forty-eight Liberal members, belonging mainly to the Radical wing of the party, held a meeting in the "tea-room" of the House of Commons, and resolved to refuse to support Mr. Gladstone's "instruction," and went in a body and told him of their determination. With that irresolution which is born of his conscientiousness, of his extreme respect for the opinions of the minority, and of that self-distrust by which so many noble natures are half paralyzed, he gave way and abandoned the "instruction." From that moment the Liberal party was disorganized. Discipline and unity were gone, and when he moved in the Committee of the Whole House the simple amendment that all rate-payers should have the franchise, whether they paid the rate personally or through their landlord, the result was already foreshadowed. The half-hearted, who have all along wanted to shirk all reform, joined the malcontents in deserting him, and he was beaten on a division by a majority of twenty, to the huge delight of the Tories.

His position out of doors is so strong, his hold on the popular heart so firm; he brings to every discussion not only such a trained, comprehensive, and subtle intellect, and such a flood of eloquence, but so much of that fire of earnest conviction and of honest human sympathy which are daily becoming somewhat scarcer amongst professional politicians all over the world, that there is no likelihood that any successor for him will ever be found by the Liberals. He towers head and shoulders above all other men in their ranks. But it is certain that his difficulties during the remainder of his career will be increased tenfold by what has just happened, for he has proved himself wanting in that faith in himself which, low a quality as it may seem, is the first requisite of any man who seeks, either in war or peace, to be followed faithfully and trusted implicitly by others.

"THE GENIAL CRITIC."

We receive occasional remonstrances on what is considered the severity of our reviews of books from the friends of what is known as "genial criticism," that is, of praise with just enough faint censure in it to make it seem that the writer is really balancing defects against excellences. Under the shelter of this "genial criticism" there has grown up a great crop of pretenders in all walks of literature and science, who deluge the country every year with their books, and secure a ready sale for them, to the great depravation of the public taste and to the great hindrance of real scholars, real poets, and real scientific men. We have endeavored to the best of our ability to do something to check this evil by providing a channel in which men of real culture may say what they honestly think about the claims of the numerous applicants for public attention who now make their appearance every week.

Without going into the vexed question of the use of criticism in its highest aspects, there is one aspect in which its utility will be denied by nobody, and that is as an aid to book-buyers. The American public contains more book-buyers than any public in the world, and the American and foreign press teems with books. Now, the majority of book-buyers have neither the time nor the money to buy or read the one-thousandth part of what is published. It is of the highest importance to them, therefore, that they should have some guidance in deciding what books of the thousands they had better buy and read and digest and put away on their book-shelves; and it is to supply this guidance, however imperfectly, that what are called "literary notices" are published in the newspapers. Without this object in view, two-thirds of them would be an idle flow of words, and the time spent in writing them utterly lost to nearly everybody but the writer and a few of his friends. But, for the book-buyer, the first essential of these "notices" is honesty and independence. The writer of them—certainly of those which appear in the weekly papers—professes to be a third party, a judge of books standing between the bookseller and the public, without interest or bias on one side or the other, and occupied solely with the task of giving the book-buyers a fair idea of the literary value of the wares which the publisher offers for sale. The publisher is, of course, interested in selling, and in nothing else. Caveat emptor is even more emphatically the rule of the book market than of the horse market. Of course no publisher of respectability selects works for publication which he does not honestly believe to have merit. But having once selected a book and put his name on it, his whole and sole business is to push its sale, to recommend it, and induce others to recommend it. The public is perfectly aware of this, and is consequently not in the least affected by what the publishers say of their own books in their advertisements or elsewhere. Those funny little sheets, containing elaborate laudatory notices of the works they have for sale, which some of the booksellers have lately taken to circulating, and in which so much philosophy, sociology, "knowledge of human nature," and wide and various reading are brought to bear upon the commendation of the last novel or poem, are very entertaining, but nobody is deceived by them. Everybody makes allowance for the motives of the writers, and, having laughed, lays them down.

When a man not very familiar with books wants to know what is going on in the book world, and whether he had better buy the latest novelty, he looks at the reviews of it, probably at that which has appeared in his weekly paper—most probably, in this country, in his religious weekly. "Here," he says to himself, "I shall get the opinion of an honest man of some literary acumen who has read the book, who has no interest in promoting its sale, and by his opinion I shall be guided in deciding whether I had better expend in purchasing it any portion of the too small sum which I can afford each year to lay out in this way." Now, if the reviewer is pecuniarily interested in the sale of the book, as the publisher is; if he is not an impartial judge, but virtually an agent of the publisher disguised as a critic, and rewarded by him directly or indirectly for puffing his wares; if the reviews he writes are not candid estimates of the value of the book for the use of the buyer, but advertisements, in the guise of reviews, for the benefit of the publisher, and intended to induce the reading public to purchase the book—then, we say, the reviewer and all who aid and abet him are guilty of an odious fraud, which is not rendered one whit less culpable or less contemptible by the fact that most books only cost a dollar and a half each. A cheat is a cheat, let the amount be what it may. And we say, advisedly, that a very large proportion of the "genial criticism" of our popular periodicals is of this kind, and it is owing to the wide prevalence of this fraud that the efforts of some journals to judge of books on their merits solely and speak of them as they deserve, are stigmatized as indications of a malignant and acrid nature.

Let us not be misunderstood. We do not say that there is any paper of reputation in the country which does not often contain reviews of real merit and written with an honest purpose, and which does not occasionally take pains to procure such reviews. Nor do we say that the corruption of the Genial Critic takes the form of gross bribery; that the bookseller gives him or the newspaper publisher a fixed sum to produce "a first-rate notice" of his last book. It is only the lowest order of humbugs and deceivers who can be seduced in this way. The process commonly in use is more complicated and a little more delicate. The bribe is "advertising patronage." Publishers find that an advertisement in any paper is doubled in value by the appearance of a favorable critique, in the editorial columns, of the book advertised; therefore they very naturally and very excusably advertise most where they get most favorable notices, and the Genial Critic, knowing their weakness, offers favorable notices in return for paying advertisements. Both parties in this way make money; the author's feelings are spared; his "profundity," his "lucidity," his "acuteness," his "wonderful grasp" and "rare powers" are proclaimed to the listening world; and a few hundred persons are eased of two dollars apiece, "which they will never miss," and "where 's the harm of it all?" say the Genial Critic and the "enterprising publisher" of the "widely circulated and influential journal." The harm is the harm of all money-getting on false pretences, and the additional harm of lowering the public taste, hindering the reward and recognition of real merit, and tempting scores of people into authorship who would be much better employed in selling thread and needles or raising cranberries.

All this has, of course, been said before many a time. The reason why we repeat it now is that we happen to have caught "the Genial Critic" in the very act of making his bargain with the book publishers, and are thus enabled to fortify our judgment with names, dates, and circumstances—an advantage which few of those who have assailed his malpractices have enjoyed. We have before us a printed circular issued by the proprietor of The Independent, a religious weekly paper of this city, and addressed to "booksellers and publishers," soliciting advertisements, and judiciously marked "private." He announces at the opening that The Independent is "unsurpassed in circulation and influence by any religious paper on the globe"; that "in name and reputation it has no superior"; that "in character and ability" it has acquired "a fame thoroughly national"; that its subscribers are "a reading class, a book-buying class," "in comfortable or independent circumstances," including "seven or eight thousand clergymen of all denominations." Much of this is, no doubt, true. The Independent has some excellent qualities, and has certainly a very wide circulation, but this only increases its responsibility in the matter of "book notices." But the views of duty on this subject entertained by the publisher of this wonderful "organ" may be inferred from the following paragraph:

> "Books Sent for Review.—The managers of The Independent desire to make their paper in this respect as acceptable to book publishers as possible. All books sent for review are considered as candidly and favorably as possible. We cannot review every bock sent us, as our space for book notices is limited. Yet ALL books of worth are reviewed and well treated."

We have great pleasure in giving this notice the benefit of our circulation. Publishers will observe that it is only their "books of worth" that are favorably treated, so they had better send their poor books elsewhere. The Genial Critic never occupies himself with the chaff. There is one question we should like to ask him, and we leave him to answer it at his leisure. He will be the last man in the world to deny that humbug is the great curse of our time. What we wish to know is, how he supposes society is ever to be delivered from it if the press, and especially the religious press, which is the ex officio exposer of humbug, is to remain one of its most besotted worshippers? Has he no bowels of compassion for the "best families, the people of intellectual culture and appreciation," even though they are "in comfortable and independent circumstances," and especially the "seven or eight thousand clergymen," who every week have to read his "candid and favorable reviews"?

HOW SHALL WE SPELL?

NO. II.

In our last week's discussion of the orthographic question we endeavored to expose the absurdity of the claim that our present modes of spelling are necessary if we would keep up a knowledge of the history of our language. Many, however, who have too much insight and caution to put their advocacy of the "historic" or Tibetan principle in English orthography upon the false ground of its indispensableness to etymologic science, will yet defend it as calculated to lead on the writer or speaker of our language to enquire into the history of the words he uses, thus favoring the development of an etymologizing tendency. He who now pronounces sam and him, they think, would be liable, if he also wrote those syllables phonetically, to just simply accept them as names of the things they designate, like pig and pen, without giving a thought to their derivation; whereas, if he knows that they are and must be spelt psalm and hymn, his natural curiosity to discover the cause of so singular a phenomenon may land him in the Greek language, and make a philologist of him almost before he suspects what he is about. There is more show of reason in this argument; but whether more reason, admits of doubt. The anomalies of our orthography, unfortunately, are far from being calculated, in the gross, to guide the unlearned to etymological research. For one of them which is of value in the way of incitement and instruction, there are many which can only confuse and discourage. In the first place, there are not a few downright blunders among them. Thus, to cite a familiar instance or two, the g of sovereign (French souverain, Italian sovrano) has no business there, since the word has nothing whatever to do with reigning; island (from Anglo-Saxon ealand, is spelt with an s out of ignorant imitation of isle (Latin insula), with which it is wholly unconnected; in like manner, an l has stumbled into could, in order to assimilate it in look to its comrades in office, would and should; women is for an original wif-men, and its phonetic spelling would be also more truly historical. Again, another part, and not a small one, seem to the ordinary speller the merest confusion (and are often, in fact, nothing better), calculated to lead him to nothing but lamentation over his hard lot, that he is compelled to master them. Take a series of words like believer, receiver, weaver, fever, reever, and try how many of the community are even accessible to proof that their orthographic discordances are bottomed on anything tangible. There is in some persons, as we well know, an exquisite etymologic sensibility which can feel and relish a historical reminiscence wholly imperceptible to men of common mould; to which, for instance, the u of honour is a precious and never-to-be relinquished token that the word is derived from the Latin honor not directly, but through the medium of the French honneur; and we look upon it with a kind of wondering awe, as we do upon the superhuman delicacy of organization of the "true princess" in Andersen's story, who felt the pea so painfully through twenty mattresses and twenty eiderdown beds; but it is so far beyond us that we cannot pretend to sympathize with it, or even to covet its possession. If we are to use a suggestive historic orthography, we should like to have our words remodelled a little in its favor: if we must retain and value the b of doubt (Latin dubitare), as sign of its descent, we crave also a p in count (French compter, Latin computare), and at least a b, if not an r also, in priest (Greek presbuteros); we are not content with but one silent letter in alms, as relic of the stately Greek word eleēmosunē; we contemplate with only partial satisfaction the l of calm and walk, while we miss it in such and which (derivatives from so-like and who-like). Why, too, should we limit the suggestiveness of our terms to the latest stages of their history? Now that the modern school of linguistic science, with the aid of the Sanskrit (not Sanscrit) and other distant and barbarous tongues, claims to have penetrated back to the very earliest roots out of which our language has grown, let us take due account of its results, and cunningly convert our English spelling into a complete course of philological training.

We have, however, no intention of taking upon ourselves here the character of reformers or of proposers of reforms; only, when this and the other principle are put forward as valuable we cannot well help stepping aside a moment to see where we should be led to if, like true men, we attempted to carry out our principles. As regards the historic element in English orthography, we think it evident enough that its worth and interest do not at all lie in its instructing effect upon the general public who use the language, but rather in its tendency to call up pleasing associations in the minds of the learned, of those who are already more or less familiar with the sources from which our words come. It is much more an aristocratic luxury than a popular benefit. To the instrument which is in every one's hands for constant use it adds a new kind of suggestiveness for those who know what it means, and gives them the satisfaction of feeling that, though they may not wield the instrument more successfully than others, there are peculiarities in its structure which they alone appreciate. Such a satisfaction is a selfish one, and improperly and wrongly obtained, if bought by a sacrifice of any measure of convenience or advantage to the great public of speakers and writers.

What may be the general loss in these respects we will not now stop to enquire. For it is incontrovertibly true that whether the natural merits of the two principles we have been considering—the Chinese and the Tibetan, the differentiation of homonymous words and the retention in writing of former modes of utterance—be greater or less, they are practically held in the most complete subordination to another, namely a simple conservation of the modes of spelling now current. All that is said in their defense is as much aside from the true point as were the pleas put forth a few years since by the Southern slave-owners respecting the curse of Canaan and the separate origin and inferior endowments of the negro race. Those pleas were urged, no doubt, with a certain kind of sincerity; but we have yet to hear of the ethnologically learned or the devout Southerner who ever set a slave free because the blood of the superior race predominated in him, or because only the sixteenth part of his lineage was to be traced to Ham, while the rest went back to Shem or Japhet, or both. "Possession is nine points of the law," and partus sequitur ventrem were the true proof-tests and scientific principles on which the master's right reposed; and so also "whatever is, is right" constitutes the complete ethical code of him who is defending English spelling. Anything else is mere casuistry, a casting of dust in the eyes of the objector. The paramount consideration, which really decides every case, is that the existing orthography must be perpetuated; if for this and that word any other apparently supporting considerations of any kind soever can be found, they may be made the most of—yet without creating a precedent, or establishing a principle which is to be heeded in any other, case where it would make in favor of a change. The advocate of "historic" spelling insists strongly upon retaining the l of could as that of would, and fights against a p in count not less vehemently than in favor of a b in doubt; the difference of receive and believe is no more sacred in his eyes than the sameness of cleave and cleave. Now, we have no quarrel with any one who plants himself squarely and openly upon the conservative ground and declares that our English spelling is, with all its faults and inconsistencies, good enough for its purpose, that every item of it is consecrated by usage and enshrined in predilections, and therefore must and shall be maintained. What we cannot abide is that he who means this, and this only, should give himself the airs of one who is defending important principles, and keeping off from the fabric of English speech rude hands that would fain mar its beauty and usefulness. Orthographic purism is, of all kinds of purism, the lowest and the cheapest, as is verbal criticism of all kinds of criticism, and word-faith of all kinds of orthodoxy. As Mephistopheles urges upon the Student, when persuading him to pin his belief upon the letter,

"every iota of the written word may be fought for," and that, too, even by the tyro who has well conned his spelling-book, though his knowledge of his native speech end chiefly there. Many a man who could not put together a single paragraph of nervous, idiomatic English, nor ever had ideas enough to fill a paragraph of any kind, whose opinion on a matter of nice phraseology or even of disputed pronunciation would be of use to no living being, fancies himself entitled to add after his name "defender of the English language" because he is always strict to write honour instead of honor, and travelled instead of traveled, and never misses an opportunity, public or private, to sneer at those who do otherwise.

In what we have said we have been solicitous only to put the defence of our present modes of spelling upon its true ground. We may, perhaps, take an opportunity later to discuss some of the other aspects of the orthographic question.

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, April 5, 1867.

THE opening of the International Exhibition, which took place on the 1st inst., according to the official programme, has naturally been the leading topic of the past fortnight. The backward state of the great undertaking, the coldness of the weather, and the too evident desire of the managers of the great show to make it a paying speculation, have somewhat cooled the enthusiasm of the Parisians in regard to the affair; and the extreme simplicity of the inaugural ceremony, reduced by the necessities of the case to a mere promenade through the court of the building, the commissioners, jurymen, and diplomatic body, etc., all in plain everyday clothes, had nothing in it to gratify the eye or appeal to the imagination. A more utter contrast could hardly be imagined to the imposing scene presented by the opening of the Exhibition of 1851, and the spectacle, quite as splendid, though different, afforded by the opening of the Exhibition of 1855. In both cases the form of the building permitted the eye to take in a vast extent of striking and splendid surface; tinted columns, gilded blazons, handsome flags, and the dense, expectant, well-dressed crowd, with its variegated masses of color furnished by the grouping of official costumes, and of the black and white of evening dress in the portions of the building filled by the uglier sex and the gay toilettes of the fairer one. And, contemptuously as philosophy may look down on the puerilities of the tailor's art, it is certain that nothing can compensate, in the general effect of any public spectacle, for the absence of the peculiar appearance imparted to the scene by the orderly contrasts of color resulting from the massing of the various styles of costume in a grand assemblage of well-dressed humanity. On the occasions referred to, the vastness and beauty of the place of concourse, the splendor of accessories, the unparalleled spectacle of the huge, expectant gathering of human beings, and the imposing pageant afforded by the sovereigns themselves in their magnificent attire, preceded by a dignified group of officials in uniform and followed by their several courts in all the elegance of drawing-room costume, moving slowly along the broad, carpeted aisles in full view of all present, and graciously acknowledging the resounding acclamations and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs that filled the vast building to its farthest extremity, combined to fill the eye and impress the mind of the beholder. An unfinished, undecorated building, very ugly, though very convenient, and only capable, through the peculiarity of its construction, of showing a mere handful of spectators at a time; reaches of almost bare wall; bare, half-swept stone floors, equally cold to the foot, eye, and imagination; and, coming and going before one could be well aware of their approach, a small mob of common-looking people, whose high position did not render their everyday clothes a whit more imposing, and in their midst a gentleman and lady, arm-in-arm, looking extremely like ordinary mortals, and covered from head to foot with the abundant dust swept up by the lady's long gown in the course of their peregrination,—such was the spectacle presented by the "ceremony" (if such it can be called) of last Monday.

It may interest your readers to know that the Empress, who, like her "august" spouse, was looking extremely well, wore a tremendously trailing gown of maroon satin, cut out into a pattern round the edge, but without other trimming; a black velvet mantle, rather longer than those in vogue just now among the fashionables of this region, very richly trimmed over its upper part only with embroideries of jet and black Chantilly lace. As an apology for a bonnet, a tiny affair, not quite so small as the biscuits and lozenges now worn on female heads, composed of velvet of the color of the dress, and trimmed with jet, lace, and a small bunch of black and gold flowers over the right side of the forehead. Her graceful Majesty, who glided along, as usual, more as a wave or a vapor than is the wont of ordinary bundles of bones and muscles, has so much good taste and native elegance that, no matter what may be the prevailing fashion, she always keeps clear of extravagance or eccentricity. Thus, though her cloak was small, it still looked like a cloak intended for out-of-door wear, and not like the ridiculous little vests, coming scarcely below the elbows, which so many of her husband's lady-lieges seem to have carried away from their toilette-stand or dressing-table by mistake; and her bonnet, tiny as it was, was by no means microscopic, and covered all the front and sides of the head, leaving one in no sort of doubt as to whether its wearer were bare-headed or not.

The Imperial pair were extremely well received—a chorus of acclamations greeting their appearance, and circling with them as they went round the building. And although the opening was so very far from being imposing as a spectacle, and the building has proved itself to be, as every one foresaw must be the case, utterly incapable of affording anything like a grand coup d'œil, there can be no doubt that the present Exhibition, when really au complet, will abundantly compensate, by the unparalleled richness and interest of its contents, for any lack of scenic effect in the "gasometer" and its arrangements.

Unready as is every portion of the interior, and difficult as it is to appreciate the most exquisite marvels until they have quitted their packing-cases, a ramble through the vast concentric galleries of the new palace of industry is far from being devoid of interest. There are in each department oases of "space" in which the exhibitors have nearly completed their preparations; and even in the least completed portions one comes here and there upon something of rare interest or beauty. For instance, on an otherwise blank wall of "Gallery II.," devoted specially to the appliances and products of "artistic industry," there is a marvellous collection of tropical leaves, silvery white but not shiny, obtained apparently by some new plastic process, which seem to have been wrought by the hand of Dame Nature herself; and beneath these a series of photographs of flowers and fruit, signed by Aubrey, of a perfection that altogether upsets one's notions of photographic possibilities. There is, for instance, a cluster of China asters and another of poppies, a bunch of grapes, and a spray laden with plums, all of life-size, absolutely astounding to the eye. The relief of these photographs is stereoscopic; and every little vein, wrinkle, or inequality of surface is as plainly visible as in the real object. The exquisite gradations of light and shadow seem to produce an effect equivalent to the shadings of color in the real objects; and the velvety texture of the flowers, the bloom of the fruit, are rendered with a fidelity and a delicacy that are indescribable.

If the "pomps and vanities" were not represented very evidently in the little ceremonial of Monday last, there will apparently be no lack of them at the two grand solemnities for which so much anxious preparation is being made at Pesth and at Berlin. The approaching coronation of the "King of Hungary" will be one of the most picturesque pageants imaginable. The King and Queen, as well as all the great Hungarian magnates, will appear in their splendid national costumes, and the display of jewellery and gold embroidery will be dazzling. The famous Esterhazy jewels, heirlooms of three or four generations, have just been dispersed under the hammer of a London auctioneer; but the old families of Hungary, despite the tribulations of their country, are rich in jewels, and will bring them out to the last diamond in honor of the day that will consecrate the great fact of the national triumph. The gala court-dress of Hungary is the richest in Europe, and, in the case of those who possess a large collection of precious stones, is often so thickly sewn over with these as to be stiff enough to stand alone. The famous Esterhazy coat, a sort of loose jacket of silk, was completely studded with magnificent pearls and jewels; and they say that every time it was put on it entailed on its owner an average loss of £1,600 from the dropping off of the stones. The cap worn with this famous suit was not only covered with magnificent jewels, but was surmounted with a phœnix composed entirely of large diamonds of the purest water, one of the finest known emeralds, and several rubies of fabulous value. The sword, sword-belt, and all the other portions of the costume, which has now been broken up and sold in fragments, were of corresponding richness and value. As for the coming marriage of the Count of Flanders with the Princess of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, the Berlin papers are full of the wedding programme. The King of the Belgians will be present at his brother's marriage, which is to be celebrated on the 25th inst., at 2 P.M., by the Prince-Bishop of Breslau, in presence of the Royal family of Prussia and a great concourse of grandees, Prussian and Belgian. The bride's train will be borne by four ladies of honor. Cannon will be fired; all the bells of the capital will ring their loudest peals. The wedding party will dine at four in the famous White Saloon of the palace; the Prince and Princess Royal will hold a grand reception in the evening in honor of their "august" relatives; and on the following day the Belgian Royal family (who are Catholics) will attend mass in the Church of St. Edwige, after which the new married couple will make a round of visits. At two o'clock there will be a déjeûner-dinatoire at the palace; and in the evening the King of the Belgians and the new pair will hold first a diplomatic reception, and then a court in the picture gallery, winding up a tolerably onerous day's work with a concert, given at eight o'clock, in the White Saloon.

The giving of concerts is becoming more and more "a feature" in the fashionable dissipations of Lent. An unusually fine one was given on Wednesday evening at the Tuileries; but the Empress was not present, having tired herself out and taken a severe cold in her long promenade on Monday. M. Auber, director of music sacred and profane at the Tuileries, moved about among the assembled musicians the youngest man present. "Mon cher," remarked the old composer to a guest who approached him, "you will hear nothing but old-fashioned airs to night [the music selected was entirely of the old masters]; but you must remember that most of the new music so called is new only in name." A snow-white hair that had fallen on the maestro's collar having been espied and removed by the guest, "Some old person must have passed very close to me," added the old composer, with one of his sly smiles.

The Théâtre Français is negotiating with Victor Hugo a revival of the nearly forgotten dramas of the self-expatriated poet, beginning with "Hernani." Sharpshooting critics declare that the attempt will be a failure; and as les absents ont toujours tort, are raking up all manner of spiteful anecdotes and witticisms against the poet. Patti is shortly to take wing for London; but Nilsson will remain here during the summer. Thérésa, Susanne Lagier, Cornelie, and Albert de Glatigny, the improvisatore, are preparing their nets for the shoals of foreign fishes so soon to arrive in Paris waters. Adah Menken is in high favor, and figures in the windows of all the print-shops; and all the empty houses not yet rented by speculators, for conversion into furnished lodgings, are being hastily turned into eating-houses.

Fine Arts.

FORTY-SECOND EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

FIRST NOTICE.

MANY of our younger painters are away this spring, and among them are some of those whose works have made former exhibitions more attractive than this one is. Mr. Homer, Mr. Vedder, and Mr. C. C. Colman, of those who are the strongest, are in Europe; Wm. H. Furness, Jr., is dead, and two unfinished portraits but poorly supply that place in the exhibition which his pictures of former years have created and which they worthily filled. We shall look at the portraits in future collections with less interest since Furness's contributions will not be among them. Mr. Vedder sends from Paris one small picture; good as it is, it is but one. So of those who stay at home; Mr. McEntee sends but one picture, and, good as it is, it is but one. Mr. Ward contributes one unimportant bust. Mr. Johnson sends but one picture besides a small cabinet portrait. Mr. Griswold does not give us what will worthily replace the winter pictures of 'sixty-four and 'sixty-five.

There is nothing from the Hills, father and son; but to that deprivation we were growing accustomed when last autumn's exhibition was made pleasanter by half a dozen of their works. Mr. Hennessy is not well represented. Mr. Boughton has almost nothing. The fact that the two best known of the avowed realists, Mr. Moore and Mr. Farrer, are better represented than ever before, and the fact that some of the more sensational of the "popular" painters have stayed away, do not save the exhibition from comparative dulness. The good pictures are as good as they have ever been, and in one or two notable instances better than have ever been sent by the same artists; but these are almost lost among the crowd of nearly six hundred of no saving merit.

This general impression comes of almost daily visits during the first ten days of the exhibition. But there are pleasant things to remember even among those pictures which are not the best; and the few pictures which are the best are certainly very delightful. If one begins at the best end of the list, it will often be with Eastman Johnson; and so it is to-day. Mr. Johnson's pictures do not seem to us the best painted of American pictures, because not of the first excellence even among American pictures as works of color; and all the quiet decision of the work, and the excellent drawing where the drawing is best, and the faithful painting of most things as they are, do not make amends for the lack of that other, the most precious of technical qualities. But these pictures are, we think, the best imagined and the fullest of thought. No. 452, "The Pension Claim Agent," is quite a model of how to treat a subject. How not to treat a subject is shown every day in pictures of nearly the same subject with this, a returned soldier telling his story. No. 495, across the gallery, is an instance. In this weak and unrefined picture, "A Modern Othello," or, in other words, a Zouave, is telling his tale, with much gesticulation, to an old man and a young girl. But this apparent readiness to tell their story does not seem to us characteristic of good soldiers, at least of those who came back from our great volunteer army. They were not apt to go off at a rattling pace, flourishing pipes in the air, and growing eloquent with the pathos of their own experience. They were rather close-mouthed and very hard to persuade to much talk about their own experiences. Their deeds had been done in the way of business, and did not seem very marvellous to them. Merchants and lawyers are not accustomed to recount thrilling tales of their ventures and their arguments; things that are a man's daily, matter-of-course employment are not often his chosen themes of discourse to strangers. And a soldier's life is nine parts waiting to one part action; ninety-nine parts rations and drill to one part conflict; while in most cases the conflict comes along as a part of the routine without violent excitement to lead up to it. So that experience of the ways of real soldiers tells against the intense interest in his own achievements of the Zouave in No. 495, and of all the army of pictured soldiers of which he is one. But in No. 452 the claim agent has called, and has seated himself at the table by the window and taken out his papers. So the story must be told; and the soldier stands leaning on his crutch and tells it very quietly, with only an illustrative forefinger. The women of the family keep to their employments and are busy; only the little girl looks around to listen, and lets fall the apple-parings; only the old man sits with nothing to do but to listen. The agent, who has heard hundreds of such stories, is stirred by this one, and his hard face lights up with excitement. The action is all direct, simple, natural. The figures are generally very well drawn even where good drawing was difficult, and there has been no attempt to avoid difficult foreshortenings. The accessories are, as always in these excellent studies of domestic country life, of the greatest value. The painting is dexterous and manly as ever, thin in the shadows, leaving little twinkling lights and broken color to shine through and render them transparent; decided and vigorous in the sharply outlined high lights. There is a too common use of a greyish-blue shade color which injures the picture—which almost spoils the well-imagined little girl's head, and harms the spirited face of the lawyer. The red of lips and of cheeks is harsh and unpleasant. The sharp-edged pattern in violent colors of the bed-spread hurts the picture, otherwise so grave, and in a grave way harmonious. But, on the other hand, the painting of the soldier's dress, of two nearly similar blues and all in shade, is excellent and admirable. The hands are all well drawn, some of them, as the little girl's that holds the knife, surpassingly well. In former works of Mr. Johnson's there have been a figure here and a figure there, a passage in this picture and one in that, better drawn or better painted than this picture taken all together. But, on all accounts, this seems to us the painter's best work, and not to be surpassed as a work of true and healthy feeling by any American picture. Mr. Johnson's other little picture, a delightful portrait, is not of great excellence in other respects, and peculiarly disappointing in color, with nothing strange in it, nothing unexpected; no strange revelations in that shadow or this reflected light—phenomena without which a picture can hardly be very good.

Mr. Vedder's "The Musician," No. 369, is so extraordinarily superior in qualities of workmanship to any work of his exhibited before and to most pictures we see here, that one is tempted to stop with the expressed admiration. The blending of the colors is certainly a study for our comparatively unaccomplished workmen. And there are evidences of a feeling for better things than smoothness of texture in the carefully studied, elastic, subtle folds of the drapery and in the suggested form beneath them. But to any one who loves color and who cares for pictures as decorative and beautiful objects, it is sad to see Mr. Vedder's rare gifts subjected to the grey demon that seems to be gaining influence over him. Shadows chilled with grey or deepened with black are just fatal to art. If this or that powerful and thoughtful man is able to make his pictures valuable in spite of the grey cloud, it will be all the more fatal to his admirers and followers. Thus much of technical qualities alone. Mr. Vedder would call this only a study, and no one ought to quarrel with the uninteresting subject; but it is really a picture of still life only. The tapestry and the dress are splendid; the woman, fine as she is for a lay figure, might be a deal more interesting as a woman, and might be doing something. But, objector, it is only a study, and Mr. Vedder is going to do us all good by-and-by, when he paints the pictures that he is nearly sure to paint.

Mr. J. F. Weir, whose great picture of the West Point Foundry last year was so interesting and on the whole valuable, sends a barbarous and harsh little picture called "The Culprit Fay," No. 310. It represents a sort of fairy moonlight on very unearthly plants; it is very false in color and fully as disagreeable as false, and there has been an attempt to make the plants round and projecting at whatever cost. Mr. Weir was, we believe, the artist of a little picture of several years ago, a belfry and bell with little sprites swarming; that picture we remember to have been like this in many respects, though hardly as bad. We hope both are of a time long gone by. A picture in the same gallery, No. 345, "The Eastern Sky at Sunset," seems to have much merit. We shall hope to speak of it again. Mr. Boughton, an admired and successful painter, sends us only a slight water-color drawing, No. 73, "Breton Pastoral." It is very careless and slight and very spotty and broken in general effect, and there is no truthful color in it anywhere. But Mr. Boughton can never quite forget the truth of form, and there is good suggestion of the human figure and of nettles gone to seed. The lover's hands holding his hat are delightfully easy and natural.

Mr. Hennessy has only "An Afternoon on the Beach," No. 545, a picture which is a disappointment to see after the hopes excited by recently exhibited work of this painter's. Most of the single figures are well studied and have some of the peculiar charm of Mr. Hennessy's best work, but they do not belong together; the picture is uncomposed both in sentiment and in line. It would not be fair to describe the figures as pasted flat upon the drab tint that passes for a beach, nor is it a wholly wrong tendency in a painter to make his work too flat, with too little relief; it may often be the best thing to do. Yet it is part of the description of this picture that these things are so with it, as it also is that there is nothing of the beauty of a beach in this waste tract before us.

COLLEGE REFORM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

I do not know who may be the author of the article entitled "Considerations on University Reform" in the April number of The Atlantic Monthly, but it seems to me to be one of the very best contributions that have been made to the education controversy which is going on among us. The realization of the practical suggestions it contains, or something like them, seems to me to be only a question of time; and I write to add a suggestion or two in regard to points which did not come within the immediate scope of the writer's article.

The question in particular which I wish to raise is, What changes should impending reforms in college management make in the college entrance examination? Whatever may be the final value put upon classical studies as an ingredient in the higher education of modern times, nothing can be more certain than that their mischievous monopoly is fast coming to an end. Once within the college walls the student finds in our best colleges, and pre-eminently at Yale and Harvard, not only admirable scientific instruction, but a liberty of choice in the arrangement of his studies which is growing greater every day. He can, to a far greater extent than formerly, follow the bent of his inclination in the selection of his studies, and give freer scope to his natural or acquired tastes.

But while this wholesome change has been going on within the college, the entrance examination has remained unchanged, or, rather, has been changing in a directly contrary direction. I know not why so little attention has been paid to this point, or through what influences the entrance examination, particularly at Harvard College, has been brought to its present pitch of absurdity. How absurd it is will be evident to those not acquainted with it from the statement that a young man of seventeen, to be admitted to Harvard College under the present system, must answer papers requiring an accurate knowledge of all the minutiæ of the cumbrous Latin and Greek grammars now in use, and so be possessed of an amount of minute grammatical information which can only reasonably be required of an advanced student in those languages, and some of which should be reserved even for our writer's proposed elective classical "tripos;" while the same young man of seventeen is allowed to enter an institution that calls itself a university absolutely and entirely ignorant of even the rudiments of every branch of natural and physical science ; for in these there is not even the pretence of an examination. If the Creator had intended that the minds of boys from the age of ten to the age of seventeen should be fed exclusively on a diet of grammatical abstractions, this would be all right ; but as every indication points in the other direction, the conclusion is irresistible that this college entrance examination is exerting a perverting influence on the earlier stages of our higher education, which is one of the most important, though one of the least noticed, evils under which we are suffering. In addition to this preposterous amount of grammatical technicalities, the mere amount of classical reading required is (as was some time ago pointed out by one of the soundest and most thorough of our classical teachers, Dr. Taylor, of Andover) largely in excess of what ought to be expected of young men of seventeen, if got up with that accuracy as to knowledge of the subject-matter which is essential to its being of any disciplinary value.

The consequences of this state of things are well known to all classical teachers, and are very manifest in the results of the college teaching itself. Unable to conform to the spirit of the requisitions, and yet compelled to conform to their letter, teachers are forced to cram their pupils ; they cannot interest them ; and the pupils themselves, forced to study Latin and Greek in this perverted way, acquire the habit of studying simply for the sake of passing the examination—a habit which, once formed, is death to all real interest in what might otherwise be a delightful branch of study. Even if here and there the interest survives, and the young man desires to make himself a real classical or philological student, so perverted has been the method of his early instruction that he has to undo half his work before he becomes a real philologist.

I am glad to see that even such a champion of classical study as Professor Bowen is awake to the absurdity of our present methods of classical study. Few will be found to sympathize with him in his estimate of the value of a knowledge of the position of Neptune or the utility of the Atlantic Cable ; and certainly no true advocate of scientific study will care how many men of straw he sets up and labels "utilitarians" merely for the pleasure of knocking them down again. The contrast between his estimate of the disciplinary value of scientific study and that contained in the recent discourse of Stuart Mill is a little striking. But with the admirable appendix to Professor Bowen's pamphlet I most heartily agree.

All proposals for the improvement of our college course thus far made seem to me to labor under this same defect, that they do not begin at the foundation, do not recognize the reorganization of school teaching, the right arrangement of school studies, as the condition precedent to the improvement of the college course that is to follow and be built up upon them. Why is the study of physical science in colleges a failure with so many young men? It is because of the lack of all previous preparation ; because during all the years set apart by nature for an initiation into the rudiments of those studies the boys were learning to conjugate and decline Greek words, trying to master all the distinctions between the use of the subjunctive and optative, and the infinite importance of not mistaking oxytones for paroxytones or properispomena. What wonder that Cooke's "Chemical Physics" discourages boys who have been allowed to reach the age of seventeen without knowing what makes the water rise in a pump!

A great mistrust has been excited in some quarters as to the value of our public high schools, partly, it seems to me, because their course of study has been, so to speak, bent out of shape to meet these perverted requisitions, and the interests of the great mass of the pupils have thus been made to yield to the necessity of getting a handful ready for college. The surest way to render our colleges unpopular is to divorce their interests from those of our public school system.

It is for these reasons that I desire to turn the attention of your readers to the very great defects in the entrance examination to college.

The Week.

MR. STANBERY has replied in the Mississippi injunction case in an argument remarkable for its power, and remarkable also for the purity and conciseness of its diction. He summed up admirably the leading points against the jurisdiction of the court, the insufficiency of the parties, the purely political character of the controversy, and the absolute powerlessness of the court as against Congress in any case in which, as in this, Congress has the people at its back.

JEFFERSON DAVIS has at last obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and there is little doubt now that the Government will produce him in obedience to it, and possibly go through the form of making arrangements for his trial; but there is very little likelihood that he will ever be tried, or that, if tried, he would be convicted. If it be, as we suppose it is, necessary to try him in Virginia, there would be no more chance of getting a jury to find him guilty, unless it were carefully packed with loyalists, than there would be of getting a jury of Fenians to find "President" Roberts guilty of violating the neutrality laws. Moreover, there is no reason either for trying him or not trying him now which did not exist two years ago, so that whether he is tried or discharged the Government stands convicted either of neglect of duty or of oppression. A more lamentable failure of justice there is not upon record. The South has failed in many things, but in one thing it has been successful. It has sent a million of men to the field to commit the offense of treason, as the Constitution defines it; but we have not been able in a single case to procure a solemn judicial decision that any treason whatever has been committed by anybody.

WHETHER or not Mr. Wilson, when he spoke in Charleston, had heard Mr. Stevens's last utterance about confiscation and had not heard the comments of the press upon it, we do not know, but he seems to have thought it best to say a word on the subject himself, and next to saying nothing has said perhaps as sensible a thing as was possible. He should vote for a measure of confiscation, he said, if there was any tyrannical endeavor on the part of the planters to prevent their laborers voting the Republican ticket. The point he intended to make was doubtless this, that gross tyranny by planters over negroes could be punished by a Congress which had not yet got its hands off the South. But talk of confiscation nowadays is very like talking nonsense.

JUDGE UNDERWOOD has delivered a charge at Richmond to the grand jury which we venture to say has no equal in the annals of justice for mellifluousness and irrelevancy. After giving a horrible account of the character of the rebellion, he drew a still more horrible picture of Richmond as it was, from which it appears that the pulpits in that city before the war were occupied by "full-fed, gay Lotharios"—most of the children were "illegitimate;" "the past" of the city he pronounced "atheistic," and expressed the hope that "its material and moral future" "would be brought into harmony with the salubrity of its climate, the poetic beauty of its scenery, and the magnificence of its water-power!" He then passed on to a eulogy on Thaddeus Stevens, whom he rated "above Clay, Fox, Pitt, and Cicero," and after a glowing eulogy on his confiscation schemes, came down in one flop to the every-day, useful topic of the exclusion of negroes from the street-cars, which he dismissed in one sentence. Of Judge Underwood's legal abilities we know nothing; his loyalty it is impossible to doubt; but we are quite sure that the cause both of justice and good government would be served if the fountains of his eloquence could be sealed up.

THE President has established such a shockingly bad character as a pardoner of the meanest and most dangerous classes of criminals, that it is not wonderful that his releasing Solomon Kohnstamm has provoked much abuse. It would be fairer to say that it has provoked much fault-finding, for Mr. Johnson having kept silence as to his reasons for pardoning the man, severe criticism of his action was no more than right. Kohnstamm had no less than forty-eight indictments against him when, having been tried on one of them, he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment; and his frauds upon the Government were so enormous, and his system of corrupting the officers of the Pay Department so successful, that a magistrate of so great authority and so high character as Judge Nelson said to him that, after hearing the evidence in the case, one might almost come to the conclusion that the disbursing officers of the Government in the city of New York were established for the payment not of genuine, but of fraudulent claims. It is said, however, that the President has had the matter under advisement two years; that eminent lawyers have assured him that Kohnstamm was convicted, as the District-Attorney afterward confessed, quite as much because the Government wanted somebody convicted as because he was guilty; that merchants of the very highest standing have petitioned for his pardon, declaring that, in a business life of many years, he had always been found upright; and finally, it was reported to Mr. Johnson that the chief witnesses against Kohnstamm were disreputable men who afterwards contradicted their testimony. Moreover, four years of the ten have been served out. Let it be true or untrue that Kohnstamm was unpatriotic, a suborner of perjury, and a swindler to an almost appalling amount, it seems to be certain that Mr. Johnson has not pardoned him in exactly the same way that he pardons ordinary counterfeiters.

MR. COLFAX was received by the Union League Club of this city at the club-house on Monday evening, and in his speech expressed his regret that Mr. Sumner's proposition to make the provision of free schools one of the conditions of reconstruction was not adopted. If Mr. Sumner had made his proposition a year sooner, we have no doubt it would have been adopted; but, like a good many other good things, it was kept back until its production looked like a mere attempt at delay and obstruction. We share Mr. Colfax's hope that the Southern States will voluntarily provide means of education for the poor, but we fear they will not do it as soon as they might have been made to do it, and as it is desirable they should do it.

In Philadelphia and Baltimore the horse-car has played a prominent part in religion and morals. Further south it has entered the domain of politics. A colored orator of Mobile has announced that, henceforth, the right to ride in a horse-car is to be considered a political and not a social right. It is to be like the right to a state-room in steamboats, or to go to the table when the first bell rings. In New Orleans the negroes, acting on this principle—and we do not know why it is not a good principle to act upon—refuse to ride in the cars which are provided specially for their use, or rather, they insist on free entry into all the cars, and there have been similar disturbances in Richmond and Charleston. The Lynchburg Republican, we observe, declares that an attempt to keep four millions of American citizens armed with the ballot out of the street-cars, is preposterous and must necessarily fail. The fact is that horse-cars will never run in Lynchburg; the editor is in a position to counsel such Southerners as are blessed with level ground. It would be wrong, however, to press this point, for in Charleston, we believe, the concession which The Republican advises has been made. In Richmond, certain gentlemen, who had been reduced by the war to the position of street-car conductors, have resigned rather than collect fares of negro passengers, and certain delighted negroes admitted to the white men's cars are said to have ridden up and down in them all day; but, as for the former, the Emperor of Brazil has abolished slavery in his dominions, and there is no place of retirement for gentlemen who cannot "accept the situation," and as for the latter, negroes can ride in horse-cars in Philadelphia and New York, and it is no easier for a colored man than an uncolored to earn his bread by perpetual excursions in horse-cars. A very little sense and justice will settle the question, and it is as good as settled now.

The Anti-Slavery Association held its anniversary meeting on Monday, and adopted a long string of resolutions couched in a more hopeful vein than usual, but declaring the present condition of affairs to be, as regards the freedmen, most critical, accusing Congress of relapsing into its old habits of corrupt bargaining, and warning the negroes against political alliance with their old masters, and closing with a shot at Governor Eyre and his aiders and abettors amongst the English aristocracy. The orator of the day was of course Wendell Phillips, who supplied nearly all the interest of the occasion. The association now holds out for a constitutional amendment securing the suffrage to the negroes, which is desirable, but which, it is to be feared, we are not likely to get at present, and this once secured, we presume the weary body would rest from its labors. Colonel Higginson advocated confiscation, which the other members had forgotten.

Two women who applied for admission as students into Harvard University got an evasive answer highly creditable to the diplomatic abilities of the somewhat retired scholars who must be supposed to be the managers of that institution of learning. The ladies were not admitted. Two other women have, we believe, made a similar application at the University of Michigan, and there will be a good deal of curiosity to hear the answer made by the faculty of that young but highly respected university. We suppose it may with equal propriety reply, as Harvard did, that "no provision" is made for female students, and, for the present, this answer must be held to be, on the whole, a not insufficient one. Whether it will, in fact, make that answer and say no more, is rather doubtful—that would hardly be the Western way; and we hope it may answer in the spirit shown by the government of the University of London, which has had its new charter drawn up with such breadth of expression as to admit of special examination of women for degrees.

Working-men will be pleased to learn that what Governor English's friends said of him during the late canvass was true, and that he does, his enemies to the contrary notwithstanding, favor an eight-hour law. He thinks a law making eight hours a legal day's work might properly be passed—provided it did not interfere with the right of employers and laborers to make contracts fixing whatever number of hours might seem to them proper. And if it will do the working-men any good, we can assure them that Mr. Hawley was also in favor of such a law as this; and, furthermore, that unless they elect a more foolish or a more knavish governor than any State in the Union has ever had yet and legislators to match him, the sort of eight-hour law which Mr. English kindly approves is the only sort they will ever get. The rest of Mr. English's message will remind Governor Orr and B. F. Perry of their boyhood's days, before we had any war or any emancipation or any negro citizens. At present, however, these gentlemen seem to act on views less retrospective.

The laborers all over the world are on a strike for one reason or another, the main reason being, however, the desire for better food, clothing, and lodging. They feel that their condition has not improved in the ratio of the improvements in machinery and manufacturing processes. The World accounts for it all in an elaborate article, showing that it is the fault of the various governments, and it follows, of course, that the discontent of the working classes here is the fault of the Republican party. This may be true, but this leaves the extraordinary severity of the past winter unexplained. The Republican party may have had nothing to do with it; but we suggest for the consideration of the writer in The World who "attends to" this party whether there is not something very striking in the fact that the Republican victories last fall were followed by the worst snow-storms and bitterest cold, all over both this continent and that of Europe, that have been witnessed for a quarter of a century. We propound no theory of our own; all we say is that this coincidence strikes us as very queer.

Slavery has reached its high-water mark in Brazil. On the 8th of April the Emperor signed a decree abolishing slavery after twenty years from date, and giving absolute freedom to slave-born children from this time on. Two millions is the number of those whose emancipation is thus deferred; but it is safe to predict that other causes than death will have greatly diminished this figure by 1887. The institution was moribund in Brazil from the moment the slave-trade was annihilated (1850–51), and, besides the fact that manumissions are common, and liberty attainable by those willing to make the effort, color is no bar to civil and social advancement when once the person has become a freeman. Manumissions, therefore, will continue, liberty will still be bought, and with all the more eagerness that the parent and the child may enjoy the same status; while the progress of liberal ideas without and within the empire, even if no political revolution ensue, will tend to shorten the term of emancipation both in public opinion and on the statute-book. The news will inspire the World's Anti-Slavery Conference that meets shortly at Paris, for except in the Spanish provinces its attention need scarcely be directed to the Western hemisphere; and nowhere in America is slavery making head.

The collector of Cable news on the other side is at work again "rapidly arming Prussia and France" and spreading "distrust in financial circles." As he has armed these two powers and has spread "the greatest uneasiness" throughout Europe several times already, there cannot now be much left for him to do in this field, and we again urge upon him the propriety of letting the feelings of "circles" and the private views of Bismark alone and devoting himself to telling us things that have actually happened.

The Tory Ministry in England has been badly beaten, it appears, in attempting to resist the lodger franchise, which will, it is safe to say, nearly double the number of voters who would be added to the bill under Mr. Disraeli's personal rating qualification. But there is clearly no getting the Tories out of office on this question, so a reform bill of some kind is pretty sure to be passed, which at the beginning of the session seemed by no means likely. The Reformers have carried out their intention to meet in Hyde Park in defiance of the Government, who were guilty of the folly of issuing proclamations declaring the meeting illegal, and afterwards allowing it to meet, with the proclamations posted up all around it. Of course, the folly of issuing the proclamation would have been aggravated by an attempt to enforce it, but its appearance aroused in the meeting a bitterness it would not otherwise have displayed, and has really made it a great political event. The real significance of the reform movement lies not in the mere fact that it will admit so many more men to the franchise, but in the fact that the first parliament elected under the bill will probably make changes in the Government so radical as almost to amount to a revolution.

The Fenian trials are going on rapidly in Ireland, and three prisoners have been found guilty and two sentenced to death, but there is not much likelihood that the sentence will be executed. Hanging will not stop Fenianism.

The text of the finding of the court in the case of Admiral Persano occupies five full columns of the Florence Nazione; for the Italian way is to sum up minutely the grounds of the accusation, the showings of the testimony, the history of the circumstances, and the articles of the code which have been violated and which indicate the penalty. The unfortunate officer, though acquitted of cowardice, is convicted of negligence, unskilfulness, and disobedience, and, besides being dismissed the service and stripped of the rank of admiral, is obliged to pay the costs of his trial—an infliction which in any country whose finances are not in so ruinous a condition as are those of Italy would probably have been omitted. A good deal of sympathy is expressed for the man so signally humiliated, owing, perhaps, to a feeling that the national pride made of him a scapegoat for what was properly its own offence and consequent disgrace. This appearance, however, could scarcely be avoided even in a clearer case than Persano's, and if he was really the incompetent commander which his acts and the official dispatches (his own included) seem to prove him beyond doubt, it was impossible to retain him in the navy, and the law was tolerably explicit as to his punishment. The proposition to attack Lissa proceeded from him, and was acceded to by the Government rather than see the fleet anchored and almost blockaded at Ancona. He must have known that he could not escape a collision with the Austrian squadron; and unprepared as he pretended to be for such an engagement, the result would have been at least glorious for Italy if his ships had been handled dexterously and in concert, according to some definite plan of action.

A NEW OPENING FOR AUTHORS.

Man, it has been well said, can have only a certain number of teeth, hairs, and ideas. From present appearances the publishers will soon be supplying him with all three—the teeth and hair false, of course, the ideas such as the fates may please. The question, Why ought a first-rate publishing house to be a good-sized manufacturing town, sounds like a conundrum—but it is not; the reasons why are sensible and solid, and in order to be accepted by all business men need only a plain statement.

What—to begin at the beginning—what is a publishing house that does not publish a magazine? Appletons are a great firm, and they do nothing of the kind, but the Harpers own a weekly and a monthly; Ticknor & Fields have a quarterly, two monthlies, and a weekly; Little, Brown & Co. have a law review; Hurd & Houghton reprint a foreign monthly, and issue one of their own besides; Scribner has a monthly magazine, so have Peterson & Brothers, so has Mr. Tilton, so has Mr. Kehoe, so have a great multitude of others. And of course, though a cynical philosopher might not see the necessity, all these magazines must live—and to live they must have readers—and readers, generically speaking, must be Man—and Man, as we have already remarked, has but a limited capacity of entertaining ideas, which brings us back to our manufacturing village above-mentioned.

For from among the innumerable repertories of ideas offered him weekly, it is requisite that the reader should make choice of this or that one. And the publisher must offer him inducements to read the particular one which his firm prints. Or it may be that the reader is perfectly able to devour and digest all the ideas that the publishers can put before him, but that he won't. It may be that the gentle reader has been debauched by the scurrilous critic, or too often betrayed by the genial and appreciative critic, or that he has discovered his own value and how much the publishers want him, and so waits to be bribed, and demands his price before he will read. At any rate, whether his mental or his moral shortcomings are the cause, the business of offering him "inducements to subscribe" is assuming vast proportions.

A Wheeler and Wilson sewing-machine worth fifty-five dollars for sixty dollars' worth of subscriptions, a Mason & Hamlin cabinet organ worth one hundred and ten dollars for one hundred and ninety-five dollars' worth of subscriptions, a twelve-dollar ice-pitcher or cake-basket or caster heavily plated in nickel silver for twenty-seven dollars' worth of subscribers, and for other amounts in subscriptions such premiums as a superb silver-plated tea-set, consisting of a chaste and beautiful tea-pot, an elegant coffee-pot, a water-pot to match, a cream-bowl of the neatest design, and a sugar-bowl like it—these are the offers which the judicious but no longer gentle reader extorts from the hitherto heady and masterful publishers. Obviously there is nothing to prevent another publisher's turning his attention to another branch of manufacturing industry, say to the making of a light and durable article of chamber furniture, or tin-ware—an article constantly in demand—or iridium-tipped gold pens, or a truly American perfume, or hair and hair dye, or soft-finish spool cotton, or gloves and hosiery, or wooden ware.

The mention of this last sort of goods suggests to us a plan which at first blush—we have not studied it in all its details—seems excellent. Why could n't most of our authors be profitably employed in turning out wooden-ware and most other articles of mechanism, to be made at the expense of the publishers, and given to subscribers as premiums for reading the other works of the same gentlemen? A small publisher might content himself with making one or two kinds of goods, as boots and shoes or patent teeth. But the great publisher, with unlimited command of money, and with an army of authors at his back, might, and no doubt before we are grey he will, go into general manufacturing. He could build two or three streets of small tenements, divided by strong fences, a few of them adapted to the use of authors unmarried, the rest to the needs of men with large families, and in the midst he might set up his manufactory. The steam which now works his presses and heats his buildings and lifts paper to the eighth story, and does a hundred other things, might be made to do still another hundred of still other things. It might here keep turning a score of lathes and keep industrious a score of poets working after patterns; there two historians, retired from the world, might be made to superintend the process of reducing certain books to pulp and transforming them to unspoiled paper; on this floor novelists might be employed in cutting and making by machinery suits of clothes; on that floor above essayists might fill small cans with hash or preserved fruits.

In short, it would be easy for the publisher, and soon it will be necessary for him, to turn out his own premiums by his own machinery, with his own authors as operatives, and thus save the immense sums which he now has to pay in the way of profits and commissions to the various manufacturers and other dealers. And as for the rest of the world, while the reader under this plan will lose nothing, but rather gain, the author will be sure of a home and of useful employment, and the publisher who pushes his magazines by premiums will be able to print whatever articles his author may write.

And for superannuated authors who had behaved themselves well, and for journalists no longer able to support the heats and toils of controversies, personal and political, there might be a little garden attached to the manufactory in which prize strawberry plants should be raised; or if the laborer had no prohibitory scruples of conscience, he might be set ot snip off cuttings of the vine to be given to the honest farmer of "the unpaved districts."

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt will soon give the novel-reading public "The Man with a Broken Ear," a most extravagant and most entertaining story by Edmond About. It is of the same sort as "The Nose of a Notary," which most people have read; and it is rather remarkable, seeing that About's "King of the Mountains" and his witty "Roman Question," with its memorable opening sentence, and his sad story of the sympathetic nose, were so generally read and liked by the American public, that we have not had more of his books translated. This translation is the work of Mr. Holt himself, its publisher.——Messrs. G. W. Carleton & Co. announce Miss Alice Cary's novel, "The Bishop's Son," which has been running through the Springfield Republican, and also a work, which is philosophic, we suppose, with the very brief and very comprehensive title of "Man."——Messrs. Lippincott & Co. have in press "The Boulevards," by W. Blanchard Jerrold; "History of the Dervishes," by J. P. Brown, interpreter of the American Legation at Constantinople, and, if we are not mistaken, a writer now and then of some tolerable verses; "The People the Sovereigns: Being a Comparison of the Government of the United States with those of the Republics which have existed before," by Ex-President Monroe; and "O-Kee-Pa, a Religious Ceremony of the Mandans," by George Catlin.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers are republishing W. M. Rossetti's "Essays on Art," Wm. Carew Hazlitt's "Memoirs of Wm. Hazlitt," and Swinburne's "W. Blake, Artist and Poet"—books not below the standard which this house seems to have set for itself.——Mr. Boutwell's speeches and articles relative to the question of reconstruction are to be gathered into a volume which Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. will publish. And a report is current that Mr. Sumner intends publishing his speech, made in secret session, in favor of the Russian-American purchase. So we may get some light on that subject; may, among other things, learn whether we are to pay the seven millions in dollars or in second-hand iron-clads.

—On one side of any American publisher bold enough to attempt a new edition of Thackeray's works stands the great firm of Harper & Brothers, who will not hear of interference by any one with the sale of books to which they are or conceive themselves entitled; on the other side stands the firm of D. Appleton & Co., who, leaving to the house above-mentioned the greater works of Thackeray, make and sell the reprints of the lesser works, "The Book of Snobs," "The Irish Sketch-Book," etc. Let us say, however, that we have never heard of any active measures taken by this latter firm to prevent new editions of Thackeray. And we say nothing here of the Tauchnitz Thackeray, for which Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt are the agents in this country. But it is tolerably well known that Messrs. Sever & Francis, of Cambridge, would, some years ago, have given us Thackeray in a far handsomer dress than he has ever worn in this country if, by an energetic application of the "courtesy of the trade" principle, they had not been compelled to stop short after they had got out "Pendennis," and sell their plates to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, who, it is currently but perhaps falsely reported, cannot base their claims to a right of property in American editions of Thackeray on any payment of money made to the author or his heirs. We say perhaps falsely reported, for it is not, on the face of it, improbable that Thackeray may have been paid by Messrs. Harper a certain sum for such of his novels as were printed in Harper's Monthly. How far such payments, amply repaid as they were by the value of the stories as portions of the magazine, can give to the house that made them a monopoly of the business of selling the novels in book-form, we do not here enquire. As we have said, the report goes that they were not made. So Sever & Francis began the publication of the novels, and were very soon compelled to stop. Messrs. Harper & Brothers have never given us the rest of that edition. But they have just put the three volumes of the Sever & Francis "Pendennis" into one, adorned it with the excellent portrait engraved for Sever & Francis, and the volume is offered at the low price of a dollar and a quarter. The paper, to be sure, is thin, but the book is by no means badly made, and the reading public might properly be congratulated if it were probable that the edition would now be completed. Whether it will or not is a question. We suppose the answer depends in a great measure on Mr. Michael Doolady. That publisher has just issued the first volume ("Pendennis") of his "Diamond Thackeray," which bears an exact resemblance to the "Diamond Dickens" of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. It has twelve illustrations, engraved on wood and well done, from designs by Thackeray, and is excellently printed on white paper. The same objection applies to these volumes as to those of the "Diamond Dickens" in regard to the fineness of the print; but, like those, these are very elegant specimens of book-making, and, of course, as regards illustrations these have an immense advantage. The price is the same—one dollar and a half—so that Messrs. Harper & Brothers offer us a "Pendennis" twenty-five cents cheaper than Mr. Doolady can. Far more people buy Dickens than buy Thackeray, but so many people—twenty-odd thousand, we believe—have bought the diamond edition of the former, and so many people who read both authors will like to see them both in similar apparel, that we suppose, and for these and various other reasons we hope, there may be a remunerative demand for the edition by Mr. Doolady.

—Mr. John Hogg, one of the publishers of The London Society, has had prepared, at the request of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, a statement, which he has sworn to before the Lord Mayor of London, in which it is declared that Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, when they bought the right to reprint London Society in this country, were fully aware of an agreement already existing between Mr. Hogg and Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, by which Every Saturday was to have advance sheets of London Society. There was, therefore, no fault to be found with Mr. Hogg for any action of his in this matter, and indeed none was ever alleged either by the Boston or the New York firm. This we take pleasure in saying. We believe Mr. Hurd, who has just sailed for Europe, will continue in force the present arrangements for the reprinting of the magazine, though, it is true, considerable quantities of the English edition find their way into this market. Mr. Hurd, during this visit to England and the Continent, will make arrangements for the sale abroad of the publications of his house, and especially for the sale of certain important new works, of American authorship, which are not to be issued till his return.

—We are informed by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, who are so advised by Messrs. Trübner & Co., that the Early English Text Society is proceeding prosperously in the accumulation of a reprinting fund. No doubt, then, it will, before long, be possible for the later subscribers to get, at a cheap rate, the publications of 1864 and 1865, which are at present out of print and hard to find. We believe Messrs. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, have on sale some complete sets of the publications of those first years of the society's activity; but of course they hold them at a comparatively high price, and the news of probable reprints will be received with much satisfaction. We have more than once, in these columns, called attention to the work and the aims of this society, which sets before itself the task of "bringing to light the whole of the hidden springs of the noble literature that England calls her own," and that we call our own too. We make no apology for again recurring to the subject; for to do so is, we hope, to lead some of our readers to the knowledge and the possession of some of the most valuable treasures of the language and to advance the cause of sound learning by acquainting them better with the language itself. A guinea a year—and that would be at present about $6 85 in paper—is the subscription fee, and for that sum the subscriber for 1867, for instance, will get certainly twenty and very likely thirty-two carefully edited ancient texts belonging to the class of romances, such as "Launcelot of the Laik," of dialectal works, such as the "Ayenbite of Inwyt" ("Remorse of Conscience," "the first great monument of the Kentish dialect"), of religious treatises, and finally of miscellaneous works, as "The Wright's Chaste Wife," "Piers Plowman's Vision" (three versions). These works, when sold in our American bookstores—this we say for the benefit of non-subscribers who may want one or another of them—cannot be sold as cheap as ordinary English books. The American importer has to pay, of course, the duty on the cost of the books, on the cost of the packing-case they come in, on the amount of the commission which the Government supposes him to have paid to a purchasing agent; but moreover, he has to pay in London the full retail price, for the society makes no discount. So, in the case of these books, the shilling is to be counted as worth sixty-odd cents in our currency and not as fifty cents, which is the value of it in the retail prices of other English books. But a guinea subscription not only gives a subscriber a large number of works curious and interesting in themselves and also of very great value to the student of English and the English; it also confers upon him the privilege of buying, at a reduced rate, in fact at half-price, the volume, soon to be printed by the society, containing the original ballads which Bishop Percy used in the preparation of his "Reliques," and which he altered to suit the vitiated taste of his day. The work, as given to subscribers for the society's texts, will form an octavo volume and will match the other volumes of the society's publications.

—Mr. Charles Webb, who says he wrote "Liffith Lank" for a magazine which twice refused it in spite of an earnest protest on the part of the author and repeated assurances that it was good, finally printed that clever little travesty in The Times. Afterwards, when it appeared in book form, he was really its publisher, though it bore the imprint of G. W. Carleton & Co. As, then, Mr. Webb in the case of "Liffith Lank" had the trouble of publishing his book, he intends now to have also whatever honor and whatever profit can be got from the business, so he issues "St. Twel'mo" under his own name, and with it a little book by Mark Twain, entitled "The Jumping Frog and Other Sketches," a volume not unworthy of a place beside the works of John Phœnix, A. Ward's books, and the two volumes of the Rev. Mr. Nasby. The new and enlarged edition of "Liffith Lank" will not be put on the shelves of Messrs. Carleton & Co. With these three books Mr. Webb will try the experiment, not too successful generally, of combining the labors of author and publisher. He has made a good beginning, however, for "Liffith Lank" sold very well indeed.

—M. J.-J. Clamageran, member of the Paris Society of Political Economy, has just published the first part of a work entitled "Histoire de l'Impôt en France" (History of Taxation in France). The author has taken a prominent part in the various congresses of the International Association for the Advancement of Social Science, and his present production is the fruit of many years of profound historic investigation in a field where he has had no competitors either among historians or economists. The first volume treats of the organization and growth of taxation during the Roman, the barbarian, and the feudal epochs, and halts in the middle of the fifteenth century. What follows will bring the history down to the revolution of 1789. M. Clamageran's preface, it is said, is a most attractive introduction to a scientific treatise, embracing in some eighty pages a prospectus of the subsequent history, and "written in a vigorous style that assumes both warmth and color when generalizations are evolved from the facts."

MR. LONGFELLOW'S TRANSLATION OF THE DIVINE COMEDY.[*]

This first volume of the work on which Mr. Longfellow has been so long engaged fulfils the justly high anticipations with which it has been awaited. The remarkable beauty of the book is appropriate to the character of the translation, and the claim tacitly asserted by the elegance of the external appearance of the volume is justified and maintained by its intrinsic merit.

After careful examination, and with no disposition to substitute commendation for criticism, we do not hesitate to say that not only is Mr. Longfellow's translation the best that has ever been made of the "Divina Commedia" into English, but also that it is hardly likely ever to be superseded or surpassed.

No one acquainted with the extraordinary felicity of Mr. Longfellow's versions of the poetry of other languages—a felicity which was one of the proofs of his original genius—can have doubted that his success would be great in any task of the sort to which he might set himself. But the measure of success he has attained in this work can hardly fail to surprise even those who had the highest confidence in his achievement.

It is with the heartiest pleasure that we say this; for we, in common with all readers of English, owe so much to Mr. Longfellow, and have so long learned to feel for him not only the admiration due to his genius, but a more personal sentiment of regard, respect, nay, even of affection, springing from the use he has made of his gifts and from the expression of his character in his writings, that we rejoice once more to be called on to testify to our gratitude to him, and with honest praise of his new work to give utterance to the feeling which is shared by thousands of readers unknown to him, and to serve them as the voice by which they offer to him their thanks.

We do not propose, in speaking of this translation, to enter upon the much vexed and insoluble question of the best method of poetic translation in general. The translator of a poem of any considerable extent has necessarily to make a choice between the literal and the free methods of translating, according to the object that he has in view. Much is to be said in favor of each. The free translation may be more attractive to an age and nation whose habits of thought and literary tastes are widely different from those of the age and nation to which the original was addressed. Pope succeeded in making his "Homer" far more popular than a more Homeric version would have been at the time he wrote. The general esteem in which Cary's version of the "Divine Comedy" has been held by English readers is due in great measure to its un-Dantesque qualities. But at present there is a reaction—it is one of the symptoms of the existing tendency to realism in literature and art—in favor of translation which shall give us as much as possible of the actual characteristics of the original; which shall not adapt it to other or changed tastes, but shall present it in its artistic and historic integrity. The more intelligent understanding of the past possessed by our generation, and the novel interest taken in the development of thought, in the life and the creeds of former days, make us desire the exactest reproduction of the chief works of ancient and mediæval literary genius.

In accordance with this disposition, Mr. Longfellow has undertaken to give us as faithful a rendering of Dante as could be made, avoiding on the one hand the unfidelity of mere literalism; on the other, that of paraphrase or interpretation. But a special difficulty attends the translation in a poetic form of the "Divine Comedy." One of the great charms of the original—a charm which belongs to it in higher degree than to any other work in literature—is its rhyme; and this triple, interlaced rhyme does not merely give delight to the ear by the recurrence of its harmonies, but it is so intimate a part of the structure of the poem that it forms one of the essential elements in the effect of the "Divine Comedy" upon the imagination and the intellect. The rhyme, which so rarely that we may, speaking broadly, say it never forced Dante to use a word he would not otherwise have chosen, becomes interfused with the thought itself, and gives not only added beauty but added meaning to the conception of the poet. Indeed, in no other poem is there so complete and absolute a blending of form with essence as in the "Divine Comedy."

But so far as the rhyme of the poem is concerned with its effect, the translator into English finds himself confronted with an insurmountable difficulty. The abundance of rhymes in the Romance languages contrasts strikingly with their scanty numbers in the languages of the Teutonic stock. If the translator attempt to preserve the triple rhyme, he speedily finds himself forced to make use of inversions and all sorts of expedients, by which qualities more important than the rhyme are obscured, if not utterly lost. The attempt has been gallantly made by one or two of the recent English translators; but no one familiar with the original can read even the best of these rhymed versions—Mr. Cayley's, for instance, or Mr. Ford's—and not soon be convinced that the English rhyme not only fails to reproduce the effect of the Italian, but is a positive hindrance to a good rendering of so much of the poem as it is possible to convey into our tongue.

Mr. Longfellow has then, as we think, done wisely in discarding rhyme. He felt, doubtless, that what was far more essential to preserve than the rhyme was the diction of Dante—a diction as various, as rich, as full, as sympathetic as ever poet possessed; now strong with unmatched simplicity and directness, now refined with an equally unmatched subtlety and exquisiteness of sense, changing with change of subject and modulated by every variety of feeling. To preserve this diction, to convey its character so far as change of language permits, must be the chief object of the translator. In keeping to the measure of the original, and confining himself to the same number of lines, Mr. Longfellow has chosen the best mode of securing this vital characteristic of the poem. If we compare his version with the other English versions that have been made upon the same general plan, we shall find that his is far the closest to the original not only in exactness of verbal rendering, but in this supreme quality of diction and of style. A poet alone can perfectly translate a poet.

It will not surprise us if many readers, attracted by Mr. Longfellow's name, should take up the book with expectations of entertainment from it which will not be fulfilled. But this will not be the poet's fault, but due to their own want of proper culture. No one need turn to the "Divine Comedy" for mere amusement. It is not to be read at all without some effort of mind, it is not to be truly understood without serious study and thought. It is not easily intelligible throughout even to Italians at the present day; and Mr. Longfellow has not attempted to make it easier in English than it is in Italian. But his translation will, we trust, lead some persons to the study and enjoyment of the poem who might not otherwise have had their interest awakened in it. It will thus not only lead them to acquaintance with one of the highest works of genius which the world possesses, and widen their understanding with knowledge of modes of thought remote from those of our day, but will introduce them to intimacy with a character almost solitary in its lofty purity, in its self-suffering manliness, in its dignity, strength, truthfulness, and tenderness. For Dante was much more than a great poet—he was a great man; and his chief work embodies and expresses as no other composition of human genius has succeeded in doing the essential personal traits of its author. It is the image of himself, and as such has a universal and perpetual interest to all other men, quite apart from and superior to that which attaches to its narrative, and to the special power and beauty with which its literary form is inspired.

[*] "The Divine Comedy of Dante Alighieri. Translated by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow." Vol. I. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867. 8vo, pp. 413.

The fact that the poem is so complete and absolute an expression of the man, imposes on the translator as his first duty the utmost attainable fidelity of rendering. Other authors may be less closely followed without wrong; but Dante insists upon respect for his words and has a commanding right to it. Mr. Longfellow has fully acknowledged this, and his translation gives proof at every line of the faithfulness which he has borne to his master. He has practised a difficult self-restraint; and we venture to say that there is not a passage in his translation in which he has wilfully substituted his own thought for that of his author, in which he has attempted to improve on the original, or in which he has allowed the temptation to interpret the meaning of Dante to interfere with the exactness of his version. Poets who heretofore have translated poets have been much in the habit of giving to their own genius a somewhat free scope in the adornment and interpretation of their authors. Chapman is perhaps the worst, and at the same time the most excusable, of sinners in this respect. Pope and Dryden are hardly less guilty. But no reader of Mr. Longfellow's translation need feel any question as to whether a thought, a simile, a sentiment in his version corresponds with the original or not. Mr. Longfellow's poetic genius shows itself here not in independent exercise, but in his exquisite sympathy with his author, in the choice of the most felicitous corresponding expression, in his selection of the most appropriate words, and in the range of his poetic vocabulary. There are portions of his version of really noble English, and throughout it the finest parts of the original are rendered as they only could have been by one who felt their charm and was himself so great a poet as to be able to transfer it into his own tongue.

The readers who know the other English versions of the "Divine Comedy" are those who are likely to set the highest value upon Mr. Longfellow's work, and to appreciate best the difficulties he has overcome. We regret that our space does not permit us to cite some parallel passages from the various English translations, to show the student unfamiliar with the other versions that in Mr. Longfellow he has not only the most poetic but by far the safest and most experienced of guides.

The notes and illustrations, which form half of the present volume, are worthy of the translation, and form an agreeable and useful body of comment. Mr. Longfellow has wisely avoided any attempt to set forth the intricate symbolism which some commentators discover in the minute details of the poem, and has pronounced his opinion upon disputed points with simplicity and without display of the arguments which have led him to his conclusions. His notes are mainly explanations of genuine difficulties, historical accounts of personages or events mentioned in the course of the poem, and passages taken from other authors which serve to illustrate the words or thoughts of Dante. There is no parade of learning in them, but they are drawn from a wide field of reading, and are the acquisitions of a naturally refined, scholarly taste, developed through a life devoted to literary pursuits.

We have left ourselves no space for the analysis of special portions of the work, but we regret this the less because the publication of the second and third volumes will afford us an opportunity to return to it, and we desire now simply to welcome it with the cordial greeting it deserves.

LONG'S DECLINE OF THE ROMAN REPUBLIC.*

It was, perhaps, a natural mistake, but none the less a very unfortunate one, that Mr. George Long, confessedly the first English authority on points of Roman antiquities, should therefore fancy himself competent to write a Roman history. We have seldom met with a book bearing the name of a history which presented so few claims to this title. Mr. Long could not fail to make a valuable treatise upon this subject, and we may be grateful to him for presenting us in a compact form with the net results of the labors of his long life. But he is by nature an antiquarian, not an historian. His highest aim seems to be to make an accurate statement of all the facts positively known, in chronological order. In the preface to the first volume he scouts the notion of "a philosophical history;" in that to the second volume condemns in strong terms the practice of "adding ornament to the simplest facts" in what is called picturesque history; and in his zeal to avoid the mistakes that other writers have unquestionably made in these two directions, he gives us a book which is neither philosophical nor picturesque, nor even a history in any high sense of the term.

To "patiently examine facts and attempt to put them in their proper place" is the sole task which he has placed before him. The result is a heavy narrative wherever Appian, Sallust, and Plutarch can be followed implicitly, and where there is doubt as to the facts a dull and rambling discussion, such as properly belongs to notes or appendices, authorities compared and arguments weighed, often without reaching any decision. When any occasion tempts we have a digression upon some point remotely connected with the subject under discussion, and those digressions are often the most interesting parts of the book, as, for instance, those upon the magic art, page 123, and upon the works of Aristotle, page 320. But anything like a generalization, except occasionally a shrewd practical remark on some political matter, or any arguing from the known to the unknown, he sedulously shuns. One smiles sometimes at a kind of dogged determination evinced to infer nothing, to accept nothing which is not down in black and white, and one cannot help suspecting that the mere mention of the name of Mommsen excites in him a kind of grim wrath; of Niebuhr, too, only that this name is now a classic in England even more than in Germany.

After all, we must acknowledge what there is really praiseworthy in Mr. Long's method. He makes, we think, a mistake in insisting upon the same canons of historical evidence in ancient as in modern history. Still, there is no doubt that a dry, sceptical treatise like this may be very serviceable in preserving the balance in investigation and checking a disposition to draw inferences from inadequate data. In ancient history we must perforce adopt a bolder method of enquiry than modern history admits. If we had only Livy and Dio Cassius complete, to say nothing of lesser writers, we should hardly desire anything more; but where all our information as to a period a generation long, crowded with important events, is contained in a series of bare epitomes, two or three unskilful abridgments, and a mass of allusions and disconnected incidents scattered through many volumes—what we know in such a case as this is very little; the question is what we have a right to infer. "Nothing lies like facts," it has been said; certainly the half-truths which thus come to our knowledge can give but a distorted notion of the course of events. And, at any rate, so long as writers on Roman history had nothing but the definite statements of ancient writers to follow, their works were meagre and profitless. It was not until Niebuhr took hold of the subject with a kind of inspiration, divining truths the record of which had perished, that a genuine interest and life were infused into it. Mr. Long is right in warring against hasty and ungrounded assumptions such as abound in many German writers on this subject. Even Niebuhr's greatness rests less upon his positive results than upon the method he introduced, for his views are now very largely set aside by the progress of the enquiry, while the stimulus he gave to the study of ancient history and the examples he himself affords of the true method of investigation ensure him a great and lasting name.

The building up of the dilapidated structure of Roman history calls for a rare combination of qualities; the widest and profoundest acquaintance with all the facts that are known, so that the mind shall have them thoroughly at its command; and, joined with this, a constructive imagination which knows how to give due weight to the smallest trifles of historical evidence and combine seemingly indifferent facts into a harmonious whole. This imagination was Niebuhr's peculiar power, and it is the peculiar power of his great successor, Mommsen; but it is one which Mr. Long not only does not himself possess in the smallest degree, but which he cannot appreciate or even understand in others. The consequence is that his history is disconnected, fragmentary, without light and shade, without satisfactory analysis of cause and effect. But, as we remarked above, it may yet be a serviceable check to the imagination. In reading a book of genius, like Mommsen's, one is carried along by the strong grasp and positive assertions of the author, and, by reason of his practice of not giving authorities, is unable to discriminate between what the writer says because he finds it so stated and what he says because he feels it must be true. But if Professor Mommsen is censurable in not giving his authorities, even more so is Mr. Long, for he does not profess to give us anything but what he finds in ancient writers, and the sole value of his book is as a thesaurus of whatever is positively known of this period. Half this value is lost by our not knowing where to find the authority for his statements.

* "The Decline of the Roman Republic. By George Long." Vol. II. London: Bell & Daldy, Fleet Street. 1866. 8vo, pp. 480.

The period covered by the second volume of this work is perhaps the most perplexing, as it is one of the most interesting, in all history—that extending from the war with the Cimbri and Teutones to the death of Sertorius, B. C. 105–72. Many momentous events during these years are hardly known to us even in bare outline, and of the whole period it is perhaps not too much to say that there is none in history of equal length and equal importance of which so little is known with certainty. If ever, the inferential method of weighing evidence is in place here, all the more because our information is unusually full and exact as to the years which immediately followed. The seeds were sown by Marius and Sulla of which we see the fruits in the careers of Pompey, Cicero, and Cæsar. Moreover, the writings of Cicero in especial abound in allusions to these earlier events, which are rich in instruction to one who knows how to use them. Nowhere could Mr. Long compare less favorably with Mommsen than just here. The only task his method allows him to attempt is to arrange in their order the scattered bits of information which we happen to possess. He tells us nothing but what is true, perhaps, but the highest truth he fails, and indeed does not try, to seize. In the German work, on the other hand, we find a consistent and complete development of events; inaccurate it may be in some details, but derived from an exhaustive study of whatever has been handed down or written upon the subject; at all events, based upon fundamental principles, and tracing out with clearness, force, and eloquence the path along which Rome was hurrying to destruction.

This period may be considered the second stage in the rapid downfall of the republic. The first is represented by the efforts of the Gracchi to overthrow peaceably the rule of the oligarchy; the third and last by the triumph of Cæsar. Between these two came the unsuccessful attempt of Marius to do what Cæsar afterwards accomplished; his is the central figure of this epoch, because he represents the irresistible tendency of events; Drusus and Sulla the ineffectual struggle against this tendency. The enmity which Caius Gracchus had so large a share in exciting between the senate and the knights, or, more accurately, between the Senatorial Order and the Equestrian Order, was in strictness, as Niebuhr well observed, that "found among all nations, at a certain stage of their progress, between the landowners and the moneyed men;" the landed, hereditary aristocracy and the aristocracy of wealth; the nobility and the parvenus. Gracchus had seen the incurable rottenness of the nobility which ruled the state, and had seen, too, that the only thing that could save his country was an infusion of new blood by the admission of the Italian allies to the citizenship, for among these were to be found the only elements of a healthy national character which still existed in Italy. It is no light task to overthrow an aristocracy whose roots are fixed in institutions centuries old, and Gracchus found himself betrayed by both the allies upon whom he depended for carrying through his plans. The new aristocracy of money which he had established as a counterweight to the nobility failed him at the critical moment; the aristocratic principle was as deeply engrained in Roman society as it is in that of England at the present day, and a wealthy contractor might aspire to found a noble family, just as a railway king may hope to be made a peer. The lower classes, too, which he fancied he had bound firmly to himself, were easily bought over by his enemies; they had no interest in reform, for, like the poor whites in the South, it was merely in the possession of citizenship that they were above their neighbors, and by sharing this with the Samnites and Marsians they would themselves lose their sole claim to consideration and would sink to their natural insignificance.

It is in these party relations which Caius Gracchus left behind him that we are to seek the key to the perplexed events of the generation which succeeded; feuds in the ruling class itself, between the senatorial and equestrian orders, while for both of them a common master was in store; unavailing efforts of the Italians to obtain citizenship, until at length they were driven to seek it by arms; all parties in turn bidding for the votes of the rabble, who had the final power of decision, but to whom one side was as good as another, so they had their fill of shows and their cheap corn. There existed no people, as we understand the word; democracy, in our sense of the term, was impossible. The only choice lay between oligarchy and tyranny. Of all this the book before us gives a very inadequate analysis.

It is true that Mr. Long, with his practical English way of looking at things, has many admirably clear and suggestive accounts of special laws, institutions, and political questions, especially in the first volume. But he lacks the power of conveying a clear notion of political movements as a whole; his mind acts in detail, and the result is rather a collection of valuable materials than a wise use made of the materials themselves. As an instance of a discussion in his best style we will refer to Chapter IV. of the second volume, which treats of the origin of the Cimbri and Teutones. His view, that both these tribes were German, is precisely opposite to that of Mr. Latham, who holds that they were both Celts; the one setting aside the obvious resemblance between the names Cimbri and Kymri, the other that between Teutones and Teutsch. It is strange, by the way, in the face of Mr. Latham's elaborate argument, that Mr. Long should say, page 52, that "nobody doubts that the Teutones were a Germanic people"; but that he is correct in following the common opinion on this point, we have no question. At the same time, his arguments for the Germanic origin of the Cimbri are ingenious, and to us conclusive; indeed, the only counter argument is the accidental similarity of the names Cimbri and Kymri. Another excellent example of his style is in the account of the leges repetundarum and other legal forms, Vol. I., Chap. II., and Vol. II., Chap. XIV. On subjects of this nature he is at home, and speaks with clearness and sagacity.

An example of the opposite kind, illustrating his incapacity for a broad discussion of political questions, is in regard to the enrolling in the tribes of the Italians who obtained their citizenship through the Social War. On page 199, Vol. II., he quotes Appian and Velleius to the effect that the new citizens were enrolled in eight or ten new tribes, at the same time expressing some hesitation as to accepting the statement. On pages 212 and 221, however, he speaks of this arrangement as if there were no question about it; but on page 402, where he has occasion to review the history of the tribes, he says distinctly that "the number thirty-five remained unchanged" from B.C. 241, and only mentions the addition of new tribes in B.C. 90 as being "proposed." This is Niebuhr's view, and is perhaps the correct one, although Mommsen and Lange maintain that the new citizens were to be distributed among eight of the old tribes, just as the libertini had been among four. It is hard to say which view is the most probable; there is the explicit statement of Appian (i. 49) in favor of the one, while the testimony of Velleius (ii. 20) is claimed by both parties; "ut in octo tribus contribuerentur novi cives" seems at first sight to mean eight of the existing tribes, but Becker insists that in that case the word must be "distribuerentur." Whichever it may have been, the law, if it was a law, never went into effect, for the reason, as Lange shows, that the census of B.C. 89 was never held, and therefore nothing but a temporary and experimental arrangement can have been made. Mr. Long, however, would certainly convey the idea at first that the institution of eight new tribes was not only decided upon but actually carried into effect.

We suppose that it is a dislike of the practice of the Germans to begin their treatises almost with the creation of the world that has led Mr. Long to discard an introduction, and plunge at once in medias res. The first sentence in the first volume mentions the fall of Carthage, with some of the results which it brought after it, and then we are led at once into the midst of the Spanish War; one would almost think he had got hold of a second volume instead of a first. Not much is gained by this, for the matter which properly belongs to an introduction is necessarily brought in from time to time in the way of explanation and illustration, interrupting the continuity of the narrative, and occupying, we suspect, more room on the whole than if a well-arranged introduction had been prepared. There is surely a due mean between this abruptness and the introduction to the "Vie de César," half a volume long, and going over the whole history of the six hundred and fifty years of the city. And it is certainly true that the decline of the Roman Republic cannot be properly told or clearly understood without a good understanding of the condition of things at the commencement of the decline.

Another serious defect will perhaps be remedied in a subsequent volume. We find no account, hardly a hint, of the inner life of the Romans, their thought and its expression, their religion, philosophy, and literature. Even if the meagre literature of this period had very little to do with the political decline, which we doubt, at any rate nothing deserves more careful and thorough consideration in this point of view than religion and philosophy, as influenced by Greek systems, and as directly connected with the decay of public spirit and private manners. It may be, however, that Mr. Long is reserving this topic to be treated as a whole at the close of his work.

THE NATIONAL POEM OF SWEDEN.[*]

"THERE 's odds in deacons," according to the proverb, and there 's odds in poets also, and it would be well enough to join this saying with that familiar one which asserts that only by a poet can a poet be translated. For who can conceive of a tolerable translation of Heine by Wordsworth, or of Emerson by Béranger? These are extreme instances of unfitness; but extreme instances to the contrary—of fitness for the task of making the poet of one country a denizen of another—are so very rare, although the poets who have attempted translations are numerous, that obviously the rule as it stands is too unlimited for usefulness, indeed so unlimited as to be nearly useless. Certainly, we ought to prize highly a poet in whom great knowledge of the poetic art, and whatever other knowledge may be necessary, are united with what we may call the translator's temperament, whose genius is sympathetic, impressible, not of itself too forcible; and it may be permitted us—and we do not forget to be grateful for the long and fortunate labor on the "Divine Comedy"—to regret that Mr. Longfellow, who unites in himself the conditions here indicated, has not done even more in the way of translating than he has done. His renderings in the "Wayside Inn" of the Heimskringla, and the fragmentary passages of the "Frithiof's Saga" with which he enriched the youthful essay on that poem which he printed thirty years ago in The North American Review, may well make us particularly regret that the poetry of the North has not had more of his attention as a translator.

[*] "Frithiof's Saga. From the Swedish of Esaias Tegnér. By the Rev. Wm. Lewery Blackley, M.A." Edited by Bayard Taylor. New York: Leypoldt & Holt.

The "Frithiof's Saga" of Tegnêr one would have been inclined to fix upon as the poem of recent times which would have most attractions for him. Tegnêr, when a professor in the university of Lund, lecturing to his pupils and speaking of the poetry of their native region as contrasted with that of Greece, of the Orientals, of the masters of modern song, not only gives it credit for wild legendary romance and for love of nature—for delighting in the pale colossal forms which float on the mists and whisper of the mysteries of the other world, in the murmur of the brook heard while the moon is rising on the Fjellen, in the song of the thrush on the golden birch, as she sits and sings a lament for the brief summer and dying nature, but also he attributes to it "depth of thought and earnestness of reflection." In this he was perhaps too partial. Not being versed in Scandinavian literature, we cannot speak with authority; but we may say that critics other than Swedish do not attribute depth of thought either to the ancient or the modern poetry of the North. Of old, it was simple in sentiment, picturesque and forcible in diction, full of the gloom of the Norse gods, and of the abounding life and energy, the reckless courage, the robust cheerfulness, the childlike or boylike simplicity, the ferocity, or rather the fierceness, of the Norse men. In modern times, as seen in this poem of Tegnér's, the sagas of the sea-wolves have put off much of the old violence and bloodiness and tremendous energy, and have put on much of prettiness and of that quality of melancholy "which sets the songs of the land to the minor key." To say that the masterpiece of the Bishop of Wexiö is an ancient saga to some extent sentimentalized, recast into finished verses of many metres, profusely adorned with vivid and happy imagery, is, we think, to describe pretty correctly the national poem of Sweden. And the profusion of elegant ornament, the carefulness and elaboration of the verse, the flavor of far-off times, the pensive melancholy, the simple and noble sentiments, the unprofound nature of the thought—all these characteristics of Tegnér's famous work would have been charmingly given us by the kindred poet who wrote "Evangeline," and who translated "The Children of the Lord's Supper," and a pleasant fresh field of poetry would have been made a possession for us. But we suppose we are not to have the pleasure, nor Tegnér the great good fortune, of a complete translation of the "Frithiof's Saga" by Mr. Longfellow. We shall, however, offer our readers, that they may be tempted to know Tegnér, though afar off, some passages of Mr. Longfellow's rendering alongside of Mr. Blackley's.

And first let us say that whoever wants a far better abstract of the poem than we can give may find the essay which we have mentioned in that part of Mr. Longfellow's prose works entitled "Drift Wood." Briefly this is the Saga of Frithiof the Valiant, or Frithiof the Bold, upon which Tegnér founded his poem: Frithiof, son of Thorsten, son of Viking, loves Ingeborg, daughter of King Bele, and sister of Helge and Halfdan. Bele dies after exhorting his two sons to keep the friendship of the bold Frithiof, the son of King Bele's dear friend and comrade. Helge, a gloomy man, and Halfdan, a trifler, refuse Frithiof the hand of Ingeborg, for he is but a Jarl and they kings. Old King Ring demands Ingeborg's hand, and being refused makes war on the brothers. They send for Frithiof, who refuses to aid them, and they are defeated, and Ingeborg weds King Ring. But meantime Ingeborg and Frithiof had met in Balder's temple (a thing forbidden) and exchanged rings. So, as a punishment for this sacrilege, Frithiof must go to Jarl Angantyr at the Faroes and get from him the tribute that he owes. In his magic ship Ellida, in the face of storms which King Helge raises by his arts, nd after a fight with demons of the storm, Frithiof reaches the land of Angantyr, and gets the tribute, for Angantyr loved Thorsten. When he comes home he finds his dwelling has been burned by Helge's men. He seeks Helge at Balder's temple, flings the tribute in his teeth, and the image of Balder is thrown into the fire. Frithiof takes to sea-roving, killing sea kings and making much booty. And after three years he tires of this life and turns himself homeward. He goes disguised to the court of King Ring. Queen Ingeborg speaks but little to him. Her life and Ring's he saves, dragging them, their sledge, and the horses to firm ice just as they were sinking. And one day he walks forth with Ring into the wood and the old king lies down and sleeps. Frithiof is tempted to kill him, but does not; he flings his sword into the wood. Then King Ring tells him he was not sleeping but was pretending to sleep that he might prove Frithiof, whom he had known from the first evening of his sojourning in the palace. Ring gives up Ingeborg to Frithiof and dies soon after; Frithiof kills Helge in war and Halfdan pays King Frithiof tribute as his lord.

Tegnêr makes old Ring kill himself instead of die "the straw death," and he makes Ingeborg bring about a reconciliation between Helge and her husband. Otherwise the abstract of the old Saga will serve as an abstract of the new. But the twenty-four ballads, each in a metre accordant with the spirit of the ballad, are full of details which we have not given. Obviously the poem is spirited and full of incidents. We are bound to say that in Mr. Blackley's translation much of the spirit and coloring disappears. Our extracts must be brief. This is the opening of the very spirited canto in which "Frithiof's Temptation" is described; first we give Mr. Blackley's version:

"Spring-time cometh; wild birds twitter, woods grow leafy, sunshine beams,
Dancing, singing, down to ocean speed the liberated streams;
Out from its bud the glowing rose peeps forth like blush on Freya's cheek;
And joy of life, and mirth, and hope, within the breast of man awake."

Mr. Longfellow's is better done:

"Spring is coming, birds are twittering, forests leaf, and smiles the sun,
And the loosened torrents downward, singing, to the ocean run;
Glowing like the cheek of Freya, peeping rosebuds 'gin to ope,
And in human hearts awaken love of life, and joy, and hope."

Mr. Blackley appears to less advantage as we read on in this same canto and come to the king's pretended sleep and waking:

"Straight the old king, waking, quoth: 'Much rest did my short sleep afford;
'Tis sweet to slumber in the shade, protected by a brave man's sword:
But where, O stranger, is thy blade—the lightning's brother, whither sped?
And who hath separated you, so little wont to separate?'

"'It matters little,' Frithiof said, 'for swords are plenty in the North;
Sharp-tonguéd is the blade, O king; no word of peace it speaketh forth:
Within the steel doth evil dwell, a spirit dark from Niffelhem;
Against him sleep no safety hath; grey hairs are but a snare to him."

And thus Mr. Longfellow:

"Straight the ancient king awakens. 'Sweet has been my sleep,' he said;
'Pleasantly sleeps one in the shadow, guarded by a brave man's blade.
But where is thy sword, O stranger? Lightning's brother, where is he?
Who thus parts you, who should never from each other parted be?'

"'It avails not,' Frithiof answered; 'in the North are other swords:
Sharp, O monarch! is the sword's tongue, and it speaks not peaceful words;
Murky spirits dwell in steel blades, spirits from the Niffelhem;
Slumber is not safe before them, silver locks but anger them.'"

In another metre are these words of Frithiof's, who reminds himself, in the midst of the wintry storm at sea, of his summer voyage to meet Ingeborg. Mr. Blackley first:

"Fairer was our journey
Beneath the shining moon,
Over the mirrory ocean,
To Balder's sacred grove.
Warmer far than here
Was Ingeborg's loving heart;
Whiter than the sea-foam
Heaved her gentle breast."

This is Mr. Longfellow's version:

"Fairer was the journey
In the moonbeam's shimmer,
O'er the mirrored waters
Unto Balder's grove;
Warmer than it here is,
Close by Ingeborg's bosom;—
Whiter than the sea-foam
Swelled the maiden's breast."

The reader has seen what he may expect from Mr. Blackley in the matter of elegance and poetic feeling. Mr. Bayard Taylor, the editor, gives, however, conclusive reasons for his selection of Mr. Blackley's from the four English versions from which he had to choose. He alone preserves all the original metres, and his rendering, though it wants vigor, and though he has let the poetry in great part evaporate, yet, Mr. Taylor says, is done better than any of the others. Mr. Taylor furnishes a life of the poet, some account of the extant English versions of the poem, and a small body of notes mainly explanatory of mythological references occurring in the poem. In outward appearance the book is quite pleasing, as books issued by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt are pretty sure to be. We must not forget to say that this work is the second of a uniform series of foreign poems which the publishers intend to issue, provided the sale of the first three volumes warrant the further prosecution of the enterprise. "King René's Daughter" and "Frithiof's Saga" are already published. "Nathan the Wise," with Fischer's introductory essay, will be the next.

NOTES ON THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER.

NO. XIV.

I REGRET to be obliged to interrupt again the regular order which I had adopted for this series, by postponing to a later period the actual enumeration of the words and classes of words beginning with the letter A. The practical difficulties of such an enumeration are both greater and more numerous than I expected, and I find a stronger reason for deferring this labor in the fact that the close scrutiny of forms, required for counting and discriminating the words, is so trying to the sight that I can only proceed very slowly with the task. I shall, therefore, for the present, go on with my etymological and critical notes, and resume the numerical computation at some more favorable season.

Backsight, in levelling, is defined as "the first reading of the levelling staff taken from any position of the levelling instrument." This, though given on very high authority, and though it is true, e converso, that "the first reading" at every station of the instrument is, not necessarily indeed, but usually, a backsight, is not a definition at all, but a mere statement of an accidental fact. A backsight is a sight or reading taken backwards; that is, in a direction opposite to that in which the levelling party is proceeding, and it would be just as much a backsight if the usual process were reversed and a foresight taken first, instead of the ordinary method.

Backstone, in provincial English, "The heated stone on which oat-cake is baked." It should have been noted that this is an archaic and local orthography and pronunciation of bakestone.

Ballad. The source of this word is rightly given; for there is no doubt that it is from Italian ballare, to dance; but as the connection between a short narrative poem and dancing is not obvious, the etymology is not complete without adding that in the Middle Ages the music for the dance was often a choir of young girls or other minstrels, who sang such poems to tunes adapted to the measures and movements of the dances then in vogue. Ingeman's Danish novels often refer to this practice.

Ballast. The etymologies proposed for this word, though generally accepted, are supported by no historical evidence, and are at best but plausible guesses. I have discussed the origin of this word at considerable length in the notes to the article "Ballast" in the American edition to Wedgwood's "Dictionary of English Etymology." Further research has not enabled me to add much to the facts thus collected. The earliest example of the word in English, in the collections of the London Philological Society, is of the year 1538; but, as I have observed in the note above referred to, ballast occurs in Palsgrave, and lastage is found, in the same sense, in a MS. of unknown date, but supposed by Wright to belong to the latter part of the fifteenth century, printed in the "National Antiquities," Vol. I.

It is remarkable that no word having the signification of ballast occurs in either the Old Northern or the Anglo-Saxon language. The navigators of those nations seem to have depended on stowage of the ordinary cargo in such a way as to answer the purpose of ballasting, though it is difficult to suppose that the piratical cruisers of the Northern Vikings were fitted out with a sufficient supply of heavy goods or stores to serve as ballasting for vessels large enough for Mediterranean voyages, as well as for coasting trips on the rough Atlantic seas of North-western Europe.

I am inclined, upon the whole, to favor the Romance etymology suggested in my note in Wedgwood, though in this, as well as in the commonly accepted derivation, the first syllable is left without satisfactory explanation.

Barker's Mill. This contrivance is described as: "A vertical recoil water-wheel, in which the water moves the wheel from which it issues by reaction or counter pressure as it issues from the orifices." This definition is erroneous throughout. The hollow arms or tubes from which the water escapes, through lateral orifices, may or may not be so connected as to form a sort of wheel; but the plane in which they revolve is horizontal, while the tubular shaft alone is vertical. Nor is the motion of rotation produced by recoil, reaction, or counter pressure of any kind, but by the difference of hydrostatic pressure on the two sides of the revolving tubes, one of the sides being closed, the other having a lateral orifice, near the end, for the escape of the water. If we suppose this orifice to be equal to one-tenth of the lateral superficies of the tube, then, as there will be no pressure on the wall of the tube at the orifice, the lateral pressure on that whole side will be one-tenth less than on the opposite one, which is closed, and, of course, there will be a tendency to move in a direction opposite to the flow of the escape-water. But this effect is due to direct hydrostatic pressure on the section of the wall of the tube opposite the orifice, not to recoil, reaction, or counter pressure. Some have supposed, indeed, that the resistance of the air to the rush of the water as it escapes produces a reacting force which gives the motion. It is barely conceivable that such a cause may add something to the velocity of the revolution of the arms or tubes; but of itself it would be insufficient to overcome the combined resistance of the air on the other side and of friction at the bearings of the shaft.

Barnacle, in the sense of an "instrument with two branches" to put upon a horse's nose, and of "a pair of spectacles," is a different word from barnacle in natural history. Max Müller, in his second series of "Lectures on the Science of Language," has learnedly discussed the history of the word as used in ornithology and conchology. The earliest European example of barnacle, in the sense of an instrument of confinement or compression, is believed to be that which I cited from Joinville in my note on the article Barnacle in Wedgwood. It there signified an instrument of torture by compression. Later, from analogy of form and action, it acquired the meanings above cited from Webster. Joinville describes this method of torture as inflicted by the Arabs in Egypt upon prisoners taken in company with St. Louis, and there is no doubt that the word, as well as the invention, is Oriental, and that the Christian sons of St. Dominic are indebted to the Moslems for one of the most efficient implements in the whole apparatus of the Inquisition. In Persian, burundan or barandan signifies to compress, to squeeze; baranjah kardan, to inflict torture, to afflict. In these words is found the source of Joinville's bernicles, whence the English word. (See Joinville, ed. Buchon, p. 179.)

Baróko. The origin of this technical term of mediæval scholasticism is worth explaining. In the systems of logic taught in the schools of that period the vowel A was used to designate a general affirmative proposition, E a general negative, I a particular affirmative, O a particular negative, and syllogisms were classed according to the character of the propositions which composed them. As a help to the memory in retaining this classification, barbarous words were coined, each containing three of the significant vowels in the order in which the propositions occurred in the syllogisms indicated by these words. Thus, baroko signified a syllogism consisting of one general affirmative and two particular negatives; barbara was a syllogism composed of three general affirmatives, and so of the rest. Syllogisms were said to be in barbara, in celarent, in darii, and so forth, according to their composition, and, as a further aid to the memory, these names were arranged in hexameters, thus: Barbara, celarent, darii, ferion, baralipton, which were learned by heart by the pupils.

Barrack. In my note on this word in the American edition of Wedgwood I have proved that it was in use in Catalan as far back as the thirteenth century, and these are the earliest examples of its occurrence yet cited. The Spaniards might readily have taken it from the Moors, but it is not probable that they borrowed it from the Celts, and, as I have shown in the same note, an acceptable Oriental etymology offers itself.

Bate, v. i., second meaning, "to penetrate, sink in." In support of this definition the following couplet from Spenser is cited:

"Yet there the steel staid not, but inly bate
Deep in the flesh, and opened wide a red flood-gate."

It is obvious that in this passage bate is a preterite, and it is clearly nothing but the past tense of the common verb to bite spelt bate, for rhyme's sake, by a common Spenserian license.

Bay, at. The derivation suggested is plausible; but the corresponding Italian stare a bada and English stand at gaze tend very strongly to confirm Wedgwood's etymology. (See his Dict. of Eng. Etym., s. v.) Besides, à bay appears to be older in French than aux abois, and therefore could not have been derived from it. Littré's oldest example of this last phrase dates no earlier than the fifteenth century; but à bay is found in a MS. of the Prise de Pampelune of the fourteenth century, published by Mussafia, Vienna, 1864, v. 4,692:

"Or preniés mil Paiens des plus civalerous
E tenés tant à bay ceus xij. vassaus prous
Che i ne peusent montier en cival noir ne rous."

Beadsman. Bancroft, in the eighth volume of his "History of the United States," p. 38, employs beadsmen in the ordinary sense of petitioners. I have reason to believe that he did not thus use this word unadvisedly, or without what he deemed sufficient warrant. In any event, the meaning he has given to beadsman ought to be introduced as one of its definitions.

Beau ideal. Both these words are originally adjectives; but persons not well versed in French are apt to imagine that ideal is the noun-element in this compound expression. The contrary is the fact, beau being used as a noun and ideal remaining an adjective.

THE EIGHT-HOUR MUDDLE.

THE value of our political system was never better displayed than in what is just now passing in the West. It has been all along impossible to convince the working-men that their plan of securing as much money and leisure as they need by cutting down their labor by one-fifth was delusive. Having once got hold of the idea, and having secured for it the attention of politicians and nominating conventions, they made up their minds to embody it in legislation at all hazards. The arguments of the political economists they treated with utter indifference, owing to the widely diffused notion that political economy and its laws are inventions of capitalists and their friends for the spoliation of the poor. Discussion of the matter was, therefore, useless. What was wanted was actual experiment on a scale large enough to display all that is essential to the process, and yet not large enough to seriously damage even for a day the national industry. Our State system supplies, as no other government in the world does, all that is necessary for such an experiment. If the eight-hour movement had sprung up in France or England, and had taken serious hold of the majority, and the Government had been forced into trying it, as the provisional government in Paris was compelled, in 1848, to try the national workshops, it would have been necessary to try it all over the country, and the loss and damage and disturbance caused by it would have been almost incalculable. Here delusions of this nature are pretty sure to reach a crisis in some one State before the others, and the legislature rushes at the experiment. The rest of the country then pauses and looks on; if it ends well, the other States follow the example thus set. If it ends ill, the agitation everywhere dies out. The politicians laugh and wink, and their dupes look cross, but go back quickly to their every-day work.

In the case of some of the popular movements, of course, experiment is unfortunately impossible. If the Fenian movement, for instance, could have been submitted to a crucial test on a small scale, it could not have survived half as long as it did, or have relieved the poor of so much of their cash, or have disgraced so many Republican orators and editors. If, for instance, one State could have been given up for a few weeks to Fenian government, the defects of Fenian institutions would have been made so plain that even the reporters of The Tribune and The Herald would have united in a protest against handing over either Canada or Ireland to the tender mercies of the "sons of thunder" who preside over the destinies of the Irish Republic. But the eight-hour question being luckily a domestic question, it has been possible to put it into the crucible of State legislation, and exhibit the result to the public at large.

It may seem strange that actual experiment should be necessary to convince men that nothing would be gained by enacting a law prohibiting a man from working more than eight hours a day unless he pleased, or that, if capitalists in one place were forced to give as much for eight hours' labor as capitalists in other places gave for ten hours' labor, they would take their departure, or that, the amount of wages depending partly on the aggregate amount of production, partly on the number of laborers, a laborer could pocket the same wages while doing less labor. Yet so it is. The experiment had to be tried; only in this way could the elementary truths which the newspapers have been preaching to the working-men for the last two years be brought home to their minds. They will now see how the thing works, how industry is affected by it, and how utterly irreconcilable it is with any sound social system—and there is little doubt that this will be the end of it. The experience of Illinois and Missouri will save the other States much loss and annoyance. But we see in all that is happening not only fresh arguments against the eight-hour law, but in favor of co-operation as the only remedy for the troubles between labor and capital.

Political economy is not taught in our schools, and it is not the kind of reading to which the mass of the people take readily in after life. Therefore, we despair of seeing, at least for a long time to come, the economical errors which most beset working-men dissipated by reading or reflection. But actual experience would dissipate them, and in a country which is, as ours is, largely governed by working-men, it is of the last importance that they should be dissipated somehow. If, therefore, laborers could be put, as they would be put under the co-operative system, in the position of capitalists, they would see for themselves where wages come from, what the necessities of capital are, how it is created, how preserved, how lost; and they would get over for ever the notion, which is at the bottom of the eight-hour delusion, that the less a laborer can work the better for himself, and that all that he can wring from capitalists, whether by threats or combinations, is so much clear gain. Co-operation is, in short, the next great step in the education and social elevation of working-men; and all lovers of the country or the race ought to hasten its adoption by every means in their power.

INDEPENDENCE IN POLITICS.

THE nomination of Henry Ward Beecher for the New York Convention was a significant event in American politics, the value of which must not be overlooked simply because, in a district strongly opposed to him in politics, he was defeated at the polls. No one familiar with the district entertains a doubt that his name drew out hundreds of voters for the entire ticket of his party; and it is certain that his personal friends furnished three-fourths of the men and means employed in the canvass, which, but for them, must have gone by default. The fact that he ran but slightly ahead of his ticket misleads persons who do not study the ways of politicians. Nineteen candidates out of twenty who run largely in advance of their ticket gain their additional votes by corrupt bargains with the managers of the adverse party; and to such means Mr. Beecher's friends would not resort. The voters whom they brought out voted for the whole ticket, although their chief motive in voting at all was to support their particular favorite. Assuming, then, what we know to be the fact, that Mr. Beecher's candidature largely helped the ticket upon which his name was placed, we think the circumstances deserve special consideration and warrant some hopeful inferences.

The objections to Mr. Beecher's availability, in the view commonly taken by politicians, were many and grave. His vocation as a clergyman was an unqualified drawback. Although all who have carefully reflected upon the subject are satisfied that the objections usually urged against clerical candidates have no application to the election of a constitutional convention, yet the mass of voters draw no such distinctions, and many Republicans hesitated to vote for a clergyman, while the Irish crowded to the polls in the afternoon swearing loudly against "church and state." All the circumstances indicate that in New York, at any rate, public sentiment is strongly opposed to the election of clergymen to any kind of office. The Cleveland letter of course still rankled in the memory of Radicals, while Mr. Beecher's doctrine of universal suffrage for males and females, natives and foreigners, white and black, was utterly repugnant to Conservatives. Altogether, it is not probable that one hundred voters in his district agreed with Mr. Beecher in all his political theories, or would have endorsed half his public speeches and letters during the previous year.

Yet nearly six thousand men voted for this candidate, hundreds of whom were drawn out solely by their desire to vote for him. A number of his friends worked zealously for his election, although differing from him more widely than some who voted against him. And thus it happened that a man of singularly unpopular opinions excited more enthusiasm and polled a larger vote than could have been done by any candidate whose opinions were in perfect unison with those of his party, and only failed of entire success owing to his profession.

The lesson which we draw from this occurrence is, that the people may be trusted more safely than politicians generally suppose with candidates of independent character and of ability to form their own opinions. But even if this inference should be denied, on the ground that one of the nineteen candidates on Mr. Beecher's ticket ran fifty votes ahead of him (although this really proves nothing against our argument), yet we rejoice that the experiment of nominating such a man has been made, and that it has at least been demonstrated that nothing has been lost by doing so, even if no immediate benefit to the party has been gained. For, under the pressure of party discipline and the stress of party necessities, the qualifications of candidates have of late years become two-fold—first, that they must unqualifiedly believe all that their party believes; and secondly, that they must not believe anything else. The least reflection should satisfy every one that under such a rule hypocrites and inferior men must have almost a monopoly of office, and that the people must be deprived of that leadership which they so much crave in times of trial. A party creed represents the views of the average of the party, not the best or wisest of its members. Men of real ability always differ more or less from their party, and indeed from each other; since it is almost impossible for any two minds, independently studying a subject so vast and complex as that which we call politics, to arrive at precisely the same conclusions upon all the questions involved. Let the reader think if he knows any two men, whose judgment he respects, who have studied the subjects, and whose opinions agree precisely upon the questions of slavery, the right of suffrage, reconstruction, confiscation, protection or free trade, Fenianism, currency expansion or contraction, the eight-hour law, and the elective judiciary. Consider how many details are included in each of these subjects and how many shades of opinion there are in respect to each, and the idea of perfect harmony of views between a party and its candidates upon all these details becomes absurd. The ablest, most honest, and most efficient men are precisely those whose divergence from the party track upon minor issues will always be most notorious. Ignorant and lazy men will let the party think for them, hypocrites will falsify, and cowards will suppress their real opinions; and under the ordinary system, these will be the most favored candidates before nominating conventions. The tendency is, therefore, toward the choice of representatives even lower than the average of the party.

Surely no argument can be needed to prove that the public interest, and even the interest of a party, would be better served by the election of a higher class of men. In the early days of the late war the Northern people were frantic for a leader. But they had diligently weeded out leaders from the field of public service for years before, and had compelled even the few who remained to accustom themselves to reticence and timidity. It was not surprising, therefore, that in a time of need leaders fit for the duty were not to be found.

We do not wish to see the American people blindly accept the leadership of any man or men, however able. But the election of first-class men would not imply any such result. On the contrary, their opinions would be greatly conflicting, and the people would be all the better prepared and disposed to decide public questions for themselves, after such topics had been fully discussed by their representatives. Such discussions would educate the public mind, and tend to develop and establish correct doctrines, to a degree which can never be expected from the generation of third-rate men now for the most part occupying public offices.

The American people can be and ought to be accustomed to support men of genius and independence, content with a general concord of views upon the issues of chief importance at the time of election. Such candidates only will reward the confidence of their constituents and the exertions of their friends; and, as a rule, such candidates are really the most available, since the enthusiasm which they arouse among their own party is generally more than a compensation for the alienation of a few narrow-minded persons or for the increased activity of the adverse party. And nothing will have such a healthy influence upon political affairs as the introduction into public life of the most able, and therefore most independent, men.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens's late criticism on Senator Wilson's performances at the South, taken in connection with the language of the Hunnicutt Radicals in Virginia, can hardly be said to be improving reading for the freedmen. Mr. Stevens rates Senator Wilson very severely for going about promising the admission of Southern members to Congress from such States as may reorganize under the Reconstruction act, and asks "who authorized him to go round peddling amnesty?" As for Mr. Stevens himself, his message to the South is that there must be "a little confiscation for the most guilty," and for all—whatever Congress likes to give them, the Reconstruction act to the contrary notwithstanding. He confesses, however, that this message is of his own composition and binds nobody but himself, so that as a prophet or a preacher he stands no higher than Mr. Wilson, while as a peddler he stands somewhat lower, for of two unlicensed peddlers most people will prefer the peddler of amnesty to the peddler of confiscation. Mr. Stevens, in spite of his modesty, however, evidently considers his letter a kind of party manifesto, and we observe that some Radical papers are inclined to treat it as such. Should it prove so, and receive a fair amount of concurrence from the Radical wing of the Republican party, we should find next fall that the labors of the last two years, in which Mr. Stevens has borne such a prominent part, had been absolutely thrown away. The Reconstruction act would have little or no value except as a specimen of legislative ingenuity and as an evidence of the power of Congress. It would not have brought us one whit nearer to reconstruction, and we should find ourselves launched on a new agitation, and a far more embittering one than we have yet had; for the negroes would be in the field, and the subject of controversy would be that most exciting of all subjects of controversy, men's title to their property.

We were of opinion when Lee laid down his arms that a small number of the principal leaders of the rebellion should have been tried for treason, and if convicted should have been executed, and their property confiscated. In other words, we were in favor of "making treason odious" by treating it before the world as a criminal offence, and this done, we advocated the reorganization of the States by the votes of the whole population, black as well as white, under the direction of Congress, providing, however, for the disfranchisement of a large portion of the most prominent promoters of the war. Nobody, however, was punished for treason, and nobody will be punished for it. Treason has not been "made odious" anywhere but in the newspapers and on the stump, and it is now too late for anybody to be brought to trial for it. It is even to be hoped that Jefferson Davis's trial may not take place, for it is sure to be a sorry farce, and to make loyalty seem ridiculous. We are opposed, as every reflecting man must be, to confiscation in cold blood by act of Congress. Confiscation if done by legislation should be done in hot blood, as an act of war, as wholesale killing is done while the enemy is in the field. But confiscation in cold blood, by means of a bill of pains and penalties, long after the fighting is over, without the intervention of a judge or jury, merely as a piece of vengeance inflicted by the majority on a conquered minority, would be an innovation which we trust and believe the people will never permit. If we were going to confiscate at all, we ought to have done all we sought to do under the acts passed for this purpose during the war, and through judicial process. To set about taking away their property from the rebels now, or even from any considerable part of them, would not only spread a universal feeling of insecurity through the South and increase the paralysis by which the industry of that unfortunate region is afflicted, but would win for us throughout the civilized world the character of obdurate barbarians.

There is one other reason for which we object to this talk of confiscation, and it is a stronger one than any, and that is—the fact that the negroes of the South will, if confiscation should take place, be expected and be entitled to share in bringing it about, and Mr. Sumner and others have even had the extraordinary imprudence—we might use a still stronger word—to suggest that they ought to profit by it. Now, we hold it to be the bounden duty of all men, whose character or position gives them any influence over the freedmen, to teach them no lessons, now that they are fairly armed with the ballot, but those of peace and good-will and it would be hard to denounce too strongly the conduct of those who, on whatever pretext, suggest to them, just as they are crossing the political threshold, that there are other ways of securing comfort or riches than honest industry, than the hard labor of the hands or of the brain. Any politician who does this is not only the enemy of the negro, but the enemy of the country, and there has been enough of it done already by those who ought to know better to call down on them the indignation of all who do not want to see the laboring population at the South converted into a wretched mob living by their votes. We owe the freedman political rights, the means of education, and ample protection for his person and property; but we owe him nothing else; and God forbid he should ever be cheated into the belief that any man has any claim upon his government for anything but these things. The suggestion that he ought to have a farm given him, even out of the Government lands, on any terms except those on which they are given to white men, we consider mischievous in the highest degree. We have had enough, and he has had enough, of these distinctions, in all conscience. We believe neither in treating him as a beast of burden nor as a spoiled child. He is a man, and must make his own way as a man; he must, now that he is launched into free life, learn its hard lessons as other poor men learn them, learn that respect comes from character, and wealth comes from industry. But the suggestion that not only he ought to have a farm, but that it would not be a bad plan to provide him with it by taking the land from his white neighbors, is neither more nor less than a lesson in spoliation which it is utterly disgraceful that any intelligent or upright American should offer him.

When one reads some of the disquisitions on the expediency of confiscation on an extensive scale to which some public men have treated us, one begins to doubt whether the lessons of history are really of any use whatever in politics. The wholesale confiscation of the property of political enemies, of traitors if you will, and double-dyed traitors at that, has been tried over and over, and it has never yet served any good purpose. It has in every case in which it has been carried out unsettled property, paralyzed industry, and bred heart-burnings and hatreds which centuries of good government have not been sufficient to wipe out. The North has now no interest in exasperating the Southern whites. It has every interest, on the contrary, in hastening the extinction of the passions and prejudices by which Southern society is torn. The surest way and the only way to do this is to elevate the negro by giving him education and a share in the Government. To make him the recipient of alms, either by grant from the public treasury or by the spoliation of the whites, is to degrade him, unsettle his mind, and give him false notions of the workings of free society. No man's recommendation of a scheme of this kind, neither Mr. Stevens's nor Mr. Sumner's, can make it anything but odious and dangerous; for the experience of all ages, of all nations and all races, the teachings both of religion and humanity, stamp it with reprobation the minute it is proposed. Why, when there is so much serious, honest work to be done, Mr. Stevens should continue to employ his brain and tongue upon it at his age, and with his real capacity for better things, passes our comprehension.

THE LAST BACKSLIDER.

Ex-Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, as everybody knows, made an elaborate argument, a few weeks ago, before a legislative committee in Boston, against prohibition and in favor of a license system. He made it as counsel, and was paid, and paid well for it; but we may presume it expressed his real sentiments, and went over the whole ground of the liquor controversy with a minuteness and elaboration never before witnessed. The majority in the State, however, if not in the Legislature, being on the side of prohibition, and Governor Andrew's argument not having made the desired impression on them, the gentleman himself is rapidly drifting towards the fate which seems in these days to be reserved with greater and greater frequency for everybody who has a mind of his own and ventures to express it on what anybody else chooses to call a "moral question." Large numbers of Mr. Andrew's friends and admirers are weeping over him as a "lost pleiad," a backslider, a renegade, and what not. He thinks that whiskey-drinking cannot be stopped by law, and that even if it could, the law had better not attempt to do it; and for this belief he has given some hundreds of reasons, and supported them by some hundreds of authorities. The majority think it can be stopped, and that, whether it can or not, the law ought to try; and will have it, that whether it ought or not, is a question of morals. The subject is one on which it is quite safe to say an assemblage of the greatest sages, apostles, prophets, jurists, and legislators which have existed from the Seven Wise Men down to Emerson and John Stuart Mill, would, could it be collected, differ to a dead certainty, because the question which lies at the bottom of the liquor agitation is one which has divided philosophers and jurists since philosophy first began and laws were first made, and which, we are quite satisfied, will not be decided for ages to come. Each generation will have its own views on the subject. The proper limits of the province of government undergo every twenty or thirty years a new definition. Thirty years ago the theory, both here and in England, was that government ought to do nothing but protect a man's life and property; at present the other theory, that it ought to do everything for him that it can do, is daily rising into favor. Which of the two will be uppermost thirty years hence nobody knows, because their respective advance or decline is dependent on a thousand influences, social and political, which nobody can foresee or regulate.

The inference to be drawn from this diversity of sentiment is not certainly that the truth cannot be got at, or at all events approached sufficiently close for all practical purposes, but that differences of opinion, provided they are honest, ought to be not only tolerated but respected. There is probably no question in the whole range of jurisprudence surrounded by greater difficulties than the question of the extent to which the law ought to control a man's private conduct, and a safe conclusion on it, if it ever be reached at all, can only be reached by experiment and patient investigation and discussion. Nobody is justified, therefore, in treating a divergence from the prevailing view on this subject as a moral offence or as a cause for withdrawing respect or esteem from a public man unless he is sure himself that he is in possession of the truth, and this, with all due respect for the majority in Massachusetts as well as elsewhere, we venture to say it cannot be, and has no business to think itself.

The practice of acting as if it had this certainty, and hunting down, as immoral and degraded, even men who have proved the excellence of their principles and the thorough uprightness of their character by long years of noble service, has been more general than it is; but it is general enough still to make it desirable that all men of thought and courage should make a vigorous stand against it. If they do not, before long we shall witness the inauguration in politics of the reign of simple brass and imbecility. The majority, we believe, in the long run governs better than any other body can govern; but it is sometimes wrong and sometimes mistaken, and the only way it can possibly avoid being very often wrong and often mistaken, is by encouraging individuals, and especially individuals distinguished for their virtues and capacity, to think and speak freely. At all events, unless the majority is prepared to do this, it ought to imitate the Roman prætor, and announce at the beginning of every year how it is going to decide on all questions, known and unknown, that may come up. As matters stand at present, men who have to write and speak are left in the most painful perplexity. New points present themselves every month on which some opinion must be expressed. If a man were safe in thinking out his conclusions, and then uttering them, of course all he would need to save him harmless would be honesty, industry, and average brain. But nowadays honesty and painstaking do not in the least atone for a blunder. Let him who makes it be who he may, let him have ever so many noble scars on breast or face, he is handed over to the lictors of the party press, and by these worthies bound, scourged, and flung from the Tarpeian rock. Last year this public flogging of an old soldier was performed by Horace Greeley in Henry Ward Beecher's case, and then within a few months, as if to show how little virtue or talents or learning or services or integrity had to do with party support or indulgence, the executioner was seen trotting about in triumph with P. T. Barnum on his shoulders, and extolling him to the skies as the favorite of the gods.

About the time of Mr. Beecher's fall, Adjutant-General Schouler, of Massachusetts, had the misfortune to think and say that Benjamin Butler was not a good man to send to Congress. The majority of the electors thought differently and elected him, and thereupon Governor Bullock dismissed the Adjutant-General, in spite of long and valuable services to the State and the nation in trying and evil days, in a letter which claimed for the majority a supremacy hardly inferior to that claimed for the imperial will by the Roman lawyers in the worst days of the empire. Whether the general or the majority was right about Mr. Butler's qualifications as a legislator is, perhaps, not yet clearly determined; but it is quite safe to say that a man may be a good citizen and an honest member of the Republican party, and yet think Mr. Butler at least as near his proper post in Boston as in Washington.

The evil will doubtless, in the long run, work its own cure, but it is about time for the cure to begin. We live by free speech and free thought. If these were not the foundations of our political system, nor treated as such, the country would not be worth living in; and we cannot afford to have them touched or meddled with. Nor can we afford to have every eminent man in the country made a target of every time he chooses to think differently from his fellows on questions of means. Lives of devotion to the great principles of truth, of justice, and mercy, do more for the discouragement of vice than any act the legislature can pass, because they form public taste and public sentiment, without the support of which all acts are inoperative.

AFRICAN ROMANCE.

We fear that the death of Dr. Livingstone must be accepted with merely the shadow of a reservation. Dr. Kirk having examined the Yohanna men who had succeeded in escaping back to Zanzibar has evidently no doubts about the matter, and as he accompanied the great explorer through the hostile tribe in question, he is peculiarly competent to give an opinion upon the matter. We are aware that the natives of Eastern Africa, whether Arabs or negroes, are not remarkable for their veracity; but as Dr. Livingstone was travelling without a white companion the news could arrive at the coast only through such channels, and the evidence appears to us to be as strong as under the circumstances it possibly could be. Sir Roderick Murchison disbelieves it; Sir Henry Rawlinson calls it a lame story; and Sir Samuel Baker is firmly convinced of its truth. But however distinguished these gentlemen may be, their opinions are worthless in comparison with that of Dr. Kirk, who will probably proceed at once to the scene of the alleged catastrophe. Till somebody does this nothing more positive is likely to be ascertained; Sir Roderick may cling to his straw, as Mungo Park's friends did during twenty years after the first rumor of his death, and as some persons still believe that Vogel is retained a prisoner in the neighborhood of Timbuctoo.

It was Dr. Livingstone's intention in this last journey to proceed at first to Lake Tanganyika, and to ascertain its drainage; then to proceed northward to the two Nyanzas; and so, having explored the whole lake system of Central Africa, to present a summary of the great discoveries of Burton, Baker, and Speke. This task would have been beyond his abilities as a geographer, but not as an explorer, had he directed his energies exclusively to it; but we have reason to believe that by attacking the slave coffles he had excited the hostility of various inland tribes, and deeply as we sympathize with the noble motives which prompted him to such an act, yet we think that considerations for his own safety and for the safety of the numerous travellers who sooner or later will follow in his footsteps should have induced him to prefer persuasion against an evil which has existed in that country, as is shown by the monuments of Egypt, for several thousand years. As for the Baron Von Decken, who was killed in one of the rivers of Eastern Africa about a year ago, he had determined not to submit to black-mail, but to fight his way. Now this is all very well from the European point of view; but the African believes that the country which he inhabits is his own property, and under the influence of that delusion he has been in the habit of making revenue out of the native traders who pass through it. The white man, as the more wealthy, is the more highly taxed; sometimes the toll is exorbitant and approaches extortion. But the instances are unknown in which open plunder is resorted to. The African prince has a commodity to dispose of—the right of way, and he can scarcely be blamed if he tries to get a good price for it. Von Decken would not pay toll, so the Africans shut the turnpike gates. He tried to force his way through them, and was slain by a simple-minded but not unjust people. If a traveller has an objection to paying for things more than they are worth, he should keep clear of old-fashioned English hotels and African princedoms. But because he is overcharged for his wax candles, he has no right to shoot the head waiter without even requesting the landlord, as the Irish gentleman did, to put him down in the bill.

A certain amount of interest would naturally be felt throughout the civilized world in an undertaking of Dr. Livingstone's, but we are inclined to believe that the African mania has died out for the present. Since Sir Samuel Baker's achievement, nothing has risen up in Africa to excite public curiosity; there no longer remains a great problem to be solved. It may interest our readers if we take advantage of this pause to give a brief retrospect of African exploration.

It may be regarded as a three-volume novel, and we now shut up the second without having a very clear notion of what the third is to be, or at least without being able to divine how the inevitable results are to be brought about. The first volume we shall entitle The Niger and the second The Nile.

It was towards the end of the last century that accounts were brought to England through various Arab traders, sea captains in the slave trade, and his Majesty's consuls that a great river existed in Central Africa. The mysterious city of Timbuctoo was situated on its shores, and its stream was covered with two-masted vessels, carrying that trade which supplied the Sahara caravans. Now, it was required to find not the sources of this river, but its mouth. None of the Arab traders knew where it was; it is doubtful whether many of them do to this day. Some said it went into a lake, others declared it joined the Nile, others believed that it ran into a red-hot desert of sand beneath the equator and went out with a hiss. Some geographers adopted those various doctrines, which were supported by the testimony of the ancient geographers, to whom the Niger was well known by name; others believed that the Senegal and the Gambia were its mouths; others that it debouched in the South Atlantic as the Congo; and a German who pointed to the delta in the Bight of Benin, a delta larger than that of the Ganges, was at first greatly derided. But before this hypothesis had been confirmed by the discovery of Lander, it had been almost universally embraced by men of science. Sir Joseph Banks, the companion of Captain Cook, and then president of the Royal Society, founded the "African Association for the Promotion of Discovery in Africa." It was largely patronized by that class of gentlemen, always numerous in England, who love to encourage enterprise and adventure for itself alone; by the merchants, who hoped to introduce their vessels into that river which was the artery of the rich Soudan; by the religious body, who saw that a new field for proselytism was about to be opened; and by those who, already commencing the noble crusade against the traffic in human flesh, believed that a lawful commerce might be substituted for it.

The first man who presented himself as a volunteer was an American named Ledyard, whose biography has been so admirably written by Mr. Jared Sparks. He died on the threshold, having entered Africa, and that was all. Burkhardt made a preparatory journey to Mecca and Medina, a trial-trip which has given him immortality. He died, like Ledyard, while waiting for a caravan. Mungo Park succeeded in reaching the Niger, and came back with very erroneous ideas about its mouth. He went out again with a large party—the most fatal of all systems—and was killed on the Niger itself. Then comes a dreadful catalogue of deaths, till, finally, Lander succeeded in following the river down to the sea.

This was in 1831, and the result appeared satisfactory to the mercantile interest. The Niger is navigable by large vessels to a greater distance than any other African river, not even excepting the Nile. But, after all, that is not saying much, and hitherto it has proved only the burial-place of money and of men. Its shores are unhealthy in the extreme, and as the negroes near the coast get their living by acting as middle-men between the traders and the people of the interior, they regard all efforts to ascend the river as unprincipled intrusions. They allowed various exploring vessels to "see the river," as they call it, without opposition, on condition that those vessels did not trade. But those promises were violated frequently enough, and the "treacherous savage" now opposes all alike. The trade of the river has not been developed to any great extent; it is still essentially of a second-class character, and British merchants consider it an all but hopeless channel. A Christian mission was sent out there once on a very grand scale, and nearly everybody died. The Government, a few years ago, established a consulate pro tem., and Dr. Baitrie was appointed. He lived there for some time, collected zoölogical specimens of value, made various trips into the interior which will presently be published, married a great number of African ladies, and refused stoutly to go home whenever the Government sent a man-of-war for him. At last the climate began to tell upon his constitution; he consented to return, but died at Sierra Leone, on his way back, in 1865.

In spite of all this, it is an incontestable fact that the Niger is, commercially speaking, a fine river. It flows through a country in which cotton is extensively grown, where it is even manufactured; its mineral resources have not yet been examined, but it is known to be exceedingly rich in gold; and it is inhabited by a shrewd and intelligent people, traders to a man, and who, under the influences of the Mohammedan religion, are rising far above the level of the palm-wine-drinking, fetich-loving savage. It is doubt ful, however, whether the British are destined to reap the reward of their own discoveries. The French are advancing towards Central Africa from two opposite points, as the Pacific Railroad is advancing towards the Rocky Mountains at once from San Francisco and New York. They have the nucleus of a great military empire in Algeria, and another in the Senegal. Both are increasing more rapidly than is generally supposed. The Gambia, a British colony, is already surrounded by French posts, and a line of blockhouses is being protruded towards the Niger and Timbuctoo.

The second volume opens up a fresh series of characters and leads us into entirely different scenes. The first is, so to speak, out of print; but the second must be fresh in all our readers' minds. Passing over the efforts of the Romans to discover the sources of the Nile, and the obscure relations of the Portuguese Jesuits in Abyssinia, we find the first chapter occupied by the glorious Bruce. A clever reviewer lately acknowledged that he was afraid of saying what he really thought about Mr. Swinburne's talents on account of the famous blunder respecting Lord Byron in The Edinburgh Review. In the same manner the ill-used African traveller of the present day reminds the public of Bruce, and appeals to the judgment of posterity It is certain that the adventures of Baron Munchausen, which were written as a parody on that gentleman's travels, and which are now devoured by a generation who never saw his book, "ought to be a lesson to us all." But we must beg to remind the reader that no man ever imposed upon the public, unconsciously perhaps, more glaringly than Bruce. He discovered the sources of the Blue Nile, and when D'Anville and other geographers ventured to assert that the White Nile was the larger stream, he chose to be excessively indignant. Indeed, we doubt whether any allusion to the Nile proper is to be found in the six volumes which Horace Walpole found so "dear and dull." The truth came out at last, but a generation passed away before anything more was done. Twenty years ago the farthest point towards the great lakes had been reached by an Egyptian, Ibrahim Khasef, who went with a slave-hunting expedition about thirty days' journey into the interior from Khartoum. It was only yesterday that we were all as ignorant of the sources of the Nile as the Cæsars were, and no European geographer ever made so good a guess about them as Ptolemy did. Even Speke declared that he had "hit the Nile on the head and driven it into the Mediterranean Sea." He would not believe that the other lake, which Baker discovered after his death, entered into the question at all, though it is now shown to be the more important basin of the two.

Here endeth the second volume, and what is to be the third? We believe that the romantic period of African travel has come to a close. Some strange animal, some new inland sea, some snowy mountain, some fiery volcano, some strange race of men may yet be discovered in this extraordinary land, but we shall never have again such delightful puzzles of adventure as the mouth of the Niger and the sources of the Nile—splendid mysteries which excited the same speculations among the geographers of Egypt, of Athens, and of Rome, of London, Paris, and Berlin; never again will the same topic, as far as Africa is concerned, be discussed in a play by Æschylus, in verses by Lucretius, and in a leader of the London Times. The climax of romance in African travel has been also reached. An artist (Mr. Baines) has painted in oil the Victoria Falls, the African Niagara; and a young and pretty woman has walked into the heart of Africa and drunk of the waters of eternal fame.

The great volume of the future will open with very different scenes. The discoveries of scientific travellers in a huge country which, for the sciences, is completely unexplored; then new developments, manias, and emigrations; huge colonies, independent states, log-huts, saw-mills, big hotels, native wars, Africans "not taxed," treaties, cessions of territory, a grand trunk railway connecting Cairo, Algiers, Timbuctoo, and the Cape of Good Hope; the Nyanzas spilled into canals joining the Niger and the Nile, the equatorial forest shipped off as lumber, elephant preserves and hippopotami waters; and perhaps, if posterity is not ungrateful, a statue to Dr. Livingstone by the shores of the Nyassa Lake.

A FRENCH SKETCH OF AN AMERICAN GIRL.

Maurice Sand has begun a tale in the Revue des Deux Mondes entitled "Miss Mary," and intended to be, apparently, a picture of American life and manners, and especially of the manners of American girls. Miss Mary Sewell, the heroine, aged twenty, is the daughter of a rich New Yorker who speculates more or less in anything which promises well, as all rich New Yorkers do, and lives in Fifth Avenue, in the third brown-stone house from the Central Park. At the opening of the story he is very much interested in Lake Superior copper mines, and greatly excited by a huge lump of ore which has been sent on to Washington from that region, but which Miss Mary pronounces "a hum bug." To make sure, he starts out in search of M. Henri de Montaret, a young French mining engineer, a gentilhomme, and a man of perfect manners, who has arrived two days before to explore the mining regions on behalf of a French company, and finds him in a bar-room in Greenwich Street, dressed in a coat of grey velvet over a red shirt, a belt round his waist, and a geologist's hammer stuck in it, pantaloons to match the coat, big boots up to his knees, and a grey wide-awake hat. Having transacted his business with him in a series of epigrams, in which the Frenchman, of course, had the best of it, the latter strolls out to walk about the city, and finds himself in the course of an hour on board the Staten Island ferry-boat. At this moment arrives Miss Mary, attired in white muslin, a white sack, and a straw hat, alone in an open phaeton, with a pair of ponies driven by herself; runs the pole of the phaeton against Montaret, and sets him swearing. On seeing the graceful apparition in the carriage he takes her for a person of light character, not knowing the usages of the country, and "chaffs" her a little in French, to which she replies in the same language and without the least accent. After some further conversation she finds out he is the young engineer her father had gone out to consult, and invites him to get into the phaeton and pay some visits with her on Staten Island. On the way she learns that her father had asked him to dinner on the following day, whereupon she enquires whether he will not change his clothes and wear a black coat and white cravat, which he promises to do, and in answer to further queries gives her a little epitome of his own biography and account of his reasons for coming to America.

On reaching Staten Island they drive to the house of Arabella Williams, opera singer, to whom Miss Sewell introduces the engineer, and who perceives that in spite of his strange costume he is a thorough gentleman. They stay to lunch, at which the conversation turns on pastry, cotton, and theology, but as the company is composed of five Episcopalians, three Baptists, and two Unitarians and a Universalist, they cannot agree on the subject of religion. M. de Montaret, the engineer, is, however, greatly taken by Arabella's arms and neck, and is quite overcome when Miss Mary took off her sack and displayed herself also in low neck and short sleeves. This at first astonished him, but he recollects that this is the custom of the country, and that she might do the same thing in the open air at a promenade without astonishing anybody. Before they leave the house Arabella is in love with the engineer and jealous of Miss Mary. After a drive round the island they are upset in a thunder-storm, smash the phaeton, miss the last ferry-boat, and have to come up to New York in a row-boat, reaching the Battery at two in the morning, a circumstance which M. de Montaret thinks likely to damage Miss Mary's reputation, and communicates his fear to the young lady herself, but she assures him that this is a mistake, and asks what she has to fear in his company. He swears to her that she has nothing whatever to fear, as he loves her too much not to respect her. Whereupon she enquires if he loves her already, and on learning that he does, warns him that he does not know her well enough, and asks if he would like to marry her. He says he would; but on hearing that he would have, in compliance with the American custom, to be first engaged to her for a year or two, declares that two years would be an eternity. Some conversation follows on the subject of Arabella Williams, from which it plainly appears that Miss Mary in her turn is going to be jealous of Arabella—who, by the way, sings in Grace Church. On landing they walk up to Miss Mary's brown-stone house near the Central Park, arm in arm.

On the following morning, when M. de Montaret wakes in his hotel, he finds a black valet in his room arranging his things, having been sent by Miss Mary for that purpose; and, on going to the dinner at her father's that evening, finds all the male guests wearing black satin vests and very high, stiff shirt-collars—his own costume being, however, irreproachable. The conversation at table runs entirely on mines. After dinner there was a ball, at which Arabella made her appearance, and paid marked attention to M. de Montaret, which Miss Mary perceiving, engages him for the next and every other dance during the evening. Arabella Williams is rendered so furious by the turn things have taken that, on finding that after having heard her sing at the opera he did not go behind the scenes to see her, she wrote him the following note, on rose-colored paper, on the following day:

> "You would never believe, Monsieur, how much pain you have caused me by your indifference. Why did you not come behind the scenes to salute me last evening after having heard me? You were alone, and nobody prevented you from coming. Know that I sang for you; but I must either have very little talent, or have displeased you much, that you should show me so little courtesy. I am wounded by it in my pride and self-love. You are, nevertheless, a well-bred man, and I do not understand your forgetfulness. Allow me to attribute this want of attention to timidity, and come this evening at 4 o'clock to Staten Island to present the excuses, which, as a woman and as an artist, I have a right to demand of you.
> "Arabella Williams."

This letter miscarries and falls into the hands of Miss Mary, who, when taking a drive in her dog-cart that afternoon in Central Park, meets Arabella, cuts her dead, and flings the note at her feet. Arabella nearly fainted when she saw the note, but goes off vowing vengeance.

Within a few days Mr. Sewell determines to start for Lake Superior with M. de Montaret, and Miss Mary makes up her mind to go with them; but her father would not allow her to go further than Cleveland, Ohio. On Miss Mary's mentioning to M. de Montaret that she had secured the privilege of making at least half the journey with him, "Ah, dear Mary," cries that gentleman, "would that Cleveland were at the end of the world!" During the journey on the "Central Road," M. de Montaret was terribly annoyed by the publicity of the American cars. Mr. Sewell, to do him justice, would have given a million for a separate compartment for his party, but he could not have it. Consequently, although the usages of the country would have authorized M. de Montaret to make violent love to Miss Mary the whole way, his French modesty (pudeur toute française), coupled with the fact that he had not obtained Mr. Sewell's permission, condemns him to an excessive reserve. At Cleveland things come to a crisis. Mr. Sewell leaves the young people at the station while he goes to look after the baggage. They walk up and down the track, addressing each other more and more tenderly, when suddenly Mary puts a ring on Henri's finger—her mother's ring. He kisses it fervently; she cries, "Now you are my fiancé!" he presses her to his bosom, and is just kissing her when a locomotive comes up and drives them off the track. Soon after they part.

The story is to be continued in the next number, which we look for with a good deal of interest, and congratulate M. Sand very cordially on the success of his first chapter. We presume he has visited America, but he cannot have been here very long; and how he got the intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of the natives, and, above all, with the ways of thinking and speaking peculiar to American young women which he displays in his portraiture of Miss Sewell, we cannot for the life of us imagine, or, rather, we could not imagine if we did not know how little genius stands in need of knowledge. We hope he will, before the story closes, touch off the custom now so common, especially among New England girls, of attending prize-fights and betting on the result, as well as that other growing custom of carrying concealed weapons and forcing men to marry them by threats of personal violence. We doubt if any native moralist has power enough to put down these dreadful but not unnatural results of Puritan training, and of the great freedom accorded in this country to young women from their earliest years. They need the lash of an acute foreign observer, and, unless we are greatly mistaken in our man, he has appeared in the person of M. Sand.

Fine Arts.

FORTY-SECOND EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

SECOND NOTICE.

In the great south room of the Exhibition are two very large landscapes, the one by Mr. Huntington, the other by Mr. Kensett. They occupy very important places, one in the post of honor in the middle of the south wall, the other upon the as prominent though not so well lighted wall of the east end. Mr. Huntington's, No. 479, is "Chocorua Peak;" Mr. Kensett's, No. 446, is of "White Mountain Scenery."

We give half of our space this week to the consideration of Mr. Bierstadt's large picture, "The Domes of the Yo Semite," which is on exhibition at another place for the benefit of the Southern Relief Fund. These three pictures invite comparison between them not only on account of their size and their (consequent) great importance in popular estimation, but also on account of a certain resemblance in the way of rendering the aspect of external nature, considered as an assemblage of variously modified colors. Although our landscape school, compared with the school that influences our painters the most, the French, is bright and pure in color, it is yet incomplete and imperfect in this: that but few of our landscape painters study, as truths of primary importance, the combined colors of the whole landscape. But in the case of the three well-known painters we have named, their practice, as seen in the pictures before us, is opposed to the theory that the colors of nature should be represented as nearly as possible as we see them. That theory seems to us absolutely correct; and practice according to it seems to us the only true and complete pictorial art, all other being partial and confessedly imperfect. There is much good art that is not colored at all, but in light and shade simply; there is some good art that is in few and pale colors; but these are, as we have said, necessarily partial and imperfect. Large oil pictures are generally supposed, by a sort of prescriptive right they have, to be of full and elaborated truth of color. If they are not, we think the spectator has a right to ask each picture to show cause why it is not. No picture, of course, can have the absolute colors of nature in all their brilliancy and force. Titian loses sunlight to get glowing and splendid harmony. Turner abandons actual truth of local color to get the large relations of part with part. We will accept and approve any picture's greyness or paleness or sombreness if it can be seen or shown that there is something gained by the sacrifice. But that is probably not the case with the pictures we are considering.

Mr. Bierstadt's picture having notice below, we go on to speak of the others, fully conscious of the strangeness of an article devoted wholly to question of color, but apropos of three works so deficient in that quality. Mr. Kensett's picture embodies, we think, that gentle and somewhat pensive love of nature which is wholly sincere, wholly estimable, and, we may add, wholly modern. There is some influence over us which makes half the people dislike bright colors, and nearly the other half dread them, and dread to show any love of them, thinking it childish or savage. Soft and neutral colors please the latter class; white, as cold and harsh as it can be made, the former. The people who like the "simplicity" of our newest and costliest buildings, white marble or white painted iron without, white plaster within, do not come to the picture galleries at all, or, when they come, see nothing in a painting which they like as well as a drawing in black and white. The other class come, and very much admire and somewhat love the Kensetts; but are disturbed and somewhat offended by such work as the Rossetti drawings of last fall. Now, if work in full color fails in harmony, such work as Mr. Kensett's, being truly harmonious, is just so far superior to it. But the great and truly admirable result is when diverse and brilliant colors are made harmonious by their gradation, and by opposition of one to another. No softness or purity gained by denying of bright color can equal that which comes of its fullest recognition.

In Mr. Huntington's picture there is color which is absolutely wrong. It is cold, subdued with black for shadow, the greens reduced to something worse than grey, the reds to something harsher than brown. The reflections in the water are apparently painted according to the assumption that rocks and trees are black, and that water has no color, but only an imperfect reflective power. For colored things seen in even a black mirror will be not black, but of their own colors curiously modified: and black things seen in a colored mirror are generally not black either. By "black" we mean not merely black paint upon the canvas, but the representation of a black thing; as the portrait of a black coat will have many hues in it. Mr. Huntington's whole system of color, not agreeable or ennobling when applied to portraits, becomes very disagreeable when applied to landscape. In the picture before us we point out no especial faults, believing it to be in this important respect wholly untrue and inartistic.

"THE DOMES OF THE YO SEMITE."

It has become such a matter of course now for Mr. Bierstadt to paint large pictures and have them exhibited, that people expect them to be criticised or rather praised if any are. Certainly if size calls for notice, these pictures ought not to be passed by. And, if that be the case, there is still louder call for notice of the scenery in our theatres; for surely much of it is far more agreeable in color, and far more truthful in naturalness of effect—and effect is all that these huge pictures ever pretend to.

If we have effects painted (and of course we do not object to that), why not paint us such things as nature is effective in? Why not give us her freshness and joyousness of color, her purity under the light of the heaven? Why not remind us of the fulness of her treasure, of the baffling mystery of her mountains whenever the sunlight, the cloud-shadow, and the mist play upon them, and of the infinite of her heavens? These pictures, not large in any such way, but only in scale—yet pictures of effects and not of simple unaided realities—not giving any of these things, cannot satisfy the soul that loves them. An effect in nature is that which draws all her various details to unity. Sunshine will do it, atmosphere will do it, mists and shadows will do it, and an ordering of parts and happy falling of lines will do it; but if the beauty of none of these, be given what can our effects be worth?

Better paint the simplest object in its verity and own quiet beauty. Indeed, if a man do not love a thing for itself, he cannot love it rightly in its congregation with others. We must love a tree before we can love a forest; we must love a man before we love humanity.

This last picture of Mr. Bierstadt's seems to be better than any he has shown us before. More than "seems to be" can hardly be said; for when a picture is shaded, and set back, and contrasted with dim surroundings, and fenced about, not much more than seeming is left. Its general hue is not so disagreeable and unwholesome as that of the first Rocky Mountain picture was. The greys are more pleasant, and there is not so much of a certain, or rather, uncertain, thick brownness about the darker parts. The rocks and waterfall on the left even approach color. There is not so much crowding of big things in the canvas, and the lines are more simple and agreeable. And there is not so much disorder of foreground, men and horses and tents scattered about, uneasy under their pictorial responsibilities. These things, of course, are great gains, and they persuade people at first to believe the picture better than it proves on further looking.

Really, the dim indecision and coarse painting of the middle distance do not fairly represent atmosphere; and the confusion of greater light in the distance does not fairly represent sunshine. The rocks are not rocks enjoyable for their hardness, or any other rocky quality, and the water does not fall in a way to rejoice the heart of one who has watched real water falling. The small hill near the right of the foreground is in shadow, but the sunshine does not seem to make its appearance again before we come to the trees on the left, which must be supposed to be in it, for they have dim streaks of darkness reaching from their trunks away from the sun's direction.

Nature's lover knows that there is beauty and enjoyment in all her truths; and he would rather have one day in her courts than a thousand of the pleasures of picturesque sin.

Correspondence.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE REFORM.

To THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

It seems to me that the views of your correspondent "W. P. A.," in regard to the training required of the entering classes at Harvard College, as published in THE NATION of May 2, are thoroughly unsound. And presumptuous as it may seem to question in such a matter the opinions of one whose name justly carries a weight of authority with it, I shall briefly review the ground taken by your correspondent.

"W. P. A." thinks that the entrance examination at Harvard has been brought to a high pitch of absurdity; and that "a young man of seventeen must be possessed of an amount of minute information which should only be required of an advanced student of the Greek and Latin languages." He also says that, "unable to conform to the spirit of the requisitions, and yet compelled to conform to their letter, teachers are forced to cram their pupils."

Now I believe that, if anything, the entrance examination at Harvard is too easy instead of too difficult, and that when it is made still harder, parents and teachers will see the absurdity of their own conduct in forcing immature boys of sixteen and seventeen into the college classes, who still ought to be at school. The principal reason that the preparatory training for college is found so difficult, is that boys and their teachers too often try to do in three years what ought to be the work of five. I acknowledge that the standard of admission at Harvard is raised higher every year, and in that fact I see a rare instance of good sense in the conduct of the college government. This increasing difficulty of admission is having a gradual but most salutary effect—a very marked effect, if we observe the average age of classes for the few last years. The class of 1866 averaged eighteen years and one month at admission, and the two or three following classes nearly the same. That boys in America are inclined to enter college too young, few will deny; and I have the authority of an ex-president of Harvard for saying that one, at least, of the objects aimed at in raising the standard of admission at Cambridge has been to increase the average age of those applying.

Now let us consider whether the preparatory training in Latin and Greek of which "W. P. A." complains is useless in itself. It would be superfluous to argue in favor of accurate beginnings in classical study, and the question is whether the entrance examination papers at Harvard contain more than the very smallest per-centum of questions which "W. P. A.'s" "intelligent school-boy" has a right to waive. From a pretty extensive acquaintance with Harvard papers, I hazard the assertion that as a rule they contain nothing which any boy who can read Virgil or Cicero intelligently should be unable to answer.

If a pedant at the head of a certain public school chooses to waste the time and burden the memory of his pupils with lists of the forty digammated verbs and Latin adjectives that want the superlative, that is his fault. Such absurdities are not required, as every well-informed teacher knows.

I believe that too little, instead of too much, grammatical knowledge is demanded on admission at Cambridge, and for this reason: thaf at present the whole of the Freshman year must be spent in grammatical drill. The instructors have not the time, granting them the disposition, to dwell upon the higher beauties of the Greek and Latin authors read, and their pupils are certainly unable to appreciate those beauties without a long preparatory course in those minutiæ which ought to have been learned at school, and which are the foundation of the edifice of which "W. P. A." seems to consider them the capstone.

I have thus far taken the ground that the grammatical knowledge of a dead language is the only ground-work for its appreciative study; but even if we adopt the other view of the matter, and grant that a wide range of classical reading should precede the study of grammatical forms, the strictures of "W. P. A." seem equally unreasonable. For it appears to be the amount, even more than the kind of work required, to which he objects. He agrees with Dr. Taylor, that "the mere amount of classical reading required is largely in excess of what ought to be expected of young men of seventeen."

Now, observing in passing that the average age at entering is not seventeen but eighteen, and that a long year's time makes much difference in the amount of reading that can justly be required, I confess myself unable to see how that amount could be materially lessened and leave anything.

The books at present required are—in Latin, Cæsar's "Commentaries," Virgil's "Bucolics" and "Æneid," and some eight or ten of Cicero's orations; in Greek, the "Anabasis" of Xenophon and three books of the "Iliad." Would "W. P. A." bring back the time when to enter Harvard it was only required that the student should be "able to construe Tully or some other Latin author, and to decline and conjugate the paradigms of the Greek grammar?"

Perhaps even less than this would satisfy him, for he sneers at the years "set apart for declining and conjugating Greek words." Perhaps he would devote those years to the mastery of the problems and callibrating machines of Cooke's "Chemical Physics," and to learning from the same book what kind of glass is best for test-tubes and what is the proper shape for retorts.

No one is more fully persuaded than the writer of the existing necessity for college reform, but one of the first steps toward making Harvard a university must be to increase the age of its students, so that for the first two years the instructors may not be obliged to treat their pupils as school-boys; and next, to require, in addition to the examinations in Greek and Latin, some knowledge of history and science. But to attempt to leave the "declining and conjugating of Greek words" and the outlines of Latin grammar—for the "cumbrous text-books now in use" teach nothing more—till after the student has acquired a critical and appreciative knowledge of those languages, seems to me very like putting straw into the bricks after they are dried. TARIFF ON BOOKS.

To THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

A press of occupation has thrown me somewhat in arrears with my periodical reading, and I have therefore only just now seen, in THE NATION of April 4, a letter signed "Veritas," in answer to mine of March 21 on the proposed book-tariff. The signature, if I remember rightly, is that of a gentleman who in a former communication actually added the gold-premium in order to find out the percentage of an ad valorem rate, and his last letter affords another instance of the vagueness of ideas common among those whose interest lies in trying to persuade the public that all our manufacturing should be done abroad and all our taxes should be levied at home.

"Veritas," it seems, accuses me of calculating on certain books in foreign languages the duty at 10 cents per lb., when, according to him, they would be subject under the proposed tariff to 25 cents. I presume that no sane man would intentionally make so palpable a misrepresentation as this, and I must therefore conclude that either "Veritas" is not aware that the "Bibliothèque Charpentier" is French, and the Abbé Migne's publications are French, Latin, and Greek, or else that he has not looked at the tariff project which he undertakes to criticise, and consequently does not know that it rates all books in foreign languages not reprinted here at 10 cents per lb., irrespective of date.

Having disposed of this, allow me to allude to an article in your last number, "The Genial Critic," and to thank you for the service which THE NATION is doing by the elevated and discriminating tone of its criticism. I think that almost all publishers would gladly see the review department of our periodical literature conducted with the same care and ability that mark the better class of the English journals. Of course, no one is especially gratified to see the condemnation of any individual book in which his capital is invested, but we all recognize that praise to be valuable must not be indiscriminate; and editors may safely rely upon the fact that the pressure on their advertising columns is regulated by the extent and character of their circulation. As far as my experience goes, however, I think that perhaps your deductions in the article referred to are a little too general, and that to a great extent the laudatory tone of our literary criticism may fairly be attributed not so much to interested motives as to good-natured indolence. The man who deals in vague praise is always safe, while he who undertakes to criticise must have some preliminary familiarity with the subject and must take the pains to form some acquaintance with the book.

Very respectfully, etc.,

WHAT THE PAPERS SAY ABOUT IT.

From the New York Tribune.

The commencement of the new novel by Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, which appears in The Ledger of this week, presents a striking illustration of the versatility of the writer, and the power of his genius to adapt itself to widely different spheres of intellectual action. Still it exhibits many of the qualities which have given him such a brilliant position among the masters of popular eloquence in this country. His mind is essentially dramatic in its character; he throws himself into the situation which he describes; his most vivid conceptions take the form of personality; he falls into dialogue with the freshness and facility of a child: he has no taste for the cold abstractions of thought, but with him all is life, activity, scenic representation, combined with a deep sense of truth, and an earnest sincerity of purpose. To such mental traits, the construction of a novel is almost an instinct of nature. The success of this story, which is entitled "Norwood; or, Village Life in New England," may be regarded as a foregone conclusion. It opens in a style of almost homely simplicity and directness, but of great vigor of expression and variety of illustration. The characters at once gain the interest of the reader, and their artless history, if carried on as it has been commenced, will afford a rare opportunity of weekly pleasure.

From The Commercial Advertiser.

THE LEDGER.—Mr. Bonner's Ledger for May 18th lies before us. Its most noticeable feature is the opening chapters of Henry Ward Beecher's novel, entitled "Norwood; or, Village Life in New England." This novel is written expressly for The Ledger, and places Mr. Beecher in a decidedly new rôle before the public. Another article is by Dr. Hill, President of Harvard College, "On the Study of Mathematics." This is the first of twelve articles, by twelve college Presidents, under the heading of "Advice to Young Men." Mr. F. S. Cozzens furnishes an article on "Russian America," and Mr James Parton one on "Queen Elizabeth." Mrs. Southworth's novel is continued. Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., continues his "Scraps of Adventure." The Ledger, in spite of all rivalry, holds the front rank in the class of journals to which it belongs. Mr. Bonner is an enterprising publisher, and pays liberally for all the matter he uses. He shows a wonderful tact in selecting writers and topics for his paper.

From The World.

Bonner's Ledger is gorgeous. Beecher begins his novel "Norwood," which unquestionably will be better than his sermons, or his lectures, or his stump speeches—is better, we say. President Hill, of Harvard, writes sensible advice to young men; Saxe sharpens his quill to new epigrams; Cozzens writes of Sitka, and Parton of Queen Elizabeth; Mrs. Southworth, Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., Fanny Fern, Alice Cary, and Wallace all write for it.

From the New York Daily Times.

THE NEW YORK LEDGER.—Mr. Beecher's novel is commenced in this week's issue of the New York Ledger. It is written with his accustomed directness and vigor of style, and gives promise in its opening chapters of a very interesting contribution to current American literature. The Ledger has several other novel and striking features, and is marked by the enterprise and originality characteristic of its editor and proprietor.

From the Philadelphia Ledger.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S NEW STORY.—Mr. Bonner, having popularized his New York Ledger by filling it with matter attractive to the masses, then took to popularizing the writings of superior men and sound thinkers, whose works had not previously reached the great body of the people. This was a good work well done. It is to be further continued, and the number for the 18th of May comes to us in advance with the first four chapters of Henry Ward Beecher's story, entitled "Norwood; or, Village Life in New England." It opens with the fine promise of being a story of deep interest, and one that will be sure to afford both diversion and instruction to the readers of The Ledger. There is in the same number, in addition to the usual variety of interesting matter, the first of a series of papers of "Advice to Young Men," contributed by the Presidents of twelve of the principal colleges of the United States.

From the Philadelphia Press.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.—"Norwood; or, Village Life in New England," is the title of the new story which Mr. Beecher has written for the New York Ledger. We may safely predict that there will be the most general and intense desire to see how Mr. Beecher, so great in the pulpit and on the platform, will distinguish himself in prose fiction.

The Week.

THE event of the week has been the liberation of Jefferson Davis on bail, with a chance of his being tried for high treason in November. Judge Underwood, as might have been expected, availed himself of the occasion to make one or two little speeches. He opened the proceedings by magnanimously dispensing with "the morning routine," "owing to the presence of many of the nation's noblest and bravest defenders." General Burton's return to the writ was then read, and the judge was quite overcome by it; and, fixing his eye on the general, proceeded to make him a mellifluous and ornate address, in which he expressed his gratitude to him for having obeyed the order of the court, and pronounced it, on the whole, a pluckier thing than any of the general's exploits "on the battle-fields of the country." Having announced with much solemnity that "the prisoner now passed under the protection of the American Republic," and that "the laws if silent in arms should be trumpet-toned and omnipotent in peace," he had a writ on the indictment served coram judice on the unfortunate prisoner, who bowed his acknowledgments. General Burton then expressed his acknowledgments for the handsome manner in which the court had spoken of him, and the court bowed; and after a little discussion between counsel, as to bail, the judge, after many words and much circumlocution, gave the audience to understand that he would admit the prisoner to bail.

THERE was, of course, a rush of competitors for the honor of bailing Jefferson Davis, and twenty bondsmen in five thousand dollars each have been accepted. We are glad, for his own sake, to see Horace Greeley heading the list. He has been long anxious to do something for Davis, in order to prove the sincerity of his belief that the late war was only a war of "principles," and that, therefore, nobody ought to be hanged. The "principle" of "slavery and secession" having now been bailed out of jail by the "principle" of "freedom and union," we suppose he considers their reconciliation complete, and that there is nothing left for us all North and South but to fall on each other's necks and cry. For our part, we believe there has been no war in modern times with the outbreak and prolongation of which the bad passions of bad men had so much to do, the objects of which, as far as the South was concerned, were morally so detestable, and the course of which was marked by so much real, everyday villany. Considering how much stress was laid by the Northern people and by the Northern press on the moral guilt of the rebellion during its progress, the spectacle of one of the most prominent representatives of Northern principles rushing not to help the head and front of the rebellion out of jail—for he would have got out without his aid—but to display his sympathy with him, cannot but be regarded as a sorry one. We do not desire the infliction of unnecessary suffering on Jefferson Davis, and we therefore are not sorry to see him liberated; but his course during the war, his strongly suspected and not yet disproved connivance at the Andersonville and Belle Isle atrocities, and the violence and brutality of his language on all his public appearances during the rebellion, mark him out in a special manner as a person on whom those who believe there was a right and wrong in the late war, and the right was on the side of the North, ought to avoid all needless expenditure of commiseration. Moreover, attempts to throw an atmosphere of saintly gentleness over a man who could, in public speeches while in a high official position, talk of political enemies as "hyenas," and hostile generals as "spaniels" to be "whipped," are simply repulsive.

THE Supreme Court has dismissed the Georgia case for want of jurisdiction, and so the Mississippi case goes by the board also, and thus the afflicted South stands with bared breast before its ruthless oppressors, who will now probably ravage it horribly. Governor Perry of South Carolina is between the horns of a dilemma. On one side is Congress, with its military governments, and on the other are the negroes, with their confiscation; and what to do, except to vote against a convention, he does not know. He may have observed, however, that in novels, when the hero has been brought to the last extremity, and it is apparently all up with him, he is apt to "see a great light," sit up in his bed, converse comfortably with those around him, and at some convenient period thereafter die happily. We think Mr. Perry himself has nearly reached this stage—not, of course, in his physical, but in his political career—that in a few months the negro question will appear quite plain to him, and that he will bless the black voters, and decently quit the stage.

WE are sorry to say we hear very bad accounts of the way in which Southerners are receiving the donations sent on for their relief. In one case in Georgia, the county officials refused to distribute a cargo of corn unless they were paid for their services out of the corn; and there is a very general disposition not to be satisfied with such things as the miserable Yankees find it convenient to send on. This gorilla condition of mind is greatly to be regretted, as it serves no good purpose. It does not help the South, and does not punish the Yankees. If the maundering editors and orators who are all the time wondering why the Yankees do not forget and forgive would preach mutual forgiveness and forgetfulness, they would do some good. In the meantime—and this is the main thing—there is no doubt that real and widespread distress does exist, and there is apparently strong probability that during the next two months there will be at the South a real mediæval famine, with hundreds if not thousands of deaths from sheer starvation, if people at the North do not bestir themselves.

The Judiciary Committee has been hard at work with the impeachment, probably in order to have something ready for their July report. But the public seems to have lost all interest in their labors, as well it may, seeing that under the most favorable circumstances it would be difficult to get rid of Mr. Johnson before the nomination of his successor, and that he is apparently forwarding the work of reconstruction, or perhaps we should rather say letting it alone, to the best of his ability. He is now contemplating a journey to the South, however, in which he will probably come to grief. The darkest region in his administration thus far is his Pardon Bureau, in which General Butler appears at present to be rummaging diligently, and may possibly find something.

Two things of some significance as regards the protection and free-trade controversy have occurred within the last ten days. The one is the meeting of the iron-masters at the Astor House, in this city, for the purpose, we believe, of creating an organization to work on public opinion in opposition to the Free Trade League. The sessions were private, so that, except the resolutions and the speeches of Messrs. Greeley and Cooper, nothing is known of what happened. But it is as well to state frankly that we think the prominence given to these two gentlemen looks badly for the future of the movement, inasmuch as neither of them is likely to be of the slightest use in controversy, both being entirely ignorant of the existing condition of economical science as taught by free-traders, and one, at least, possessing little or no reasoning power, which in politico-economical discussions is of prime importance. We say this with the utmost respect, as they are both worthy citizens; but Mr. Greeley's contributions to the science have for some years excited simple merriment amongst the leading free-traders of England and the Continent, who, whenever the great tug comes here, will undoubtedly supply most of the weapons to the free-trade arsenal. The other event to which we have referred is the appearance of a pamphlet on the "Collection of Revenue," by Edward Atkinson, who is treasurer for several of the largest mills in New England, and perhaps represents as well as, or better than, anybody else the manufacturing mind of New England on the tariff. The pamphlet is a broad, straightforward advocacy of the application of the free-trade theory to our tariff, as far as circumstances will admit, and of the total abandonment of the protective system, due regard being had to the vested interests which have grown up under it. We propose next week to notice Mr. Atkinson's views at greater length. His utterance of them is an indication of a formidable defection from the protectionist ranks.

We now have an eight-hour law in this State, Governor Fenton having signed the bill passed last session. This, we believe, makes three in the whole country, and we presume this will be the last that will be passed anywhere, as the absurdity of the movement is gradually dawning on those engaged in it, and the trial of it in Illinois and Missouri has satisfied the working-men that no good can come of it. All these laws simply prohibit men from working more than eight hours unless they wish or agree to do so, and are therefore of about as much value as an act permitting the working-man to have roast-turkey and pumpkin-pie for his dinner whenever he thinks he could afford it. The New York Tribune, we presume by way of saying something soothing to the disappointed, declares that, although the law may not effect any immediate change, "a principle is now established to which labor is at liberty to gravitate—that is all." This sounds very fine; but suppose a law were passed fixing the compensation for a day's hod-carrying at twenty-five dollars in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, and we were to say that a principle was established towards which hod-carriers' wages "were at liberty to gravitate," would the hod-carrier be any better off? The "liberty of gravitation" has been enjoyed by both labor and wages for a long while, and cannot be established or helped by acts of the Legislature. The laws of trade generally interfere with it somewhat, but they are the only laws which can interfere at all.

Teaching the poor and ignorant would, we suppose, be admitted in all Christian countries to be one of the noblest and most ennobling works in which a woman can engage, and we believe there is no civilized country in which a lady would lose caste by doing it for love of the work. But there cannot be a better illustration of the crooked condition of the Southern mind than the fact that Southern women make a distinction between "nigger teachers" and others, based on the color of the persons taught, and positively act on it in everyday life, treating Northern women engaged in negro schools as degraded thereby, no matter what their social position at home may be. A better illustration of the condition of Southern civilization could hardly be offered; it is almost as useless to comment on it or denounce it as to denounce the Turkish prejudice against women going unveiled. But in Kentucky the doctrine has just received a remarkable expansion in the case of a highly respectable white female teacher in a colored school, who boarded with a most respectable and well-to-do colored family, and while so boarding sought admission to a Baptist church in Louisville. The pastor made no objection, but the member who was appointed to enquire into her character advised her, on finding where she boarded, not to present herself for admission, as some members would object to her on account of her boarding-place, and vote against her. So that while with some the color of one's pupils is a reason for exclusion from society, with others the color of one's landlord is a reason for exclusion from the Christian church. We doubt very much whether the absurdities into which the color prejudice may lead people were half so fully revealed in slavery as they will be in freedom.

A long card appears very prominently in the Mobile Nationalist, which is devoted through a whole column to what the writer calls "alluding to" the editor of the Mobile Tribune. He calls him a "certain fellow and poltroon, known commonly as the inefficient editor of the Tribune;" also "the man Shelton;" "the poor, craven editor;" "the fellow Shelton;" charges him with having "filthy language and indecent allusions in the columns of his sheet," and says "that families have to keep to the windward of it, as the stench and poison would utterly contaminate," etc., etc. All this has a sound of the olden times about it, and if the "Southron" spirit be not dead in the man Shelton, he will shortly murder the man Harrington who wrote the card. But we "allude" to it, as Mr. Harrington would say, rather by way of introduction to the observation appended to it by the editor of the journal in which it appears, than for its own merits. He says "he published it before knowing how personally abusive it was, and that had he read it carefully he would have required some modification of the style."

Mobile, with a pretty large floating population of gamblers and other roughs, was, perhaps, the likeliest Southern town to bring the pistol to bear on a prominent Radical in the act of expressing his views. We confess to having been a little surprised that Mr. Wilson got through so many States as he did without having a shot fired at him. Judge Kelley, a less plausible and more aggressive orator, has not been so fortunate; but the riot in which he nearly lost his life seems to have been not preconcerted and not violent. If we could ever expect with any confidence that the South would accept the inevitable without some preliminary knocking of its head against the wall, we might expect it to listen with civility to Radical orators; for nothing is surer than that the South has got to submit to free speech. It is a dreadful case, no doubt, but there it is.

International law explicitly allows any government to use as a subject one of its escaped citizens, as we may call them, who, having emigrated and become a naturalized citizen of a foreign country, afterwards returns to his native country. The law, or at any rate the practice, of each single nation goes further and says: "Once a subject, always a subject." Mr. Seward has for years been laboring with the Prussian Government to induce a change in its views of this question. He entertains what perhaps will be in the future the views of all nations in regard to it, but certainly his views are not current at present.

He upholds "the right of men who have committed no crime to choose the state in which they will live, and to incorporate themselves as members of that state, and to enjoy thenceforth its privileges and its benefits, among which is included protection." Probably Count Bismark has paid more attention to the cases of this nature which are constantly coming up for practical consideration, than to the general principles set forth by Mr. Seward. The American naturalized citizen who claims protection at the offices of the American consuls in Prussia, is, about as often as otherwise, a specimen of one of these disreputable classes of people: 1st. A bankrupt Prussian-American who has fled from American creditors, to begin business again with the immunities that an American passport gives him. 2d. A political agitator who, having come over here to get a title to American protection, gets it and goes back to his trade of agitating without the intention of doing his duty by his native or his adopted country. 3d. A young man who, having, when a boy, left his home to shirk the military duties required by law, and having spent a certain number of years here, goes back home with naturalization papers in his pocket. 4th. (Between 1860–65) a naturalized citizen who did not want to be drafted. All these people, without having done a thing to deserve the privilege of citizenship, either in the United States or Prussia, find it convenient to be residents of either, and really and honestly citizens of neither country. And our lax laws make it so easy for these and other similar sorts of people to get a certain measure of protection without making the least return, that it is no wonder that an American naturalization paper is not looked upon with the greatest favor by foreign governments. To ask them to respect it till we do something more to make it respectable than talk of man's natural right to naturalization papers, is to ask for more than we shall get or ought to get.

Dr. Kirk, who, as we observed last week, is the only trustworthy authority upon the question of Dr. Livingstone's death, has received information which evidently shakes his belief in the statements of the Johanna men. Some traders from Central Africa who have lately arrived at the coast declare that when they were at Maksura they heard nothing about the murder, but heard, on the contrary, that Dr. Livingstone had proceeded into the far interior. Now Maksura is only ten miles from the place where he is said to have been killed, but it is ten miles short of that place, and the Johanna men said that Maksura was passed in safety. The late account therefore is not a positive contradiction of the former, but on the other hand it is not a confirmation—which is saying a good deal. There is therefore a hope: an expedition will be sent out to Lake Nyassa, and in the meantime we must content ourselves with these native reports, in which, whether favorable or unfavorable, no absolute reliance is to be placed.

It is at last finally settled that we are not to have a war in Europe or the present. Prussia withdraws her troops from Luxembourg, and the fortress is to be dismantled and the territory neutralized, the neutrality being guaranteed by all the contracting powers. Both France and Prussia deny that they have been "arming," except in so far as was necessary to keep up the efficiency of the existing organization. The correspondence of the London Times announces that Bismark still expresses his belief that there will, in a year or two, be a war between France and Prussia, while acknowledging, as we have always maintained, that neither of them is now ready for it. The chances are that for two or three years to come they will both find enough to do in the work of internal reorganization to drive foreign war out of their heads. There is really nothing for them to fight about, except what may be called political influence, but this influence, it is now beginning to be understood, depends as much on peaceful prosperity as on the strength of standing armies, or, in other words, rather on what a nation is capable of doing, than what it has done.

ECCLESIASTICAL DRESS.

A writer in The Edinburgh Review makes what, for Ritualists, must be considered rather distressing revelations as to the origin of the Ritualistic vestments, which these gentlemen appear to consider amongst the essentials of Christian worship. He shows that they are simply the articles of clothing worn by the Romans in everyday life, and which the Church preserved in her ceremonial, just as she preserved the Latin, when everything around her changed. The alb is the white shirt or tunic which was worn by every Roman peasant next his skin, and which in Southern countries was often his only garment, and which still figures so prominently in the Pope's wardrobe. The Emperors Commodus and Heliogabalus introduced a new variety of it with long sleeves, called a dalmatica, because it came from Dalmatia. The pall is the old pallium or woollen cloak of the philosophers, worn as an overcoat. It was constantly changing, as our overcoat is, its fashion and name, and the slang names given it, like our "paletot" and "aquascutum" and "surtout," have been preserved, and actually become sacred terms in ecclesiastical nomenclature. One such overcoat was the cape or cope, also called pluviale or "waterproof"—the equivalent of our "aquascutum." Another was the chasuble or casula, the "little house," as the Roman laborer called the smock or "sack" in which he shut himself up in bad weather. Another was the "cassock" or casaca or caraca or caracalla, introduced by the Emperor of that name from France. The "surplice" is a garment of barbarian origin—the super pellicum—which in the North was drawn on over the furs worn by the Gauls and Celts in their cold climates. It was the "white coat," the cotta candens, worn by regular clergy, not in church only, but in ordinary life. The reviewer adds that in the oldest Roman mosaic, that of the Church of Sta. Pudentiana, of the fourth century, the apostles appear clothed in the common costume of the period. A separate dress for sacred personages had not been thought of. In other words, "clothes" had not assumed the tremendous importance which they acquired in the Middle Ages and still retain in the church, the army, and diplomacy.

The most imaginative Roman, under the empire, in his wildest dreams probably never pictured to himself the possibility of the garments he saw every day on the young swells in the Forum attaining, after the lapse of many centuries, the character of "sacred vestments," having books written about them, and large bodies of educated men engaged in the careful study of their cut and ornamentation as matters of the deepest spiritual importance. That all this should have come to pass, and that fifteen hundred years after Rome had passed away, the costume of her peasants, lawyers, courtiers, and dandies should be deemed the costume divinely ordained as the only fitting attire for priests ministering at a Christian altar, is, perhaps, the most remarkable illustration in existence of the strength of her hold on the ideas of the modern world. In what a firm grip her law and literature keep us is well known. Professor Maine even goes so far as to suggest that the theological speculation of the Western world owes its form and coloring to Roman jurisprudence, but this, if true, is not half so wonderful as that Roman tailors and Roman fops should have furnished the basis for what we suppose we may call a modern sect.

How the Church came to preserve the old costume is not hard to understand. It was the dress of civilized men, and, with the Latin language, recalled, in the midst of the rising tide of barbarism, the memories and traditions of holier and happier times, and probably made no inconsiderable impression on the half-clad savages who crowded round the altars as the empire began to go to pieces. We should be afraid to predict for any pieces of modern dress a future so glorious. There is little likelihood, in our age, of any material corruption of the Church. All our tendencies are rather in the direction of less form than of more form. But if modern society should ever go astray and take to Comte's worship of the Human Race, or any other similar absurdity, for which it was necessary that the ministers should have a peculiar dress, we doubt if any articles of our present attire have made sufficient impression on the popular imagination to have a chance of adoption, except, perhaps, the stove-pipe hat and the Cashmere shawl. These have retained their hold on the respect and even reverence of men and women so long that we can almost imagine circumstances under which they would form indispensable portions of the outfit of a priest or priestess, and be handled with awe, and spoken of with bated breath.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Clergymen who have subscribed for Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's or Messrs. Appleton's "Bible Dictionary" will be glad to hear that Mr. W. L. Gage's Lowell lectures are to be published, by W. J. Widdleton, in book form and under the title "Biblical Geography treated according to the Historical Methods." The volume will contain from seven to twelve maps. It is to be published, perhaps, before summer, more probably in the fall. —— Messrs. Ticknor & Fields announce a new edition of Dr. Hayes's "Arctic Boat Journey," a book which has been for some years out of print, and which the success of the author's "Open Polar Sea" has revivified. The new edition will have an increased number of illustrations, but will not be otherwise different from the old one.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce "Critical and Social Essays," a volume containing articles reprinted from the columns of this journal. "Tennysoniana," which the same firm announced for republication, they have decided not to issue; but in its place they will publish a work of the same nature, which will be prepared for them by a competent scholar. "Tennysoniana" is chiefly bibliographical, and contains but very little to interest any one but a person either a mere bibliomaniac or a mere devotee of Tennyson. The author seems to have been a rather diligent person, without critical ability, who has thrown together for his friends a few desultory notes with regard to editions of Tennyson. —— Messrs. Myers & Chandler, of Chicago, will publish in the fall a new book by G. S. Phillips ("January Searle"), who wrote out the experiences of Allan Pinkerton, the famous detective. "Chicago, her Ministers and Churches," is the title of the forthcoming volume, and the nature of it is "the ecclesiastical history of Chicago in pen-and-ink portraits." Other books announced by the same house are "Deus Homo," by Prof. Theophilus Parsons, and a translation of a "Life of Jesus," from the German of the late Dr. F. Immanuel Tafel.——John Meredith Read, Jr., will soon publish a new and enlarged edition, illustrated by Bierstadt, of his excellent "Historical Enquiry concerning Henry Hudson," which he published about a year ago (vide Nation of June 12, 1866).—— Messrs. Roberts Brothers announce for immediate publication a small paper-covered volume, the contents of which first appeared in Macmillan's Magazine anonymously, but the author, the publishers say, "is known to be the same to whom popular opinion ascribes the authorship of 'Ecce Homo.'" "Elementary Principles in Art" is the title of the book. The same house also have in preparation a book which will be even more successful than their "Memoirs of Madame Récamier," now in its fifth edition, for it will have higher claims upon that more thoughtful and cultivated class of general readers for whose tastes Messrs. Roberts Brothers cater. It relates to the life and character of perhaps the most admirable of the women who have influenced the best Frenchmen of the two last generations. It is "The Memoirs and Correspondence of Madame Swetchine," translated by Miss Preston. "A Painter's Camp in the Highlands," by Philip Gilbert Hamerton, reprinted from the second London edition, and Schefer's "Layman's Breviary," translated by the Rev. C. T. Brooks, are also to be issued by Messrs. Roberts Brothers, the former on the first of June, the other later. ——J. B. Burr & Co., of Hartford, which city, by the way, has been of late articularly active in publishing books of the very popular kind which agents sell by the hundred thousand, announce "Life in the Holy Land," by Charles W. Elliot.

—Mr. Bancroft, in the ninth volume of his history, charged Major-General Philip Schuyler with the disgraceful, and not only disgraceful but transmissible, vice of cowardice. So Mr. George L. Schuyler, who, like Mr. Greene, has the misfortune or fault—we hardly know which Mr. Bancroft considers it—of being a grandson, asked Mr. Bancroft to let him know on what authorities he depended for a justification of the charge against General Schuyler. Mr. Bancroft sent a polite reply, and enclosed copies of certain letters and extracts of letters. Thereupon ensued a controversy at first amicable in tone, afterwards not so amicable; for, as all experience shows, the preservation of good temper in these controversies is an excessive rarity. Of this dispute, however, it may for a wonder be said that the issue is narrowed to a single point, and is kept narrow, and that the brief pamphlet is very readable. We have not space in the limits of this note to set Mr. Bancroft's case fully before the reader, nor to give Mr. Schuyler's refutation; for that he does refute the accusation we hold to be almost beyond dispute. We will, however, give what may be called, not unfairly, a sample of the whole. Among the documents sent Mr. Schuyler was an extract of a letter written in August, 1777, by General Richard Montgomery to General Schuyler, in which the former officer urges his commander to come immediately to the front.

> "I entreat you," he says, "to follow in a whale-boat, leaving some one to bring on the troops and artillery. It will give the men great confidence in your spirit and activity, and how necessary to a general this confidence is I need not tell you. I most earnestly wish that this may meet your approbation; and be assured that I have your honor and reputation much at heart."

Mr. Schuyler replies that the document sent him is not the whole letter, nor a continuous extract from it, and that Mr. Bancroft's clerk in transcribing it has omitted the closing words of the last sentence, which in the original reads thus:

> "Be assured I have your honor and reputation much at heart, as of the greatest consequence to the public service; that all my ambition is to do my duty in a subordinate capacity without the least ungenerous intention of lessening that merit so justly your due, and which I omit no opportunity of setting in its fullest light."

And Mr. Schuyler adds that when Montgomery hastened without orders to the Isle aux Noix, he knew, as Mr. Bancroft knows, that Schuyler was, by order of Congress, attending a conference of the Six Nations at Albany, and that Schuyler at once did join Montgomery, although at the time he was suffering under a most excruciating illness. The impression of Mr. Bancroft's inaccuracy left on the reader's mind by Mr. Schuyler's pamphlet may, it is true, be in part due to the fact that Mr. Schuyler has the last word; but that such an impression has been made on our mind by a careful reading of the pamphlet is also true. And we have not the least hesitation in saying that no one who owns Mr. Bancroft's volumes ought to be without Mr. Schuyler's "Correspondence and Remarks" (published by D. G. Francis), any more than he ought to be without the pamphlets addressed to Mr. Bancroft by Mr. Greene and Mr. Reed.

—T. H. Morrell has published the second volume of Joseph N. Ireland's "Records of the New York Stage from 1750 to 1860," a work valuable to dramatic critics, and certainly of much interest to actors and to those people—their pursuit may almost be called a profession by itself—who are known as old play-goers. The book contains an amazing amount of such information about actors and actresses as can have been got only from reams of play-bills and newspapers, and some of the sort of information which actors possess in regard to each other, and which is, perhaps, about the best specimen of gossip pure and simple that still gets into print in books. Literary gossip is apt to be not perfect gossip, for it deals with people too famous, and the new style of criticism constructs the character of the criticised author from the smallest details of his life, so that the merest trifles as to his board and lodging become not gossip but evidence for the prosecution. Court gossip goes into the newspapers, but not into books so often as it used to, and our nineteenth-century monarchs are such hard-working political economists that their laborious lives furnish less material for the gossiping letter-writer than in the days, for ever gone, when chancellors of the exchequer wore satin breeches and gorgeous doublets and believed in sumptuary laws, and kings took things easily. But theatrical gossip is the same in all generations, and this book contains a little of it. From the opening pages of Mr. Ireland's book we take the following quotation from Bradford's Gazette, October, 1733, when New York had 7,055 inhabitants:

> "Last week arrived here a company of commedians from Philadelphia, who, we hear, have taken a convenient room for their purpose in one of the buildings lately belonging to the Hon. Rip Van Dam, Esq., deceased, in Nassau Street, where they intend to perform as long as the season lasts, provided they meet with sufficient encouragement."

This first theatre of New York—a temporary one—was on the east side of Nassau Street, between John Street and Maiden Lane. Of the first edition of the book there are sixty 4to and two hundred 8vo copies, and the price of a copy is twenty-five dollars.

—"Mr. Wheelwright, one of the members of Boston, preaching at the last fast, inveighed against all that walked in a covenant of works, as he described it to be, viz., such as maintain sanctification as an evidence of justification." These words are Governor Winthrop's; the fast he mentions was held in January, 1637; and the preacher was Mr. John Wheelwright, a relative by marriage of the famous Anne Hutchinson, and allied in opinion to the party or parties which were hostile to Winthrop. This sermon belongs to the history of the Massachusetts Antinomian Controversy, and is of frequent mention in works relating to the early days of the Massachusetts Bay colonists, but though preached nearly two hundred and thirty years ago, and though the Massachusetts Historical Society have long owned a manuscript copy of it and a great part of the original manuscript, yet it has never been in print till this year. It appeared in The Historical Magazine for April, which thus has the credit of first giving to the light an historical monument of great interest. In other aspects it is perhaps not so interesting; the politics in it which, no doubt, gave it much of its importance, and which brought Wheelwright, a father of all such as are "political preachers of New England," to a trial for seditious language, it is rather hard for an ordinary reader to discover amid the concealing theology. This latter, so far as we can judge—we speak under correction—is the theology still taught in all Congregational churches.

—Among the latest announcements of Messrs. Trübner & Co., of London, is a new translation of the hymns of the "Rig-Veda," the oldest records both of Indian and of Indo-European thought and language, by Professor Max Müller. We say a "new" translation out of respect for those of Wilson and Langlois (French); but Wilson has read the hymns only through the distorting and discoloring spectacles of the Hindu commentators, and Langlois seems to have understood neither the hymns nor the commentators, and to have made his version in no small part out of his own head. Müller's work will doubtless be of a very different character, founding itself on sound principles of interpretation, and being executed with the learning and acuteness for which this scholar is distinguished. It is to include a transliteration, in Roman letters, of the original text and notes—in which last, from the specimen furnished in the publishers' circular, we fear that the translator will waste precious space in refuting the errors of Wilson. The same house furnishes evidence of the fresh awakened interest of the British in their Eastern empire by promising the appearance, within a month or two, of the first volumes of two new histories of India; the one "comprising the Mohammedan period," a posthumous work of the late Sir H. M. Elliot, the other, "during the Hindu period," by Mr. J. Talboys Wheeler. Both authors were long residents in India, in the Government service. It makes us somewhat suspicious of the grade of historical criticism which Mr. Wheeler's work will exhibit, to find that the contents of the second volume are to be the legends of the Ramayana, the whole actual historical substance of which would certainly have to be diluted to make it fill a respectable chapter. A second edition, "rewritten and greatly enlarged," of the first volume of Dr. Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," that most authentic and useful series of compendia of information respecting the religion and institutions of the ancient Hindus, also announced by Trübner, is worth a passing notice. The book has, we believe, been some time out of print.

—To prevent mistakes—of which one has already occurred, caused by our statement the other day in regard to the Early English Text Society—we would say that while the present value in paper currency of a guinea (the subscription fee) is $6 85—that or about that—the price of a guinea's worth of English books imported into this country (and to subscribe for the Early English texts is practically to import a certain number of books) is in paper nearly twice $6 85. It is, when one adds duty, exchange, and the profit on importation which the importing bookseller allows himself, something like $13, perhaps a little more, perhaps a little less. As for the "Percy Manuscript" which the Society reprint, the price of that to a non-subscriber is two guineas; to a subscriber only one guinea. If, then, a person wants that book he may as well spend one of his two guineas in making himself a subscriber and getting the texts for 1867. Having done that he gets the "Ballad Book" for the other guinea. This is, at any rate, the plan which Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt advise their subscribers to adopt, and we suppose that other American agents of the society pursue the same course.

—"Von Thunder-Ten-Tronckh on Compulsory Education" is the title which Mr. Matthew Arnold gives to some articles which he is now publishing and the first of which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette of April 20. A child of light, whom the British Philistines have brought to a garret in Grub Street, is supposed to have gone into the country with his friend the Prussian, Arminius by name, whose acquaintance we made in Mr. Arnold's "My Countrymen" which made so much noise a year or so ago, and between them befalls much conversation on the Philistine and his works and ways as they have come to fruit in British institutions, political and social. To the "vivacity" for which Mr. Arnold once half apologized he gives its head in these articles, and all Philistia will henceforth hate its tormented tormentor more cordially than ever. We quote a few characteristic sentences; perhaps even on our side of the water there may be here and there a Daily Telegraph with a style almost boisterous and with prose of the baser sort. Arminius and his friend in one of their morning walks come upon an old peasant, Zephaniah Diggs, who is being taken along to be tried for poaching. The friend makes haste to tell Arminius that perhaps, in this particular instance, British local self-government may not appear to the best advantage:

> "In the present case, however, there is," said I, "no danger, for a representative of The Daily Telegraph is down here to be on the look-out for justice and to prevent oppression. Immediately afterwards I was sorry I had said this, for there are, unfortunately, several things which operate on Arminius like scarlet on a bull, making him vicious the moment he comes across them, and The Daily Telegraph is one of these things. He declares it foments our worst faults; and he is fond of applying to it Dryden's dictum on Elkanah Settle, that its style is boisterous and its prose incorrigibly lewd. Though I do certainly think its prose a little full-bodied, yet I cannot bear to hear Arminius apply such a term to it as 'incorrigibly lewd,' and I always remonstrate with him. 'No, Arminius,' I always say; 'I hope not incorrigibly. I should be sorry to think that of a publication which is forming the imagination and taste of a million of Englishmen." "Pleasant news!" was Arminius's answer the last time I urged this to him; "pleasant news! the next batch of you, then, will be even more charming than the present!"

Throughout, the article displays great skill in the use of "the dangerous figure called irony," and is utterly merciless and unsparing. By all persons not subjects of Queen Victoria it will be read with lively pleasure.

—Lamartine has a better stomach for proverbially bitter bread than any other man who has of late disgraced the literary profession. News comes that the French Chambers have passed a bill granting him a pension, a substitute, we presume, for the proposed bill to give him outright eighty thousand dollars, a sum which his debts would have swallowed up in a day. It is reported that the Emperor would have paid all the poet's debts if the poet's delicacy had permitted, but it would not. Lamartine's delicacy is a thing infinitely capricious, but quite possibly it will permit its victim to accept an annuity, though a large sum in cash was what it seemed to crave.

—At present it is not easy to make an accurate comparison of the population of one state with that of another; for the one may include and the other may exclude from the official census the number of its merchant seamen, of its fishermen, of the seamen of its navy, of the soldiers of its army, etc. The attention of the members of the International Statistical Congress has been called to this source of error by Dr. Maestri, an Italian statistician, who has issued a programme of the subjects to be discussed when the Congress meets in Florence next September. He frames these two questions: 1st. In fixing the official population of a state, should regard be had to the actual population, or to all who of right are citizens of the state? (la population de droit). 2d. In estimating the population of right, what elements of the population are to be included and what excluded? The coming session of the Congress will be the sixth, and Prince Humbert of Savoy will act as president. As the sittings will not extend over more than eight days, it is conceivable that Dr. Maestri may fail to get an answer to the two following questions which he puts under the head of "Moral and Judicial Statistics:" 1st. In how many and what categories are we to range the poor? 2d. What statistical elements is it necessary to get in order to completely cure the body of society of these plagues?

SCIENTIFIC.

An exploring party of more than usual importance has just left the Atlantic for the Pacific coast to make a survey, under the direction of the United States Government, of a belt of land near to the fortieth parallel of north latitude, stretching from the Sierra Nevada to the Rocky Mountains. Through or near this belt will pass the Central Pacific Railroad, and the object of the expedition is to gather in advance as much information as possible respecting the structure of the country, the mineral resources, the agricultural capacity, and all the other physical characteristics of the region. The expedition is so well organized and there is so little exact knowledge in respect to the district to be examined that high anticipations are entertained of the scientific and practical results which are likely to be reached. Believing that our readers will be interested in watching the progress of this party of young and enthusiastic explorers, within the limits of our own domain, we have gathered the following particulars in respect to their organization.

The survey is ordered by Congress; it is to be conducted under the direction of the Secretary of War; and, more particularly still, under direction of the chief of the U. S. Engineers, Major-General A. A. Humphreys, to whom the party will report and from whom they have received their general instructions. This distinguished officer, whose name has long been identified with the explorations and surveys directed by the War Department of the U. S. Government, has shown the greatest interest in promoting the objects of this new expedition, and to his experience and good judgment in fitting out the party much of its success will be due.

The head of the party in the field is Clarence King, a gentleman of about five-and-twenty years of age, educated in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale College, and connected for a few years past with the State Geological Survey of California under Prof. J. D. Whitney. The experience which he has thus acquired as a mountain explorer admirably fits him for the leadership in this new expedition. He has travelled extensively among the great mountain regions of the West, has ascended and measured some of the loftiest peaks, is inured to the exposure and hardships of frontier life, and appreciates fully all the conditions which are essential to success. Nine assistants are under his direction. His friend and associate in the California survey, Mr. James T. Gardner, who has lately been engaged with Mr. King in surveying and mapping the famous Yo Semite valley and the adjacent mountain region, is the first assistant in topography, and Prof. James D. Hague, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, likewise an experienced traveller, is the first assistant in geology. There are also two other topographers, two other geologists, a zoölogist, a botanist, and a photographer. On their arrival in California a squad of twenty-three mounted Californians, under non-commissioned officers, will be detailed by the military authorities as their escort, and six drivers and packers will complete the personnel of the party—a company of thirty-nine in all.

By turning to any good map of the Western mountains the reader will see that the proposed line of exploration extends from the 120th to the 105th meridian, or from Pyramid Lake, near Virginia City, on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada, to Denver City, on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. The length of the tract to be explored is about 1,000 miles, its breadth will not exceed 100. The great desert basin of Nevada and Utah and the various parallel ridges and valleys by which it is traversed, including the lofty ridges known as the Eastern and Western Humboldt River Mountains, and the Wahsatch Mountains to the east of Great Salt Lake, will, of course, be included in their observations. The party hope to go this year, between the first of July and the first of November, as far as Fort Riley, and then to spend the winter, which is there too severe for field work, in the neighborhood of Virginia City. Next year they hope to reach Salt Lake City, and their work out of doors is to be completed in the third year. Of course much additional time will elapse before the scientific result of the expedition can be fully published; but everything of immediate practical value, especially with reference to the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad, will be, as we understand it, at once made public.

An accurate map of the region is the first desideratum, and the necessary surveys will, therefore, be prosecuted as rapidly as may be consistent with accuracy. It is exceedingly important, also, to ascertain whether coal can be found in that region of such quality and in such quantities as to be a dependence for the coming locomotive. The position of water supplies in that desert basin is another most important topic of enquiry. So, also, the possibilities of agriculture need investigation. The geological and mineralogical characteristics of the country will constantly be examined. In short, to examine and describe the geological structure, the geographical conditions, and natural resources of the country will be the aim in view.

PREACHING.*

Burnet, in a pleasing passage of the "History of his Own Times," describes the revolution in the style of preaching which was effected in his day by a class of preachers of whom Tillotson was the chief. The long-drawn, hair-splitting, pedantic sermons which had been in vogue were supplanted by a simpler, briefer, more perspicuous method of address, and the consequence was that not only was a multitude drawn into the houses of worship, but the waning prestige of the Church of England was revived in London. If there be symptoms of a decline in the influence of the pulpit now, it is worth while to enquire into the causes and the proper remedy. We count it no evil that the old-fashioned reverence for the person of the preacher which once prevailed, especially in New England, has sensibly abated. The sombre approach of the village pastor no longer causes the children of the household to skulk away and hide themselves in the barn. The people have found out that the minister is a man of like passions with themselves, and the more free and familiar style of intercourse is doubtless a gain for both parties. The vastly diversified forms of intellectual activity, the multiplying of books, magazines, and newspapers, the presence of a host of lecturers and political orators, and other agencies which will readily occur to a thoughtful reader, account for the relative diminution of the power exerted by the pulpit over the popular mind. Such are the stir and excitement of American life, that when Sunday comes many—men of business as well as men of books—shrink from a stimulating harangue of any sort, and crave the quiet and silence of home. There is no place so remote from large towns that its inhabitants are cut off from hearing lively political speaking. Fresh from the mass meeting or, perhaps, from a visit to the metropolis, where he has listened arrectis auribus to Mr. Beecher, it is no wonder that the rustic finds the country parson dull. Inevitable causes have lessened the relative importance of pulpit teaching; yet it wields still, in this country especially, a vast power over the moral and religious convictions of the people, and there flows from it, besides, a general educating influence of great moment. All that we propose in this article is to drop a few hints in regard to the best means of sustaining the pulpit's legitimate influence.

The first danger of a preacher springs from the temptation to a perfunctory discharge of his office. He ascends the pulpit at stated intervals, fixed by astronomic law. In the pulpit there is an appointed round of services for him to go through. No one looks for very tangible results from any single day's work. Not a few men—worthy men, too—on some anniversary of their "settlement," have no other record than this, that they have preached so many sermons, attended so many funerals, and bound together so many pairs in matrimony. If preaching fails of all perceptible effect on the minds and lives of those who hear it, there is the parable of the sower and the convenient dogma of divine sovereignty. It is no special reproach to ministers that they are liable to forget their dependence upon their personal exertions for success in their work, and to fall into a half-mechanical performance of their official labors. The same danger besets every profession which is subject to analogous conditions; and ministers are but men. No wonder that audiences become thin. The civil law no more, as in days of old in the New England communities, requires attendance upon public worship. The authority of church-going as a sacred and reputable custom is falling away. But the measures frequently adopted by way of reaction against perfunctory ministrations and for the purpose of alluring auditors into the church are alike reprehensible and futile. Most of the phenomena which fall under the head of sensational preaching are due to the motives just mentioned. Odd or otherwise startling themes are chosen, and announced beforehand in flaming advertisements. Eccentricities of style are deliberately assumed. Wit, such as it is, is introduced to relieve the weariness of the hearer. A convulsive, boisterous elocution is palmed off in the room of earnestness. An excessive and unnatural vehemence, which is a fault of Mr. Beecher in certain passages of his discourses, is copied by his feeble imitators. A shrewd observer remarked, the other day, that in order to make the fortune of a sermon nowadays, it is necessary for the preacher to "holler" at least once in the course of it; once is enough, but once at least he must bawl. Cases are not infrequent where a vociferous delivery is accepted in lieu of intellectual qualifications for the preacher's office; in lieu of method and of good sense. A mixture of rant and cant suffices to muster an auditory; the pews sell; considerate hearers are silent, and, one by one, withdraw to some other place of worship or stay at home with their books. Thus the most intelligent and truly respectable class are drawn away from church, and whatever benefits church-going on their part would confer on themselves and on others are lost. We believe it to be a fact that in the best educated parts of this country the auditories on Sunday are made up predominantly of women. The men, to a large extent, are not seen in their pews. What is wanted, it is plain, is a living earnestness to take the place of the spurious and counterfeited earnestness which can deceive only the ignorant. Eloquence is born of deep and stirring convictions; genuine itself, all its products are of necessity genuine. It can afford to disdain every species of clap-trap. It is a flame that communicates itself and kindles all within its reach. It goes forth with the speech of a living man, so that books are no substitute for it. When preachers are truly earnest, preaching is truly eloquent. It is then a fresh and warm and enlivening utterance.

* "Homiletics and Pastoral Theology. By William G. T. Shedd, D.D., Professor in Union Theological Seminary in New York." New York: Charles Scribner & Co. 1867.

Preaching, if it would hold intelligent men, must be itself thoughtful. How shall a man who discourses weekly on threadbare themes avoid commonplaces? A successful preacher must be en rapport with the thinking men of his time. He need not be metaphysical or polemical in his sermons. He may utter plain thoughts in plain words. But if the prevailing currents of thinking in the field of religious and philosophical speculation pass him by untouched, he will surely be out of sympathy not merely with the reflecting portion of his audience, but also, in the end, with his hearers generally. For in this day of cheap printing and rapid communication thought diffuses itself in all directions, and men of every class scent in the atmosphere whatever is new. A caste confining ideas within its charmed circle has never subsisted among the Western nations, as in the East, and still less can such a monopoly and seclusion of thought exist in this modern age. Yet the pulpit is often late in learning what are the present thoughts of men. There are many sermons which are able but obsolete. They would have answered well in the day of Hume, but are not so apposite to the time of Strauss. They are good as refutations of Hobbes, but do not touch Stuart Mill. Let there be in the preacher an underlying consciousness of the questions, difficulties, that agitate the secret thoughts of active minds at this hour, and he will not want for interested auditors, provided, of course, that his speech is reasonable and seasoned with charity. But let him not hope to win success in the use of antiquated weapons and in combat with defunct enemies.

If a minister, besides possessing special preaching ability, is a definite and systematic thinker, he is doubly armed. It is true that there have been effective pulpit orators who have not been characterized by the possession of this quality in an eminent degree. Whitefield is an example. It is the same here as in the field of political oratory. Yet it will be found that even preachers of this class have had definite truths, defined convictions, to express and inculcate. That a definitely marked system of thought and habit of accurate thinking are no hindrance to a preacher—other things being equal—but are, on the other hand, a powerful auxiliary, is sufficiently proved in numerous instances. Luther is one; South is another, who, with all his terseness and incisive vigor, was an exact theologian. To say something a man must have something to say. He must not deal in vague generalities. He must not speak out of fluctuating and inconsistent moods of opinion. He must not contradict himself from week to week. The tendency nowadays among literary men is decidedly averse not merely to dogmatism, but also to dogmatic theology and to the inculcation by a preacher of definite, pronounced doctrines in religion. We regard this tendency as excessive and unhealthy, as enervating in its influence on the pulpit, and adapted to reduce the effect of pulpit teaching to a minimum. The preacher must have not only faith, but a faith. He must have beliefs in religion which are capable of being stated, which are coherent, and which are held as something sacred and vital to the welfare of men. In this case he will speak with authority; not the authority of an arbitrary or overbearing mind, but with the authority that depends on insight and assured conviction.

We have departed somewhat from our text, which was Dr Shedd's new work on homiletics. It is written in the author's vivid and vigorous style, and contains many suggestions which may be profitably pondered by the class to whom it is addressed.

JAPANESE LYRICAL ODES.*

Doctor Emmons once being asked what he considered a proof of a great mind, replied that it was the power to look at the point of a cambric needle six minutes without winking. The Japanese artists at the Academy of Music do not practise this feat, yet the accomplishment of spinning a top on the edge of a keen cutlass entitles them to consideration. We have, therefore, been at the trouble of looking through a book entitled "Hyak Nin Is'shin," in order to ascertain if the Japanese can spin discussions as well as tops, toss the heavy weights of thought like knives and balls, and balance propositions like long poles.

The book in question is a collection of lyrical odes, translated into English with some slight parade of scholarship. The materials are ancient, though the work owes its compilation to Teika or Sadhaihe, whose preface bears the date of 1805, and the compiler inserted them in a work of his called "Records of Illustrious Mouths," but they were afterwards separated from it and placed in charge of Ten-Kei, a priest in the Temple of Naka no In, near Kisto the capital.

These odes are extremely popular with the Japanese, and are familiar in the household, every child having his memory well stored with them. Some are of a peaceful character, some didactic and descriptive, while many touch upon love. Mr. Dickins tells us that the point of the ode often lies in a play upon words, very telling in the original, but seldom capable of a good rendering into English. As regards the metre, the translator has been obliged to yield to necessity and abandon uniformity. The odes vary in length, some being of four and others six lines, which fact, perhaps, does not indicate the ability to look long at the point of the needle.

The writers touch upon the four seasons, which in Japan are very distinctly marked, so there is no difficulty in finding something about spring. We select an ode by one Toki-Yasz', who flourished in the year 834. It is addressed to his lady love. It seems that he had been into the woods to get not early flowers, but "wakana," an "east-wind vegetable" which the fair one coveted. As a proof of his zeal he shows the late snow upon his clothes and says:

"Thy wishes, love, have I obeyed,
And 'mid the meadows have I strayed
In this spring-time, and sought with care
The Wakana plant that groweth there.
Lo! on my sleeve
The falling snow its trace doth leave."

The following refers to a little blossom which withers about the end of spring:

"'Tis a pleasant day of merry spring,
No bitter frosts are threatening,
No storm-winds blow, no rain-clouds low'r,
The sun shines bright on high,
Yet thou, poor trembling little flow'r,
Dost wither away and die."

Here is an ode to the Shiragiku, a kind of white chrysanthemum resembling the hoar-frost:

"I had to pluck thee, flower,—thought—
To pluck thee, flower, in vain I sought;
The earliest hoar-frost feigning thee,
Fair Shiragiku, cheated me."

Autumn is, however, the most prominent season. The Japanese poet is never weary of praising this portion of the year. He loves to dwell upon the fall of the leaf, the reddening of the waters of the stream, and the varied tints of the woods. The following was composed about the year 880 by the son of a princess on seeing a representation of the river Tatsta on a screen:

"O Tatsta! when th' autumnal flow
I watch of thy deep, ruddy wave—
E'en when the stern gods long ago
Did rule, was ne'er beheld so brave,
So fair a stream as thine, I vow."

Another piece on autumn we must give for the sake of its author, Tenji, who died in the year 661 and "became a god":

"My lowly hut is thatched with straw
From fields where rice-sheaves frequent stand,
Now autumn's harvest 's well-nigh o'er,
Collected by my toiling hand;
Through tattered roof the sky I view,
My clothes are wet with falling dew."

* "Hyak Nin Is'shin; or, Stanzas by a Century of Poets; being Japanese Lyrical Odes translated into English, with explanatory notes, the text in Japanese and Roman characters, and a full index. By F. V. Dickins, M.B." London: Smith, Elder & Co. 1867. 8vo.

The following, on the tender passion, bespeaks an ardent lover:

"With deeper melancholy sways
  The moon-lit night my love-sick soul;
See how my face my woe betrays,
  How down my cheek the hot tears roll."

This other, composed by a priest in 1241, is not less ardent:

"On Matsuho's shore, our meeting place,
  At dusky hour of night, I wait
My longed-for mistress to embrace;
  Ah, why then linger'st thou so late?
My ardent passion, than the fire
That heats the salt-pans, rages higher."

The author of the following, written in quite a different vein, flourished in the year 1004. He says:

"By th' dim grey light of early dawn
  I strayed by Uji's wave,
From whence the rifting mist upborne
  Me scattered glimpses gave
Of Zeze's stakes there set
Whereon the fisher spreads his net."

In order that the reader may judge of the translator's versification we give the literal version, which recalls glimpses of what we have seen on a foggy morning along the banks of the Hudson:

"'Tis dawn. Here and there, in the rifts of the mist that hangs over the river Uji, come into my sight the net-stakes of Zeze."

Another author enshrined in this volume is not less successful in his photography, and his verse has besides a tone which runs through all the poetry of the Western nations, also, as fast as each arrives at the civilization of cities and courts:

"Oh! that throughout an endless life
I might in peace dwell, far from strife!
For ever watch the fishing yawl,
And view the net's abundant haul:
    How fair to me,
How pleasant such a lot would be."

The translator takes no credit for his versification, and he is probably wise. At least, no one will award him much praise after comparing the rhymed with the literal rendering, which he has given in a variety of instances for the benefit of those to whom, as in our own case, the Japanese is an unknown tongue. In the rhymed version the poet's ideas appear to have got pumped on.

But we must conclude, and conclude with two more extracts. The following is by a high official of state, who flourished nearly nine hundred years ago, but who found himself left at last with no companions but the trees:

"Of old companions bereft,
  Men's friendship more I may not seek,
Nought but the ancient pine-trees left
  That grow on Takasago's peak;
Comrades of many a year now gone,
But not the friends for whom I mourn."

The author of the following, being proposed as chief priest, thus puts his Nolo Episcopari:

"An ignorant man am I, unfit
  O'er all the multitude of men
In dignity supreme to sit:
  The simple priest's black robe again
I would, a humble dweller on Wagatasoma, gladly don."

On the whole, these poems, which we offer rather to gratify the curiosity of our readers than with the imperfect materials at our disposal to criticise them, give one quite a favorable impression of Japanese taste in poetry. In the early poetry of any of the Western nations we should have naturally expected the simplicity and directness that these show; but in early poetry of the East it has the effect of an agreeable surprise. And the feeling for natural objects and the sentimental use of the aspects of nature are unexpectedly evident in the poetry of these Oriental barbarians. Yet it would seem that the curse of stationariness has been upon the Japanese poetry as on all else in that empire. These poems of a remote antiquity are the household songs of to-day—not admired masterpieces of the national literature, as some of our ancient works, are among us—but for ever, and to the exclusion of all other productions of the Japanese muse, in the mouths of the people.

NOTES ON THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER.

NO. XV.

Bedridden. A more probable etymology for this word is bed and the old Germanic verb rise, risen, to fall, and hence to lie. (See American edition of Wedgwood under Bedridden, and note thereon.)

Berg. This word, in its second meaning, "a large mass or mountain of ice," has no near, perhaps even no remote, etymological connection with berg, a borough. It is simply the common Gothic word for mountain, in a restricted application, and should have been distinguished from berg in other senses.

Bevy. As sight was frequently used in Old English, as in modern New-English, for a great number or quantity, it seems probable that bevy is from Fr. belle vue, a fine sight.

Bighorn. The Rocky Mountain wild sheep, so called from the great size of its horns. I have noticed in a former number the omission of this word from the alphabet

Bird's-eye maple. This peculiar grain is not confined to the "sugar maple," but occurs not less frequently in the wood of the red or soft maple.

Bloom, v. t., defined "to put forth as blossoms." The authority cited in support of this definition is a passage from Hooker, Book V., § 3: "Heapes of rites and customes now superstitious in the greatest part of the world which, in their first originall beginnings, when the strength of vertuous deuout, or charitable affection bloomed them, no man could iustly haue condemned as euill." In Hackluyt, III., 48, mention is made of "blooming and smoothering heates"; Dampier, ed. of 1703, Vol. I., 529, has: "unless it be when a bloom, as we call it, or hot blast"; so Halliwell, Dict. of Arch. and Prov. Words, gives as the second meaning of bloom, "to shine, to throw out heat," and adds that bloomy means "very hot," and that the "hot stages of a fever are called blooms." Upon these authorities, I think that in the passage cited from Hooker, bloomed means, inspired with genial warmth, animated with glowing devotion, or the like, and hence the definition in Webster is erroneous.

Blote, defined "to dry and smoke; as to blote herring." The editors erroneously suppose bloat herring or bloaters to be the same as red herring, and derive bloat from the Dutch "blozen, to blush, to get red." According to Nall's very curious and learned "Great Yarmouth and Lowestoft," pp. 302–4, bloated herrings or bloaters are not red herrings, but are fish only partially cured and prepared for eating fresh or nearly so, while red herring very thoroughly smoked and dried, so as to keep for years. Wedgwood's etymology, from a Scandinavian root signifying soft, soaked, swollen, is therefore probably the true one. (See his dictionary under Bloat.)

Bocardo. This word belongs to the same class as baroko, explained above.

Bosh. We have borrowed few words from the Turkish, but the bosh of that language, empty, vain, nonsensical, so closely corresponds in meaning with the English noun bosh, that it seems possible that the latter may have been imported from the Levant.

Bottom. Seventh meaning, "a ball or skein of thread." In this sense bottom is etymologically distinct from the more familiar word of the same form. It is in origin identical with Chaucer's bothum, a bud, French bouton, and with bottom of an artichoke, which is the bud of that plant. The application of this word to a ball of thread or yarn is, of course, from similarity of form. Bottom of an artichoke is not given in Webster, though used wher ever the artichoke (not the common Jerusalem artichoke) is known among people speaking English. Shakespeare, "Hamlet," I., 3, uses button for bud: "before their buttons be disclosed;" and the word, evidently the same with bottom, a bud, is not yet obsolete in this sense.

Bound, destined to or for, in speaking of a ship. It was long ago suggested that this word is simply the Scottish boune, O. N. buinn. I see no reason to doubt the soundness of this etymology. (See Wedgwood, s. v.)

Bracer, in the language of archery, signifies, not technical "armor for the arm," but a guard worn to protect the forearm from the friction of the bowstring when the arrow is discharged.

Brake, fifth sense, "a contrivance for confining refractory horses," and, tenth sense, "an ancient instrument of torture." This is a different application of the same word, which is doubtless identical with barnacle, discussed above, and Brank, second meaning, "a scolding-bridle," is probably still another derivative from the same root. It is even possible that brake, in locomotive machinery, is cognate; for brakes or breaks, to check the speed of railway and of ordinary carriages, act by pressure, and consequently friction.

Brat, child. The earliest example of this word yet cited is of the year 1580. Is it not an importation from Russia, where it is the common word for child?

Brickbat. In the passage cited from Hackluyt, brickbat cannot have the signification assigned to it by Webster, "a piece or fragment of a brick." Hackluyt describes the ingots of silver he is speaking of as of "the fashion and bigness of a brickbat." The "bigness" or size of "a piece of a brick" is as indefinite as that of "a piece of chalk." Hackluyt meant simply a brick.

Bridal, noun, and

Bridale. I see no sufficient ground for distinguishing these forms etymologically, and the latter is probably the original word.

Buck, lye. The reference of this word to a Gothic root signifying beech, because lye was often made of beechwood ashes, is without linguistic probability, and contrary to historical evidence, the word being older by centuries in the Romance than in the Gothic languages. Buck is probably cognate with German weich, weichen, soft, to soften by soaking; as to which see American edition of Wedgwood, under Buck, and the accompanying note. If either this etymology or that proposed in Webster is correct, then buck in the third sense, "in mining, to break up or pulverize, as ores," is a totally different word, and, in this sense, it is doubtless from the German pochen, or from the same root as pochen.

Buckram originally signified a very fine, delicate, white fabric, and, therefore, is not probably allied to barracan. (See on this word Wedgwood, Vol. I., American edition, and the note citing authorities as to its primitive meaning.)

Bulk. (See Wedgwood, American edition, and note on this word.)

Bullen-nail, a nail with a round head. The editors derive this word from bull, in the sense of large. This is a mistake. In Italian, nails with rounded heads are called bollette, from bolla, Lat. bulla, a bubble, a stud, a boss, or hemispherical projection, and in Spanish, a nail with a semi-globular head is called bollon. This last form is, doubtless, the immediate source of the English word under consideration.

Bullion. The curious history of this word is well traced by Wedgwood, though the examples cited from Spanish documents in the notes in the American edition throw some doubt on the etymology.

Buoy. I have investigated at considerable length the history of this obscure word and its derivatives, as far as it is known, in the notes to the American edition of Wedgwood. It first appears in Spanish and Portuguese, though, according to the "Vocabulary of Words beginning with the Letter B," printed by the London Philological Society, an example has been found in English of as early a date as 1466. The familiar use of this word in Spanish and Portuguese in various derivative forms and in figurative senses at a period when it was scarcely known at all, and then only in its literal meaning, elsewhere, tends to show that it is of Hispanic origin, or at least was first introduced into the Peninsula. Its early acceptations point to the notion of flotation, not confinement, as its radical sense. The derivation from a word signifying a fetter or chain is a pure conjecture, having no better foundation than similarity of form, and no historical evidence has been adduced in support of it.

Burg, a fortified town, said to be the Anglo-Saxon form of borough. The occurrence of a word evidently the same, in the form borj or burj, in Maltese, Arabic, Turkish, and Persian, with the signification of castle, tower, fortress, bastion, suggests a query whether we must not look farther than to Anglo-Saxon for the origin of the word in this sense.

Burgoo. The name of this sea-pudding is traced by the editors of Webster to an English word meaning yeast or to a Celtic root. This is a mistake. The word was brought from the Barbary coast, and is the Arabic burghūl, bruised wheat or other grain, also, a pudding or thick gruel made of such grain. It was probably introduced by Englishmen who had been prisoners in the Barbary States, for it occurs as a Moorish word in many of the old narratives of Algerine captivity. (See, for example, Pitts, chap. iii.)

Bush, fifth sense, a box-shaped lining for the bearings of machinery, the vents of fire-arms, and the like, called also sometimes box. This is a different word from bush in its ordinary meaning, and is derived from the Ger. Büchse.

Busk. This verb, at least in the second sense, to make ready, is undoubtedly the O. N. at buast or buasc, which means the same thing. (See Wedgwood, s. v.)

Byzant or byzantine, often written bisant or besant, a name given in Western Europe to coins struck at Byzantium or Constantinople. This word, as the designation of a coin, was unknown to Byzantine Greek, and it was applied to coins of very different values at different periods, according as this or that coin happened to be the current monetary unit at the time and place of circulation. The byzant of "fifteen pounds" appears to have been an English coin struck on particular occasions, and the word in general signifies a piece of money of far inferior value.

The Bankrupt Law of the United States, 1867. With Notes, and a collection of American and English Decisions. By Edwin James. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1867.)—The passage of the Bankrupt act has opened a new field of practice for lawyers all over the Union, in which not one in fifty of them has had any experience. The amount of business to be done under the law will probably be large at all times, but especially so during the first few months. The early appearance of this volume will therefore make it very welcome to the bar, which is anxiously seeking for light upon its new duties. The plan of the work is to give the law as it stands, adding to each section notes with appropriate headings, in which the contents of the section are restated in a more concise form and decisions cited where they cast light upon the subject. The previous bankrupt laws of the United States having had a very brief existence, a great majority of the cases cited are necessarily English; but there is no doubt that those decisions will be conclusive with our own courts in similar cases. The book is written in a style having the merit of comprehensibility, though not of elegance. The typography is highly creditable to the publishers, but the author has evidently not done his full duty in revising the proofs. As the first work upon the subject, this volume will doubtless meet with a good demand, and will be useful to the legal profession; but it ought not to hold and it will not hold the position of the standard treatise on bankruptcy. That place must be reserved for a work in which the law is arranged in scientific order, and the statutory provisions blended with the decisions of the courts.

We observe on the title-page of the volume a statement that Mr. James was one of the framers of the last English Bankruptcy act. That act was framed under the direction of the Lord Chancellor by two legal gentlemen, of whom Mr. James was not one. Mr. James Brooks was a member of our State Assembly when the Code of Procedure was passed, and, without having the slightest idea, as we suppose, of what was in it, was instrumental in pushing it through. He has not, however, claimed any share in its authorship. Mr. James had some idea of what was in the Bankruptcy act, and was in Parliament when it passed; but to say that he was one of the framers of the act is to misuse language.

Shakings. Etchings from the Naval Academy. By Park Benjamin, Class of '67. Engraved by John Andrew. (Lee & Shepard, Boston.)—It is difficult to judge of the original merit of these sketches, inasmuch as they have almost been appropriated by the draughtsman who put them on the block. Of him it is not too harsh to say that he vulgarizes whatever he touches, as any one may see from the opening plate and passim. The "situations," we may suppose, are Mr. Benjamin's own, and these are humorous enough. So are the mottoes taken from the poets and misapplied; and in their initial letters we probably get nearest to the spirit and ability of the young artist. We hope that when he next publishes he will either himself prepare his designs for the engraver, or will employ a draughtsman who can "follow copy." Mr. Andrew has done what he could—which is much—but there is a limit to the improvement which an engraver is authorized or disposed to make on the drawing under his hand.

Sybil's Second Love. By Julia Kavanagh. (D. Appleton & Co., N. Y.)—The scene is a little French sea side watering-place, with nodding old château and whirling, bustling factory; society half native, half English. The persons of the story are both French and English, and true to their blood. The plot has fair variety and surprises, is skilfully foreshadowed, is generally well proportioned to the several characters. These last present abundant contrast. Sybil, pure, truthful, enthusiastic, ideal, gives her first love to an accomplished, fairly honorable but fickle count, who soon loses his heart to another; when Sybil receives the attentions and becomes the wife of a man whom she had always admired, to whom she owed much of her acquirements and some of her character, and whom she was thus prepared to love. She meets with indifference and deceit in her bosom friend, is threatened with family dishonor, but passes sweetly and triumphantly through all. The dialogues are sometimes strained in expression, though generally natural, and are sometimes trivial. The descriptions are often excellent, presenting analysis as well as sentiment. The style is clear, simple, direct. The novel holds a first position in the second class of fiction.

Joan of Arc. A Biography. Translated from the French by Sarah M. Grimké. (Adams & Co., Boston.)—Most that is known or thought to be known about the Maid of Orleans—"La Pucelle," as the French call her for short—will be found in this unpretentious little volume. It is a very well Englished paraphrase mainly of Lamartine's history of the same personage, and its chief fault, apart from its lack of essential dates, is the exalted view which the translator takes of Joan. "Next to Jesus," to use Miss Grimké's own words, "she seems to have been the grandest medium of divine communication." We shall certainly not deny her claim to be ranked among spiritual phenomena the most remarkable; but it may be doubted if her commission to crown "a weak and unprincipled monarch," whatever part it played in shaping the destinies of Europe, was divine in any other sense than were the Crusades or the career of Bonaparte. The pleasing portrait which faces the title-page is said to be a photograph from a painting in the Louvre.

Teetotalism as a Rule of Duty Unknown to the Bible. By D. R. Thomason. (New York: Richardson & Co. 1867. Pp. 136.)—The temperance party has had such undisputed sway in the Protestant churches of America for many years past that this vigorous attack upon its doctrines by a clergyman, endorsed by one so eminent as Dr. Howard Crosby, will create a new sensation. Mr. Thomason argues his case mainly upon Scriptural grounds, and has little difficulty in proving that the wine mentioned in the Bible, including that miraculously made by the Saviour at Cana, was an intoxicating liquor. This is an easy victory, for, although many good men have tried to persuade themselves to the contrary, we doubt whether a hundred persons have ever been thoroughly convinced that the wine drunk by the Jews was not intoxicating. But if that was so, it follows that no one who recognizes the example of the Saviour as a perfect one can assert that the use of wine is necessarily sinful, and that total abstinence is not a universal duty. Having gained this advantage, Mr. Thomason opposes the whole theory of teetotalism as in substance the same with the Roman Catholic doctrine of works of supererogation and all the various errors of asceticism and uncalled-for self-denial. This branch of his case he does not treat so satisfactorily; nevertheless, his remarks are very suggestive of thought, and may well induce many advocates of total abstinence to reconsider their views. The book itself is an indication of a reaction in public sentiment on this subject which deserves special notice. It is marred by a needless degree of asperity in tone, but the author's spirit is kindly and his purpose good. We commend it to all who desire to form an intelligent opinion on the questions involved in the discussion as well worthy of perusal.

RECONSTRUCTION OUT OF COURT.

THE Supreme Court has dismissed the bill of complaint brought in the name of the State of Georgia to prevent the Reconstruction act from being carried out. The grounds of the decision are not yet made public any further than that the court deemed the cases to be out of its jurisdiction. The Attorney-General did not raise the objection, as he might have done, Congress having so decided by the preamble to the statute, that the plaintiff had no legal existence; and we may assume that this important question has not been passed upon by the court. The main argument of Mr. Stanbery was directed to prove that the controversy was not over the possession of property, but over the control of political power; and that with such a controversy a court of equity had nothing to do. This argument will, we believe, be found to have decided the judgment of the court. If so, the whole scheme of resistance to the act of Congress must fail; for there is no possible method by which judicial intervention can be obtained in time to save the de facto governments of the Southern States. The work of reorganization must go on; and when it is completed, the decision of Congress will make valid whatever may have been irregular, leaving no choice for the courts but to recognize the governments which Congress has approved.

Undoubtedly it is no light matter that the highest court in the land should thus disclaim the power of enquiring into the constitutionality of an act of Congress destroying the government of ten States. For it must be observed that every word of Mr. Stanbery's argument would be just as applicable if Massachusetts, instead of Georgia, were the complainant, and if Congress had undertaken to overthrow a State government which it at the same time admitted to be perfectly legitimate. No State in the Union, therefore, can rely upon the Supreme Court for protection against the usurpations of Congress. This is a grave fact, which deserves serious consideration.

And yet, notwithstanding all the perils of such a decision, it is clear that it is justified by reason and experience. There is a point in all controversies beyond which no court can safely go. Political economy has demonstrated that human legislation has its sphere, in attempting to transcend which, no matter how worthy the motive may be, it only works the more injury as it strives to attain an ideal good. And so the sphere of judicial action is limited by natural laws, and the judge who goes beyond his proper jurisdiction for the sake of doing perfect justice, really injures the cause which he aims to serve. He may be able to do justice in the particular case in hand, but he cannot help creating a precedent full of evil.

Purely political controversies are, of all things, the least amenable to the jurisdiction of a court. The origin and existence of a state, the existence and justice of a war, or the validity of a revolutionary change in the form of government, are all of them questions which no nation ever allowed its courts to determine. The highest court of republican France met in December, 1851, and regularly deposed Louis Napoleon, declaring all his acts to be void; but this decision, although unexceptionable in theory, has never been followed by any other court in the world. The Supreme Court of New York believed the Convention of 1846 to be unconstitutionally convened; but if it had attempted to enforce its views, it would have made itself ridiculous. The Supreme Court of Missouri recently tried the experiment, and was simply crushed out of existence. Even where the courts have achieved a temporary success in such a course of action, their degradation has been eventually brought about by it. Thus, the Superior Court of New York City, some years ago, interposed for the protection of the city against the plundering schemes of the Common Council; but the plunder has gone on in different forms, while the court has been changed from the ablest to the weakest tribunal in the State. Politicians found that the court might prejudice their interests if left to the control of able and honest men, and they speedily found an excuse for turning such men out.

All devices for protection against the will of a decided majority of the governing class are certain to fail; and nothing is more unwise than to thrust a few judges across the path which such a majority have resolved to pursue. As the Attorney-General pointed out in his argument, two-thirds of Congress, united in the pursuit of any object, can crush everything which stands in their way. As a practical question, it is useless to oppose them; and, as a question of principle, it is more in accordance with the republican idea to trust a large body, fresh from the people, with the decision of political questions, and even with the legal interpretation of a political instrument, than a small body of men not governed by the views nor familiar with the wishes of the people. Congress, as well as the Supreme Court, is sworn to obey the Constitution; why should the one be trusted to keep its oath rather than the other?

The immediate results of the decision just rendered by the court are unqualifiedly beneficial. Even if the suit had been merely entertained, without a decision upon the merits, the effect upon the South must have been very injurious, while it is difficult to estimate the mischief that might have been wrought by the entire success of the complainant. It could not have saved the State from the ultimate control of Congress, and it would have introduced new elements of evil into the conflict. We think that every intelligent Southerner—certainly every shrewd lawyer or politician—feels relieved by the decision. Certainly it is a cause for gratulation among all friends of regulated liberty.

The speedy reorganization of the South under the Reconstruction act is now made all but certain; and this done, it is the duty of all friends of peace, prosperity, and reform to press for the adoption of a constitutional amendment prohibiting disfranchisement or other political distinctions on account of color. We need this at once to settle the negro question for ever, or, in other words, to ensure justice and tranquillity, and to enable us to give a reasonable amount of attention to the removal of other abuses. Time spent in trying to get Congress to force negro suffrage on the States by act, we regard, even if it can be shown that Congress has the power, to be time wasted.

LAND FOR THE LANDLESS.

MR. SUMNER gave expression in the Senate, two months ago or more, to the opinion that the grant of "a piece of land" to each colored head of a family "was necessary to conclude the glorious work of emancipation." In answer to enquiries as to where "the piece of land" was to come from, he said it might come from land sold for taxes, and might have come out of the property of applicants for pardon as a condition of the pardon. The exact size of "the piece of land" was not settled by Mr. Sumner. This important detail, as well as we can make out, was left to Mr. Phillips, who has decided that the superficial area of the farm which each negro head of a family ought to have, in order to complete the work of emancipation, is forty acres. Mr. Phillips, as might be expected, is not troubled with Mr. Sumner's doubts about where the land ought to be got. He has determined offhand, and with a confidence which makes the difficulty that has been found in governing the world perfectly incomprehensible, that the required number of forty-acre farms ought to be secured by wholesale confiscation of rebel property. But even Mr. Phillips does not seem to have given the subject all the attention it merits; for there was not a word said about it at the last meeting of the Anti-Slavery Association until, towards the close, Colonel Higginson delivered himself of his views upon it, which seems to have wakened Mr. Phillips up to a sense of his neglect, for he drew a confiscation resolution on the spot, and it was passed, of course, without a moment's delay. Whether Mr. Sumner originated the idea or not, it is certain that it has made considerable progress, and, as might be expected, finds great favor amongst the Southern Radicals, and is now a topic at loyalist meetings. At the Hunnicutt convention, a few weeks ago, it was received with enthusiasm; and if the great body of the freedmen throughout the South are not greatly taken by it when it is urged upon their attention, it will show that they surpass in wisdom and self-restraint and honesty any landless class that has ever yet appeared in history. The Southern whites already begin to be considerably alarmed by it, especially in the States in which the blacks are in the majority, and Governor Perry uses it freely, and we may be sure others will do the same, to dissuade the white population from voting for a convention under the Reconstruction act. The amount of mischief which the agitation of the scheme may do, either in postponing reconstruction or preventing the great body of the late rebels from taking part in it, is, we think, incalculable. The argument of the advocates of the confiscation scheme is substantially this: Land is necessary to complete the glorious work of emancipation—forty acres, or thereabouts, for each head of a family; in most States the whites take every pains to prevent negroes acquiring land, and will not sell it even to those who are able to purchase it; the Government does not own any land in the rebel States, or not enough; it is, therefore, right and expedient to seize the land of persons who have taken part in the rebellion or aided it—that is, of the entire landholding class—and divide it amongst the poor, both black and white.

Now, we totally deny the assumption that the distribution of other people's land to the negroes is necessary to complete the work of emancipation. We admit that farmers make the best citizens of a republic, and that the possession of land does exercise a conservative and elevating influence on character, but so does the possession of railroad stock or Government bonds or good clothes. But there is no mysterious virtue in land which makes the manner in which it is acquired of no consequence; like everything else, whether it will prove a blessing or a curse to the holder depends on how he gets it. If he has inherited it from an honest father, as most of our farmers have, or has bought it with the proceeds of honest industry, it is pretty sure to prove a blessing. If he has got it by gambling, swindling, or plunder, it will prove a curse. In this respect it differs in no degree from gold or any other kind of property. A large fortune amassed by hard work and upright dealing ought to, and in most cases does, improve the character of its owner, and cannot be regarded, on the whole, as anything but a benefit for him and all connected with him. A large fortune acquired by cheating, gambling, or robbery is almost sure, if not squandered in riotous living, to kill the soul of him who makes it—to render all labor irksome to him, all gains slowly acquired seem not worth having, and patience and scrupulousness seem marks of imbecility. This is in fact one of the oldest and most familiar truths in the world—a truth which every generation in every country sees illustrated every day. Farms taken from the rightful owners by the strong hand of power as a piece of political vengeance wreaked without the intervention of courts of justice, in defiance of the forms of law and to the ruin of the innocent and helpless, have never, we are glad to say, brought anything to the takers but political and moral blight and damnation. No community built up in this way ever enjoyed its booty, or ever held it without being depraved by it. This mode of political propagandism has been tried by the English in Ireland, by the Turks in Turkey, by the Spaniards in America, and it has in every case debauched those who tried it. At the South the white has for two hundred years robbed the black, and he is atoning for it to-day in sackcloth and ashes; if we now set the black to rob the white, we may be sure that like retribution will speedily follow. The negro is just entering on free life, and if he is fit to vote, as we believe he is if evil-minded demagogues will let him alone, he is also fit to win a farm for himself as a poor white man has to win it. If it be deemed desirable that he should have land without waiting to earn it, it ought to be given him out of Government lands, and it would be better for the nation to spend five hundred millions in settling him on them rather than allow or encourage him to use his ballot for the purpose of helping himself to his neighbor's goods.

Nor does the proposal to allow the poor whites to share with him in the fruits of confiscation deprive the scheme of one particle of its repulsiveness. Equality is a good thing, but there are certain transactions which it cannot redeem. A division of rich men's land amongst the landless, as the result of a triumph at the polls, would give a shock to our whole social and political system from which it would hardly recover without the loss of liberty. Every election would thenceforward threaten property, and men of property, we may be sure, would find, as they have found under similar circumstances in all countries, the means of protecting themselves—but not through constitutional government.

What the negroes want is education. Let us vote millions for schools, tens of millions for books and papers, but not one cent for gifts or largesses. No man in America has any right to anything which he has not honestly earned, or which the lawful owner has not thought proper to give him. We do not want to see reproduced, in the middle of the nineteenth century and in a Christian republic, the depraved and worthless mob who, in the declining days of Rome, purchased with their votes the privilege of living in idleness on the spoil of the public enemy. We are thus earnest in calling attention to this matter because there are a hundred indications that the talk of confiscation is already unsettling the minds of the negroes, turning their steps away from the paths of peaceful industry, and teaching them to look for comfort and independence in the wilds of political intrigue. If the ballot and education are not sufficient to secure their elevation, other means must be tried; but the Northern public cannot one minute too soon silence or rebuke those who seek to place organized plunder amongst these means. A negro farmer, squatted on his forty acres of confiscated land, with the former owner, or the children of the former owner, living around him, hatred in their hearts and curses on their lips, would be one of the most pitiable objects in creation. He would never lie down at night with the certainty of seeing the morning sun; never leave his home with the certainty of re-entering it. There are already plenty of barbarizing influences at work in Southern society, influences which it will for years take the whole force of Northern civilization to combat. A forcible redivision of lands would create another and a more powerful one than any, and one which the growth of knowledge would do nothing to weaken, for hatred of the spoiler is, perhaps, the only one of the passions which civilization, instead of checking, stimulates. The freedmen and loyalists are about in all the States to take part in framing constitutions, and if they do not regulate the landlords and laws of landlord and tenant in such a way as to facilitate the acquisition and retention of homes by poor men, they will prove more foolish or shortsighted than we take them to be.

THE CABLE NEWSMONGER.

The gentleman who bamboozles the American public with European "news," through the Atlantic Cable and the morning papers of this city, has during the last fortnight had his resources as an inventor and deluder very severely tasked. Up to the moment when it was positively announced that the basis of a treaty had been arranged preparatory to the meeting of the Conference in London, he had had things completely his own way. He had armed Prussia, armed France, sent tons on tons of ammunition to the Rhine, and had caused "political circles" and "financial circles" to shake with anxiety. But the positive announcement that the terms of a treaty were settled would have been to an ordinary man a heavy blow. He, however, was nothing daunted, and went to work again with an energy which suggests the inference that he must be an American, and a Californian of the early gold period to boot. The King of Prussia made no mention of the Luxembourg affair in his address at the opening of the Chambers, whereupon our newsmonger flashed the news over the wires, with a comment of his own, which was intended to prepare us for the worst—as much as to say, "This talk of the Conference is all very fine; but wait a little." As the news about the Conference still continued to look peaceful, however, we got over the shock of the King's silence, and were waiting hopefully, when, on Tuesday week, our newsman fished up his courage, and informed us that "it was reported the leading powers hesitated to carry out the proposition for guaranteeing the neutrality of the Grand Duchy, and that its people wanted to be annexed to Belgium." Now, we have no doubt that this was "reported;" but we have no hesitation in asserting that he "reported" it himself after having first invented it. The Conference had not met, but it was on the point of meeting when he telegraphed the tale; the members had their powers and instructions in their pockets, and the "leading powers" had no longer any hesitation about the matter, and if they had, the news-agent had no earthly means of finding it out. The "report" that the people of the duchy wanted to be annexed to Belgium was about as valuable a piece of news as a report that the people of Connecticut prefer nutmeg-melons to watermelons. Perhaps they do; but whether they do or do not, no telegrapher can tell any better than anybody else.

He was not satisfied with reporting that the "leading powers hesitated to guarantee the neutrality of the Duchy." He sent this valuable information on the morning of Tuesday, the 7th inst. During the day he appears to have begun to feel that we should not be sufficiently alarmed by it. So, at two o'clock in the afternoon, he made up his mind to give us another dose, and accordingly telegraphed:

> "Notwithstanding the preliminaries looking to the preservation of peace, France and Prussia are both rapidly arming. This course is producing distrust and alarm in financial circles here and elsewhere."

Now, it is quite true that both France and Prussia are "rapidly arming." They have been doing so for some months past. France is putting the Chassepôt rifle in the hands of all her troops, and is largely increasing her total force—a process which is the consequence not of the Luxembourg affair, but of the campaign of 1866. Prussia, too, is introducing her military organization into all the recently annexed states, and is arming the new troops with the needle-gun, and is making a variety of reforms suggested by the experience of the last war. So that this information had about as much significance in itself as an announcement that "movements of troops" were going on in Russia, or that the Dutch were firmly resolved not to abandon Holland. The assertion by which it is followed is, however, a gem of imposition. When a man says that a certain thing "is producing distrust and alarm in financial circles here and elsewhere" he cannot possibly be convicted of lying, because you can never show that nobody in "financial circles" has felt distrust or alarm. In the first place, you do not know where the particular "financial circles" he refers to are to be found. You may be able to prove that there is no alarm felt in Rothschild's "circle;" but there are thousands of "financial circles" besides this one, and if the newsmonger could induce three Hebrew "note-shavers" in London to say that they were frightened out of their wits by the military preparations in France and Prussia it would not be difficult to vindicate him from the charge of positive falsehood. Then, also, "elsewhere" is a region of enormous possibilities. It contains, for certain, thousands of "financial circles," and it would be as unsafe to assert that none of them was alarmed by Bismark's and Louis Napoleon's performances as to assert that there were no red-haired colonels in the French army because you had never happened to see one. But, nevertheless, as a piece of political news intended to throw light on an important question, the Cable despatch was absolutely worthless, for it was one of those announcements in which the authority on which it is made is everything. It would have great importance coming from Rothschild; coming from our friend, the news-agent on the other side, it was simply an impudent attempt to practise on our credulity.

On Thursday last he had become sufficiently emboldened by the impunity which had attended his earlier efforts to inform us that "the demands of the Prussian Cabinet were assuming a menacing tone." We have no hesitation in pronouncing this a deliberate invention of his own, and have very little doubt that it was produced in aid of some stockjobber. The Conference had met the previous day (Wednesday), probably for a formal exchange of powers, and had adjourned till Thursday, the very day on which this mendacious despatch was sent. It is ridiculous to suppose that the Prussian Cabinet, having committed the Luxembourg matter to the hands of its representative in London, had after this made any move whatever in it, or made any "demands" on anybody pending the negotiations. Whatever it would have to say about it, it would say in despatches to its minister for his guidance at the Conference, and it is by no means likely that he hurried down to the lodgings of the veracious reporter of the New York press to make him acquainted with Count Bismark's private and particular wishes. The second meeting of the Conference was, in fact, held on Thursday morning, probably just about the time our agent was sending off his last canard, and before it reached this city the terms of peace had been agreed on—a fact which the worthy unblushingly communicated to us on that very evening. On Friday the negotiations were closed, and all was settled.

We doubt if a more disgraceful story is to be met with in the history of news-collecting than the "story of the Cable" during the European crisis. We have no hesitation in saying that the telegraph has been used persistently not for purposes of enlightenment and instruction, but in aid of gold gamblers, and with marked contempt for the intelligence of the American public, and that the greater portion of the press in this city, at least, instead of protecting their readers against these attempts on their credulity and their pockets, have connived at or assisted in the imposture. The New York Times is, as far as we know, the only daily morning paper which made any attempt to sift the despatches or expose their untrustworthiness. The matter is one to which newspaper proprietors ought, for their own credit and the safety of their readers, to turn their attention. If the newsmonger in London who forwards these cable despatches is not under their control, they ought to have the work done by somebody who is, and pay him for doing it well; and whenever they publish any telegraphic news from Europe which is likely to affect the money market, and which does not reach them through the authorized channels, they ought to formally disclaim all responsibility for it.

FEDERAL JUDGES AT THE SOUTH.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN is said, by his various biographers, to have maintained throughout the late war an undoubting faith in the complete restoration of the Union. It may be so, but we must admit that some circumstances cast a doubt upon the question. And of all the difficulties in the way of our belief in the assertion, we reckon as among the most insuperable the appointment of Messrs. Underwood and Busteed to the position of United States district judges in the Southern States. No one can persuade us that Mr. Lincoln seriously expected, when he made these appointments, that either of those gentlemen would ever have an opportunity to perform his judicial duties, or rather to prove, upon a large scale, his incapacity for performing them. The act was one of Mr. Lincoln's practical jokes, perpetrated to relieve his mind from the burden which oppressed it, as well as to rid himself (harmlessly, as he supposed) of a couple of bores. We remember that he first nominated Mr. Busteed for a generalship, and then, conscientiously scrupulous about making a joke at the expense of the army, suddenly relieved his protégé from the duty of superintending a charge of bayonets, where he might do mischief, and assigned him to the light and safe duty of charging imaginary juries from an imaginary bench. Mr. Lincoln's enemies discerned a graver motive for his action, and averred that he designed to make it impossible for Alabama to return to the Union, by impaling it on a dilemma, of which one horn was secession without Judge Busteed and the other reunion with him. But we are satisfied with our own theory of the appointment.

Judge Underwood is a man of a different stamp from Judge Busteed, resembling him, indeed, only as both of them remind one of the patriarch Necessity, which, as we learnt at school, "knows no law." Necessity, we suppose, suggested the appointments, and, if the proverb is true, necessity alone can justify them. We believe that Mr. Underwood was not a lawyer at all; and although when compared with such a lawyer as Mr. (better known to an irreverent public as "Dick") Busteed he is perhaps to be preferred, still it is scarcely a safe rule in selecting men for high offices to hold that an appointment may be justified by showing that it was possible to have done worse. Some knowledge of the law, we humbly submit, is to be desired in the judge of a United States court; nor can we concede that Mr. Underwood's experience as a justice of the peace will bring him up to our very moderate standard. We knew him some years ago as a rather long-winded old gentleman who, like one or two other refugees we wot of, was ever ready to bestow all his tediousness upon us. We sympathized with him under his misfortunes, but we never dreamed that he would seek for consolation in a high judicial office.

No position in the country demands greater ability, dignity, and discretion of its occupant than that of a Federal judge in the South. It is the duty of such an officer to maintain, in the midst of a hostile community, an interpretation of the fundamental law utterly distasteful to them, and yet to divest his mind of all feelings which would disqualify him from administering impartial justice with courtesy and calmness. None but a strong and well-balanced mind will be able, under such circumstances, to avoid the temptation to an obsequious suppression of the truth on the one hand, without indulging, on the other, in that bitter resentment which naturally results from the uncivil treatment given by Southerners to those who will not bend to their will. Judge Underwood was never flattered by the press or people of Richmond, and was, therefore, not tempted to become subservient to them; but their insults have goaded him to a most unseemly exhibition of temper upon the bench, which must utterly destroy his usefulness as a judge.

And now there is some prospect of his being entrusted with the most important trial ever known in our history; in which, if it is not to be a sorry farce, the very foundations of our Government are to be tested; in which the ablest lawyers of the land will be engaged, and in which a slight blunder would give treason a moral victory. We know of but one thing which the judge can do that is worse than to cause the acquittal of Davis, and that is, to pack a jury and convict him. Nothing good can possibly come from such a case in such hands.

We have felt it our duty to speak plainly of these things because the downward path of the judiciary requires plain dealing. We cannot with a good grace censure Democratic judges in New York for recklessness and indecency, if we do not censure other judges for the same faults elsewhere. And the conduct of judges at the South is, as we have pointed out, a matter of special importance. They have it in their power largely to aid or to hinder the work of reconstruction. By mingled patience and firmness they can win the affection of the loyal and command the respect of the disloyal. Most of them, we are glad to believe, are doing so, and are in all respects well qualified for their position. We wish that the friends of the others would impress upon them that loyalty is not properly manifested by ranting speeches from the bench. No Copperhead has of late struck a worse blow at the Union cause than Judge Underwood administered in the rigmarole which he poured forth the other day in the disguise of a charge to the grand jury at Richmond.

THE RELEASE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

JEFFERSON DAVIS is at last liberated on bail. We are glad that this step has been taken, both as an act of justice in itself and as an indication that his trial is approaching. The detention of Mr. Davis while the last embers of war were being stamped out was clearly justifiable; but from the time that the authority of the United States was established beyond question, his imprisonment could be sustained only upon the same grounds as that of any other person accused of high crimes. Nobody had the slightest fear (we might say hope) that he would run away, if released; and his continued duress has been simply an act of punishment before his conviction. Such punishment is directly contrary to the spirit of our laws; and has only been tolerated by the American people in this case because of their intense hatred of the man and of the cause which he represents, and because of the technical difficulties which stood in the way of his conviction for a crime of which, if it existed at all, every one knew him to be guilty. Yet these are not reasons sufficient to justify the course which has been pursued, and which has added another to the many dangerous precedents of the war.

The trial of Mr. Davis, if it can be conducted in a satisfactory manner, will have some important and beneficial results. An honest jury cannot fail to find the prisoner guilty, as far as the mere facts are concerned. The real controversy will be before the court, to determine whether those facts constitute treason. No authoritative decision has yet been rendered upon that question. The only convictions for treason against the United States, so far as we are aware, took place in California and Kentucky before the United States district courts. It will be remembered that a party of desperadoes in California attempted to seize a Government vessel for privateering purposes. They were convicted and sentenced to death, but their sentences were commuted to imprisonment. The convicted parties were all pardoned long ago, and there is not now a single individual suffering punishment for treason to the United States. These trials were had in the lowest Federal courts, and the offences of the persons convicted were committed under circumstances which did not afford them the protection of regular warfare. Nor were they citizens of a seceded State, acting in or issuing from that State for military purposes. The Kentucky convict was a citizen of Kentucky, and could only have made his case worse by justifying under the authority of Tennessee as a seceded and foreign State. The California party was made up of nondescripts from various nations and States, all of them, however, residents of California, and therefore clearly without excuse for hostile acts. But no court has yet had an opportunity to determine whether the commander of a regular army, conducting war against the United States upon equal terms, and in the name of a hostile government, can be convicted of treason. Of course we, in common with the majority of the American people, think that he can and should be; but very able and sincere men think otherwise, and the question ought, by all means, to receive a judicial and conclusive solution. We only regret that the law provides for no appeal in criminal cases to the Supreme Court, so that all the judges could take part in the decision.

It would be a most remarkable fact if, after four years of civil war, posterity should be left in doubt whether it was or was not treason to wage such war against the United States. The discussion may be carried on in newspapers and reviews a hundred years hence with even more vigor than it has been in our own day. The success of a war waged expressly against the theory of secession would be cited on one side; but, on the other hand, the fact that, after having achieved such a complete triumph, the Federal Government could not secure the conviction of a single man for treason, might be cited with at least equal force upon the other side. Why, it may justly be said, if the acts of Davis and Lee were treasonable, were they not convicted of treason? As far as General Lee is concerned, a sufficient explanation is given in the terms of his surrender; but in respect to Mr. Davis no such explanation is possible.

It may be said that the prospect of future rebellions is remote and visionary, and that no practical good can result from a conviction of treason, followed (as it doubtless would be) by a commutation of the sentence. But in this country theories and precedents have a value unknown in any other, even in England, from which we have learned to rely upon precedents. We can never expect to be entirely free from elements of danger, and for centuries to come we shall need all the security which can be given by judicial expositions of our fundamental law. Not for purposes of vengeance, nor yet for the mere satisfaction of a theory, but for the sake of removing all doubt as to the allegiance of American citizens and the perpetuity of our Government, we should desire to see Jefferson Davis fairly tried, and his guilt determined by a tribunal commanding universal respect.

A FAIR IN A PALACE.

BERLIN, April 14, 1867.

THE late Bohemian campaign has thrown open a large field for benevolent enterprise, and the Crown Princess has not failed to take that field with as much cheerful energy as did her husband that of last summer, and I may add with as much success. The benevolent object was to get together a fund, to bear the name of the "Victoria-National-Invaliden Stiftung," for the benefit of the wounded and maimed of '66. In order to collect funds and to give a novel impulse to the purses of the capital, the Crown Princess undertook to get up a ladies' sale in the halls of her own palace, where for the last six days there has been enacting a scene as novel as attractive, the softening moral effects of which on this most uncajolable of capitals may probably be great. There have not been wanting those, however, who carp at the too great condescension shown in the late throwing open of the palatial doors for the purposes of benevolent trade. It was thoroughly amusing to listen to the arguments that were brought to bear. A sovereign, by the showing of those persons, might stoop to almost any species of immorality of behavior—that was princely, for that they were accustomed to—but to be actively benevolent, industrious by hand and deed, as the Crown Princess has been in behalf of her project, was very unroyal; it was unprecedented.

But I shall leave the cavillers "to digest the venom of their spleen," and join the thousands of those who with me rejoiced in the sight of the princely pair laboring with and for their subjects, at once the Gospel rendering of their high position and the only one adapted to the democratic nineteenth century. To assist the Princess in the practical carrying out of her plan, first in collecting and afterwards in selling, a staff was selected of twenty-seven ladies distinguished for rank, beauty, or wealth, or all three together, who beat up Berlin and sent, some of them, literally wagon-loads of articles to the palace; while the Princess herself, with some help—which helps informed me she worked "like any Bürgerfrau"—undertook the difficult and irksome task of looking over, selecting, and arranging. Rich gifts came from all parts of Europe, and the ladies' sale promised to become a bazaar in all its Oriental brilliancy.

On Monday, April 8, all the arrangements were completed, and at noon the main entrance to the palace was given up to the public. The minimum admission was sixpence, and two of the wounded heroes received the patriotic pence on silver plates in the vestibule. The rain came down in torrents that day and the two following, causing the Princess serious concern lest the "Bürgerfrauen," who would wish to dress in their best and could not afford a cab, should be prevented from coming. Indeed, on the first day only the Princess's "carriage friends" came and the great open space in front of the palace was filled up by them. Few entered on their humble boots as I did.

Turning to the right, we first entered what appeared to be a small anteroom, richly furnished with carved wood pieces. From this into a long hall, converted for the time being into a refreshment-room, where presided some of the most attractive of the twenty-seven assistants over a table of dainties; liquids and solids in due proportion. Great liveliness prevailed in this department, and wit and laughter flowed more freely than did the wine and bouillon, though they too found delicately appreciative palates. We hear, for instance, of "a liqueur" paid for with a fifty-thaler note, and of a half-penny roll and caviar with a one-hundred-thaler note; also of a lump of gingerbread—but Nuremberg gingerbread, mind—bought for one hundred and fifty thalers by the widow of the celebrated composer of "L'Africaine."

Passing this hall we entered a long gallery, where sixteen stalls were most tastefully arranged, ten to the left and six to the right. They were hung with red, like tents, and surmounted with Prussian colors and eagles. This gallery runs into the Rotunda, or Gedächtnisshalle, where was the chief attraction, namely, the Crown Princess, who, assisted by some ladies, was kept incessantly occupied from twelve to four making sales. But the well-bred crowd is still so great that I cannot elbow my way through to the rotunda, and shall employ my slow progress onwards in giving some idea of the arrangements and of the articles exposed. An unseen band at this moment strikes up the national hymn, and Majesty in person enters. A pleasant little flutter of additional excitement is observable, for the King leaves a pleasant or a gallant word wherever he turns, and is, besides, "first-foot" to almost every stall there. And what was there not to buy in this Arabian hall? The stalls to the left offer the choicest selection of china, glass, bronze, hardware, jewelry, precious stones, embroidery, basket-work, writing materials, dainty bits of dress, and carved wood. Among the most valuable or remarkable objects were four drinking-cups of the sovereigns Frederick II. and Frederick William III. and IV., a painted glass flagon and glass of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and an inkstand in exact imitation of Frederick the Great's, purchasable only by a member of the royal blood. The above articles were contributed by the Crown Prince. From Russia came two fine malachite vases, valued at £90 apiece; likewise an album bound in malachite; from the Queen of England two magnificent Indian shawls, both bought, I am told, by the richest silk-mercer here, a Jew. The Grand Duchess of Baden contributed an assortment of cuckoo clocks in richly carved cases, and the Queen of Sweden a fur cloak. Another royal and generous donor was the Prince of Wales, whose gifts of Oriental ornaments and Turkish and Japanese weapons took up a whole compartment to themselves, and were sold off the first day. The six tables to the right were devoted exclusively to objects of art—oil pictures from distinguished hands, water-color drawings and prints, and especially five photographs from originals, were placed about in attractive and rich profusion. As special objects of interest, however, were two life-size heads, one of a vegetable and one of a fruit girl, painted by the Crown Princess from life, and purchased by the King for 4,000 thalers (£600). They are highly creditable productions—I do not mean for a princess, nor yet for a woman, but just for an artist. The different textures are finely given, the firm-fleshed cherries creditably rounded off, and the faces have much and true expression. The same royal artist and Begas were the sole occupiers of the sculpture table. The living stream has borne me on almost to the arched entrance to the Gedächtnisshalle, when I am stopped by a crowd clustering round a bower to the left. A very brisk sale of flowers is going on in this "Bude." A small, swarthy-complexioned man steps up and selects the very daintiest of bouquets—camellias and roses, if I could see them!—and lays down a thousand thalers on the silver plate. He does not wait for the nine hundred and ninety of change, but edges his diminutive person through the crowd till he finds himself opposite the Crown Princess, to whom with every mark of respect and gallantry he presents the nosegay from his master the Sultan! "Well worthy of the golden prime of good Haroun al Raschid!"

At length the rotunda is reached, and the lady who seems most lively and is most simply dressed is the Crown Princess, looking at that moment "the sweetest lady of the time." She is giving change for a shilling to the buyer of some of her wares and calling attention to her other articles. She does not deal in gold and silver and jewels, but in baby-baskets, cradles, staring Highlandmen-dolls, unmistakable little shoes and jackets, penny trumpets, and such like. Rich people might go to the other splendidly arrayed tables, but at hers the poorest might spend his sixpence. Besides, there was scope and opportunity for the rich man to spend his gold. Many paid their sixpence just to gaze and go; others trembled to find just two feet of table between them and a real, live princess, and had to be reminded to move on; some bought together the strangest collection of articles—it was too delightful to have a princess serve them. On one of the days a stolid, bulky Pomeranian, confronting her, addressed her thus: "Meine liebe Frau Kronprinzessin, I want to buy your eldest son." She answered: "I am very sorry I have sold all my eldest sons; and I had so many." "It would have been something for my whole life if I had bought it from you," returned the man. His address was taken, and the promise given to send the eldest son. He received a hint he should now move on, but he, turning once again to the Princess, said: "Frau Kronprinzessin, since you have promised to send me your son, you may as well send me the whole of you!"

But such incidents are far too numerous for any more to find a place here. Propriety bade me move on too, but it was with regret I left the Princess's "shop." Nor was the touch of humor wanting. The Crown Prince presided over a certain pink bag designed to entrap innocent souls. "Ein kühner Griff, 10 sgr." ("one good grab for ten zwanzigers") was printed outside of it, and whoever was bold enough to risk his money came off with a wooden spoon, a sugar mannikin, an empty box, etc., etc., for his reward. The bag was a most popular institution, thanks to the never-failing flow of humor and affability of the Prince. As the fame of the bazaar spread, the crowd increased from day to day. The two last days the concourse was so enormous that the palace doors had to be shut, and the crowd up-stairs thinned off before others were admitted. The last day the admission was one thaler, which likewise included a ticket for the coming raffle.

The results of the sale are, I hear, highly satisfactory. The proceeds of the first three days amounted to about $21,000. The attempt was a bold one on the part of the Crown Princess to run counter, as she did, to long-rooted aristocratic prejudices. But say what one may, it has been a triumph, and a triumph as much of the individual as of the Princess; and her sound head and brave heart will one day be a glory to the mighty throne that she is destined to fill.

Fine Arts.

FORTY-SECOND EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THIRD NOTICE.

It is hard to give any general name to that class of pictures of which our galleries always contain interesting specimens, the class to which belong pictures of plucked fruit, of flowers in vases, of flowering or other small plants painted near at hand and as principal subject; of "foreground" in general. The recognized master of this school is William Hunt—"old William Hunt"—who died in 1864. There is, perhaps, no other artist of very great and unusual powers who has given much of his best energy and feeling to the painting of such simple subjects. All the very great painters of the world can finish minutely when they choose, and in their elaborate and complete works they generally do so, taking great pleasure in the patterns of embroidery worn by their St. Barbaras and St. Cecilys, and in the wild flowers at their feet. But the painting of the same lovely things, unassociated with human life, and unassociated with the contrasted vastness of general landscape, has seldom been the chosen work of the strongest men. Little else than technical skill can be shown in fruit and flower painting; intellect and character only as they affect eye and hand. But the highest technical skill is very dependent upon intellect and character; and there is certainly as much of William Hunt, the man, in his wonderful plums and grapes as there is of the personality of many a strong religious or historical painter in his own more pretentious work.

Those men who do not devote themselves wholly or, as William Hunt did, in great part to these simple foreground subjects, yet study in this way, if they are wise and at all in earnest about their work. The best landscape painters know that a forest cannot be painted without skill to paint a single tree, nor a tree without skill to paint a sprig of leaves. The best figure painters know that without the skill to draw the folds of drapery it is in vain to ask for skill to paint the wrinkles of the brow. And as the diligent and devoted men work hard at such things when they are young and still students, so they work at them at often-recurring intervals when they have gained skill and knowledge—skill and knowledge which they wish to retain. Mr. Vedder's little picture, spoken of two weeks ago, is little more than a study of simple and delicate things near at hand. Mr. Vedder is neither a highly-trained artist nor yet anything of a tyro; we are very much in need of highly-trained artists in America, and will wait while he studies drapery and tapestry, and afterward the figure, to his satisfaction. Mr. Moore is not a consummate landscape painter, nor yet by any means only a beginner; and we are glad to see him painting simple details so resolutely. His picture of apples (No. 146) is hung too high to be rightly judged. Lower, it would be found unequalled by anything of the sort in the exhibition, and unsurpassed in technical qualities by any work of its class in America. As a picture, it is not quite right; the three apples make too bright and isolated a spot of light upon a subdued ground; they are too vivid and sharp-edged where all else is soft and rather monotonous. But in the mere rounding of the fruit, and in the gradation of its varying color, there is delicacy of touch well used, and very good management of the pigments. The roundness is got without any toning down or dulling of color, and by just matching the hues of the models bit by bit, as they appear modified on the under side and toward the outline. It is impossible to find any part especially worthy of praise where all the work is quite faultless as far as it goes, and that is far. The Japanese tray is capital, the reflections of the apples plainly seen, though dulled in color, where the lacquer of the tray is most brilliant, and disappearing entirely where the bronzed flowers cross them. We say again that this picture needs close examination, without which it cannot be at all rightly seen. It needs, moreover, a frame of a totally different character from the one it now has. Mr. Moore's other fruit piece is by no means so good, and especially inferior in its quality of color. In the landscape No. 522 there is some admirable foreground work, rocks and weeds, an admirable cedar inlaid in a pure blue sky, a boat on the beach of unsurpassable truth of lines; all these under a rather dim kind of sunlight and hardly in full color, but wonderfully subtle in drawing.

Miss Wenzler has some very well painted apples in a picture in the West room, No. 579. Of four pictures by this artist this one seems to us much the best. It is very prettily made up as a picture, and lacks only fresher green of leaves to be a most desirable possession to any lover of nature or of pictures.

Mr. Newman's little drawing, No. 107, Japanese still life, a study of red, black, and gold, is quite agreeable in spite of what seems to have been an attempt to give roundness and projection to the flat birds in gold lacquer on a tray. The poppy is very good; but to have made the "still life" wholly Japanese the poppy ought to have been a camellia japonica, unless these indeed are of a Japanese variety of poppy.

Mr. Farrer year by year gains greater skill in those foreground studies in which he succeeds better than in landscape. Of his work of this kind there are four pictures that seem to us peculiarly good—of which four only one is in this exhibition. The painting of trailing arbutus was at Mr. Knoedler's gallery last spring, the painting of clematis was at Mr. Schaus's gallery in the fall, the drawing of fringed gentian has not been publicly exhibited, and the painting of "Summer Flowers" is in the corridor now, and numbered 156. This last has the fault that it is not sunny, although there are shadows thrown by little spires of grass across the white petals of the ox-eye daisies. The colors are not paled as by sunshine, but in full glow and very warm and rich. It is probably the best piece of coloring in an oil picture that Mr. Farrer has exhibited, and it is a charming bit of nature-tangled grasses, tall white and yellow daisies, a few buttercups, and a host of great red clover blossoms at their feet among the clover leaves, are all growing together till the (hay) harvest. That is done in this picture with oil paint which could hardly be done with water-color; for the thin spires of grass are almost modelled in the pigment, laid on one over another till they catch the light like real stalks. This would be insufferable if the work were less well done; as it is, the picture is quite a wonderful piece of painting from nature. The small picture of dandelions, No. 271, in the North gallery, is also minute and elaborate—less agreeable in color than the summer flowers, though indeed Mr. Farrer's color does not seem to us his strong side, nor very delightful, at least in his oil painting. There are three water-color drawings in the corridor, of which our favorite is No. 106, of fleur-de-lis, somewhat flat but hardly the worse on that account, and in texture of petals really beautiful. The drawing of peaches is also admirable.

Mr. Henry Farrer has a very pleasant drawing of a red bird—No. 128. Mr. T. L. Bulson has some very delicate and minute pencil drawings—small, seemingly the elaborately careful work of a beginner.

It is pleasant to see the wood engravings that are exhibited. A number are by W. J. Linton, an English engraver of eminence whose work one meets in many carefully illustrated English books, who has made his home here, and has a chance to help us in a way in which we need help. But in Mr. Henry Marsh we have long had an engraver whose superior there has hardly been in the delicate work that has made his reputation. Much of his work, as in the copies of photographs in the "Life of Prescott," has been of a kind not wholly suitable to wood engraving, nor desirable to have done very often. The wonderful "Butterflies," in the frame No. 60, seem to be proof impressions of wood-cuts in a well-known book. The story goes that these woodcuts were made in close imitation from the creature laid beside the block. It is probably true, for the downy texture of the insect is reproduced with marvellous fidelity and with extraordinary beauty of result. It would be well to know how many copies can be taken from such blocks without entire loss of these effects, for that is a danger to be especially feared in such exquisite work.

Correspondence.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE REFORM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Your correspondent, "H. F. B.," who criticises my letter on this subject, does not, it seems to me, fairly meet the points at issue. I was not discussing the subject of admission to some future possible university, such as all lovers of literature and learning are hoping to see Harvard and Yale become, but the practical working of the present system of entrance examination to Yale and Harvard as they are now. Neither is the question so much as to the quantity of work actually set down upon the Greek and Latin examination-papers as in regard to its character, and the work which, from the character of the grammars prescribed, and the customary methods of using them, is supposed to lie behind those papers, as the necessary preparation for passing them. If "H. F. B." has had any practical experience in classical teaching, he must know that the practical effect of the system has been to produce in the schools a very great amount of dead mechanical memorizing of the minute grammatical details with which the grammars universally used are crowded; and that the evil has been intensified by the fact that those schools which are usually held up as the best models are the very schools in which this style of teaching is carried to the greatest extreme. Boys of ten to twelve years of age are set (or were set, for really the progress of educational improvement is nowadays so rapid that it is dangerous to speak in the present tense) to committing to memory page after page of each grammar's paradigms, rules, exceptions, and all as a needful preliminary to the reading of the simplest prose. I think that the best classical teachers have universally come to the conclusion that this is not the way to teach the classics, even if the grammars were ever so good; and when the process is applied to such books as "Andrews and Stoddard," it is no wonder that the result is far from satisfactory. "H. F. B." may say that teachers ought to know better; but do they know better? and how can it be expected that more than one in a hundred will have the ability or the courage to set himself against a recognized system? The ambition of the boys is not to know Greek and Latin, but to "enter clear," as the boys of —— school do; and they and their teachers naturally follow what are understood to be the ways of —— school, and to get up Hadley and Andrews and Stoddard with the greatest possible minuteness. I am happy to know that in the next Harvard catalogue all specification of particular grammars will be omitted. The next step should be for the accomplished professors at Yale or Harvard to make a set of those simple and thoroughly philosophical elementary grammars for boys. I will venture to say that they can do it with far more success than seems to have attended the labors of the nine English head-masters, if we can judge from the amusing protest which "A Grinder of Little Boys" published in the London Times the other day.

The reason why the Freshman year must be spent in grammatical drill is not, as "H. F. B." supposes, because so little, but because so much, grammar is required—or supposed to be required, for practically it comes to the same thing—for admission. So much is attempted that it is all badly done, and all has to be done over again. The result is that the student, before he arrives at the pleasures, is, in nineteen cases in twenty, wearied out with the pains of the classics.

In the very admirable "Report on the Study of Languages" presented to the Association of New England Colleges, written by President Hill, and signed also by President Sears and President Woolsey ("H. F. B." will find it in the supplement to the Boston Daily Advertiser for May 4), there occurs the following passage, to which all my own experience leads me to subscribe:

> "Grammar is an analysis of the usages of a language, and cannot be profitably and intelligently studied without some previous familiarity with those usages. Reading ought, therefore, to precede the study of grammar, and the study of grammar be entered upon gradually, and only as fast as the needs of the reading require it. The boy fitting for college should learn only so much of the grammar as may be required to enable him to construe intelligently the books on which he is to be examined; and this can be comprised in a very few pages of paradigms and rules. It would be hard to overstate the mischief wrought by forcing children to commit to memory several hundred pages of Greek and Latin grammar before they can read the simplest books in those tongues." . . . "One very marked advantage in larger reading and less extensive grammatical drill at the beginning of the course is that of making the pupil most familiar with what is of most frequent occurrence, and thus giving due perspective to the facts and principles of the language—a perspective which cannot be correctly given by the artificial mode of using two sizes of type in the grammar."

"H. F. B." is inclined also to question the opinion that the amount of classical reading required is too great. It is very true that the average age of candidates for admission to college is higher than formerly. But the following are the words of Dr. Taylor, as quoted in The Massachusetts Teacher, only last year: "A special difficulty in the way of critical classical study in the elementary course is found in the amount which the requirements of the colleges make it necessary for the scholar to go over before his admission. In the time usually devoted to preparation for college the amount is much greater than can possibly be studied with success and profit." Dr. Taylor is careful to add that he does not wish the actual amount diminished, but that its character should be changed, that what is learned should be learned thoroughly not only in respect to the words, but in respect to the subject-matter. It seems to me that he is right. How instructive, for instance, could a classical teacher make the study of one of Cicero's orations to a lad of sixteen in connection with Roman law and Roman government, if he had time to go into such details under the guidance of George Long and other modern commentators! How much more life it would give the dead Latin, what a useful and manly study it might be made for the future citizen, if, instead of being the mere illustration of grammatical pedantries, the Verrine or the Catilinarian orations were to be employed as the vehicles for imparting valuable information in regard to history and political antiquities! What if the teacher were to try to make the boys love Virgil's sweet poetry, as he might do if time were allowed for all that delightful collateral reading which the study of the Latin epic and pastoral poetry would naturally suggest? But the boys must be got through the whole, and their school-books are loaded down with pedantic notes cribbed from Forbiger. Simply to construe Cæsar is one of the sorest of a school-boy's tasks, but he would be interested if he could make the campaign under the guidance say of his Majesty the Emperor of the French.

Five or six books of the "Æneid" read carefully and critically, so that their full meaning and beauty shall be brought out, are a hundred times more valuable than the whole twelve as they are now usually studied. A few hundred beautiful lines committed to memory are worth more than as many pages of abstract rules, or of the stuff which goes by the name of Latin composition. A little knowledge of the poetry of the English language and of the nineteenth century, of which the average school-boy is now profoundly ignorant, would, one would think, be a useful help in forming his taste for the poetry of nineteen centuries ago—if, indeed, forming his taste were thought to be any part of a teacher's business. Utopian as the idea may seem at present, the time is fast coming, I think, when school-boys will be taught English as well as Greek and Latin.

As for instruction in physical science, I do not know that much need be said in reply to a writer whose notion of it seems to be that it is the mastery of "calibrating machines," whatever those may be, and the learning what kind of glass is best for test tubes. Nevertheless, there is an increasing number of persons who believe with Stuart Mill in the disciplinary value of the study of physical science, and who believe also that its rudiments are to be mastered, if ever, in youth—that they are even a better and more natural discipline for the youthful mind than the theories of German grammarians about Greek roots. Yet in the Cambridge High School, where there is exceptionally good provision made for the teaching of science, the candidates for college are the only class excluded from its benefits. If these candidates are a year older at the time of admission than formerly, it only makes the absurdity more glaring of their profound ignorance of the simplest rudiments of natural and physical knowledge. I believe no one will dispute the fact that that ignorance is all but universal in the young men who enter our colleges at the age of seventeen or eighteen.

3 vols. 16mo, paper, price $2 25.

This is the first issue of a series of English translations of eminent German authors, published by Baron Tanchnitz, in a style uniform with his great series of British authors.

Auerbach's "AUF DER HOEHE" has been translated into all the principal European languages, and is considered by not a few of the best judges to be nearer perfection than any other novel.

The London Times says: "It is being devoured by the reading world, and has had a more rapid success than any work of the kind ever published in Germany."

The Week.

The Supreme Court disposed of the last political question before it by denying Mr. Sharkey's motion for leave to amend the Mississippi complaint, and dismissing the suit. The court was equally divided upon the motion. We believe it is safe to say that Justices Clifford, Nelson, Wayne, and Field were in favor of granting the leave desired, and the Chief-Justice, with Justices Swayne, Miller, and Davis were opposed to it. Mr. Justice Grier was absent. The probability is that, if he had been present, he would have favored the amendment; and thus the question whether the court can interfere to protect the public property of a State remains undecided.

Mr. Greeley has published his reasons for bailing Jefferson Davis. They are two in number—one, that Davis could not have been convicted in Virginia without packing a jury; the other, that the prisoner's counsel desired Mr. Greeley's name as a bondsman. He denies positively that he "labored with Judge Underwood in the premises," and says that "that upright jurist needs no defence from such an implication." Calling Mr. Underwood a "jurist" we consider an unseemly joke, and think Mr. Greeley ought to have known better than to make it on so solemn an occasion.

Alexander H. Stephens says he always regarded Jefferson Davis as a man of kind heart who meant well in what he did, but was not fit to be the head of a nation in a time like that of the late war. He would listen to no advice and heed no warning; because he wanted to succeed, he thought he must. In his flight from Richmond he seemed to Mr. Stephens like a big fly in a stable whose eyes the boys have put out, and which goes about running its head against everything, bobbing up and down unconscious of where it is going or what it is doing. History will have something to say about slavery and the morality of its defenders which Mr. Stephens, of course, did not say in his conversation with the correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, but leaving out of view that most important of the elements which will determine the future historical estimate of Davis's character, we dare say Mr. Stephens's view of his chief is not very far different from the one which posterity will take. Mr. Stephens, if the correspondent is to be relied upon, could not have been in earnest when he made the famous speech about slavery's being the corner-stone of the Confederacy, for his own mind had been, and it never ceased to be, to fight only if forced to fight, and then to fight not for a new nationality but for such terms of reconstruction as should be more favorable to the South than the provisions of the old Constitution.

Mr. Bancroft has been appointed Minister to Berlin, and has accepted the position. We should think he would be glad to go abroad for a brief period, as he is at present remorselessly pursued by grandsons whose ancestors he has assailed, and who are just a little too much for him. His rough treatment of Mr. Greene deprives him, too, of the sympathies of the public under the terribly severe handling which he in his turn has been receiving from Mr. Schuyler, who is a much fiercer assailant than Mr. Greene, and shows him no mercy. As the historian has only just entered on the Revolution, the prospect before him must be admitted to be troublous, particularly as he will, before long, get down amongst the sons, who are a more powerful and truculent body than the grandsons.

The Washington correspondents have succeeded in enlivening the dulness of their late despatches with Booth's diary, for which they have been half frantic for some time. They got the President's copy; for Mr. Stanton, who had the original and who knew the utter baselessness of General Butler's charges, refused, in pursuance of his well-known policy of never replying to defamation, to give the diary to the press. There is nothing in it of any consequence, though of course nothing connected with Booth's crime can be without interest. The entries begin on the day of the murder, and in parts they read very much as if the criminal expected that it would fall into the hands of his pursuers; and in other places, where he confesses to himself the enormity of his guilt, and almost cries out against his own crime, the book reads as if he had meant it for his own eye alone, or for the eye of a friend, being natural and honest in tone and certainly very touching. He rants, of course, and talks of fame and country and tyrants; but plainly the pangs of remorse were among the miserable man's sufferings through all his wanderings till his wretched death. But two dates are written in this diary, which closes with the 21st of April. The leaves that were torn out of the beginning of the book were lacking, so Colonel Conger says, when it was taken from Booth's body, and there is really no reason for believing that any person in the employ of the United States ever tampered with it. General Butler, if he has any sensitiveness at all, must about this time be feeling more keenly than ever that, in his performances in the Fortieth Congress, he has made rather more of a mess of it than in any other part of his life as a civilian.

The reaction which has taken place amongst the old Abolitionists in favor of "politics" is something very remarkable. In bygone days they would have nothing to do with political machinery or political processes, and considered or talked of the "ballot and the bullet" as synonymous terms. Everything was to be done by moral suasion. From this faith, however, which had at least the merit of celestial purity, Wendell Phillips fell away when he helped to nominate Frémont for the presidency at the Cleveland Convention, and having once taken up the carnal weapons he wields them like a veteran. He is now as good a politician as can be found, has become "a great leader," and has his "organ," The Anti-Slavery Standard, which is quoted by all the "secular" papers as the exponent of "a party" which is "doing good work" at Washington, and before which the devils of conservatism shake on their hoofs. Moreover, in order to make his position plain, he advised the working-men in Boston the other day to give up the proud position which they have long held in America, of owing nothing to government and expecting nothing from it but security—a doctrine which is, or ought to be, the corner-stone of democracy, and told them "that there is no channel but politics in which they can get their question [their hours of labor] settled." To crown all, he pooh-poohed "book larnin," as it is called in the South, and informed his hearers that "the best education in the world was that which a man got by struggling to get a living"—a statement which, if true, will enable us to dispense with the cumbrous machinery of schools, colleges, and libraries, as our children are all sure to get a living somehow, and pick up what knowledge they need in the process. This is very much the position which Mr. James Brooks used to take about the poor whites of the South, each of whom had his squirrel rifle, just as the Northern workman has his chisel or his hod, and learned all he needed to know by studying "natur'" and listening to speeches at the cross-roads.

The Hebrew gentlemen who were so offended with the insurance companies in this city a short time ago, because they refused to ensure persons of the Jewish persuasion after having found that the number of Jewish fires in insured premises was much greater in proportion than that of Christian fires, will be grieved to learn that the English insurance companies have had the same sorrowful experience, and are rapidly drifting towards the same intolerant course. A parliamentary enquiry has elicited the unpleasant fact that about 33 per cent. of the fires in London are supposed to be intentionally lighted, and that the defrauding of insurance companies in this way has become a regular business. What is more to the point is that the pioneers in this business, and its prominent supporters, are stated in evidence to be "gangs of foreign Jews," who settle in London for the express purpose of ensuring small houses, having them burned up, and then swearing to whatever is necessary to get the money out of the companies. Now, this being the case, any insurance officer who treated Hebrew insurers as he would treat Christians or Buddhists would be guilty of a gross betrayal of the stockholders. People put their money in insurance companies not for the purpose of illustrating and enforcing the great principles of religious freedom, but for the purpose of making as much money as possible; and the plan for the friends of toleration to adopt is to get the Jewish swindlers and incendiaries who have brought this stigma on their race to give up their bad practices.

In laying the foundation-stone of the Jesuits' College the other day in Cincinnati, Archbishop Purcell, who is a very sensible man usually, violently assailed the Catholic Institute in that city as a disgrace and disappointment to the Church, owing to its having been used for the representation of "frivolous and obscene plays," to wit, "Faust" and "La Favorita," and for the delivery of addresses by Wendell Phillips containing "attacks on God and religion." The Cincinnati Gazette elaborately defends the operas against the charges of "frivolity and obscenity," and shows that by presenting vice in an unpleasing form they may in reality promote virtue. It will, however, produce no impression on the archbishop, as he has never seen an opera and never will, and probably is in much the same state of mind about it as a gentleman we recently heard of, who had refrained from going to the theatre all his life owing to his belief that actors always wore yellow tights. Moreover, it is absurd to defend the opera as a moral teacher. Nobody is made better, in the ordinary sense of the word, by seeing "Faust" or "La Favorita;" he is simply entertained by the music, and music does not exert an "elevating" influence on the character, all the musicians in the world to the contrary notwithstanding. But then if we gave up all modes of relaxation which did not exert an immediate and palpable good effect on morals, we should soon find life intolerable. As to Wendell Phillips's religion, we greatly fear it is his political economy just now which is most defective, and we advise Archbishop Purcell as a friend to let him alone.

The most remarkable special correspondent now living is the gentleman who has been writing to The Tribune of this city and The Gazette of Cincinnati from the banks of the Seine. Of that stream, by the way, he says that it is "very clear and fresh of current, and is of itself a gracious ornament—such a river, notwithstanding its narrowness, that the dying Napoleon asked to be buried by its side." If these lines should meet his eye, he will be pleased to know that the objection to the narrowness of the stream having been waived, the funeral afterwards took place according to request. Mentioning Mr. J. C. Breckinridge, whom he has met, he makes this statement, which we pronounce extremely improbable:

> "When he speaks you can see that there is no land so hard to be exiled from as our land, that this man would have cracked as with an earthquake."

And by-and-by he limns another well-known Southern leader:

> "He has a whitish, bloated face, no beard, a flat forehead, grey eyes so used to looking into the bottoms of rum-tumblers that they are of a dead, vitreous glaze, and he answers better than anybody I can instance to you for an elderly Dead-Beat. When he walks, his flat, inelegant, half-mashed feet seem to be those of a man used only to describing half-circles about a bar-room. And this is George Sanders," etc.

We fear our correspondent's constitutional led him half a dozen times along that "mile of cafés, where you can drink all that intoxicates all the nations of the earth?" when he produced the confounding outbreak which follows:

> "What would you think to pass these bronze gates and see through the shades of silver and emerald, among the infinite statues and palaces and temples, the dromedaries come carrying their Arab master, the wild horses of the Cossacks with a savage sabreman in each stirrup, the asses of the Pyrenees laden with velvet muleteers; where you can . . . be, in a word, a cosmopolite in a cosmopolis, and stagger under the first grand conviction you have ever had that the universe is too grand for your thought?"

On the whole, we are sorry to hear that he has left Paris, though, as friends of human freedom, we are glad that Napoleon made no attempt to restrain him of his liberty and keep him in the Exposition. The Tribune, we suppose, will contain more of his brilliant—or is it lively?—and captivating prose.

The Exposition is neither a swindle nor a failure, and seems likely to be pecuniarily remunerative. The attendance is immense, and those who visited the show when it was yet in disorder are astonished anew by its symmetry, its variety and grandeur. A New Jersey locomotive carried off the prize affixed to its class, and in machinery, as usual, America appears to good advantage. Remarkably, again, our art collection is viewed with almost unexceptional admiration, though it would hardly be considered by us first-rate or representative, and undoubtedly contains some wretched paintings. Mr. Church's "Niagara" took a second prize, and we shall be disappointed if honor is not done also to Mr. Homer's masterpiece, "Prisoners from the Front." The American department, like the English, is closed on Sunday, partly, we suppose, to relieve the attendants, but chiefly out of respect for the estimation in which the day is held in both countries. Naturally this causes serious disappointment to Continental visitors, and especially to the laboring classes of Paris, for whom Sunday is the only holiday.

The week's news from Crete is as contradictory as usual, but the reports from Athens and London, to which the Turks give a sweeping denial, have at least the advantage of being somewhat definite. To believe these would be to agree that Omar Pasha has been badly beaten in two sanguinary battles, with a total loss to his forces of 3,000 men, and would make it prudent to wager that if this commander, who made his reputation in similar warfare, fails, no successor will ever put down the insurrection. On the other hand the Sultan has felt able to decline ceding the island to Greece, as the Great Powers have again united in petitioning, and to express his entire confidence in the ultimate reduction of the Cretans. His tenacity in this direction is not maintained towards Egypt, which has for some time been practically independent of him. He now grants the Viceroy the title of King.

The French army is rapidly arming with the new Chassepôt rifle, and according to the last accounts of an experiment made with a battalion of chasseurs each man fired eight shots a minute, a slight improvement on the Prussian needle-gun; but as far as rapidity of firing is concerned, it is not probable that there will be any perceptible difference between any of the breech-loaders in the excitement of action. An Austrian maker is now said to have one which for simplicity of construction surpasses all others, and is so strong that it may be thrown off a housetop without injury. About the murderous execution of these guns there is no difference of opinion; but bad as they are, a new gun, which has no explosive material, but is simply worked with a crank, and spurts balls in a continued stream on the principle of the sling, has made its appearance on the scene, which, if successful, some people imagine will put an end to war. It must be remembered, however, that as long as the combatants are armed with equal efficiency, the problem of strategy remains just what it has ever been, how to be the strongest at the point of attack. The general who manages to bring most breech-loaders to bear on a given spot will always come off victorious. And even if the crank gun were introduced, and a whole battalion could be swept away by a single squirt, the leader who first brought his cranks to bear on the enemy's flank or rear would win the day. No matter what weapons are introduced, therefore, except perhaps the French chemist's Greek fire, which is to destroy an army in five minutes, war will continue to be a game of manœuvres, although the actions may be made frightfully short and destructive.

THE NEGRO'S DESIGNS ON WHITE SOCIETY.

All pleasure is in its nature evanescent; but perhaps there is no pleasure that fleets more quickly and sooner palls upon the taste than that of assisting at tea-parties and other gatherings at the festive board. Indeed, we are not sure that to taste this pleasure at all there is not requisite a much longer spoon than is used in the social intercourse of mere mortals, and that the pleasure of the tea-party or dinner-party does not consist wholly in getting the invitation. While, then, for fear of disappointing and further embittering many respectable people who are just now very uneasy in their minds, we are willing to admit that the negro, misled by radical agitators, intends to force himself into our dining-rooms, we are sure that there is no real danger of his staying there. He may, to be sure, insist on learning wisdom by his own sad experiences, and that is a right which can be denied to no legal voter; but it will take him a very short space of time to assimilate the truths we have mentioned. We give him two months in which to satiate himself with the bitter ashes of that particular apple of Sodom, and expect him to have six or seven weeks to spare.

And if it were proper to intrude upon ex-Governor Perry and his sorrowing friends in the first paroxysms of their grief, we feel confident that, with some such considerations as those suggested, we could soothe and comfort them in their affliction, and woo their minds away to brighter and better views. We should remind the ex-governor that if the joy of going to tea-parties and soirées very quickly fades away, the joy of going vi et armis to tea-parties is of still briefer date; nay, that although Aristotle does declare that "the desires of men are boundless, and some men live only to gratify them"—so much we should have to concede—yet the voice of history is silent as to any nation or tribe of men who have ever sought their pleasure in giving themselves invitations to the feasts of persons who did not want their company. That particular form of self-indulgence seems never to have had overmastering attractions for men of any color or speech. And many others of the fears which have latterly disturbed the minds of Mr. Perry and other intelligent persons of both sexes are perhaps no better founded than the one which we have been examining. It is now almost June, and the colored race has not yet moved itself to the political capital of the country and taken up its permanent residence there. Yet we can remember when it was apprehended that the negro race, in its insane desire to wield the power of the ballot, and in its crass ignorance of the relations between labor and food, would at once, men, women, and children, take seats through the day in the galleries of the Senate and House, and in the evenings perpetually cast its vote for the mayors of Washington and Georgetown. We shall have to admit, we suppose, that the black man has determined on having the pre-eminency in the country; but we are persuaded that these two fears may be dismissed. The shocking subject of his insisting on his right to offer himself to our daughters in marriage is one that we must decline to consider. Our pen shrinks from portraying the horrors of San Domingo, which, in that case, would at once be revived. This one word we would say: the remedy which suggests itself to us is, we are aware, an extreme one—but how would it do before the blacks enter on the unprincipled line of action which is expected, and before the white male citizens of the United States, with the help of Indians not taxed, draw the sword for a war of races,—how would it do to confer upon the white ladies of our country the right of suffrage? Thus they could have some voice in the settlement of this tremendous problem which baffles the unaided wisdom of man. As we have said, we know the remedy is an extreme one; but would not the object and the result justify it? Is it not possible that by interesting the women themselves in this question we may avert "the bloody reinauguration," etc.? The only other remaining question—the horse-car problem—which may be stated thus: how long a time will elapse, if we permit the African to seek the society of the white man as he appears when conductor, driver, or passenger in the street-cars, before the African will learn that freedom means work, and that it is impossible for him to raise the great staples of the South while he squanders himself riding to the ends of the earth in the street-cars of our cities?—we regard as unworthy of a moment's attention.

We disclaim any wish or intention of being harsh in these remarks to the afflicted; to be a Job's comforter—and without any Job, by the way—is a task we have no stomach for; but we may be permitted to say to Mr. Perry and to Mr. Jenkins and the rest that once the devil got into a certain town in Spain and corrupted all the inhabitants to a dreadful degree. There was not, if the expression may be pardoned, a single wrinkle on either of his horns that he did n't teach them, and it was the most fortunate thing in the world for all the people of that section (O si sua bona norint!) that one day a person came along who was perfectly acquainted with their esteemed fellow-citizen and knew that he had n't in his veins, for all his airs, a drop of blue blood, and that in the long run the prosperity that his works and ways bring to any community is a very left-handed prosperity indeed. So the good man, who must also have been a good fellow, not only displayed the foul fiend to the incredulous townsmen in his true colors, but he laid on him a heavy spell of some sort, and the devil, with what grief of mind we can partly imagine, was condemned to enter forthwith upon a course of revival preaching and convert those whom he had before corrupted. The sermons delivered on several occasions would be worth reading if they could be had nowadays. We can fancy him on one morning bringing the lash down on the mad lust of power and precedence, that sin so apt to sway the human heart, and by which, though he said it who should n't, some of the very first angels fell. On another day he may have warned his hearers to beware of injustice, showing them the only true policy of states and men, and how from one injustice another springs, how from the hatred of race to race and the religious of one faith to the religious of another flowed the political oppression of the Spaniard by the Moor, of the Moor and Jew by the Spaniard, and how from this political tyranny sprang all forms of social tyranny, to the injury of the individual and the decay of the realm. It must all have been very affecting, especially when the audience considered the source of this teaching and how particularly well qualified the preacher was to hold forth on these and similar subjects. We can think of only one drawback which would limit his usefulness People of the sort to which the sermonizer belonged are said to know all about the past, but to the future they are blind as bats. The devil can quote the historians, sacred and profane, in a manner to move the envy of a Congressman from Virginia or a contributor to the review of De Bow (who, by the way, if not which, is not dead yet), but his gift of prophecy, we are informed, was never of any account. However, it is as well for him to keep on preaching. The hearer will get good, if from nothing else, from the light thrown on the history and natural history of the very interesting personage speaking. And his utter incapability to look ahead and see what is coming and must come—that, too, will be interesting in its way.

LITERARY.

Messrs. A. Williams & Co., Boston, who make a specialty of publishing and dealing in works on agriculture, rural architecture, horticulture, stock, etc., announce as nearly ready "Chemistry of the Farm and the Sea," by Dr. James R. Nichols, editor of the Boston Journal of Chemistry and Pharmacy; and "Geyelin Poultry-breeding in a Commercial Point of View," to which Mr. Charles L. Flint, secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Agriculture, furnishes an introduction.——Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, whom Mr. Dickens has just declared to be his only authorized publishers in America, announce a "Charles Dickens Edition" of Dickens, in thirteen or fourteen volumes, of which each will contain a novel complete, adorned by eight of the original illustrations, selected for their goodness. This volume will be rather larger than those of the Diamond edition, the type rather larger, and the page will not be divided into two columns. The price will be a dollar and a half. Another edition will be the "Illustrated Library Edition," in twenty-six volumes, the appearance of which it is not necessary to describe, as the edition will be to all intents and purposes the same as the octavo illustrated edition which Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have long had on sale. The price, however, will be less. It is proposed to offer it at two dollars a volume, which is somewhat cheaper than the illustrated Riverside edition of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton. The latter, however, has additional illustrations by Darley and John Gilbert.——Mr. Henry C. Lea, of Philadelphia, announces "An Historical Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church," a work written by himself, of which he says that "it has had the leisure of years conscientiously bestowed upon it," and that his other recent work, "Superstition and Force," which, by the way, is a credit to American scholarship, was in comparison a mere pièce d'occasion.——D. Appleton & Co. announce the second volume of Flint's "Physiology of Man," and a republication of Michelet's "History of France."

—Tauchnitz will add to his edition of Thackeray a volume containing "Denis Duval," which has been especially revised for the purpose, and another volume containing the "Roundabout Papers" and some other papers never before collected. To his list of books the same publisher adds "Dr. Marigold's Prescriptions," "Mugby Junction," "Idalia," by Ouida, and "Nina Balatka," conjectured to be by Mr. Anthony Trollope. The English translations of German authors, which are hereafter to form a part of the Tauchnitz library, and which began with Auerbach's "On the Heights," will soon count among their number Anster's rendering of "Faust," Zschokke's novels, Paul Heyse's tales, and several of Lessing's works.

—There is no provision of law whereby the people may be organized for the purpose of nominating candidates for office; that the need of organization is felt is evident from the voluntary organizations formed by political parties, but in these voluntary organizations there are grave defects. In consideration of these things, which are set forth as above in a recent circular from the Union League of Philadelphia, that association has offered $1,100 in prizes for "essays on the legal organization of the people to select candidates for office." The first prize is to be $500, the second $300, the third $200, and the fourth $100. The essays are to be addressed to Mr. George H. Boker, secretary of the Union League, and must be sent anonymously, for, if not, no attention will be paid them; the author's name must be sent separately in a sealed envelope. This subject, which has already had some discussion in these columns, is surely one of very great importance, and we are very glad that a body like the Philadelphia Union League has turned its attention to the matter. Its example, to say nothing of its prizes, will turn the attention of many. It is, we think, to be desired that the secretary, Mr. Boker, should be instructed by the directors of the league to draw up a circular a little more definite in its terms than the one from which we have quoted. An intending essayist would no doubt like the work narrowed rather more than it is in the words which we have quoted above, and of course the more precisely the subject is limited, the better are the essays likely to be.

—It is almost necessary to apologize to our readers for saying anything more about Mr. Dickens and his American publishers. The matter concerns "the trade" somewhat, but our readers only a very little, and this mention is, we hope, the last that will have to be made. Mr. Dickens, then, has recently written four letters to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, which that firm have published, and in the fourth of them he denies that he has derived, does derive, or ever is to derive any pecuniary advantage from republications of his collected works in this country, not issued by Ticknor & Fields; statements to the contrary originate in nothing, Mr. Dickens says, or have been twisted into being from two irrelevant facts: 1st, That the Harpers, through their London agents, bought advance-sheets of his then latest novels for simultaneous republication in America; 2d, That Hurd & Houghton bought one hundred impressions of the illustrations to "The Pickwick Papers." For the italics given above, Mr. Dickens or Messrs. Ticknor & Fields are responsible. We take them to mean an assertion that buying advance-sheets is a very different thing from buying manuscripts, and while it gives the purchaser the possibility of early publication, cannot be held to give him any property in the novel as a book. Next comes Mr. W. A. Townsend, who is ready to make oath that advance-sheets of Mr. Dickens's novel of "Bleak House," which is not one of the three novels mentioned by Mr. Dickens, were bought by the Harpers for two thousand dollars. And after him comes Mr. Lea, of Philadelphia, who says that in 1838 Carey, Lea & Blanchard, the first house to publish Dickens's works in this country, paid the novelist £50 in acknowledgment of the success of their edition of his "Pickwick Papers." Furthermore, Mr. Lea says that for "Barnaby Rudge" and "The Old Curiosity Shop," which were published serially, Mr. Dickens received from the same house £2 10s. a number; or, for the novels, £107 10s. and £112 10s. respectively. In 1842 Mr. Dickens visited this country, and for several years afterwards would not countenance any American editions of his works, so Carey, Lea & Blanchard published "Martin Chuzzlewit," "David Copperfield," and "Dombey & Son" without paying Mr. Dickens anything; and by-and-by Mr. Dickens's books, as we have heard, being not so popular in this country as before he wrote "The American Notes," and Messrs. Carey, Lea & Blanchard being, perhaps for that, perhaps for other reasons, willing to dispose of the stereotype plates of his books then in their possession, they sold them, and at a low price, to Getz & Buck, of Philadelphia, which firm in turn sold them to T. B. Peterson & Brothers, and T. B. Peterson & Brothers have also bought the plates of the later novels of which Messrs. Harpers purchased the advance-sheets. The Petersons claim the right to publish Dickens in this country—a right based, as it seems (we are as far as possible from attempting to settle the question), upon purchases of advance-sheets by Carey, Lea & Blanchard, and afterwards by the Harpers. Ticknor & Fields claim the same right, because they alone have paid Mr. Dickens not for advance-sheets merely, but have paid him, and intend to pay him, a share in the profits of a complete edition of his works. The claim of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields Mr. Dickens allows. If it should seem that what Mr. Dickens says in his Ticknor & Fields letter, "No. 4," is contradicted by Mr. Townsend's and Mr. Lea's statements, it should be recollected—1st, That Mr. Dickens speaks of republications of "collected works;" 2d, That it does not appear that he has had any money from any American house but Ticknor & Fields, except for the privilege of getting advance-sheets for early publication, and, in one instance, £50 by way of "acknowledgment" for the success of a republication of his first book; 3d, That Mr. Townsend's contradiction relates to what Mr. Dickens calls, and what is, so far as regards the quarrel between the publishers, an "irrelevant fact," about which he was not troubling himself when writing his letter. Harpers probably paid $2,000 for "Bleak House," but it was paid for advance-sheets. The English publishers of "Bleak House" may have been the persons benefited by the payment, or a thousand other things are more likely than that Mr. Dickens has made a mistaken statement.

—The key-note of the early Biblical history is to be found in the antipathy of color and the system of castes which it evolved. Once the region between the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean was filled with a dark-colored, perhaps a black, African race. The Kenites, or descendants of Cain, conquered some of these dark men, and set up in Palestine a system analogous to that still subsisting in India, namely, a unity subdivided by castes based on color. Egypt was conquered by a clan of the Aryans other than the Kenites, and this conquering clan, having much mixed its blood, was conquered by another, the "Shepherds" of modern commentators. The Abrahamic tribe was a white one; it expelled a dark tribe which it was ruling, and this fact appears in history as the driving out of Hagar and Ishmael by Sarah. Jacob was white, Esau of mixed blood; Joseph was white, so was Benjamin, but their ten jealous brethren were half-castes; Joseph clearly was of the same race as the "Shepherd" king who took him into favor; and the Israelites in Goshen were white men, ruling black or dark-colored men. By-and-by the mixed race achieved supreme power in Egypt, and drove out the Shepherds; at the same time, their friends, the white rulers of Goshen, who went into Canaan, joined the Kenites and the higher castes, and both uniting, the two together waged a war of extermination against the lower castes, a war such as only breaks out between rival colors, a war so remorseless that the victors invented for it a divine command to extirpate. Thenceforward Hebrews and Kenites lived side by side, each supporting a separate priesthood, the two divisions of the Aaronic caste, the children of Ithamar and Eliezer. David was a Kenite. The Kenites were more spiritual, poetical; the Hebrews more gross, material, bound by laws; the Kenite believed that in each heart was the sanctuary of God, that each man was a priest; the Hebrew would have sacrifices; the Kenite would have prayer and not sacrifice. The Psalms of David are the poems of the Kenite king. The quarrel of the two priesthoods divided the nation; it was David's attempt to ascertain the fighting strength of each opinion by his numbering of the people that called down the wrath of God on that monarch, and helped to split the kingdom into two. Judah was Kenite, and Israel Hebrew. The schism lasted down to the destruction of Jerusalem; the Sadducees, who believed not in the resurrection, being Hebrews, and the Pharisees being Kenites; and, as we suppose, the "black" Jews and the "white" Jews of our own day represent respectively the Kenites and the Hebrews, for the Kenites, though living side by side with the Hebrews, were, of the two, the subordinate people, and, as we have seen, subordination and superiority were dependent on color. All this is the theory of Mr. E. de Bunsen, who has recently published in England a very interesting and learned book—interesting, but not the easiest reading in the world —which is entitled "The Keys of St. Peter." The matter above set forth is, however, only subsidiary. The main purpose of the work—which is a continuation of the same author's "Hidden Wisdom"—is to show that the Kenites were the depositaries of religious truths discovered by primeval man, or revealed to him and handed down by secret tradition. Of this truth, which the Hindoo philosophers, and after them the Jewish priesthood, preserved, and which the Pope now possesses, the essence is, that by perfect submission and perfect obedience to the will of God a man may become spiritually perfect, like unto God, and master of the universe. This wisdom Jesus reduced to practice, but did not teach. In other words, he knew the best, but did not teach the best. However much this view of the perfect spiritual character may revolt most people, and however little they may feel inclined to accept the rest of Mr. de Bunsen's work, yet, as written by a learned and able man and relating to matters of great importance in many points of view, the book is well worth attention.

—The proposed new law of libel introduced in Parliament by Sir Colman O'Loghlen and reported on favorably by the select committee to which it was referred, absolutely exempts newspapers from prosecution for publishing libellous matter actually uttered at a public meeting, provided the answer of the person aggrieved is allowed to appear in an equally conspicuous form. The Spectator strongly objects to the measure and hopes the bill will be amended in the Lords, for, as it stands, an unknown person, who perhaps cannot be reached at all, may make (from spite) damaging assertions which disreputable papers may disseminate with impunity; the present law at least obliges newspapers to send respectable and discreet men to report the proceedings of public meetings. In this country, where the worship of the press is as much a "cult" as it is in England, we have no such law of libel as the one proposed. But libel suits against newspapers are proverbially unsuccessful, so that practically we live under such a law. We should say that a result of our practice is that our public men have come to disregard entirely everything that the newspapers of their political opponents say about them, and that the public in general adopts pretty much the same course, so that the evil may be said to work its own cure. That is, as far as concerns the person libelled. Of the ill effects upon the press of this impunity, every day and not every journal but very many journals furnish examples.

—Among German books recently issued we notice a little volume by Eugen Richter ("Die Consum-Vereine: ein Noth- und Hülfsbuch für deren Gründung und Einrichtung"), published in Berlin, but to be had of L. W. Schmidt, New York, which contains the history of co-operative associations in England and in Germany. The facts about the Rochdale "Pioneers" are pretty well known. We learn from this book that the co-operative societies of Germany have 350,000 members, with yearly returns of 85 millions of thalers, and a working capital of five and a half millions of thalers. There are now about two hundred societies under the presidency of Herr Schulze-Delitzsch, a member of the Prussian Chamber of Deputies, under whose direction new societies have been and are constantly being organized. How they are organized and how managed it is the author's object to set forth in the last eight of his twelve chapters, his experience in Düsseldorf, Magdeburg, and Berlin having not only made him unusually well-informed but convinced him of the need of the practical directions which he here gives.——A remarkable publication is Dr. Berghaus's "Chart of the World" (Gotha: Justus Perthes). The fourth improved edition of this excellent map shows the drifts and currents of the sea, the sounded depths, the direction of winds and magnetic currents, all international steamer, railway, and telegraph lines, and, generally, gives the most exact information of the land and sea.——Boetcher's "Manual of the Hebrew Language" (Leipsic: F. Mühlau) is an important addition to Hebrew literature, having particular reference to comparative philology.

—The Vienna Internationale Revue, which has for its contributors the most prominent publicists of Europe, has commenced its second year. The first number contains an essay, by Huber, on Diderot and the encyclopædists of France; by Harder, on the growth of North American law; by Block, on national economy; by Laun, on Bryant, "the American poet of landscape;" by Keferstein, on the American educational system, etc., etc.

—According to the Italian statistical bureau there are contained in the public libraries of Bavaria 1,268,500 volumes, a number which gives twenty-six and four-tenths volumes for every one hundred Bavarians, as the proportion of books to citizens, or rather of books in public libraries to citizens, which puts Bavaria at the head of European countries so far as the relative rank of nations is determinable by such a test. Bavaria is at the head; next comes Italy, who for each hundred Italians has 19.5 volumes; next France, with 11.7 volumes; next Prussia, with 11 volumes; next Belgium, with 10.4 volumes; next Austria, with 6.9 volumes; while Great Britain, with her 6 volumes for every hundred inhabitants, is nearly at the end. Only Russia is worse off: one hundred Russians have but one volume and sixth-tenths of another; and even this show of volumes is got, in part, by making out of the specifications of English patents 30,000 bound volumes; these in the British Museum make but 1,000 volumes. The bureau seems to have had no precise rule as to what should constitute a volume, and, as appears in the case of the specifications, England may have frequently been placed at a needless disadvantage. However, Great Britain, as Mr. Matthew Arnold might say, is not yet Haussmannized in this respect; in that country it is only the British Museum Library which is aided by the state, and the other public collections are small; a comparison of the whole number of books in the hands of the people of the various countries would no doubt give England a higher place than is given her by the estimate of which we speak. Another matter of interest which we observe in The Pall Mall Gazette's abstract of the bureau's report is the statement, quoted from M. Loua, a French statistician, that the selection of reading matter made by the Italians affords a fresh demonstration that the tendency of the age is more and more toward the positive sciences and away from studies purely scholastic: in 1863, in the 210 public libraries of Italy the whole number of books read was 988,510; of these 183,528 related to mathematics and the natural sciences, 122,496 to history and philology, 261,689 to general literature, 193,973 to jurisprudence and law, 70,537 to morals and philosophy, 54,491 were theological and sacred works, and 101,797 were cyclopædias.

—The very convincing exposure by Mr. John Bartlett, compiler of "Familiar Quotations," of the literary robbery committed on him by Mr. Hain Friswell, seems to be accepted on the other side of the water as conclusive of Mr. Friswell's guilt. Readers of Mr. Bartlett's letter in our issue of Feb. 7, of this year, are informed as to the magnitude and the unblushing impudence of Mr. Friswell's offence. It is a crime that book-makers had invented before Guttemberg invented movable types, or one would incline to the theory that the shocking example of the editors and sub-editors of newspapers had corrupted the honesty of authors.

CHANCELLORSVILLE.[*]

The two years that have elapsed since the surrender at Appomattox Court House have taught us, among other things, not to be sanguine in our expectations of value in each new book upon the war. Bad as many of the books of this kind that have been written at the North have been, those that have been written at the South have usually been worse. The normal inferiority of Southern literary efforts has been accompanied in their accounts of their doings in the late rebellion with such reckless disregard of truth and such insane boasting, that one no more thinks of placing Harry Gilmor's book, for instance, in his collection of material for the history of the war, than he does of placing "Gulliver's Travels" among his books of geography. And yet a good thing has at last come out of the peculiar Nazareth which lies below Mason and Dixon's line. A most excellent book has been written by Captain Hotchkiss and Colonel Allan, who were formerly officers of the staff of the Second Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia, in other words, the corps commanded by Stonewall Jackson till his death. This book, published under the title which is given below, is the best book of its class, and the most valuable contribution to the history of the war of which we have any knowledge. It is a monograph, as its name imports, and it is precisely the sort of book that is wanted. Summaries of the campaigns of different generals and armies and of the war are plenty enough already. What we wish for now is books that will enable us to become familiarly acquainted with each important battle. "Chancellorsville" is just such a book, and it is so thoroughly satisfactory that it is delightful to be led to believe by the form of the title that the same or equally competent hands are to illustrate the other battle-fields of Virginia.

The story of Chancellorsville is not pleasant reading for Northern men as Northern men. That must be admitted at the outset. All things considered, it was the most glorious battle for the South and the most disgraceful battle for the North that was fought during the war. The larger army was beaten by the smaller, the army that divided into two parts was beaten by the army that divided into three parts. The army that first placed itself on the flank of its adversary gained nothing by the brilliant manœuvre, and presently had its own flank effectively turned and crushed. As a final and crowning disgrace, "the finest army on the planet" was cooped up in its intrenchments and then driven fairly from them by a vastly less numerous body of men.

But though it is true that the story of Chancellorsville is a mortifying story for Northern men, it is no less true that it is an intensely interesting story for the student. For six days the two great armies of the North and South were in presence of each other, and often actually engaged. The stern fighting of those days was not the mere shock of one mass of brave men meeting another, like the melee in the "Gentle and Free Passage of Arms at Ashby de la Zouche." Nor was it like Fredericksburg or Gettysburg, where gallant storming columns pressed in vain on positions too strong for them to carry. Still less was it like the common run of battles in our war, where the vicious parallel order was followed, and the only question was which could bear the hard pounding longest. There is not a passage in the history of the rebellion in which more genius in conception and more energy and skill in execution were displayed than in the operations about Chancellorsville in the spring of 1863, when the Virginian forest was just bursting into leaf.

No faithful account of the campaign of Chancellorsville could be otherwise than interesting; but Captain Hotchkiss and Colonel Allan have done their work so admirably that their account is fascinating. It might have been pardoned if they had indulged in some glorification in writing on such a theme, but the tone of their book is all that could possibly be asked. Their moderation and their abstinence from fine writing are eminently creditable, and there is not a word or sentence in the book that even approaches to being offensive. The foreigners who visited their army and write about what they saw might well learn a lesson of good taste from them.

A careful examination of the principal authorities upon this campaign, and a comparison of the results derived therefrom with the contents of this book, lead directly to the conclusion that it is altogether accurate and trustworthy. No man can ever say that any account of any great series of operations is absolutely free from error; but we believe this to be one of the most faithful accounts of a great struggle that was ever written. It is written in good, simple English, and that is enough to say before passing to a more particular notice of its contents.

The action about Chancellorsville has three matters of special interest—the movement by which Hooker placed the bulk of his army on the left flank of Lee, the movement by which Jackson turned and crushed Hooker's right, and the battle of May 3, which ended in the capture of Chancellorsville by the Southern army. Of subordinate interest, but hardly less importance, was the check received by the advance of our army, near Tabernacle Church, on the 1st of May. Up to that time the tide of our success seemed to be at the flood. There and then the tide turned, and from that time the ebb was strong and its velocity rapidly increased.

From the first twenty pages of the book we learn little that we did not know before. The most noteworthy statements contained in them are the assertions that in the winter of 1862–3 the alphabet of the Federal signals was discovered by the enemy; that the staff of the Army of Northern Virginia was then made a complete organization by itself; and that the artillery of the same army was consolidated into one corps at about the same time. The authors speak of the discipline of their army at that time in higher terms than General Lee, according to some authorities, has sometimes used about it.

It has been commonly, and we think truly, charged upon Southern officers and authors, that it has been their practice to understate the number of their own troops and to overstate the number of ours. No such charge can be brought against the authors of this book. On the contrary, they give to General Hooker's army a total smaller by some ten thousand than Mr. Swinton assigns to it, while their estimate of the effective of Lee's army seems to exceed Swinton's by about seven thousand. The Northern writer makes the proportion of the two armies to be as 24 to 10, the Southern as 20 to 10. The proportion is bad enough for us at best; but the difference is material when we are counting men by ten thousands.

It is well known that General Hooker conceived a plan of considerable merit for placing his army on General Lee's left flank, and forcing him to come out of his elaborate lines about Fredericksburg, behind which (if we may accept the somewhat extravagant assertion of Messrs. Hotchkiss and Allan) "the Confederate army was as secure from attack in front as Wellington at Torres Vedras." His execution of this plan was good, and even brilliant, and the manner of it is well told in the book before us; but this is familiar matter, and we pass from it to the check which our army met with near Tabernacle Church, the immediate cessation of the advance, and the withdrawal to the lines constructed about Chancellorsville. This event of the campaign has always been matter of special wonder to those who have had any knowledge of the facts. Indeed, so mysterious has it been that Mr. Swinton seems to have felt himself reduced to the utterly unsatisfactory suggestion that General Hooker's conduct was actuated by an impulse of romantic generosity. It is not easy to believe that the fabulous "chivalrous courtesy" of the commander of the English troops at Fontenoy was imitated on an enormous scale beyond the Rappahannock, and we look with the liveliest interest to this book for an explanation of the enigma. We find in it enough to satisfy us that General Hooker, though he committed one of the most woful errors ever committed in war, was not guilty of such fatuity as is commonly supposed. He made a terrible mistake; but it is not true, as we believe is generally supposed, that his successful advance was checked by what was, comparatively speaking, a mere handful of men.

On the morning of Friday, May 1, General Hooker commenced his movement from Chancellorsville toward Fredericksburg and Lee's left flank. He moved a little less than forty thousand men, on the river road, the plank road, and the old turnpike, and he held in reserve, beside his cavalry, a force which could not have been much less than thirty thousand men, the greater part of which was disposed within a radius of one mile from Chancellorsville. His advance met with but little opposition until it approached the position taken up by the Confederates near the junction of the plank and turnpike roads with the old Mine road, about three miles east of Chancellorsville. This line, it appears from the book before us, Anderson had "busily fortified," and it also appears that there were rifle-pits on Smith's Hill—a height to the right and rear of the Confederate position. These facts are not to be lost sight of. More than this. Our authors tell us that this line was occupied by three out of the four divisions of Jackson's corps, by Anderson's division of Longstreet's corps, and by three of the four brigades of Law's division of the same corps—a force amounting in the whole to about forty thousand men, and all under the general command of Jackson. These facts are of the utmost importance. They amount to this: that about a third of the Federal army was advancing through an unknown country, under nobody in particular, against about an equal number of Confederate troops, established in a fortified position in a country perfectly familiar to them, and commanded by the most brilliant general that the war had yet developed. It was the old, old story—a fraction of the Union army, under command of subordinates, advanced against the bulk of the Southern army, under the command of a man who was little short of a magician in his control of his troops.

[*] "Chancellorsville." By Jed. Hotchkiss, late Captain and Topographical Engineer, Second Corps, A.N.V., and William Allan, late Lieutenant-Colonel and Chief of Ordnance, Second Corps, A.N.V. New York: D. Van Nostrand. 1867.

The first result was what might have been expected. The active Jackson did not content himself with standing on the defensive, but promptly took the offensive. He did not wait for the development of the Federal advance, but took the initiative himself before the preliminary movements on our side were completed. The second result was natural enough, but not what might have been expected from "Fighting Joe Hooker." Such of our troops as were first engaged fought bravely enough, but the great flanker presently caused a brigade or so to appear on the right of our advance, and that was enough, melancholy as it may be to write the words. Instead of supporting his advance with the great mass of troops which he held in reserve, our fighting general ordered a withdrawal of his troops to the position which they had occupied in the morning. After gaining such an advantage of position as would have given assured victory to Frederick the Gerat, he caused his troops to retire, and made every man in his army feel that their forced marches had been made in vain, and took from every soldier the élan of successful advance. The best criticism on the soundness of his reasons for this retrograde movement, namely, that he feared that his forces might be encountered by the enemy while debouching from the woods, and before they had time to deploy, may be found in the subsequent achievements of the army of Lee.

As our authors say, as the Federal troops retreated the whole Confederate line advanced and followed them closely to their breastworks, which were only from half a mile to a mile from Chancellorsville. Here our troops took up a position which was strong both by nature and by the fortifications which they had thrown up. The line ran, for the greater portion of its length, parallel to the plank road, but the left, which was the weakest portion of it, was retired at an obtuse angle, and the extreme right of the line was bent back in a semicircular crotchet. About sixty-four thousand Union troops, besides Pleasanton's cavalry, were disposed in this position, while the main body of the Confederate army, amounting to between forty and forty-five thousand men, were concentrated in front of our left and left centre. In this position both armies passed the night of Friday, May 3.

The morning of the following day was occupied by the Confederate leaders in planning a deed of dreadful note. The Federal position was too strong to justify an attack in front. Jackson, fertile in expedients, suggested a movement of his entire command round the right of the opposing army, and an attack on Hooker's right and rear. Lee hesitated to adopt a plan which would leave him for several hours with only about sixteen thousand men in presence of the whole right wing of the Federal army. With an audacity which he had never displayed before, and which he never displayed afterward, he gave his approval to the suggestion, and the movement began early in the morning.

The distance marched by Jackson, from the point where he left the Confederate position, on the plank road east of Chancellorsville, to the limit of his westward march, a point of the old turnpike west of the Federal position, was eleven miles or more, and this distance was somewhat increased by the fact that he often left the main roads to avoid the deep mud. Every step of his movement may be followed on No. 3 of the admirable maps with which the authors have enriched their book. While he was making this long march through dense forests and over wood roads, with 26,000 men and his artillery and trains, the Federal commander lay quiet in his lines, calling up the First Corps with its 17,000 men from the neighborhood of Fredericksburg, examining his position in person, and rectifying certain details which he considered faulty. As early, at least, as nine o'clock in the morning of this eventful day, he received information of the movement of Jackson which led him to suspect its object. His suspicions might well have been confirmed by the results of a reconnoissance in force made by Sickles, the commander of the Third Corps. But he seems to have made up his mind that the enemy must be retreating, and to have inverted the information he received into evidence in support of that theory. Two years of fighting had not been sufficient to teach him that the Southern army was not wont to retreat without firing a shot; but he had not learned the lesson that he might have learned from Gaines's Mills and Thoroughfare Gap and the Antietam. The great deception practised by Frederick upon Soubise at Rosbach was here repeated upon him, and he appears to disadvantage in comparison with Soubise, for the French general was no more completely deceived, and he moved his troops with all the rapidity in his power on what he supposed was his retreating enemy, while Hooker kept his masses quiet, though the frequent demonstrations which Lee made all that day along his front proved to him that at least a rear-guard of the Southern army was near his lines.

When Jackson reached the plank road, west of Chancellorsville, he halted and inspected the Union lines from a commanding hill. He then ordered his command to move a little further to the north-west, that he might deliver his attack completely in rear as well as flank. When he reached the old turnpike he turned sharply to the right, moved eastward along that road for three-quarters of a mile, and there, at a distance of three-quarters of a mile from the right of the Federal line, he deployed his command to the right and left of the road, in three lines, covering a front of about a mile and three-eighths. Between five and six o'clock in the afternoon all was ready. Twenty-six thousand men were in order of battle within rifle-shot of the men who formed the extreme right of our army, and they, poor fellows, had stacked their arms and were eating what was to many of them their last meal. All was silence where Jackson and his men were, and it was in this lull before the storm that Hooker telegraphed to Sedgwick: "We know the enemy is flying, trying to save his trains—two of Sickles's divisions are among them." This message reached Sedgwick near Fredericksburg at 7.05 P.M., and it was just before six o'clock that Jackson gave the order to advance. What followed is but too well known; but we must find place for a few lines from the picturesque description which the authors give us of the scene that was presented as the curtain rose:

> "Just before six o'clock Jackson gave the order to advance. As swiftly as the brushwood would permit the lines moved forward. The forest was full of game, which, startled from their hiding-places by the unusual presence of man, ran in numbers to and over the Federal lines. Deer leaped over the works at Talley's and dashed into the wood behind. The Federal troops had, in most cases, their arms stacked, and were eating supper. All danger was thought to be over for the night. The startled game gave the first intimation of Jackson's approach. But so little was it respected or believed, that the suggestion was treated as a jest. Presently the bugles were heard through which orders were passed along the Confederate lines. This excited still more remark. Ere it had been long discussed, however, there came the sound of a few straggling shots from the skirmishers, then a mighty cheer, and in a moment more Jackson was upon them. A terrible volley from his line of battle was poured among the Union troops ere they could recover from their surprise. Those in line returned a scattered fire, others seized their arms and attempted to form. Officers tried to steady their men and lead them to meet the attack. All was in vain" (p. 48).

The Confederates marched straight on, killing, wounding, and capturing as they advanced, for about two miles. Then the approach of night, the gallantry with which some Federal artillery was used, and the confusion produced in their own formation by the difficulty of the country and the tumult of swift victory, combined to make them pause. It was while Jackson was reforming his front line, and preparing to achieve still more decided successes, that he received his death-wounds. The story of the manner in which he received his wounds and was carried from the field is told in a few striking words which bring the whole scene before us.

The success of Jackson had been immense from every point of view. He had inflicted upon our army an immense loss in every way. He had captured much material and many men, and he had rendered the whole Eleventh Corps a source of weakness instead of strength. He had shaken, if he had not destroyed, the confidence of our army in its leader, and he had impaired its morale, for the time, to an incalculable extent. It is needless to say how his army must have contemplated itself and its leader after such an exploit. Finally, there were comprised in the ground which he had taken some heights which overlooked the right of Hooker's line, and were the key to his position.

The death of Jackson was a terrible price for the South to pay for this or any other success; but it is not easy to believe, as he did, that if he had remained unhurt a few hours longer, he would have cut the communication of our army with the United States Ford. But into such a region of speculation it is not proper to enter here. His loss was never made good to the South. The wound which Joe Johnston received at Seven Pines was thought by many a blessing in disguise, for it placed Lee in command; but they had no such consolation in the case of Jackson. When they carried him to his grave "at Lexington, in the valley of Virginia," they parted from the man who had no equal as an executive officer among the Southern soldiers of the Great Rebellion.

We have dwelt at some length upon two portions of the history of this campaign, because the former is comparatively little understood, and much interesting information in regard to it, and correction of erroneous impressions, are contained in the book before us, and because the latter is one of the great exploits not only of our war, but of all war, and has a dramatic finish and completeness of the action in the death of the leader who devised and executed it. Of what remains we must speak very briefly.

The stubborn action of May 3, which closed with the victory of the Confederates and the capture of Chancellorsville at 10 A.M., is described by Messrs. Hotchkiss and Allan with the greatest clearness and minuteness, and in a perfectly satisfactory manner. On this day Hooker was taught, if he had not understood before, the folly which he was guilty of when he abandoned the better position near Tabernacle Church on the 1st of May, and the importance of the loss which he had suffered the day before in permitting Jackson to turn his flank and wrest the heights at Talley's from the Eleventh Corps. When the battle was over, and he had returned inglorious to his camp at Falmouth, he may have thought with bitter recollection of the way in which he had seen the crossing of a river and the attack of a flank of an army in position carried to a successful issue, less than a year before, by the same generals who had beaten him now, and blushed to think that he had refused or neglected to learn from them. A fraction of the energy and persistence displayed by Lee and Jackson at Gaines's Mills must have made the movement of Hooker on Lee's left near Fredericksburg, especially when we consider its incidental advantages in uncovering Banks's Ford, and shortening the communication with Sedgwick by twelve miles, one of direful portent for the enemy.

In discussing so interesting a subject with so thoroughly satisfactory a book at hand the pen runs away with us, and we must leave untouched the authors' equally clear and soldierly account of the movements about Fredericksburg, where the left wing of our army under Sedgwick was operating, while the main body of the army fought or listened to the sound of the fighting, which was the case with thousands of our men near Chancellorsville.

There are five maps in this book of the highest order of merit, "showing the topography of the country and the successive positions of both armies, prepared, for the most part, by the direction of General Lee immediately after the battle." They are invaluable for the study of the campaign of Chancellorsville, the operations about Fredericksburg included, and almost equally valuable for the study of Burnside's battle of Fredericksburg. Should this book pass to a second edition, as we hope it may and to many after that, the authors would do well to indicate more frequently in the text the number of the map to which they are referring as their narrative proceeds.

"Chancellorsville" is appropriately finished by a most interesting sketch of the last days of Jackson, written by Dr. Hunter McGuire, formerly the medical director of Jackson's corps, an accomplished and amiable man, whom one officer, at least, of the Union army remembers with kindness for courteous attentions shown by him to a wounded prisoner. This sketch is pronounced by the authors to be the most faithful and accurate account now in existence of the wounds and death of Stonewall Jackson.

Serpents in the Dove's Nest. By Rev. John Todd, D.D. (Boston: Lee & Shepard.)—Two articles, reprinted from The Congregationalist, on the crime of abortion—not simply the refuge of the vulgar, but the scarce concealed practice, even habit, of the respectable. The private experience of almost any of us can supply instances, partly of the sort which involve dishonor if a child be born, largely of matrons who dread the pains of childbirth or the cares of an increased progeny. Physicians only know the full extent of this dreadful immorality, and in their hands mainly, we are sure, lies the power to repress it, since its roots are in the general ignorance of physical laws. Unhappily, to effect an abortion one need not resort to those doctors who advertise their soulless specialty, and who, from time to time, are exposed by the death of their victims, dragged before the courts, and visited with proper reprobation by a virtuous public. Too often the "regular" practitioner, whose standing is unequivocal, is particeps criminis, it may be in the sacred capacity of family physician.

Just now the subject is attracting a great deal of attention; hence the natural inference that the evil is growing. It may be so, but it is not proved—not even proved, as Dr. Todd insists, that the New England ancestry "never were spotted by the blood of innocents," and "never quenched life immortal for the sake of ease or fashion." Nor is there a definite and inflexible relation of cause and effect between abortion at the present day and the (assumed) infecundity of our native population. Dr. Todd seems to hold up the minister's wife, and the Irishwoman who breeds like a rabbit, as the pattern women of the age. But is a large family always or ever proof of chastity and continence? What is certain is, that abortion in every stage is incredibly common among American women in good circumstances and of average education, and that the thought of it is not repugnant to hundreds who, for whatever reason, are never tempted to employ it. Not only is it common, but even flagrant. A correspondent of The Medical and Surgical Reporter, writing, if we remember, from the West, tells of seeing an instrument for abortion hanging up in plain sight, like any domestic utensil, and its purpose avowed without shame. The statistics of the immense demand from the country for the books and medicines of murderous quacks, whose headquarters are in the large cities, are enough to palsy the imagination that attempts to interpret them.

The pamphlet before us will probably increase the wholesome excitement occasioned by the articles composing it, and revive the charge of "indelicacy" against its author. We have not read the two books advertised by him and his publishers—Dr. Storer's "Why Not? A Book for Every Woman," and "The Mother and Her Offspring," by Dr. Tracy—but we believe we can confidently recommend these works to every household. The sensational title of the former, while it may invite those who are caught by quack advertisements of similar vagueness and suggestiveness, would seem to be a bar to its purchase by the soberer portion of the community, with whom, nevertheless, the book, as we have seen, may have weighty concern.

An earnest word upon this subject will be found in a pamphlet published in Portland, by E. P. Le-Prohon, M.D., entitled "Voluntary Abortion; or, Fashionable Prostitution, with some remarks upon the Operation of Craniotomy." The leading positions of this writer, who has practised for twenty-four years in this country, in three of the New England States, are, briefly, these: There is no difference (morally speaking) between feticide and infanticide; no physician is ever justified in destroying the fœtus for the sake of the mother—God, not man, being the judge of which life is the more valuable, and there being no certainty of saving the mother's life by this violence; the licentiousness of the press in publishing quack advertisements, inciting to voluntary abortion, is the immediate cause of the increase of this evil in America; the Catholic religion alone, as history proves, is capable of repressing it. No one can doubt that the point against the press is well taken; and we entreat Dr. Todd to reconsider his resolution to write no more, and to arraign first and foremost those "religious" newspapers whose prosperity is almost built on impure and utterly pernicious advertisements of the kind alluded to, such as have just been made penal in Rhode Island. Let the doctor give the names of the responsible publishers, no matter who gets "excited," and the good he may accomplish is absolutely incalculable.

The Market Assistant. By Thomas F. De Voe. (New York: Hurd & Houghton.)—The least that can be said of this book is, that it is all it purports to be. We are well aware that some, having studied the catalogue of food from the chapter on domestic animals to that on dairy and household products, may experience such a perplexing embarrassment of choice as to be ready to pronounce "assistant" a downright misnomer. But how few will find this embarrassment so objectionable as that which proceeds from confinement to a narrow range of market purchases! Is there one of the staple meats, for instance, that a never so versatile housekeeper or landlady has not some time or other loathed with all her strength? Indeed, it is not the epicure alone who sighs for new viands to devour, as Alexander for new worlds. Dyspeptic is a relative term; we are all restricted in what we eat; but the mischief is that we never learn the economy of a greater variety. This is partly, perhaps mainly, because we forget that the greater variety exists; and on this account, if on no other, Mr. De Voe has not written in vain. Recipes, with rare exceptions, he very properly leaves to the cook-books. Mrs. Putnam or Mrs. Ellis may tell how this or that article is to be served up; his business is to help you get it and not be cheated. Hence he enumerates everything that is or has within the memory of man been brought to the New York market, with some things that will perhaps be introduced hereafter. Wherever it is possible he gives their history, and culls from newspaper and other records accounts of "extraordinary specimens," the largest oyster, or fish, or turtle, the biggest haul, the mammoth cheese, and all sorts of adventures; tells you the origin of porter-house steak, explains the naming of the weak-fish, the canvas-back duck, the Rhode Island greening, mentions the use of ox-teeth in the earlier stage of dentistry—recalling what Catlin says of the mine which he unwittingly revealed to the dentists when he described the above-ground Indian cemeteries, with their circles of skulls, whose teeth were presently to do Christian service; and assigns to Dr. Franklin the credit of creating the broom corn culture, which was so marked a feature of the Connecticut River Valley before tobacco usurped its place. "A lady of Philadelphia," says his authority, the Washington Sun of 1837, "held an imported clothes-whisk in her hand, and, while examining it as a novelty, he found a single grain still attached to the stalk; this he planted," and we know the result.

The author makes some sensible remarks on the disadvantage of employing servants to do the marketing for their employers—a practice probably more in vogue in this city than in Boston or in Philadelphia, where the market-houses are much more conveniently distributed, and, if they cannot boast the same profusion or the same cheapness, since New York outbids them in their own stalls, are infinitely superior in cleanliness, roominess, and wholesome ventilation. In the circumstances, Mr. De Voe does all that he can for those who are doomed to thread the labyrinth of Washington or Fulton Market, and his book is emphatically the assistant of those whose means are limited. The thrifty, generally rotund mistresses who block our ferry-boats and horse-cars with their baskets every morning, coming from Harlem, Brooklyn, Hoboken, and Jersey City, will find here (as many of them as can read English) an amusing vade mecum for the tedious journey.

Homespun; or, Five-and-Twenty Years Ago. By Thomas Lackland. (New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1867.)—This book must have been written out of a free heart by one whose love for country life is very genuine. There is no evidence that the author's inspiration came rather from his publishers than from his theme, as is the case with many books that we are asked to read. The volume is divided into three parts, entitled Penates, Vicinage, and Bucolics. Under the first head we have brief and charming essays upon rainy days, garden-work, barn-life, huckleberryings, etc.; under the second, others just as pleasant upon the country store and school and fair, the town meeting and the poor-house; and for Bucolics we have talk of farmers' wives and sons and daughters, the hired man, etc. On first reading these essays we were almost persuaded that we had seen the book before, but as it bears no evidence of being a republication, we have come to the conclusion that our impression arose from the fact that the author was describing with remarkable fidelity things which we too had much enjoyed. The book has this advantage over most books of its class, that it is intensely human. Not content with speaking of trees and fields, of horses and cattle, it delights in men and women, and it is of them in their relations to the life of a New England farm that the author continually speaks. The book is all the better because it is written by one who knows the city quite as advisedly as the country, and so can speak of the two successfully by way of contrast and comparison. Yet while the author aims to recite the praises of country life, he never seems to feel it necessary to underrate the advantages of the city in order to achieve his end. Thomas Lackland, whoever that may be, is a person whose reading has been fortunate for his book, for it has enabled him to grace its pages with many choice quotations, well quoted to the illustration of his various themes. It is almost as good as going into the country for a few days to read his pleasant little book.

Benedicite. Illustrations of the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as Manifested in his Works. By G. Chaplin Child, M.D. Two volumes in one. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1867.)—The title of this book will not at once suggest its character; but its fitness will at once appear when the author's object has been discovered. The "Benedicite" forms a part of the song of the "Three Holy Children," an apocryphal addition to the Book of Daniel, which has been incorporated with the service of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The object of this volume is to offer a series of illustrations of the power, wisdom, and goodness of God as they are suggested by the verses of the "Benedicite." These verses call upon the heavens and the earth, the showers and dew, winter and summer, frost and cold, etc., to praise the Lord. It includes in its ascriptions almost every form of organized life—vegetable, animal, and human life—together with the forces of the inanimate world, and furnishes a glorious text for a discourse on the perfection of the world. Dr. Chaplin has performed his task with a combined modesty and an enthusiasm that bespeak for him a generous perusal of his book. Making no claim to originality, it does not enter into the disputed questions of the times, and is thus saved from that odium theologicum which is so painfully characteristic of most books of this class. The spirit of the book throughout is excellent. It must not be thought that it is another book of natural theology, for it is not. It does not try to prove the existence of God from natural phenomena; but, taking it for granted, goes on to illustrate his attributes in many striking ways; and its author is not such a bigot that he cannot draw his illustrations from Darwin with as much confidence as if he were an accredited defender of the faith instead of an impartial seeker after truth. The author is apparently a member of the Established Church in England; but his work is not sectarian, and is calculated to afford pleasure and profit to all that read it in the spirit in which it has been written.

The Indigestions. By Thomas King Chambers, Honorary Physician to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, etc. (Philadelphia: Henry C. Lea. 1867.)—There are few treatises upon subjects purely medical which can with advantage be put into the hands of the general reader. It is desirable, of course, that all should know something about the functions of the human organism, but few laymen get any satisfaction in reading about diseases, their symptoms, treatment, etc. We are disposed to make an exception, however, in favor of the work of Dr. Chambers on "The Indigestions." The author of this charmingly written book is one of the few medical writers able to present their ideas always in an agreeable and even an attractive form, and his mode of discussing the various causes of indigestion is philosophical and in the highest degree physiological, and conveys a kind of information interesting as well as useful to all. The chapters on indigestion of different alimentary articles and upon some of the causes of indigestion, such as eating too little, eating too much, sedentary habits, abuse of alcohol, tobacco, etc., would produce much good if they were generally studied. The mass of the people have yet to learn that the condition known under the name of dyspepsia is almost always produced by some flagrant and constant violation of physiological laws, and is to be relieved by removal of its exciting and predisposing causes and not by medication. Physicians, also, have much to learn in this regard; but the rising generation is becoming quite progressive, and medical men are more and more disposed to study and treat diseases from a physiological point of view. One great advantage in Dr. Chambers's book is that his physiological ideas are well up to the present condition of the science.

Treatment of Fractures of the Lower Extremity by the Use of the Anterior Suspensory Apparatus. By N. R. Smith, M.D., Professor of Surgery in the University of Maryland. (Baltimore: Kelly & Piet. 1867.)—This volume is not intended as a complete treatise upon fractures, but, as the author states, it is rather an explanation and defense of his own peculiar views in relation to the mechanical treatment of fractures of the lower extremities. These views are not new, being essentially the same as those entertained by his distinguished father, Nathan Smith, of New Haven, and which were given to the public in a volume published in 1831. Up to this moment, however, the method of treatment recommended by these gentlemen has not been very generally accepted. Indeed, the prevailing opinion of surgeons has seemed to be that the treatment of broken thighs by "suspension" was only adapted to certain exceptional cases, and especially to certain examples of gunshot fractures. Dr. Smith has long occupied a position in which his opinions have commanded respect, and this book will be read with interest by American surgeons. To the young surgeon the speciousness of the arguments will, no doubt, often carry conviction; but to the older members of a profession so practical as surgery conviction only comes by seeing.

The Adventures of Sir Lyon Bouse. By the Author of the "New Gospel of Peace." (New York: American News Company.)—Sir Lyon Bouse is supposed to have visited this country during the civil war, and to have looked at us through the eye-glasses of a very British tourist. "I arrived in New York," he says, "on the 25th of November, 1861. Directly I landed I saw a mob. Just as I expected. They were armed with whips, and wore brass badges with numbers—signs of a secret association, I suppose. They shouted and yelled at us as we came off the ship, thus affording an evidence, before I was well ashore, of the American hatred of everything British." And so he goes on giving unprejudiced opinions of American men and manners, experiencing disgust at the lack of great and small game in Central Park, disagreeably surprised at the absence of conductors on the stages on Broadway, equally astonished and enraged at an attempt, on the part of an American sitting at the forward end of the stage, to rob him of six cents and share it with his accomplice on the box, and somewhat discontented because, though his note-book was ready, no tobacco was chewed by the Americans at the breakfast table of his hotel, and in every way disappointed and shocked. There are some sharp things in the book, which, by the way, is a small pamphlet with scarlet covers; and if any one enjoys hearing "You 're another" said to the stupid-headed critic of American follies, he may find in this trifle half an hour's enjoyment of a certain sort.

St. Twel'mo; or, The Cuneiform Cyclopædist of Chattanooga. By C. H. Webb, author of "Liffith Lank." (New York: C. H. Webb; American News Company. 1867.)—How much "St. Elmo" deserves ridicule and how hard it must have been to make an effective travesty of it sufficiently appear from this, that Mr. Webb has been able to incorporate with "St. Twel'mo" whole pages of "St. Elmo." His premeditated absurdities are so exactly in keeping with Miss Evans's unconscious silliness that only one who remembers "St. Elmo" would ever suspect in "St. Twel'mo" diversity of authorship—to use Mr. Webb's own joke, "a little Evans leaveneth the whole lump." We have not critically compared Mr. Webb's former burlesque with this one, but "St. Twel'mo" appears to us almost as amusing as "Liffith Lank;" not quite as good, for to burlesque Miss Evans's book properly there would be necessary a far more protracted course of the "jim-jims" than that described by Mr. Webb in Harper's the other day, and we can hardly require a humorist to make delirium tremens a habit, even for the sake of getting on a level with the ravings of Miss Evans. A good deal of Mr. Webb's fun is aimless, as fun ought to be, but in his serious use of it he does a service to the cause of sense in literature—a service which, if he likes, he can vastly increase—that entitles him to thanks.

Christie's Faith. (Harpers.)—A fair novel, as novels go. Scene in London, partly in middle, mainly in low life; plot constructed with considerable skill; characters in good contrast, but both false to nature in many particulars, especially, perhaps, the character of the aunt and that of Teddy; dialogue lively enough, but much of its expression is quite too fine for its grade of life; descriptions somewhat diffuse. The story will interest, however, by the incidents of its plot and the vivacity of its characters.

Recent Republications.—In "Maga Social Papers," as in the preceding volume of his Railway Classics, Mr. Putnam shows the excellence of his judgment. He has selected fifteen articles from Putnam's Monthly, all of which are entertaining, and few not instructive. The colored race is well treated, having assigned to it an essay on "African Proverbial Philosophy," and another on "Negro Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern." The latter has a permanent value, and we regard its resurrection as very timely. It may profitably be read in conjunction with Mr. Higginson's "Spirituals," in the June Atlantic.

So long as diamond print is to be used by our publishers, they can scarcely employ it better than has been done by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields in their complete edition of the "Poetical Works of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow." They are all there—the verses which have made his name house hold in England above even native poets—excepting only and of course the translation of Dante. But the five sonnets expressive of his feelings while engaged upon this life-labor are there. And last of all is placed the clattering Christmas carol called "Noël," which reminds the reader that Mr. Longfellow was once professor of modern languages and belles-lettres.

Of the various editions of Dickens which have occasioned so much controversy we cannot pretend to speak singly as each volume appears, but rather once for all. The Globe edition of Hurd & Houghton recommends itself in every respect except its bulk; the Ticknor & Fields Diamond, on the other hand, is dangerously fine in print, and ought properly to be a reference edition, rather than a pocket companion, in these days when everybody reads in the cars. The Peterson edition has a familiar look that compensates, perhaps, for its unpretending typography, and is well enough bound in green cloth to suit almost any library.

HORACE GREELEY AND JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE expressions of feeling called forth by Mr. Greeley's performances at Richmond last week have been sufficiently strong and sufficiently numerous to warrant us in saying that, whatever difference of opinion there may be as to Mr. Greeley's motives, there is none at all as to the repulsiveness and inexpediency of his conduct. The majority of the Republican papers ascribe his appearance as Davis's first bondsman to a love of notoriety which has been growing on him for some years, and which now finds expression in one way and now in another. They appear to think that, having achieved as an editor all the distinction within his reach, he sighs for the possession of some odder title to fame, and wants to connect his name with some startling political monstrosity, or "curiosity," as his friend Barnum would call it; that he has the craving for participation in any character in practical life by which so many men of eminence as thinkers and scholars have been afflicted, and not being able to secure it in the ordinary conventional channels, seeks it through the "sensational." Others explain his course by ascribing it to still loftier and more daring ambition, and support their theory by an elaborate and highly entertaining analysis of his character, which we have neither the space nor the inclination to reproduce. The examination of men's motives is a difficult and delicate task, which even the most skilful hand can hardly perform without doing injustice, and it is tolerably certain that no revelations which the chemists of any party are likely to make about Mr. Greeley's mental or moral composition shake the faith of the farmers in him. Partly owing to his long and unshaken devotion to the great principle of freedom, partly to the plainness, directness, and bluntness of his style, and partly to the innocent expression of his face, he has secured a hold upon the confidence of the agricultural population which nothing short of downright betrayal of the cause to which his life has been devoted will weaken, so that even a large proportion of those who are most disgusted by his kindness to Jefferson Davis will not ascribe it to low motives. He might do worse things than this and yet find himself popular in the "unpaved districts."

But we do not need to show that in bailing Jefferson Davis he was actuated by any purely selfish motives in order to prove him guilty of that kind of blunder which, when committed by a man in his position, deserves almost as severe punishment as if it were a piece of sheer baseness. He would and probably will defend himself by saying that the first necessity of the country at the present moment is peace and reconciliation, that Davis was no more guilty than the rest of the rebels, that the war was in reality only a rough mode of deciding between two contending principles, that no good purpose can now be served by punishing anybody, and that the sooner we can lead the South to forgive and forget, the better will it be for all parties, and that there is no better mode of doing this than having a prominent anti-slavery man like himself help to get the chief of the rebellion restored to liberty.

Now, this is a statement of just half the truth. The restoration of peace and harmony between North and South is no doubt of great importance, but the means taken to secure it is of just as great importance. If there be anything which the press, the pulpit, the prayers, the hymns, the speeches, the conversations of the North have been emphatic in affirming during the last six years, it is that the late war was not merely a contest for empire, as Earl Russell called it, not merely a struggle to settle a political difference, but a struggle between moral right and moral wrong. It was on this special ground that the invectives hurled against France and England were justified. These countries were told over and over again, that were the war simply a war for the Union we should neither ask nor expect their sympathy. It was not to be expected that they should greatly care whether the North American continent was covered by one political organization or by two. To Frenchmen and Englishmen the American flag from a purely political point of view was no more than the Brazilian or Paraguayan flag.

We took far higher than political ground. We said that the rebellion was an immoral enterprise, conceived and carried out not by mistaken men, but by bad and unscrupulous men, animated by corrupt and selfish motives, and determined to gain their ends at whatever cost or suffering to others. We said, too, that not only was the enterprise immoral, but that the means deliberately employed to ensure its success were inconceivably wicked, and involved the commission of the foulest crimes—perjury, treason, murder, and robbery. Nowhere has the deliberate villany of the Confederate leaders been more uproariously exposed than in the columns of The Tribune, and in fact it is this very villany which has been always used by Mr. Greeley as a reply to the statement that the South voluntarily seceded from the Union, which he has always maintained stoutly she had a right to do.

It was, therefore, not solely because the South sought to leave the Union, but because she sought to leave it by vile means, for vile ends, that we invoked the sympathy of the civilized and enlightened world for the North. We said justice and humanity and truth, and not the Union only, were at stake in our struggle, and that the place of all good men, whatever their political creed might be, was on our side. If anybody wants proof of all this, let him take up the files of The Tribune during the last six years, and read the leading articles. The struggle being now over, Mr. Greeley sets us the example of going to the South not to relieve the sufferings of our late enemies—for this as Christians we are bound to do; nor yet to assure them of forgiveness and peace—for of this everybody sees the wisdom; but of testifying to them, by unasked and officious politeness, by offer of aid in escaping the legal consequences of their transgressions, by, in short, the usual marks of sympathy, esteem, and respect—for this is what is meant by bailing a man out of jail when you have no personal acquaintance with him, and he neither asks nor needs your aid—that there has been nothing in their conduct to offend our consciences or lower them morally in our estimation. In other words, when Horace Greeley went down to put his name on Davis's bond, he said to all the world, "I, the most prominent representative of Northern feeling and opinion, who have had, perhaps, a larger share than any other man in bringing about the struggle which has just terminated, do hereby declare that my opinion of you, Jefferson Davis, is higher than ever it was; that I see in you simply an unfortunate enemy; that I look on your course during the past four years, your slaughterings, starvings, hangings, your spoliation, your railings and threatenings, as simply parts of the process for settling an honest difference of opinion; that you have done nothing and said nothing and sought nothing which a good and pure and high-minded man might not do and say and seek; and that the denunciations of you and your cause on moral grounds with which the Northern press, and my own paper the foremost, have been filled during the war, were all gammon, the wretched, frothy rhetoric, 'all sound and fury, signifying nothing,' which we editors make our living by producing and selling; that when Northern preachers prayed for God's blessing on our arms they prayed for the divine interposition in a game of pitch and toss, in which the right was on neither side; and that when Northern young men went out to fight, as they believed, for something nobler and holier still than either flag or country or laws, they fought and died under a sentimental delusion. You and I are too old to be humbugged in this way; as 'practical men,' we know that in cases of this kind the masses have to be kept up to the fighting by fine words, but that war is simply a means of settling the construction of legal instruments, and that when all is over nothing is more natural than that the leaders should embrace, as you and I do, over the fresh graves and amidst the ruined homes."

We have, as our readers know, opposed all forms of persecution of the South. We have objected to confiscation and to the infliction of every other penalty not clearly called for to secure peace and good order. But, then, we believe in the existence of such a thing as national dignity, national self-respect, and national conscience; and we say that a decent regard for these things makes Mr. Greeley's performances at Richmond—all except his speech, which was able and sensible—simply detestable, and calls for a more emphatic reprobation than they have yet received, although we have no doubt whatever as to the intensity of the disgust with which the public generally regards them. No man could in private life go on for years accusing another of fraud and perjury and pursuing him with the utmost rigor of the law, and then, when he had got judgment against him, invite him to his own house and treat him as a valued friend, without degrading and debasing himself—and what we need, of all things, is the application to the national conduct of the rules of honor and decorum which regulate the conduct of men in private life. None of us dare offer as an excuse for taking a criminal to our bosom the excuse which Mr. Greeley offers in effect for fraternizing with Davis, that there was more money to be made or comfort to be enjoyed in this way than by marking in our demeanor towards him our opinion of his morals. Mercy we might show him; assistance in rescuing him from suffering we might offer; but those marks of esteem and confidence which are reserved for honorable misfortune we dare not bestow on him; morality, justice, and decency would forbid it. Of the value of these feelings in the conduct of national life, in keeping alive the public conscience, in cherishing a healthy public opinion for the support of the law, the preservation of a high standard of public and private morality, of a high sense of the worth of character Mr. Greeley appears to have no conception, nor, we are sorry to say, have a very large proportion of the loudest bellowers amongst our reformers. It is this which accounts in part for the worship of such heroes as P. T. Barnum, because he happens to be an anti-slavery or temperance man, and for the practice of applying the foulest epithets to and accusing of the most disgraceful conduct men whom the revilers and accusers meet the next day and salute with as much cordiality as if nothing had happened. Nobody who knows how strong is the reflex action of language and of conduct on mind, can doubt that the prevailing tendency to treat moral offences as matters which ought not materially to affect our intercourse with those who commit them, and to treat our own denunciations of them as so much rhetoric and nothing more, helps to make our sense of right and wrong somewhat less acute, and to lower our estimate of what we owe to our own honor. It is not very long since a notorious embezzler of the public funds was entertained on his return from an exile which he had passed as a fugitive from justice, by a company which included a high officer of police and the chief-justice of a court of record. Similar examples of the same debased and debasing indifference to the effects of crime on character, and to the desirableness of supporting in our conduct the lofty doctrines which we all spout from platforms or publish in books or newspapers, may every day be witnessed; but Mr. Greeley has achieved the distinction of offering the world one of the most striking and very conspicuous of them all.

ARMY REFORM IN ENGLAND.

The one thing certain about the English Reform Bill seems to be that it will be passed in any shape the majority of the House desires. There is apparently no amendment which Mr. Disraeli will not accept if forced upon him. For instance, he held very tenaciously to the clause exacting two years' residence as a qualification for the franchise in boroughs, and when an amendment was threatened by Mr. Gladstone some weeks ago reducing it to one year, Mr. Disraeli issued a circular to his supporters informing them that this clause was of "vital importance," and that if it were modified he could not go on with the bill. When, however, the amendment was carried, he very coolly accepted it, though after a night's consideration, and when asked how he reconciled this course with the circular treated it as a good joke. So that it is now certain that he has no policy whatever, and that the only duty which he considers himself engaged in is the formal carriage of the bill through the House. Evidently nothing in it is "vital" as far as the ministry is concerned, and the debates begin to lose a good deal of the interest when it is known that no division will affect the position of the ministry. The probabilities are that either the personal payment of the rates will be given up or all "compound householders" will be abolished, so as to remove Mr. Gladstone's strong objection as to inequality of qualification.

The public attention in England, therefore, begins every day to be more and more turned from the question of reform to the questions with which a reformed Parliament will be expected to deal, and they are now cropping up in the present Parliament with ominous frequency. Foremost amongst these is the condition of the army. Recruits are every year getting scarcer and scarcer, and it is generally acknowledged that the force is inferior to every other in Europe in every element of efficiency except courage. The rank and file are drawn from the dregs of the population, and the officers are selected from the upper classes, undergo no preliminary training, and purchase their promotion. The reformers ask first of all for the abolition of flogging, and have succeeded after a hard fight in the present Parliament in having fifty made the maximum number of lashes, and the punishment itself restricted to two or three of the worst offences. In the reformed Parliament it will probably be struck from the Mutiny act without delay.

Next comes the mode of appointing and promoting the officers, and this is a political even more than a military question. The kind of army the Liberals want is a middle-class army, like the first standing army which existed in England—that of Cromwell—an army in which the ranks were filled by young farmers, shopkeepers, and mechanics, and the officers were men who won their grades in the ordinary way, by courage or skill, or both. This was the kind of army with which the Parliament won its battles, and which the Protector brought to a degree of perfection in drill, discipline, and armament never witnessed previously in Europe except amongst the Spaniards. It was, of course, disbanded at the Restoration, and the foundation of the present military régime was then laid. The new army was officered by "gentlemen," country squires or their sons, and the ranks were filled by their serving men, dependents, and lewd fellows of the baser sort from the great towns; and to keep this blackguard crew in order, discipline of extraordinary severity was resorted to: flogging with "the cat," the number of lashes being left to the discretion of the courts-martial, was instituted; the drill and internal economy of the regiment were committed in a great measure to the non-commissioned officers, and a line of demarcation was drawn between the officers and men such as has never been seen in any other country. As all places in the government service were then salable, military commissions became salable too; and although William III., who was horrified by the practice, made a desperate effort to abolish it, it was too powerful for him, and has survived to this day.

At that time also, and in the foregoing circumstances, originated the idea which to this hour is the foundation of the English military system—that the army is not a profession, requiring a man's sole and undivided attention, but what may be called "a light occupation" for men of some fortune and leisure, in which they will enjoy select society of their own set, and not be required to sink their gentlemanhood in "the shop." The rate of pay and the mode of life have all been arranged in accordance with this theory, and even promotion has been made a matter of purchase, the richest men rising invariably to the highest regimental positions. That the British army has acquitted itself as well as it has done is, perhaps, one of the most wonderful proofs in existence of the great qualities of the race; but, as might be expected, its great exploits are actually cited by some of the Tory orators as proofs of the value of the purchase system, just as so many other abuses have been defended by pointing out how the nation has thriven in spite of them. To put the army still more completely into the possession of the oligarchy, too, another grand absurdity has been perpetrated, that of having it governed by a commander-in-chief, exempt from responsibility to Parliament, instead of a minister of war sitting in the House of Commons. There is a minister of war, it is true, but then the commander-in-chief is independent of him, and, within the limits of the Mutiny act, may snap his fingers at him, and the commander-in-chief is always a man of aristocratic connections and devoted to the existing system. If he showed the slightest taint of liberalism, the place would be made too hot for him, and yet not a word of it would get into the newspapers. The present incumbent is the Duke of Cambridge, who is usually referred to in the House of Commons as "the illustrious Duke." He has been in one fight, Inkermann, in which he broke down, wept, and went home soon after a sadder and somewhat wiser man. But his value is incontestable, as his rank is so high that none of the numerous military cliques can bully him.

What the reformers now want is an army like that of the Commonwealth, with the pay so good and prospects so fair and punishments of such a nature that respectable young men of the middle and working classes may be induced to enter it, dismissal from which would be, as it is now in the Life Guards and in the Irish Police, and as it was amongst the Sepoys in India, a disgrace and punishment, and in which commissions would, as in France, be divided between pupils of military schools and deserving non-commissioned officers, and in which promotion would be partly by seniority and partly by merit; in other words, a democratic army. How hard a fight they are likely to have, however, may be judged from the fact that not only has the old régime that mysterious but tremendous force called in England "good society" at its back—a force which can almost arrest the administration of justice when it is fully exerted—but there is a sum of nearly thirty-five million dollars invested in commissions by the actual holders of them. Yet the question is the foremost question of reform, and must now be solved. It involves not only a most important branch of internal economy, but the position of England in Europe and the future of her colonial empire. The present military system is confessedly useless for anything but a policy strictly defensive, and contains no provision for the contingency of a sudden difference with a first-class power; besides which, the army has acquired an importance it never had before, from the fact that England's maritime supremacy has disappeared before the recent changes in the instruments of naval warfare.

The military and naval force may be said to be the only instrument of government which the aristocracy did not surrender to the middle classes in 1832, and to the possession of it the former doubtless owes a large portion of its prestige. Nothing fairly killed the French aristocracy but the proofs afforded by the war of the Revolution that hostlers and linen-drapers could command regiments and win battles. Once Soult and Murat and Junot had been seen chasing the finest troops in Europe from hard-fought fields, the value of the gentilhomme as a soldier—the one thing on which he prided himself—was gone. So there is now in England a kind of superstition, which the upper classes do all they can to foster, that the leading of soldiers is the proper business of "gentlemen," and that there is something inherently absurd in a man of "low connections" attempting such a thing; and how much the prevalence of this feeling has to do with the political supremacy of the aristocracy has, we think, never been fairly estimated. Once destroy this feeling by showing what a democratic army, even of Englishmen, can do in the field, and the political prestige of birth and rank would receive a blow such as nothing else could give it, and such as many people, the late Mr. Cobden amongst the number, have thought it impossible for anything to give it.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION AND THE GOVERNMENT OF OUR GREAT CITIES.

As the government of New York City will form, we suppose we may say the most important part of the task before the coming Constitutional Convention, and as the work of this convention will furnish, as that of its predecessor did in 1846, a model to ever so many other States, we sincerely trust that its members will divest themselves at the outset of the delusion, which the Democratic press is so fond of preaching, that localities, whether cities, towns, or villages, have a "natural right" to self-government, and that the interference of the whole community in their concerns is a sort of usurpation.

No political term has been more abused than the term "municipal independence." We have inherited it from Europe, and with it some of the fallacies which in Europe have grown up about it. The history of the idea that there is, as against the state at large, something sacred about local government, would prove a most interesting and instructive study, and would, if it were in existence just now, render us a good deal of service. The earliest states in the western world were simply cities. The Greek states were all originally cities, and Grecian history is the history of the attempts of some cities to preserve their independence as against others. Rome was a city, and the spread of the empire in the ancient world consisted mainly, at least in Europe, in the absorption of cities, or rather their subjugation, for their self-government for local purposes was not touched. The city organizations survived the downfall of the empire, and they derived fresh strength and importance during the feudal times from the fact that, being surrounded by walls, they were the only spots in Europe in which life or property was tolerably secure. The rest of the country was given up to highway robbers called barons and knights. Even after the feudal aristocracy had been overthrown and the great consolidated monarchies began to be formed, the towns were the only refuge of industrial and mental activity, and the only places in which the forms of political freedom were kept alive. Not unnaturally, therefore, there grew up the feeling that the city was a sacred political unit, and was not to be meddled with, transformed, or reformed by any power outside.

At the settlement of this country local self-government was not unnaturally made the basis of the political system, but the reason was the expediency of the thing. As a general rule, localities are best governed by their own inhabitants; but, besides the expediency of the thing, Americans imported the European tradition of "natural right," and it is now preached vigorously as part and parcel of the Democratic creed, although in our state of society it is a sheer absurdity. The inalienable right of New York or Buffalo to govern itself, well or ill as it pleases, would be a very fine and invaluable doctrine if outside the city limits there was a grasping monarch or plundering aristocracy; but the pretension, when set up against the people of the State, a quiet, peace-loving, order-loving, liberty-loving body, whose interest in the prosperity and good government of the great towns is almost as great as that of the inhabitants themselves, is simply ridiculous.

Our political unit is the State. We have never had any other. The State sovereignty lies in the people of the whole State and nowhere else. It is not and cannot be parcelled out amongst towns or cities any more than among individuals. The city of New York is, before all things, a piece of State territory. Every right, privilege, and emolument it possesses is the free gift of the State, and the only good reason for bestowing it is expediency—common everyday expediency. The ninety-five thousand voters of this city have no more divine right to govern themselves than Thomas Smith has to reign supreme in his own garden. It has been found by experience that the affairs of towns are best managed in most cases by the inhabitants of them, and, therefore, towns are allowed to govern themselves as far as possible. If it were found, however, that local government did not work well, it would be the duty of the State to put an end to it "National right" has no more to do with the matter than the nebular hypothesis.

If the members of the convention will only clear this matter up thoroughly, lay fast hold of the principle of expediency, and clear their theories of mediæval cobwebs, they will go to their work with double chance of success. If they go to it encumbered with political superstitions and the old clap-trap and fallacies which have done duty on a thousand stumps, they will probably make a bad failure and drag us all down to destruction. It must not be forgotten that in the opinion of a great many thoughtful men we are on our last legs, and if something cannot be done to improve our political tone and brace up our system we shall come to irremediable grief. Moreover, it cannot be too often repeated that the New York convention does not sit for this State alone. It is to draw up a constitution for this State, but it will supply principles to the whole Union, because it is the first to revise and pass judgment upon the great Democratic experiment of the last twenty years. It is most important to the success of democracy everywhere that it should not be, and should not appear to be, tied up by any theory whatever, or that there is any article in its creed except the one that all power comes from the consent of the governed, and that all governments should be carried on through freely and frequently elected representatives.

We propose to say something hereafter about the various plans for dealing with the problem of municipal government.

BURNT SHIPS.

O Love, sweet Love, who came with rosy sail
And foaming prow across the misty sea ;
O Love, brave Love, whose faith was full and free
That lands of sun and gold, which could not fail,
Lay in the west—that bloom no wintry gale
Could blight, and eyes whose love thine own should be,
Called thee, with steadfast voice of prophecy,
To shores unknown :

O Love, poor Love, avail
Thee nothing now thy faiths, thy braveries ;
There is no sun, no bloom ; a cold wind strips
The bitter foam from off the wave where dips
No more thy prow ; the eyes are hostile eyes ;
The gold is hidden ; vain thy tears and cries ;

THE DIGNITY OF HISTORY.

If we are to believe Mr. Carlyle, not the very Father of Lies himself could be a really first-rate historian. He, and only he of created beings, would have the necessary knowledge ; all that the family of Adam have ever been and ever done through all the generations he would know ; the sum-total of human experience he would have under his hat, as you may say, the nullities, inanities, everlasting verities and all—to put it briefly, he would be as nobody else could be, provided with the proper store of examples. The Wandering Jew whom Mr. Carlyle specifically mentions could obviously be acquainted with the doings of only a part of the race, and with them only for a matter of eighteen centuries, and he being out of the count, all mere ordinary men are a fortiori out of the count. But even Lucifer would probably fail of perfection as a historian when the question was of the requisite philosophy to teach properly by the examples in his possession. And though he were not to miss on this point, still he would undoubtedly come short and fail to "fill the bill" which Mr. Carlyle sends in to the ideal. For the Perfect in History to prove himself such and satisfy Mr. Carlyle must be the can-ning man who is able to reduce the verities to practice, who can live history for others to write, and embody his philosophy in the daily example of a perfect walk and conversation. For that business Mr. J. S. C. Abbott or anybody else is as good as Satan himself, probably better. From all which it appears that the ideal historian is a personage of very great dignity. And we may with all cheerfulness promise to give him, when he arrives, our most distinguished consideration ; plainly he will deserve it all, and the payment can probably be staved off for several generations. But the actual historian we have here among us ; he, as we know, may be Mr. Abbott, or Sir Archibald Alison, or M. Thiers, or anybody else, and it stands us in hand to be wisely incredulous and intractable when we hear him asserting the claim of his occupation and himself to superior dignity and consequent respect.

Really, the historian is a reporter. Leaving aside the matter of amusement, we do not know how the actual writer of history has been of any considerable service to his fellow-creatures except as a collector and chronicler of facts. He has always, or, at any rate, very often, attempted to be something more than this—he has been largely a fabulist ; he has dealt freely in inferences—indeed, more of his shockingly bad reputation for veracity is owing to well-meant endeavors at reasoning than is owing to his lies, pure and simple—he has philosophized ; he has been an orator and very often a rhetorician, but he has been of use to mankind solely, or almost solely, for his facts. A great part of what little value inheres in his inferences, philosophy, and what not, consists in their usefulness for purposes for which he did not intend them, as when, to make one example serve for a million, we get a fact relative to Roman superstition from the veracious tale in Livy of the clouds raining blood. So that even as a poet or a fabulist "Mr. Bos-locutus-est," as Mr. Charles Reade calls him, does duty as a reporter. For that matter ,what is Clio herself but the Proclaimer or the Reporter ?

And ages ago, when the reporter was a rare creature, it was natural enough that he should plume himself on his superiority over the non-reporting part of mankind. Even there has been in the annals of most nations a period when he might have been pardoned for feeling all the pride of the dodo ; when, for anything he knew, the species might with him become extinct. And, by-and-by, when the barbarian ceased to burn town and monastery, the period of the toga set in, and the historian discovered his pedigree and got himself a muse. But the airs of dignity which were due to the rarity of reading and writing in any language, and afterwards to the greater rarity of reading and writing in the dead languages, and to the slavish reverence with which the Ancients were regarded, are not for consideration here. They were put on by the apothecary who wrote his prescriptions in Latin, and perhaps by the divine poet who prostrated himself before Virgilius as a philosopher, and Statius as a poet, and were in no way peculiar to the historian. His claim is a claim to pre-eminence among his fellows, and has other foundations. We do not wish to speak disrespectfully of a class of writers once held in honor, and very numerous, though their best days are perhaps over, but we suppose the true theory of the historian's proverbial dignity is that which bases it on the fact that the political historian, who has stood forward as the historian, has for a long time been a reporter at service—a sort of a Jenkins in attendance upon kings and other great ones of the earth—whereby, as has been observed in the case of the private man's flunky, he has put on all the state of the master whom he has been serving. The historical Jenkins has so long followed kings and queens on royal progresses, and courtiers up and down the back-stairs of palaces, and ambassadors to foreign realms, and generals to the field, and has seen so much of royal births, deaths, and marriages, and of the rise of favorites and of the promulgation of statutes, of the engrossing of treaties, and a myriad other imposing things, that it is no wonder that his manners have become excessively oppressive, that he forgets our common humanity, and that he, after all, is only Jenkins, and, in his best estate, only a more or less honest and intelligent reporter.

For a great many generations he has been absurdly oblivious of his real relation to the rest of his literary brethren and to the world at large, and w suppose—and again we say that we have no desire to speak except with all due respect,—we suppose that there is something of the old spirit discernible in a letter of Mr. Bancroft's to a gentleman who wished to show him that he had committed an error of fact in his last published volume. Mr. Bancroft seemed to be taking some considerable thought for the dignity of history, and apparently holds that only sincere personal friendship for the doubter can justify the historian in lowering that dignity so far as to attend to grave doubts cast upon his statements. "Were it anybody else," he says, "but one like you, for whom I cherish a sincere regard, I might decline anything that could lead to a private discussion of questions appertaining to history."

Now, of course, there are various reasons any one of which may serve for a historian who is averse to a private discussion of his statements. If he knows them to be true he may well enough save himself the bother of private attack and rejoinder, and remit the party aggrieved to his remedy in a pamphlet. But it is an amusing proof of the tenacity with which old notions cling to life to find a historian nowadays pleading the dignity of history as an effectual bar against answering charges of inaccuracy in presenting facts, or against answering charges of any kind. History has no dignity. "Historic truth," as the Emperor Louis Napoleon says,—"historic truth ought to be no less sacred than religion" ; to which assertion it is quite probable that we give our assent. But it is instructive to recollect that the author of it immediately proceeded to write the "History of Julius Cæsar." And beginning with Herodotus and coming down to Headley and Towle, in what one of the histories is one to find the sacred historic truth ? Scattered bits of it, no doubt, he will find here and there ; a little of it in the very worst and silliest of them. The most measureless liars, as Dr. Johnson said, tell more truth than intentional falsehood ; but the most of what historic truth we have in regard to the past doings of our race, the most of what light is shed upon the path by which we have travelled from our original acorns to the civilization of to-day, the most, in short, of what we know as facts in regard to the life of man on earth, it is notorious that this has been got not from histories so called but from a thousand other less pretentious sources, from fragments of poetry, from plays, from bits of pottery, from inscriptions on broken stones, from letters of love or of trade or of friendship, from books of travels, from files of old newspapers, from records of commerce, from anything and everything, one might almost say, except what historians have seen fit to write. We would not speak of the reporter as if it were a small thing to be a reporter, for surely there is no harder thing to do and no more useful thing than to observe accurately and report with exact truth. But it is not this sort of honor which historians have most eagerly sought, and it is not upon this that they found their claim to pre-eminent dignity. If it were, could we not conceive of Mr. Bancroft, for instance, eagerly snatching at any opportunity, whether a friend offered it or an enemy, to get the least additional light on any point in his narrative ? With the true dignity of history this would have been perfectly consonant, however inconsistent it might seem with that mock dignity which once hedged the historian as well as the king in whom he delighted.

If it is true, then, that history is valuable to man for what truth it give him, for what facts in the story of man's life it tells him, and that hitherto its attempts to do more than this have been failures, then it seems clear that the sacredness and dignity of history belong not to any actual history or historian, but to the ideal historian for whom we wait, and that they may best be left unappropriated till the arrival of that faultless monster. And if what is called history could not save a historian of our day from the absurdity of arrogating to himself the judge's place, the history of historians, one would suppose, might. Our friend Livy had to wait, to be sure, about seventeen centuries for his Niebuhr; but at last Livy was reduced to his facts. Mitford and Gifford—we pretend to preserve no chronological order; any names in the whole list are serviceable as examples—vanished away before Grote, who, comparatively speaking, told the truth and was not a blind partisan; Plutarch was and is a great name, but nowadays we read him as we drink liqueurs, partly for the pleasure of taste and partly for the unnatural exaltation that follows; Gibbon has to submit to a reviewal from Guizot; Hume, Robertson, Voltaire, who regards them? Surely the saying of Mendoza ought to be the motto of the fraternity of historians. "One day," says the Spaniard, "is master of another; and whatsoever is written to-day, there will be somebody who will know more to-morrow."

It is, as we suppose, to a perception of the truth that historians have attempted vastly more than they have been able to perform that we owe the division of labor that has partly been effected, and that will yet be wholly effected, in this field of human endeavor. The tendency, getting stronger yearly, is to let the philosophy of history be extracted by philosophic minds, perhaps not particularly well fitted, and at any rate upon which it shall not be imposed, to collect facts from original sources nor to dispose them in the ordinary narration. These two branches of the work can be done by the numberless sorts of historians, pure and simple, from the historian of literature down to the historian of the cotton manufacture. This latter is the reporter, and his glory shall be to tell the truth of facts. The ornate, high-flying, pictorial, over-dignified historian, with his theories and his admirations and whims and the rest of his clatter, can do articles for magazines.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, May 3, 1867.

THE Easter vacation is over, and the political struggle is beginning again. It is really very difficult to catch the exact meaning of the incidents of a warfare carried on with so little sincerity by a great majority of the combatants on both sides, for it is impossible to say whether any particular action is contested with bona fides or is a mere sham fight. Thus, the Conservatives won a triumph just before the vacation, in which they had apparently changed places with the Liberals and were going for household suffrage against a narrower franchise. Mr. Gladstone appeared in his worst character as a leader; from his love of intellectual intricacy he allowed himself to accept the issue in a form in which it was unintelligible to the country and his party; and when, as a natural result, he was beaten, he allowed himself to display the feminine sensitiveness which so often interferes with his powers of command. He wrote a letter which was intended to frighten his followers into obedience, but which might be interpreted as a resignation of his post as leader: although this interpretation seems to have been groundless, it resulted in a temporary disorganization of the party. Deprived of Mr. Gladstone's authority, they seemed to be delivered over almost helplessly to their opponents. The first division, however, of the session again turns the tables. The Liberal party voted for lowering the term of residence necessary for obtaining a vote from two years to one, and carried their proposal by a majority of no less than eighty. What the result will be remains to be seen; at present it seems doubtful whether Mr. Disraeli has not been too clever by half; he has offered the tempting name of household suffrage with the intention of neutralizing his gift by cunning restrictions; he may be caught in his own trap and compelled to allow the extension without the restrictions. The only difficulty is that many of his opponents are as insincere as himself, and would shrink from the actual concession of the gift which they affect to demand. The play of the opposite parties is not a very edifying spectacle, and I can only hope that their mutual cheating of each other may somehow turn out for the good of the public. "When rogues fall out"—but the proverb is something musty.

The vacation now ending has been marked by the appearance of two or three new newspapers in London. To start a newspaper is one of those experiments which seems to have irresistible attractions in spite of extreme risks. Feeble periodicals are constantly appearing, leading a half-starved life for a few weeks, and, after changing hands two or three times, dropping into an early grave. It is a long time, however, since any daily morning newspaper has been started in London. The abolition of the stamp duty gave an impulse to the penny papers, which at the time were languishing, and enabled them to survive and even to flourish. The Telegraph—the "Penny Thunderer," as it is called, from its resemblance to The Times on a small scale—is now a great success and has made the fortune of its proprietors. The Standard, the Tory organ, also pays well; and The Star, Mr. Bright's organ, which has the smallest circulation of the three, is also said to be beginning to be profitable. For several years it was kept alive as a party organ, but scarcely paid as a commercial speculation. These three have long had the field to themselves. They are now threatened with competition by a new rival called The Day. The Day is the organ of Lord Grosvenor and the Adullamite party, or, as it more euphoniously describes itself, of constitutional liberalism. Constitutional liberalism is to the common eye indistinguishable from ancient whiggism and is divided by exceedingly delicate shades from rank toryism; it is what Mr. Matthew Arnold would call the eminently Philistine party in politics. It finds out, as The Times did the other day, that the plan of purchasing commissions in the army is, "for practical purposes" (the regular Philistine dialect), the most admirable that has ever been invented; it believes in bulwarks against democracy and in the various checks and balances of our admirable constitution, and, in short, in all the enchanted whiggeries and shams and phantasms which Mr. Carlyle used to denounce. The Day has, as becomes its politics, plenty of money behind it, and, though not very well written, may perhaps succeed.

I do not know how it may be with you, but an English newspaper calculates for its chance of living upon attracting advertisements. The Times, it is commonly said, loses more the greater its circulation; that is, the threepence does not cover the expense of publication; but its enormous quantity of advertisements makes it a most valuable property, and of course, if the circulation were known to fall off, the advertisements would disappear also. Hence the question is whether The Day or any freshly launched journal can live through the first year or two with scanty means of floating until it can push through the early shallows into the deep waters of advertisements.[*] The Pall Mall Gazette, I am happy to say, seems to be accomplishing this object successfully, for it is really the best written and fairest of all our daily papers. There were many novelties about it, which made many people augur ill of its success; in fact, it was generally expected to die an early death; but its gallant proprietor, Mr. Smith (of Smith, Elder & Co.), who had already made one of the greatest successes in periodical literature by successfully starting The Cornhill Magazine, never despaired, and has now achieved an undoubted success. I think that his performance is a fair topic of congratulation. The Pall Mall Gazette is written with much talent and takes a higher tone than most newspapers, and it is, on the whole, a really liberal paper. It is true that all papers written for the higher classes of English society are apt to take the rather cynical and sceptical tone of politics which is exhibited by The Saturday Review. They are written for people who are very comfortable and naturally object to any change in the state of things—for why should an English gentleman of good means want to see anything altered in the universe? So far as he is personally concerned everything is so pleasant that it had much better stay as it is. Now, for good or evil, such papers as The Times, The Saturday Review, and The Pall Mall Gazette write for a class of society which is full of these thoroughly contented people, and they naturally suit their tone to their audience. There is often a curious contrast between the writers in these papers and the opinions expressed, which I hasten to add is not due to any actual dishonesty of the writers, though perhaps a stern moralist may consider them in some degree compromised. To take a single instance, I should guess, though I could not prove, that a decided majority of the writers in The Saturday Review were in favor of the Northern States during the late struggle; I am still more certain that a large majority of them incline to extremely liberal theological principles. But of course neither Northern sympathies nor free-thinking in theology would pay with the upper classes in England. Consequently such questions are committed to those writers whose way of thinking happens to coincide with that which is popular in the highest social state. The Saturday Review has another special cause of weakness in theological questions. Mr. Beresford Hope, the chief proprietor, is an extreme High Churchman; and as few intelligent men, and therefore few Saturday Reviewers, agree with him in this matter, the result is to neutralize the paper entirely. It sometimes sneers at the Evangelical party, and frequently sneers at religious belief generally, though in terms sufficiently covert to deceive the ordinary British public; but in most church matters it preserves an exceptional silence. The Pall Mall Gazette is in this respect very superior, and has had some very remarkable articles upon the theological questions of the day. Its tone in these matters is, indeed, much in advance of the ordinary English creeds, and has sometimes rather shocked the squeamish part of its constituency.

[*] It is since dead.—ED. NATION.

I mention these details to show how far I believe it to be true that the leading newspapers represent English opinion. Undoubtedly the most common political hue of an educated Englishman is a kind of neutral tint, with a certain leaning in favor of what he believes to be genuine liberalism, but also with a very strong dread of democratic, revolutionary, and atheistic principles, which he holds to be closely connected, and to be great disturbers of proper peace and quiet. The Times and The Telegraph write for the upper and lower stratum of the great social mass in which this class of opinion flourishes, The Times being for those who can afford threepence and The Telegraph for those who can afford a penny. The Saturday Review and Pall Mall Gazette, again, write with rather more discretion for the most refined portion of the same class; and the trifling deviations from what I may call the regular platform are caused by certain individual peculiarities of the proprietors and editors of the papers. The Times used to be the one great English organ; it has very much declined in authority, and it is said to have declined in circulation, owing to the growth of the penny papers below and of the other papers mentioned above it. But substantially they all correspond to mere modifications of the same general body of opinion, which passes current with the great majority of Englishmen as unimpeachable political philosophy. The Day is an attempt to found an organ for a set of thinkers very slightly diverging from the common type, except that perhaps they have a rather greater aversion than most men to anything in the way of serious reform.

I have scarcely space to mention any of the other ventures which have been lately started. They are, indeed, of inferior interest. One to which I cannot help wishing well is The Chronicle, a new weekly paper, which is the organ of liberal Roman Catholics. The combination is, I fear, rather an unstable one in England; since by mere force of opposition most English Romanists are naturally driven into the Ultramontanist camp; but I am glad to see some more respectable organ of a large body of my fellow-countrymen than the virulent and, if I may say so, blackguard papers by which they have been hitherto represented. Indeed, if I were writing a history of the English press, I should have to say that our religious newspapers generally are by many degrees the most foul-mouthed, vulgar, and rancorous writings of the day. The Record, an evangelical organ, has an easy predominance in all these objectionable qualities; but they are all remarkable for narrow-mindedness and a total absence of Christian charity. I don't know whether these deficiencies are peculiar to English Christians, as represented by their periodical literature, or common to Christian literature all over the world, but here they are very strongly marked.

A FRENCH SKETCH OF A FRENCH GIRL.

To the Editor of The Nation:

On reading your French sketch of an American girl, it struck me that a French girl from the American point of view might make an amusing picture. Then I recollected having once read a French sketch of a French girl which afforded a pretty good pendent to "Miss Mary;" so I thought of telling you where it might be found. But then again it occurred to me that the work might not be accessible to many of The Nation's readers, as it is a book which (so to speak) no Puritan's library should be with. So I determined to give you a free abridgment of it from memory.

The hero, a gay young Parisian of fortune, who has been for several years doing what gay young Parisians commonly do, becomes blasé, and goes to visit a married sister in the country. His relations tell him he ought to marry. They have picked out a nice girl for him, a Mlle. Pelagie Quelquechose, an orphan brought up by her maiden aunt. The dower is good and the damsel is pretty. He is introduced to her at a party—tries to talk to her. Her conversation consists chiefly of "Yes, sir" and "No, sir;" indeed, she has not much more to say for herself than Sir Oran Haut-ton, the domesticated gorilla who figures in one of Peacock's queer novels. Nevertheless, as the dower is good and the girl is pretty, and he has nothing particular to do and everybody is worrying him to marry her, he consents. The proposal is made by his sister, and accepted by her aunt. He now sits by his betrothed at parties and dances with her, and is allowed to see her every day at home—in the presence of a third party. He attempts to get some more conversation out of her; she refers perpetually to "my aunt," who has told her not to do this or that. She moves about like an automaton, and looks no one in the face, not even her intended. "Lift up your eyes, they are too beautiful to be hidden." "My aunt tells me to look down," and so forth.

He seems to think it a serious matter to unite himself to a woman for life (there is no divorce in France) without knowing something of her tastes, inclinations, sentiments, and character, and especially her feelings towards himself; therefore he requests the female plenipotentiaries to grant him a private interview with Pelagie. Absurd! indecent!! impossible!!! He persists, however, and carries his point. But Pelagie is the same doll in private that she was in public. "You did me the honor to accept me. Why?" "Because my aunt told me to." "Then you thought nothing about me when you first saw me, or till your aunt spoke of me?" A blank look. "Suppose I had been old and ugly and stupid and fat and lame, would that have made no difference?" "Well, sir, if my aunt told me." The starling-like refrain drives him nearly crazy; still, as the dower is good, etc., etc., he marries her. But as to how this demure damsel conducts herself after marriage let us be discreetly silent, for her biographer is M. Paul de Kock.

This time I am content to let the lions be their own painters. Taking the two just as they stand, I decidedly prefer Miss Mary to Mlle. Pelagie.

POLITICS AND EDUCATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

In The American Freedman of this month, in an editorial on the "Commission and its Work," I notice this expression with reference to the right of suffrage lately conferred upon the colored man:

> "But the ballot is an edge tool. Whether with it he slay his foes or himself, will depend upon his knowledge how to use it."

The truth of this declaration was strikingly illustrated yesterday at the Republican county convention held in this city. The purpose of the convention was to choose delegates to the district convention, to nominate a candidate for Congress. The meeting was largely attended, and it was perfectly clear that an overwhelming majority of the freedmen present were in favor of the nomination of Judge Lawrence, superintendent of freedmen for this county; but the comparative ignorance of the colored people, and their want of familiarity with parliamentary usage, enabled a few well-trained politicians to subvert their will, and the probability is that our next representative to Congress will be one whom the leading Democratic paper here declares to be "thoroughly committed to the conservative platform."

The fact is, unless there is a much larger effort to educate the freedman, to the country at large his enfranchisement will be of no benefit. The leading politicians of the South have always been accustomed to manipulating the masses to suit their own views. Unfortunately, the Republican party is saddled with many of this class, who, while their loyalty may not be questioned, are for themselves "first, last, and all the time."

In New England, where public schools have taught the people to think freely, the aspirant for public office must come before them with a clear record, and his party with a platform of principles. There the mere demagogue stands but little chance. Here it is very different. There "the reason why" of the schools is ever at the front. Here it is at the rear as yet, simply because the North will not see that the safety of the republic depends upon the education of the multitude "armed with the ballot." The process of reconstruction will occupy a time sufficient to enable us to educate a generation. Here lies the gist of real reconstruction; not a patched-up sort of truce, but an intelligence which shall be a future reliance.

I take very little interest in politics generally. The result of the convention yesterday arrested my attention, it was such a striking confirmation of the plea of the educational commissions of the North for means to "lay broad and deep the foundation of a free-school system."

Yours, Wm. F. Mitchell.

The Week.

THE leading incident of the week, and certainly the most amusing one, has been the encounter between Mr. Greeley and the Union League Club. The club undertook, or at least some of its members did, to call him to account for bailing Jefferson Davis, an act for which he was, as a public man, responsible to the public, but with which the club, as a social organization, had no more to do than with the management of his paper. This was error the first. Error the second was preparing some milk-and-water resolutions in condemnation of an offence which, if the club had any right to notice it at all, merited expulsion. Error the third was in not either passing the resolutions or voting them down after having prepared them, instead of substituting for them some feeble stuff in caucus-English about the wrong of releasing Jefferson Davis. Mr. Greeley met the attack in his best or worst style, whichever anybody pleases to call it, dropped the "Men and Brethren" manner in which he commonly discourses, and hit hard in good ringing Saxon, though blindly, as men in a rage usually hit. One's opinion of his style could not but rise on reading his letter, though one's opinion of his judgment could not but fall in just the same proportion. The public generally, we think, disapproved ot the meddling of the club, but at the same time has very little sympathy with Mr. Greeley in his present troubles. Whenever in times past the Republican party has chosen to hunt down dissenters from the prevailing creed, and let loose the party sleuth-hounds on them, Mr. Greeley has always claimed the head of the pack as the post of honor, but having a shockingly bad nose, he was never to be depended on, except in very cloudy weather, when the scent lay very heavy. Consequently the "minor editors" have rarely ventured to follow him over more than a few fields, and he has been forced to do some of the worst of the great chases alone. Many a poor heretic in his tree has listened in terror to his solitary bay, and wished he too had "an organ," and could come down and show fight on open ground.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL STANBERY has furnished the President with a long opinion upon the proper interpretation of the Reconstruction Act. The substance of it is, that the disfranchising clauses are reduced to a very narrow operation by reason of their equivocal language, which Mr. Stanbery properly considers must be construed in favor of the elector. He holds that no one is excluded from voting or holding office by the fact of having held such purely civil offices as were necessary to preserve the order of society during the rebellion, or by his having committed any offence, or held any office, not clearly referred to by the oath of registration prescribed by the act. It was always obvious to us that the haste with which Mr. Shellabarger's amendment was drawn up had left many loopholes in it; and we expected that Mr. Stanbery would discover them whenever he turned his attention to the subject. It is, probably, just as well that it is so, since the policy of disfranchisement is one that cannot be adhered to, and might as well be abandoned first as last.

MR. BOUTWELL is said to be the writer of the "Address of the Union Congressional Republican Committee to the People of the South," which is now going into circulation among Southern voters, both white and black. It is Governor Boutwell's, or it is somebody's who is like Governor Boutwell in being clear-headed and straightforward, a man of advanced views and of common sense—in short, a Radical with reasons. The address is of some importance aside from the good it may do among the colored people, who are now, as to a less extent they always have been since the war ended, under the influence of some of the best and purest Northern men and women in the country, and exposed, as we all know, to the influence of some of the weakest and some of the meanest men ever reared in the North. Aside from the good it may do in disabusing their minds of certain notions which it is criminal, in a very high degree, to disseminate among them, the address will do good among the Southern whites. If it does no more, it will remove from the minds of some of them the fear that confiscation still impends over them, and show that as regards such measures Mr. Stevens, Mr. Phillips, and General Butler do not speak for any important part of the Republican party or Northern people. People in the North have no need of Mr. Boutwell to tell them this; but if we may believe accounts that come from there, Mr. Stevens succeeded in frightening quite a number of Southern landholders.

COLONEL SHEPHERD, commanding at Mobile, has made his report on the late riot, and we learn that the disturbance was not preconcerted, that but a few people participated in it, and that the scene of action was speedily vacated by everybody but the police. Mr. Kelley had been repeatedly interrupted by certain persons, and at last the police made one arrest, which was accompanied by a shot from somebody's pistol. Thereupon a number of shots were fired towards the platform, and by-and-by, after a momentary lull, a large number of additional shots were fired, the most of them into the air. General Swayne imputes to the police no worse fault than inefficiency, but he says that freedom of speech and public order have long been greatly outraged in Mobile by a part of the population, which presumes upon the sympathy of the police authorities with rebel sentiments. The deposition of Mayor Withers, and the temporary establishment to some extent of martial law, General Swayne seems to have ordered in accordance with the views of the loyal element of the city population, who apprehended a new outbreak consequent upon the riot. We suppose this will last no longer than till the police force is made loyal. Mayor Withers signified his acceptance of his fate in a dignified letter to Colonel Shepherd, which inclines one to believe in his loyalty to the Constitution. General Swayne, however, removed him for being inefficient, and therefore bad in his place, and in the way of something better.

For want of an audience, Pollard of Richmond's oration on the "Chivalry of the South" was not delivered in Lynchburg last week. Unavoidably a good many occurrences, in the true sense of the word insignificant, have been related to the damage of the Southern people, as proofs that they hated the negro and the Union. They ought in fairness to have the benefit of a wide dissemination of this item of Pollard's personal history—that a half-educated, noisy, Yankee-cursing, chivalrous Southern orator, writer, and martyr was, notwithstanding all these titles to the applause of the average Southern audience, compelled to put his eloquent oration back into his carpet-bag undelivered because in a town of twelve or thirteen thousand inhabitants he could not find twenty men who would listen to him. To be sure, it is possible that Pollard of Richmond had had "personal difficulties" with a majority of the citizens of Lynchburg, but we like to believe in so hopeful a sign as that the Southern people are getting disgusted with him and his kind.

The Times of this city exposes an attempt on Friday of last week to revive the Fenian mania by collusive telegrams of armings and preparations in all parts of the country, which were showered that night upon the chief newspaper offices, and in some instances were accepted and printed for genuine. Such an imposition upon the public intelligence can have no other motive and no other possible effect than to plunder still more villanously the Fenian clientèle, consisting, it is well known, of an ignorant, humble, and poorly-paid class, mostly servants and largely servant girls, whom it is the concern of every good citizen to enlighten and protect from this organized piracy. We are free to say that we hold it culpable to so much as attach the importance of news to the sayings and doings of the ostensible "patriots," and that to employ reporters to retail the proceedings, "opinions," and "intentions" of the Fenian headquarters is to assist in deluding and spoiling the victims, and to prolong the vitality of a most deplorable anomaly in our body politic. The first duty of the press is to ignore the Fenians as much as possible, and the next to denounce them as they deserve when it is necessary to notice their lawlessness and rascality. The Times, as we have before remarked, is one of the few papers that observe this rule.

Just before the Connecticut election we strongly reprobated the conduct of the Republican Convention of the Fourth District in nominating P. T. Barnum, and we recommended good citizens to "scratch" that gentleman's name at all hazards. To this the New York Tribune of March 28 replied:

> "But to this absurdity" (the advice of The Nation not to regard the "regular nominations") "something more serious is joined—the studied insult to the Republicans of the Fourth Congressional District, who chose Mr. Barnum as their leader. The convention which nominated him undoubtedly represented the people of the district, and to accuse it of want of decency is also to accuse the people."

Mr. Barnum, however, ran behind his ticket, and was not elected. On Tuesday last this same journal, in an article on Nominating Conventions, apropos of the prize offered by the Philadelphia Loyal League for an essay on the best mode of selecting candidates, says:

> "Each of us is now virtually compelled to vote for candidates in whose integrity and capacity we feel no confidence. There may be a very good name at the head of our ballot, with two or three more scattered through it; but of three-fourths of those named thereon we either know nothing or no good. How shall we mend this?
> "Our advice, briefly, would be:
> "1. Let us elect by popular vote fewer officers than now, leaving more to be appointed.
> "2. Let us discard, for the most part, the swindling machinery of 'Regular Nominations,' and call by public requisition upon fit persons to stand as candidates for elective offices."

Now, we know that, as a general rule, performances of this kind only excite the laughter of the public; but we believe that few thoughtful men witness them without asking themselves what design of Providence can be answered by permitting the existence of newspapers, and more particularly why Providence permits the existence of newspapers that serve "great causes" by an open contempt for truth and honesty. If the press is ever to be raised out of its present low estate, it must be by readers insisting at all events on outward respect for their own intelligence and moral sense. They cannot make all writers for the press good men; but they can at least compel them to be decent hypocrites.

It sounds incredible, but they say that our Board of Councilmen actually think they can make outsiders believe them honest. At all events, either out of fatuity or as a cynical jest quite worthy of Jonathan Wild, the Board has recently gone through the form of proving to an observant world that the lower branch of the New York City Council is honest. The late Legislature, which has not made any attempt to prove itself honest, passed a law making three years, instead of two, a councilman's term of service. The Board of Councilmen have passed a resolution censuring the corrupt Legislature for thus meddling with their constituents. It is said that the same councilmen paid to the Legislature, which they denounce for extending the term of service, $11,000 for said extension.

The Cable newsmonger, according to the New York Times, is an American gentleman of great virtue and ability, and the same journal insists upon it that his despatches during the late war crisis in Europe were borne out by events. As this is a matter of fact, there is no use in discussing it. We refer all enquirers to The Times's own columns during the past three months, and they will there find, we repeat, that nearly every opinion and prediction of the agent of the Associated Press—not of the "special despatch" manufacturer only—was falsified by the news of the following week. What was true in his news was almost invariably trivial to the verge of silliness. He has, within the last week, taken to predicting the price of stocks on the London Stock Exchange, and, incredible as it may sound, the leading newspapers here actually publish his prophecies. He waits till ten o'clock in the morning—that is, a few minutes before the market opens—and then telegraphs across the ocean that "the market has not opened," "but that the best judges think," or "it is generally thought, that United States stocks or Eries will be so and so." Of course no shrewd business man is gulled by such stuff as this, but the unwary may be, and the publication of it by the morning papers may be set down amongst the curiosities of journalism. In The Times and Herald of last Sunday he prophesied at ten o'clock that, when the market opened, United States five-twenties would "improve" and Eries "decline;" but in his despatch sent two hours later, printed in the same column, he unblushingly reports that Eries had "advanced one-half," and that United States five-twenty bonds had "declined a quarter"!

The dominion of Canada is formally in existence, to the great satisfaction of the politicians who infest the provinces, if of nobody else. Some of these gentlemen, we see, are already talking of a standing army to be counted by the hundred thousand. The people generally, we take it, are waiting to see what benefits are to be derived from the new arrangement; and while the more intensely loyal among them see in the confederation of the provinces a strengthening of the bond which ties them to the mother country, and which at any rate keeps them from drifting towards the United States, the wisest heads among them probably doubt whether the provinces as a republic, bearing the responsibilities of an independent country, will not come this way faster than if they had remained in the colonial state. This drifting is not, however, a process which there is any need of hastening; we in this country are not the losers if there is any loss in the delay. Meantime, we have on our northern border the same number of neighbors as before, something like three and a half millions, and we believe no change in our relations with them is made necessary by the change in their domestic affairs.

The Mexican imbroglio is over, at least so far as Maximilian is concerned. Queretaro has been captured, and with it the "Emperor" and his chief supporters. Juarez has, it is said, refused to promise that Maximilian will be held harmless, and it is not only not impossible, but by no means improbable, that he may be shot. Everybody out of Mexico would probably, in the interest of humanity and civilization, regret this result, but it must be admitted, on the other hand, that there would be much excuse for it. The only difference between Maximilian and any ordinary filibuster was that he came to Mexico and took his seat on the throne under a recognized flag and with the aid of a regular army. This difference, however, he has clearly waived by staying behind after the French had gone, and he is now at the conqueror's mercy. Moreover, he has exposed himself to the worst by his having outlawed the Liberal forces as soon as he got possession of the city of Mexico, and treated all prisoners as brigands. Those who have read the "Contra-Guerrilla Français" papers in the Revue des Deux Mondes know what a shocking state of things this inhuman policy brought about. The whole story is inexpressibly sad. Maximilian is a good man, as princes go, the best of the Hapsburgs, but should he meet his fate as a filibuster, it will at least have the good effect of teaching a lesson which will not soon be forgotten in European palaces.

"An Irishman who knows both sides of the Atlantic" has been writing to the Irish papers, drawing awful pictures of the demoralization of the Irish people through the importation, by the Fenian emissaries, of American ideas into Ireland about marriage, social equality, the clergy, land tenures, and what not, and says if the working of the poison cannot be stopped, something—we do not exactly know what—will happen. We are greatly afraid the writer is a pretender. The trouble with the Fenians here is that they do not seem able to get an American idea into their heads; and we are warranted in concluding that what they have not got, they do not carry over to Ireland with them. The only American commodity which, so far as we have observed, they have secured a full supply of, is what is vulgarly called "gas," but this was not entirely unknown amongst the Brotherhood before the "war" began.

Mr. Ruskin has recently contributed to the English press a most dismal but withal somewhat ludicrous account of the sufferings of Thomas Carlyle from the manners of the street boys at Chelsea, who, it appears, jeer him most shamefully as he walks through the streets, so that he is obliged to take his "constitutional" after dark. This led, of course not unnaturally, to some very damaging reflections on the manners of the English lower classes as compared with those of the Italians or other Continentals—a comparison in the main just. We nevertheless felt on reading the story that the pestering of an elderly man of quiet habits must be rather too monotonous for the Chelsea populace to keep it up, unless there was something more than usually peculiar about his appeaaance. It now appears that at the bottom of the trouble is a very remarkable high-crowned hat which Mr. Carlyle persists in wearing, and which, as there is nothing of which the British mob is so intolerant as oddity in hats, brings the roughs upon him the minute he passes his door. Their conduct is scandalous, but we doubt if it would afford much of a basis for political generalization to anybody but Mr. Ruskin.

In order to judge between Kossuth and Deák in their difference about the course which Hungary has adopted with Austria, it is necessary to have considered whether, after Sadowa, independence was really to be coveted by the leaders or the people of that province. Neither in patriotism nor ability does the successful statesman yield to the exiled chief, nor, we may add, in that modesty which is the essence of self-sacrifice, while he has certainly the confidence of his countrymen. We believe that he has and deserves their gratitude also; and in view, on the one hand, of the extraordinary growth of Prussia, on the other of the ever portentous magnitude of Russia and the menacing aspect of Turkish affairs, Deák acted prudently and sagaciously in strengthening Austria by Hungarian allegiance, rather than in exposing his country, by isolating her, to the perils of a general European conflagration, or to the aggrandizement of neighboring powers. At all events, when a constitution and a ministry have been wrung from Austria by the most uncompromising persistency, and the old policy of that empire has been displaced by one in accord with the progress of events, it can hardly be maintained that Hungary is weaker than before, or that the men who have brought her to this position are to blame. It is, perhaps, not to be regretted that there are still Magyars who cherish their dreams of separate autonomy, and who occasionally give signs of life. Mazzini undoubtedly aids the Liberal party in Italy by his radicalism, and a similar office may belong to Kossuth. If he makes of it a policy, we have the key to his recent letter of censure.

REHABILITATION OF DEAD PERSONS.

We may almost say that a Frenchman is born polite, good-tempered, quick-witted, and a very fair prose writer. But though we can imagine Mr. Bancroft, for instance, surveying him with admiration on account of these gifts and graces, yet Mr. Bancroft ought after all to be thankful that he was not born in France. The Court of Cassation has just murdered history. It has just made a decision which even a historian not hostile to grandsons may be permitted to view with unaffected horror. It has declared, in deciding a case brought before it on appeal, that a man may maintain an action for a libel upon the memory of any one of his ancestors, and that the plaintiff in such a suit is not restricted by any statute of limitations, so that mere remoteness of relationship need prevent no one from becoming the champion of his farthest forefather's name and fame.

The Imperial Courts of Angers and Rennes have held that the law under which it was sought to bring the particular action to a successful issue before them did not include dead men in the class of "persons" who might sue for redress; before the Court of Cassation, also, this view was insisted on. It was urged that the plaintiff is bound to show that the libel has injured him personally, or was calculated to do so, and that otherwise the maxim is applicable which Voltaire offered by way of correction of the old and foolish one—de mortuis nil, etc.—namely, that to the living delicacy is due, to the dead truth only. To all which, and much more equally cogent, M. le Procureur replied eloquently, with what disquisitions upon the gloire of one's ancestors we can all imagine, and with what philosophic remarks upon the solidarité of families only a Frenchman can imagine, with quotations from Ulpian, and, finally, with citations of precedents which showed that in old times the law had adjudged dead men to be "persons;" that often, to appease its offended majesty, the corpses of comfortably buried men had been dug from their graves, tried, convicted, and condemned to suffer various indignities as punishment for crimes formerly committed by the souls resident in them. Readers at all curious on the subject we take pleasure in referring to the works of Mr. Thomas Wright, the Timothy Titcomb of two hundred years ago, who is very fond of proving to the hardened sinner, by the examples of bad Frenchmen, that nothing is more likely than that his mortal part will be disentombed, his skull nailed to the city gate, his right hand cut off, and the rest of him burnt to ashes. Probably numbers of M. Delangle's cited cases may be found in that author's instructive volume. The procureur's precedents and arguments took the judges along with him, and they made the astonishing decision above reported. Any French Kinglake who may have been meditating a work on the Duke de Morny, or Marshal Magnan, or Queen Hortense, or other friends and relatives of his Majesty Napoleon III., will probably find his account in pondering for awhile on this remarkable decision, which is, perhaps, the most striking illustration that has lately been vouchsafed us of the truth of Rochefoucauld's saying, that in France everything happens. What remains to happen it would be hard to say.

Of course it is the Emperor who is at the bottom of all this. To speak evil of dignities is forbidden; but on several occasions the Court of Cassation has vindicated its claims to the Imperial gratitude in such ways that no one will believe that in giving this opinion the judges gave their own opinion. But the Emperor being behind the judges, is there anybody behind the Emperor? We confess that we think there is, and as Americans we blush to say that we fear an American citizen may have advised him to this course of infamy. Has no American citizen, of historic tendencies, recently been closeted with the Emperor? Has no stern republican, in spite of his political creed, been received with marked favor by the despotic ruler of France? Have we among us no one who confesses that upon some points at any rate he favored Napoleon with advice and soothed him with sympathy? If so, there is an American to whose secret and evil counsels we owe this despotic attempt to reduce history to eulogium.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MONTESQUIEU'S great work has, we believe, been issued by American publishers, but not, we think, for many years. And of late the copies bearing Scotch or English imprints, which have been not uncommon in the second-hand bookstores, have been getting rather scarce and too dear. Soon we are to have a new edition, perhaps of all Montesquieu's works, perhaps of "The Spirit of Laws" only, which will be published by Mr. W. J. Widdleton. The edition will be under the editorial supervision of Mr. O. W. Wight, a gentleman to whom the American scholar is already under great obligations for his efforts to place before the public good editions of weighty authors. Another new book, if it can be said to deserve in any sense the name of a new book, which Mr. Widdleton is about to publish, is the "Moxon Elia"—the one containing those few words of hitherto unpublished preface and dedication which we copied the other day in a literary note. Mr. Widdleton is in the habit of publishing every year one or two small editions of Lamb's works, or such of them as there is most call for, and to an immediately forthcoming instalment of his "Elia" will prefix the matter which makes Mr. Moxon's "the only complete edition."——Mr. G. P. Putnam & Son announce for immediate publication a book entitled "What is Free Trade?" which is made up of the arguments of Bastiat, and of illustrations drawn by Emile Walter from American trade, commerce, and manufactures. "Emile Walter" calls himself "A Worker," which is all we know of him, except that he is a free-trader.——G. W. Carleton & Co. will publish in a few days two new novels by two American authoresses of some reputation, "The Cameron Pride," by Mrs. Mary J. Holmes, and "The Romance of Beauseincourt," by Mrs. Catherine Warfield, who wrote "The Household of Bouverie."——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce a book of a class which ought to be engaging the attention of all who expect to serve the community in the capacities of political speakers, sociological writers or lecturers, and legislators, and which will also be read with interest by such working-men as work at handicrafts. Its title is "Co-operative Societies: Their History in England and Germany," and it is, or is to be, a translation of Eugen Richter's "Die Consum-Vereine."——Messrs. Roberts Brothers, of Boston, have in press S. Baring-Gould's "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," a work which is, perhaps, entertaining rather than curious, and is curious rather than instructive, and which is only in part made up of myths, unless that name is to be applied loosely to all relations which are not true.——Loring, of Boston, announces "A Week in a French Country House."

—The proper folk-songs of this country should be sought, we suppose, among the aborigines, but the capacity of the Indian for music does not appear to be equal to his reputed capacity for eloquence. The negro possesses both these gifts in a high degree, and it is singular that no one up to this time has explored for preservation the wild, beautiful, and pathetic melodies of the Southern slaves. Their secular songs, or what purported to be such, have in times past made their way into all mouths; but their "spirituals"—the genuine expression of their eminently religious nature—have only recently claimed attention. We are able to announce a collection, based on the Port Royal hymnody, and including the songs of as many Southern States as are obtainable, which will be published either in the course of this year or at the beginning of the next. The words and (whenever possible) the music will be carefully reproduced, and it is the aim of the editors to make the volume complete in both respects. Any information relating to this subject will be very acceptable to them, and may be sent to Mr. W. P. Garrison, Box 6732, N. Y. Post-office.

—We learn from Mr. Boker, the secretary of the Union League Club of Philadelphia, that in offering the prizes to which we referred last week, the directors had in view simply this object: "To get at some system, whether by a project of law or otherwise, whereby decent people may have a voice in the nomination of the candidates of their party, and whereby this most important matter may be taken from the hands of those pothouse politicians and sordid wire-pullers who have now, at least in Pennsylvania, the almost exclusive control of all preliminary political movements." And Mr. Boker adds that it is not proposed to set any limits for the writers of essays, who may send in for competition a paper, a pamphlet, a volume, or a library, the directors promising on their parts to go faithfully through whatever is handed in by the essayists. The League deserves the thanks of the community.

—We have never absolutely said that Mr. A. M. W. Ball wrote the poem "Rock me to Sleep, Mother;" but for some time we have been strongly inclined to believe that he did, and that, as the case stood, Mrs. Akers would do well to bring forward, if she could, some evidence to rebut the evidence brought forward by Mr. Ball's friends. Were it not for one recent discovery we should still be of the same mind. Mr. Morse, who wrote a "Vindication" of Mr. Ball's claim to the authorship of the poem in question, vouched for the authenticity of letters in which various people referred to the poem as one that they had heard Mr. Ball read some years before 1860; one or two of the correspondents making casual references to it which are stronger as evidence than any direct assertions; another of them recalling the expression "backward, roll backward," as a part of the poem "Rock me to Sleep" with which he had found some fault when it was read to him. This reference to a particular verse goes a very long way towards making untenable the supposition that, in speaking of "Rock me to Sleep," the correspondent referred to a poem the same in name with Mrs. Akers's poem, but different in all important respects. We cannot go through all the evidence for and against Mr. Ball, who, as a poet, is, we should say, perfectly capable of all the thought and all the sentiment in the favorite poem which is attributed to Mrs. Akers, and almost capable of verse as good in rhythm and rhyme as Mrs. Akers's "Rock me to Sleep." He can reconcile himself to writing and she can write:

"Tired of earth's mockery and the soul's strife;"

"From the sick soul and the world-weary brain."

We should have been still disposed to think, as we were disposed to think a week ago, that probably Mr. Ball wrote "Rock me to Sleep, Mother," and Mrs. Akers polished it and wrongfully claimed it for her own, if it were not for the fact that a writer in the New York Times shows that a poem, written by Mr. Ball and quoted by Mr. Morse in his "Vindication," must have been "conveyed" from Mrs. Sarah Helen Whitman, of Rhode Island. We dare say Mr. Ball wrote "Rock me to Sleep;" but we doubt if he may not as well hold his tongue hereafter. He is either a miraculously unfortunate man, or he is a literary offender of no common sort, and in either case silence is his best policy.

—Sir Archibald Alison, who is just dead in the middle of his seventy-fifth year, was a historian who had outlived the greater part of the reputation he once owned. His "History of Europe," on which his fame must rest, had the advantage when it first appeared of giving the reader in a book an account of events whose history he would have been obliged to hunt out of newspapers and magazines if Sir Archibald had not collected it for him. He was a man of very considerable attainments, of good powers of mind, and in politics was a bitter Tory. His story, then, is so prejudiced, though honest and careful in its record of facts and events, that its substantial truth is depended on by nobody but a colonial subscriber to Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, and there is now but very little in his pages to attract most readers. He was born at Kenley, Shropshire, in 1792, his father being a clergyman and the author of "Essays on Taste," which Jeffrey reviewed favorably in The Edinburgh Review. The historian was educated at the University of Edinburgh, adopted the law as a profession, and in 1828 put forth two books on the principles and practice of the criminal law. In 1833 he published the first volume of the "History of Europe, from the Commencement of the French Revolution," a voluminous work which before he died he had brought down to the time of the accession of Louis Napoleon. He is also known on this side of the water by a volume of his essays, which have been reprinted as one of the well-known set containing some of the contributions to periodical literature made by Carlyle, Macaulay, Sydney Smith, Sir James Stephen, T. N. Talfourd, Sir James Mackintosh, Prof. Wilson, and Lord Jeffrey. Alison loses in the comparison with almost any one of them.

He was made a baronet by the Derby-Disraeli cabinet of 1851, and would have been seventy-six years old on the 29th of December next.

—Among new books in England we see announced one which, to judge it by what can be seen of it in Miss Mill's recent able essay in The Westminster Review, must be valuable to sociologists everywhere. It is a translation, made by the author's wife, of "Social Reform in England, by a French Critic," and the writer was M. de Pontès. "The Moralization of the Dangerous Classes," "The History of Pauperism," and "Woman in England" are among his themes.——A novel that we are likely to see on this side of the water is "Paul's Courtship," by Hesba Stratton, the author of "Burcot Towers" and of a part of "Mugby Junction."——Another new novel is "Counting the Cost," by William Duthie, a rising man of letters who is well spoken of by some of the critics, though his Saturday Reviewer says that the novel gives one the impression that the author in writing it read "David Copperfield" and "Armadale" in alternate chapters during the day, and the next morning wrote out his dreams.——Also, beyond a doubt, we shall see Martin Farquhar Tupper, "His Opinions about Stars and Creeds and Ghosts; His Arguments for the Future of Animals; His Strictures on some Recent Critics; His National Psalms and Hymns," which are now advertised in the English papers, the whole being "Proverbial Philosophy, Third Series."——Cassell, Petter & Galpin announce an "Illustrated Book of Fables," which is to be issued serially, and of which the first four parts, now published, are devoted to "La Fontaine's Fables," translated by Walter Thornbury. Gustave Doré designs the pictures. ——Another illustrated book, which is also published in parts, is Messrs. George Routledge & Sons' "Natural History of Man,"—man of all colors and races, his dress, his habits, his weapons, utensils, etc., etc.

—American publications noticed in late English journals are books by Mr. Greene, Mr. Longfellow, S. Adams Lee, and President Felton. Mr. Lee's "Book of the Sonnet" is noticed by The Saturday Review, which praises the first volume—Leigh Hunt's—and entirely ignores the fact that the work is in two volumes. Mr. Greene's pamphlet against Mr. Bancroft is noticed by The Athenæum, which inclines to adopt the pamphleteer's view of the historian. Of Mr. Longfellow's translation of "The Inferno," except The Pall Mall Gazette none of the organs of British criticism have yet spoken. The reviewer in The Gazette declares that Mr. Longfellow uses English not like a native of the Anglo-Norman race, but gawkily like an Italian tyro; "he has attached himself to that extreme faction among translators who are distinguished by a minute and curious literalism which picks up words one by one with as little regard as possible to the natural effects of combination and association in the languages of all finite intelligences, so as mostly to distil away not only the grace and freedom of each expression, but even its emphasis and perspicuity, and to make every text appear cold and dry." The review is to be taken rather as a word from the school of translation opposite to that in which Mr. Longfellow has now enrolled himself than as anything else; certainly it is not at all a full and careful examination of this latest of the translations and a critical comparison of it with others. The writer does, however, note the fact that very often Mr. Longfellow's rendering bears a very close resemblance to that of Mr. Rossetti's.

—A post-mortem examination of the brain of Professor Galetti, of Gotha, ought to have revealed, we should say, a lesion of the cerebral convolutions somewhere near the phrenological "organ" of language. It must have been that there was some physical cause of such exquisite blundering as that with which he was accustomed to delight his university; the highest degree of the retired and simple-minded student's inaptitude for the task of expressing his ideas with precision is not enough to account for some of his follies. Galetti was a professor at Gotha from 1783 to 1828, and lectured to his pupils upon geography and natural history. His bulls were so many, so enormous, and so amusing, that some one took the pains of collecting quite a number of them, and, no doubt, adding a good many of his own, which were published, and of which these are examples. Once lecturing upon natural history, the professor thus spoke of the goose:

> "The goose is the most stupid of animals, because it only eats as long as it can find something."

Of Venice:

> "The Venetian Government is a mixed aristocracy out of which it is not easy to extricate one's self."

The following dialogue passed between him and a student in his audience:

> "'Some years ago a giant was here who was three and a half feet high, leaving out his head.'
> "'That was not very high.'
> "'Yes; but he was also a dwarf.'"

But unless we could remove the professor's orbitary plates we should decline to account for this speech:

> "Six thousand years have passed since the creation of the world, therefore the number of years before the birth of Christ must first be added and then subtracted."

Or this:

> "Gotha is not much farther from Erfurt than Erfurt from Gotha."

Or this:

> "Which is the right and which the left bank of a river can only be determined at its source."

Among the traditions of almost every institution of learning is the figure of some such personage as Professor Galetti, and this specimen of unconscious humor, if it was wholly unconscious, it is worth while to rescue from the works of Professor Popkins, of Cambridge; "The Dramatic Literature of the Greeks" was the lecturer's theme:

> "I am probably singular; but I never loved to be horribly delighted. I love to see everything, everybody, and every soul right and good and happy, doing well and ending well. But in this case it may be said that we should have no tragedies and scarcely any history; no trials of principle and few exercises of virtue. But, in fact, there is no danger of this sterility in the world. And since we are as we are, it is best that we should know the truth, and that it should be set before us in the most strong and striking colors, to deter us from vice and excite us to virtue. That is true, if it be true. But the same instrument which may be the minister of virtue may also be the pander of vice. As the conclusion of the whole matter, I must say that I consider the theatre as the bane of Harvard College."

It would not be so very hard, keeping in view the many learned brethren of Galetti and Popkins, for some modern patriotic Irish scholar to outshine "the judicious O'Geoghegan," and prove pretty conclusively that the birthplace and nursery and first natural seat of learning was the Green Island.

—Mme. Ratazzi, wife of the Italian premier, has published a somewhat scandalous novel called "Bicheville," written in French, and descriptive of but two possible cities in Europe—Paris or Florence. The critics beyond the Alps had no difficulty in deciding in favor of the latter capital, and the actual personages who identified themselves or were identified with the characters of the book were not unreasonably incensed at the author. The Marquis Pepoli, a former colleague of Ratazzi, and a relative of his wife, who had, nevertheless, not escaped being represented or misrepresented by her, demanded "satisfaction" of the minister; and the King espousing his cause, a jury of four, selected for each of the parties, found the demand to be just, but agreed that Ratazzi need not regard the challenge till he should cease to be president of the council of state.

EDUCATIONAL.

We are informed that the government of Harvard College is about to make some important changes in its course of instruction, which will go far towards meeting many of the objections which have been raised of late against the too great restrictions in the choice of studies imposed upon those who wished to take the regular undergraduate course. The exact nature of the changes proposed will be best understood by a brief comparison of the previous course with the one which we understand is likely to be adopted.

The studies of the freshman class remain unchanged and are all required.

Under the previous system the studies of the sophomore class were all required, and consisted, according to the catalogue of 1866–67, of Greek, Latin, mathematics, English language (Anglo-Saxon), chemistry, botany, rhetoric, and German. The average number of hours spent in recitations was three each day during the first five days of the week and one on Saturday. Under the proposed system the required studies of the sophomore class are chemistry and German (each two hours a week through the year), history, rhetoric, and philosophy (each two hours a week one term). The elective studies are Greek, Latin, pure mathematics, and applied mathematics. Of these elective studies each sophomore must take two.

Hitherto the required studies for the junior class have been (see same catalogue) during the first term physics, rhetoric, chemistry, and Latin. The elective studies were mathematics, Greek poetry, Greek prose, Roman history, chemistry, natural history, and German. During the second term the required studies were rhetoric, physics, and Latin, and the elective studies were the same as in the first term, with the addition of Spanish. Under the proposed system the required studies of the junior class are philosophy (two hours a week) and physics three hours a week. The elective studies are Greek, Latin, ancient history (in Greek text-books), mathematics, chemistry, natural history, the English language, and German; Spanish and Italian can also be taken under certain conditions. In each elective department, with the exception of the last two, three hours a week will be given to recitation.

The required studies of the senior year have been logic and philosophy, political economy, physics and history in the first term, and philosophy, history, and religious instruction in the second term. The elective studies were the same with those of the second term junior, with the addition of Latin and patristic Greek. Under the new system the required studies of the senior year will be (beginning with the year 1868–69) history, philosophy, and ethics; the elective will be Greek, Latin, mathematics, physics, chemical physics, history, philosophy, and modern languages. Each senior may choose two or three electives. The time occupied in recitation will be five hours each week for all required studies, and three for each elective. The average time hitherto spent in recitations and lectures by the same class was three hours each day except on Saturday.

This scheme will, of course, make it necessary to assign special honors at graduation to such as have passed successfully the examinations in the more difficult branches, and will induce students to attach an importance to the degrees when obtained which they have not hitherto. The most obvious defect, as it appears to us, is in depriving a student of the opportunity of taking Greek, Latin, and mathematics during the sophomore year. It is proposed, as we are informed, to allow two only of the three to be selected for that year. The plan seems, on the whole, a movement in the right direction, though we should have been glad if the extension of the elective system had been more complete, with its natural consequence of a regular gradation of honors. The democratic principle of giving the same degree on graduation to the highest and lowest scholars, which has so long cursed our American colleges, chilling the enthusiasm of the more ambitious scholars by depriving degrees of almost all significance, has reached, we hope, the beginning of its end.

MR. EMERSON'S POEMS.*

In the course of the twenty-one years that have passed between the publication of Mr. Emerson's first volume of poems and the issue of the volume which has just come from the press, there has been a great change in the regard of the public for their author. Mr. Emerson has had the felicity of living long enough to be assured of the gratitude of his own generation for his services to them, and of the permanence in the future of his influence and of his fame. Of hardly any other living American author can it be so confidently assumed that he will hold a place among the universal classics. The class whom he addresses and whom he directly affects through his work are the best. An idealist himself, he is the sage friend and counsellor of those who hold to the ideal as to the only absolute reality, and who, through the power which they draw from the sources of life, have virtue to lift the world, from age to age, to higher levels of thought and action.

It is in the influence of his writing upon character far more than in any direct intellectual effect that the chief worth of Mr. Emerson's teaching consists. He adds but little to the store of thought. His appeal is not so much to the understanding as to the soul of man. He regards thought as the wise man regards money; not as good in itself, but good for its uses and as a means. He seeks for absolute values, for what underlies and gives meaning to thought, for the universal of which the individual is the imperfect symbol and representative. He looks through shows and masks and illusions to the substance beneath them. He has the clear, practical judgment of the nineteenth-century American man of business, but he applies his judgment with the insight of the prophet, and he regards all things as if they were merely ideas.

In this idealistic turn of mind his nature is that of a poet, and in comparing his first and his last volume one can hardly fail to be struck with the fact that in all their most characteristic qualities they seem like contemporaneous productions. There is little in his latest volume which, so far as tone and spirit are concerned, might not belong appropriately with the poems of twenty years ago; little in his earlier volume which might not equally well find place in that of this year. His genius was mature from the start, and there is so little of the artist in his composition that time and experience and culture add no new capacity to his powers of expression. True to himself, as few men are capable of being, from the beginning, he remains true to himself to-day, and the spirit that moves him to poetry touches the same chords and works the same harmonies now as when he was a young man. The sound of the wind in the forest does not change with difference of years. Mr. Emerson's poetic genius seems as little modified by conscious will—as simply natural and inartistic—as the genius of the pine or the hemlock.

Mr. Emerson's inspiration comes from ideas rather than from actual life. There is nothing in it of a dramatical or lyrical quality. The emotions and interests of individuals do not appeal to him in such a manner as to lead him to seek to give expression to them in his poetry. None of his poems are, in a proper sense, studies of character; none of them are narrative or have to do with events and stories. They are, consequently, not poems of delight so much as poems of invigoration. It is not men but man with which they are concerned; not human nature but Nature, the mother of us all, whom the poet has studied, and whose aspects and influences he reproduces in his poems. A sentence from his own essay on Shakespeare describes his poetic sense; he knows "that a tree has another use than for apples, and corn another than for meal, and the ball of the earth than for tillage and roads; that these things bear a second and finer harvest to the mind, being emblems of its thoughts, and conveying in all their natural history a certain mute commentary on human life." Most of his finer and most characteristic poems are inspired with this feeling. Take, for example, in his first volume, the exquisite verses entitled "The Snow-Storm," or "The Humble Bee," one of the most perfect of his poems in expression, or the little piece called "Berrying;" or, from his new volume, the noble poem called "The Sea-shore." But perhaps he rises to his highest level where this sentiment of nature is most distinctly expressed in direct relation to man, as in "The Problem"—one of those poems which will always be held among the best—or as in passages from the "Wood-Notes."

Our space is too limited to permit us to cite from poems which ought to be familiar to every lover of poetry, but we must make room for a few lines from this latter poem, "Wood-Notes," which is not so well known as some of the poet's briefer pieces. The pine-tree sings to the poet:

"Only thy Americans
Can read thy line, can meet thy glance,
But the runes that I rehearse
Understands the universe;
The least breath my boughs which tossed
Brings again the Pentecost;
To every soul it soundeth clear
In a voice of solemn cheer—
'Am I not thine? Are not these thine?'
And they reply, 'For ever mine!'
My branches speak Italian,
English, German, Basque, Castilian,
Mountain speech to Highlanders,
Ocean tongues to islanders,
To Fin and Lap and swart Malay,
To each his bosom secret say.

. . . .

For Nature beats in perfect tune,
And rounds with rhyme her every rune,
Whether she work in land or sea,
Or hide underground her alchemy.
Thou canst not wave thy staff in air,
Or dip thy paddle in the lake,
But it carves the bow of beauty there,
And the ripples in rhymes the oar forsake."

It is, perhaps, due in part to the absence from Mr. Emerson's genius of any controlling æsthetic element that henot in frequently indulges himself in mysticism, and makes his verses puzzles and enigmas not only to the common reader, but even to the trained student of poetry. "Brahma," which excited so much cheap amusement and wonder when it first appeared some years ago in The Atlantic Monthly, was not, indeed, one of these riddles, but is plain and intelligible as an expression of Hindu Pantheism. It is a sign of the change brought about by years that there is far less of this obscurity in the new volume than in the old. But Mr. Emerson is, however, still careless about the shape in which his thought embodies itself, and fails to guard his poetry against the attacks of time by casting his poems in perfect and imperishable forms. If there be much of the Greek philosopher in his composition, there is very little of the Greek artist. Many far inferior poets have a freer gift of melody and a keener sense of harmony, order, and proportion. The music of his verse is rarely long sustained, and he does injustice to his own culture by not infrequent neglect of rhythm and of rhyme. Thus, in "May-Day" he ventures to rhyme abroad with Lord, and, still worse, poured and abroad; so, too, we find him rhyming coats and spots, zones and towns, cavaliers and travellers (where the accent is wrong as well as the rhyme). There are quatrains in the "Boston Hymn" and in "My Garden" which cannot be read musically.

"May-Day and other Pieces. By Ralph Waldo Emerson." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1867. 16mo, pp. 206.

It is not to find spots on the sun that we speak of these defects; but because of our regret that poems which ought to be popular, and ought to outlast most of our contemporary poetry, are deprived by them of the chance of immortality which attends a work fashioned in perfect form. It is the form which is the seal of duration of all human works. Happily, there are some of Mr. Emerson's poems of which the form is the worthy embodiment of the thought.

Mr. Emerson's muse loves to dwell on "those clear-ethered heights" which are the resort of calm and noble thoughts, of pure fancies and generous sentiment. Of the youth to whom such poetry is dear all good may be prophesied. It will nerve him to high thinking and high living. It will make his ideals more precious and more beautiful to him. It will serve him as a test of the purposes and motives of his life. In the best sense, Mr. Emerson is a moral poet; he writes not to draw a moral, but because he is possessed with a moral sentiment which he can best express in poetry. He is the utterer of the moral ideas by which the hearts of his generation are moved. He is a poet of his times, essentially American in spirit; that is, devoted to universal ends and to the common welfare. His strength lies not in the power of his imagination and the vivacity of his fancy so much as in the dignity and breadth of his sentiment. His poetry comes from a large and pure nature, and it will always be prized most by the readers who are most in sympathy with the qualities which gain for its author the respect and the gratitude of those whose respect and gratitude are best worth having.

We must please ourselves by making two brief citations from the "May-Day" volume. The first is from "Voluntaries:"

"In an age of fops and toys,
  Wanting wisdom, void of right,
Who shall nerve heroic boys
  To hazard all in Freedom's fight,—
Break sharply off their jolly games,
  Forsake their comrades gay,
And quit proud homes and youthful dames
  For famine, toil, and fray?
Yet on the nimble air benign
  Speed nimbler messages,
That waft the breath of grace divine
  To hearts in sloth and ease.
So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
  So near is God to man,
When Duty whispers low, Thou must,
  The youth replies, I can."

DAYS.

"Damsels of Time, the hypocritic Days,
Muffled and dumb like barefoot dervishes,
And marching single in an endless file,
Bring diadems and faggots in their hands.
To each they offer gifts after his will,
Bread, kingdoms, stars, and sky that holds them all,
I, in my pleachèd garden, watched the pomp,
Forgot my morning wishes, hastily
Took a few herbs and apples, and the Day
Turned and departed silent. I, too late,
Under her solemn fillet saw the scorn."

JAMES KIRKE PAULDING.*

DR. GRISWOLD in his "Prose Writers of America" remarked upon Nathaniel Hawthorne as follows: "He controls his reader as the capricious air does the harp. The handkerchief, raised toward the eye to wipe away the blinding moisture there, is checked at the lips to suppress a smile summoned by some touch of delicate and felicitous humor." So it may seem a hard thing to say of any person that he is one of those American authors whom the world may properly leave to Dr Griswold; but we believe that is what must be said of J. K. Paulding. He does not deserve a long biography, nor elaborate criticism, nor, briefly, remembrance. And in fact he has been very well forgotten. Between 1802, when he began contributing to Peter Irving's Morning Chronicle, and 1858, when he wrote some verses which were probably his last literary effort, he produced something like twenty-five volumes, and Griswold says that a complete collection of his more elaborate writings would fill about thirty volumes; but except "Salmagundi," the joint production of himself and Washington Irving, nothing of all this mass of matter is now read by anybody; hardly anybody knows the titles of any two of the volumes, and "Salmagundi" is known to ten persons by its title where it is known to one by its contents.

His son, however, Mr. William I. Paulding, to whom was left the care of Mr. Paulding's literary property and literary reputation, has resolved upon discharging his duty by giving us in five volumes a life of his father and certain of his works. In so doing he is doubtless over-zealous. One compact volume, prefaced with a biographical memoir, and consisting in small part of passages from the author's poems and in great part of selected essays—for, as his son is aware, Mr. Paulding was more successful in the humorous essay than in any other department of literature—this would have been our way of trying to secure for Mr. Paulding the attention of the present and the next generation. All this, however, is rather the affair of Mr. Paulding's literary executor than of the public, which will find it as easy to leave five books unpurchased as to leave one. But as regards another point in the editor's method of doing his work, we should do wrong if we did not protest against it. He says:

"I have felt, therefore, that I was entitled to more than the ordinary latitude of an editor, and have seized upon that privilege of revision which the preoccupation or the indifference of the author allowed to escape himself. The changes are mostly in the shape of omissions of tautological matter or corrections of inaccuracies of language due to carelessness. The free substitutions of words are in a great measure mere transfers of his own expressions; though I have occasionally ventured to introduce one of my own. But I am confident that I have not in any way, or in the least, distorted or disturbed that more etherial part of the work which is the measure and figure of his mind."

We shall not attempt to show any one who does not already perceive it the absurdity of this way of editing an author's works. Richard Bentley, as editor of "Paradise Lost," tried it on the verse

"No light, but rather darkness visible," and was confident that he had given us Milton, and Milton bettered, in the new verse:

"No light, but rather a transpicuous gloom."

Paulding is not Milton, nor the editor of Paulding so unfit a critic of his father's works as Bentley of "Paradise Lost;" but if we want Paulding's works at all—and there is a bare chance that they may at some time be of some value to somebody as specimens of "the formative period of American literature"—we want them exactly as they were written, without the smallest change to mislead the smallest verbal critic of the twenty-first or twenty-second century. We hope, for the sake of setting a good example, if for no other reason, the editor will reconsider his determination and deal with the public in strict honesty. Unless, indeed, he is that man who can estimate precisely all the effects, in sæcula sæculorum, of even infinitesimal falsehoods, and can assure us that the effects of this one may be disregarded. In which case there is less to be said in reprehension of his action.

James Kirke Paulding was born in Dutchess County, New York, on the 22d of August, 1778—not, as Griswold says, in 1779. The family, which perhaps was Dutch and perhaps English—the editor is not sure about its nationality—first settled in this country in 1664. James Paulding's father, at the time of the boy's birth, was acting as a "State Commissary to the Revolutionary Forces." A nephew of his and cousin of our author was the Paulding who figured in the capture of André. And our author himself, born in the midst of war, his childhood being passed among a mixed community of Whigs and Tories, and his earliest recollections being of the atrocities of this cruel sort of fighting, took in with his milk a very bitter prejudice against England and the English. We fancy it had much to do with his liking for Goldsmith that he could call him Irish, and Swift, whom also he imitated, also, it is very likely, passed with him for an oppressed Irishman and no British tyrant. This Anglophobia was very prominent in all Mr. Paulding's literary career, perhaps is his most decided characteristic as an author; but if we remember the scenes of his youth, he will be excused for this narrowness, from which only the best and the worst Americans of his day were able to free themselves. The commissary, his father, a devoted patriot, finding difficulty at one time in meeting his engagements, pledged his entire fortune for provisions for the army, and lost it all; the State legislature, after peace came, would not reimburse him, his creditors threw him into jail, and, though soon released, his courage was broken by the scurvy treatment he had received, and he did nothing afterwards to retrieve his losses. Thus James Paulding was brought up as a very poor man's son. His boyhood was gloomy; he knew, he says, what it was to want bread.

His education in school, which he got in a log school-house while living with an uncle a little way out of Tarrytown, extended over but a few months, and "first and last cost about fifteen dollars, certainly quite as much as it was worth," and ended before he was thirteen years old. It was while at school that he made Goldsmith's acquaintance; he fell in with a copy of the "Citizen of the World," and to that work, which he read twenty times at least, he owed it, he says, that he had any taste or style. Going back from his uncle's house and the school in its neighborhood to Tarrytown, where his father and mother lived, he spent the time between his thirteenth and nineteenth years on the farm with his parents, doing not much work, shooting a little, fishing a little, reading what books he could lay hold of, and dreaming away many of his hours. At nineteen he had never been five miles from home.

But in 1797, his elder brother, William, found a place for him—a clerkship in the United States Loan Office—and he went to New York. Washington Irving's brother, William, had married Paulding's sister, and an acquaintance formed between the future authors soon ripened into a friendship which was never broken during life. Other members of the circle of which in those days these two were a great part were Harry Ogden, Henry Brevoort, Gouverneur Kemble, and William and Ebenezer Irving. With a spirit of fun, which nowadays seems rather mild in flavor, all of this fellowship except Washington Irving, who was probably the namer, had nicknames, as "the Patroon," "Nuncle," "the membrane," "the supercargo," "Captain Greatheart." Paulding was "Billy Taylor." The meetings of the set were perhaps somewhat literary, and no doubt not infrequently were convivial:

> "Shreds of odd stories have floated down even to the present day—how Henry Brevoort's hat, taken by mistake after a dinner-party, was recognized on the head of an individual found in the gutter in front of Trinity Church, whom the Dogberrys of the day, or rather night, bore carefully home to that gentleman's lodgings, and insisted upon the body's being his own; how Billy M. was once carried in procession by his still capable friends to his bed, and, with Mozart's requiem chanted over him, was buried under all the furniture of his room; how—but what skills it to repeat these things now? 'Alack and alack!' of all those merry blades but one survives. That one is Gouverneur Kemble, 'the Patroon,' probably so styled by way of joke in those days of great landed properties because he owned an old house and a few acres near Newark, New Jersey—the Cockloft Hall of 'Salmagundi.'"

In January, 1807, the first number of "Salmagundi" was published, and was received with great favor; but when the authors demanded of Longworth, the publisher, an equitable share in the profits, he refused to accede to the demand, and the publication came to a sudden end. Remaining, we suppose—the biographer does not tell us—in the Loan Office, Mr. Paulding employed his spare hours in writing prose not very powerful, and verse decidedly weakly, for the newspapers, and in turning out occasionally something more ambitious. In 1812 he published "The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan," in which he imitated Swift's style; and in 1813 he attempted in "The Lay of the Scotch Fiddle" to burlesque Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel." The attempt was a very bad failure, if we may judge by the specimens which the editor places before us. We make room for one extract, and for the editor's critical comment upon it:

> "As the light vapor upward flies
> To seek its kindred of the skies,
> New objects greet the wondering view,
> Of various form and varied hue.
> A jutting point, a circling cove,
> Whose sandy beach the fishes love;
> A glen retreating from the shore,
> Down which the rushing waters pour;
> A whitewashed cottage, bowered in trees
> Scarce moving in the morning breeze;
> Each in its turn, a fair array,
> Stand cheerful in the eye of day,
> Till, at the last, a beauteous whole
> Combines to win the ravished soul,
> So, on the morning of her birth,
> From Chaos rose the smiling earth,
> And from the gloom of vapory night,
> Rushed into order, beauty, light."

"However delicious this, I fancy it rather a study from the Hudson than from Chesapeake Bay. But this by the way."

Such as it was, "The Lay," and "John Bull and Brother Jonathan," and a pamphlet entitled "The United States and England," a patriotic reply to some quarterly reviewer, attracted the attention of Mr. Madison, and in 1815 Mr. Paulding was made secretary of a Board of Navy Commissioners. In 1816-17 he wrote "Letters from the South" in two volumes, a work which relates to Virginia only, and is filled up with nature-painting and disquisition of one kind and another; in 1818 he published "The Backwoodsman," a long and very discursive poem; in 1818 he married Miss Kemble; in 1819 he published a second series of "Salmagundi," which he wrote without aid from Irving; in 1822 he published "A Sketch of Old England," which is a comparison, of course to the great disadvantage of England, drawn between that country and the United States; in 1823 "Konigsmarke the Long Finne," a sort of parody of one of Scott's novels; in 1824 he was made Navy Agent at New York; in 1825 he published "John Bull in America, or the New Munchausen," a caricature of the early British traveller; in 1831 "The Dutchman's Fireside," the best of his novels; and in 1832 "Westward Ho." It is not worth while to continue this catalogue of titles which mean nothing to the reader of to-day; Mr. Paulding was a busy writer nearly all his life, but when one has catalogued his works there is really not very much more to be said of them, and whatever more is to be said may better be said when the other volumes of this series of books come from the press. In 1838 Mr. Van Buren made Mr. Paulding Secretary of the Navy, an office which he filled with credit and from which he retired in 1841 to private life. He spent the last twelve years of his life on his farm in the county of his birth, and on the fifth of April, 1860, he died at the advanced age of eighty-one—an honorable man, a patriotic citizen, but, speaking broadly, a writer of not the least importance to any but his own generation and of no great importance to that.

THE MAGAZINES FOR JUNE.

We have nothing new, we believe, to say about "The Guardian Angel," which, as usual, occupies the post of honor in The Atlantic Monthly. An occasional stroke of wit, an occasional touch of poetical feeling, an occasional proof of the truth that the physician and student of the body has an insight peculiar to himself into the diseased and the healthy movements of the mind, give the reader a pleasure not to be despised, and induce him to go on in spite of the commonplaceness of the characters, the dulness of much of the satire—satire is one-sided, and we say nothing of the truth or falsehood of it—and in spite of the atmosphere of carnality which pervades the story. This month the guardian angel appears for the first time, and seemingly is a visionary figure, suggested by a picture, of a female ancestor of Myrtle Hazard's.

In "Poor Richard," as in his other love stories, Mr. Henry James, Jr., shows his fondness for handling delicate threads of feelings and motives in the intricate web of character. We find a good example of his patience and perhaps over-refinement of thought in depicting his personages in the passage where the three men find themselves together with Miss Whittaker, and her rustic lover, a fierce and moody man, sits by while she converses with the others. Whether or not we admit it probable that Richard could have entertained a doubt as to his inferiority, we are at any rate ready to admit that in giving himself an answer to his question he reasoned closely: "Richard sat by, wondering, in splenetic amazement, whether he was an ignorant boor or whether they were only a brace of ignorant snobs. He decided correctly enough, in substance, for the former hypothesis. For it seemed to him that Gertrude's consummate accommodation (for as such he viewed it) of her tone and her manner to theirs added prodigiously (so his lover's instinct taught him) to her loveliness and dignity. How magnanimous an impulse on Richard's part was this submission for his sweetheart's sake to a fact damning to his own vanity could have been determined only by one who knew the proportions of that vanity." We may remark here, as we have named the two writers together, that in Mr. James's, as in Dr. Holmes's, treatment of women, the influence, the physical influence, of sex is very perceptible; but in Mr. James's stories it is not only refined but subtle—an aroma, as it were; while the better known novelist deals with women as if he were a materialist.

"Negro Spirituals," by Mr. Higginson, is very interesting reading. So far as we know, his paper gives us the largest collection of the songs made and sung by the American slave that has yet been put before the public, and, if our memory serves us, he has succeeded very well indeed in reproducing the Sea Islands dialect. We regret that Mr. Higginson did not also, as he might have done so well, and as is almost necessary to a tolerable appreciation of the "sperichils," describe for us the "shout." This is a ceremony which the white clergymen are inclined to discountenance, and even of the colored elders some of the more discreet try sometimes to put on a face of discouragement; and although, if pressed for Biblical warrant for the shout, they generally seem to believe "he in de Book," or "he dereda in Matchew," still, it is not considered blasphemous or improper if "de chillen" and "dem young gal" carry it on in the evening for amusement's sake, and with no well-defined intention of "praise." But the true "shout" takes place on Sundays or on "praise" nights through the week, and either in the praise-house or in some cabin in which a regular religious meeting has been held. Very likely more than half the population of the plantation is gathered together; let it be the evening, and a light-wood fire burns red before the door of the house and on the hearth. For some time one can hear, though at a good distance, the vociferous exhortation or prayer of the presiding elder or of the brother who has a gift that way and who is not "on the back seat"—a phrase the interpretation of which is, "under the censure of the church authorities for bad behavior"—and at regular intervals one hears the elder "deaconing" a hymn-book hymn, which is sung two lines at a time, and whose wailing cadences, borne on the night air, are indescribably melancholy. But the benches are pushed back to the wall when the formal meeting is over, and old and young, men and women, sprucely-dressed young men, grotesquely half-clad field-hands, the women generally with gay handkerchiefs twisted about their heads and with short skirts, boys with tattered shirts and men's trousers, young girls barefooted—all stand up in the middle of the floor, and when the "sperichil" is struck up, begin first walking and by-and-by shuffling round, one after the other, in a ring. The foot is hardly taken from the floor, and the progression is mainly due to a jerking, hitching motion, which agitates the entire shouter, and soon brings out streams of perspiration. Sometimes he dances silently, sometimes as he shuffles he sings the chorus of the spiritual, and sometimes the song itself is also sung by the dancers. But more frequently a band, composed of some of the best singers and of tired shouters, stand at the side of the room to "base" the others, singing the body of the song and clapping their hands together or on the knees. Song and dance are alike extremely energetic, and often, when the shout lasts into the middle of the night, the monotonous thud, thud of the feet prevents sleep within half a mile of the praise-house. But this will all be treated of, we hope, in the new book of spirituals which is announced in another part of our paper. Mr. Higginson, it appears, was fortunate enough not only to light upon a poet of negro minstrelsy, but also he found the poem thus repeated to him by its maker to be a genuine "fiddle-sing." For this secular poetry of the negroes we hope the compilers above referred to will keep a sharp lookout. It is so rare that some have made the mistake of doubting its existence.

Mr. Whittier celebrates the good qualities of the late Major Stearns in verses disfigured by some very unfortunate flaws. Mr. Whipple, in his "Shakespeare, the Man and the Dramatist," makes a good essay on a difficult subject for the essayist. He must feel, however, that he gives a very inadequate account of Byron when he describes that poet as a misanthrope, a representative of a class of which the highest logical development is Timon of Athens. It is true—we think it is James Hannay who points it out—that one goes through three stages in one's acquaintance with Byron. The first is the stage of which the sign and emblem is the turned-down collar and the misanthropic brow; in the second, one is ashamed of his boyish admiration, and lets Lord Macaulay teach him his estimate of his former idol; in the third, one gives great and honest admiration to the powerful intellect and powerful soul of the formidable exponent of the modern spirit who, dying at thirty-six, had written "Don Juan." Mr. Whipple seems to be still in the second stage of these three. Mr. Parton, in "The City of St. Louis," is quite as agreeable as in his glorification of Chicago. Mr. Bone, in his article relating to our Russian American possessions, deals too largely in latitudes and longitudes and other measurements to be generally interesting or intelligible. His paper must be read in connection with a map. It contains, however, much valuable information, and gives, on the whole, a highly favorable account of the new territory. The other articles, and none of them is bad, in fact none of them is not good of its kind, are "The Founders of Montreal;" "Golden Chains," which is all about the manufacture of gold chains, and is written in a very pleasant, sprightly way; "A Venetian Experience;" "The Red School-house," which is a smooth and pretty piece of poetry; "Among the Comedians," and "Reviews and Literary Notices," which consist of a good notice of three slight books, a slight notice of one good book, and a careful notice of Mr. Reed's damaging reply to Mr. Bancroft.

Of the other magazines of the month there is very little to be said. The Catholic World is mostly made up of selected articles from various foreign Roman Catholic magazines. From The Month it borrows an article on "The Mortality of Great Capitals," which is very well worth consideration, especially when it briefly considers the efficacy of a lavish supply of pure water in lowering the death-rate; from Le Correspondant we have a pleasant paper on ancient lecturers and orators; from The Dublin University an equally entertaining and instructive paper on "Libraries of the Middle Ages;" from The Dublin Review an article on "The Church and the Roman Empire." The only prominent original article is an able examination of M. Victor Cousin's claims to the title of philosopher. Little that is trifling finds its way into The Catholic World, and it perhaps makes head more successfully than most other sectarian periodicals against the constant tendency of that sort of literature to become extremely uninteresting, not to say unpleasant, reading to the general reader.

Hours at Home for June is not a strikingly good magazine. The Duke of Argyll's "Reign of the Law" is carefully and favorably reviewed by Prof. H. B. Smith, and we think Dr. Bushnell's fifth number of the "Moral Uses of Dark Things," which is entitled "The Condition of Solidarity," is perhaps the best of the series. "We exist by race, in families under laws of inheritance, circulating derivative blood, and bearing qualities bred in-and-in which as nearly amount to moral characters as they well can without our being answerable for them," and in other ways which Dr. Bushnell does not forget to mention. We are inextricably knotted into close relationship with our fellows. Thus we live in solidarity, as the French say. But Dr. Bushnell vindicates the freedom of the individual will, and for the rest shows how well it is that all this should be so by applying a form of the argument which is not unusual in dealing with the riddle of the world, and which in a general way may be described as telling the complainer that till he can make a better world he must hold his tongue and recognize the uses of all kinds of adversities. A. Jerome Faust tells us something about Esaias Tégner and his contemporary, the Swedish hymnist, John Olaf Wallin. Hours at Home, let us remark, ought not to borrow poetry without leave and without acknowledgment.

"Over the Plains to Colorado" is the readable thing in this month's Harper's. It tells us rather more about Colorado than we remember to have read before; in particular it talks very intelligibly and very intelligently about mining and the Colorado mines, and enables us to see clearly some of the folly which has made mining stock a name of fear to innumerable abused investors. "The Dodge Club" is rollicking as usual and makes one envy the obstreperous animal spirits of the writer. Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford is said to be the author of "The Marshes," a story of love and death—fleshy and bloody—which we may be permitted to call a screamer. And another well-known writer, Alice Cary, is responsible for a most absurd performance, "Jane Morrison."

The Galaxy has become a monthly instead of a fortnightly magazine, and will, we think, grow better with the change. Hitherto its strong point has apparently been its serial stories, which have generally been of more than average goodness, and, we dare say, by discarding its strong point it might itself become stronger. A magazine with two quite readable novels constantly running through it is an extraordinary magazine if the space between the novels is not in great part filled with padding. This has never been the case to a very reprehensible degree with The Galaxy, which, on the whole, is the second-best literary magazine in the country. Secondariness in a magazine is not so dreadful a fault as in the individual writer, for a small minority of good articles can reconcile us to a large majority of poor ones; but as for the mediocrity of men there is a dreadful saying against it. It is true, however, that The Galaxy has steadily improved since its first number, and we are glad of the change in its times of issue for the reason that the longer interval between numbers must tend to make the numbers better. This month, besides the two novels, Mrs. Edwards's and Mrs. Harding's, we have something about "Torturing Words;" some Alger-dilute by Mr. Eugene Benson, who talks not wisely about "Solitude and Democracy;" some talk about Bismark by C. Wyllys Elliott; and some pleasant enough talk about Déjazet, the wonderful soubrette of the Parisian stage; a careful criticism of "American Painters" as seen at the Academy of Design Exhibition, by Mr. Russell Sturgis, Jr.; "The German Cotillion," by Mr. G. D. Budd, a trifling article; "The Legend of Amsanctus," a well-told little story, by Mr. W. L. Alden; "A Norse Love Story," which is a synopsis of "The Frithiof's Saga," by Mr. Richard Grant White, who really talks as much about "cultivation" as if he were not in full possession of it; and, finally, "Nebulæ," a constant article, the tone of which is not always all that could be wished.

One Thousand Familiar Phrases in English and Romanized Japanese. By the Rev. John Liggins. Second edition. (New York: Hurd & Houghton.)—This beautifully printed pamphlet commends itself now to a larger circle than it did in 1860, the date of its original appearance. Others besides the natives of Japan and foreign residents and visitors in that country and in China are likely to prize it, if not to read it. For, besides Japanese jugglers whom we import, and Japanese embassies that come to us of their own the newly-established communication between Japan and California is bringing us into unexpected contact with the ingenious islanders. In default of having Mr. Liggins at his elbow, Mr. Seward, in his late interview with the Tycoon's commissioners, would have made a better figure if he had used Mr. Liggins's book. He might then have confessed in the vernacular that, linguistically speaking, it is "Difficult to carry on a large business with a small capital" (p. 58); or, turning the conversation upon Russia, have remarked impressively, "Having mutually made a treaty it is very bad to break or violate it" (p. 59).

"THE GUILT OF THE REBELLION."

MR. GREELEY, as we attempted to show last week, struck a formidable blow at the theory that there was any moral guilt in the rebellion when he volunteered to become bondsman for Jefferson Davis. The few shreds of the doctrine which were left were carefully removed on Monday last by an article in The Tribune showing that the rebellion was a "civil war," in all respects like the War of the Revolution, and that therefore the punishment as traitors of persons engaged in it would be cruel or improper.

During the progress of the struggle this view of the position of the Confederates—we ought now in decency to give up calling them "rebels"—was vehemently urged both by the Southerners themselves and by foreign orators and writers. When Americans, led on by The Tribune, filled the air with reproaches against Europe for not sympathizing with the North, our claims to this sympathy were stoutly denied, on the ground that the war was a civil war like the Revolution of 1776, that the issue was simply a political issue, and that it was impossible to tell which of the parties was in the right till the contest was brought to a close, and, therefore, the English maintained that in the meantime they were justified by every consideration in giving their sympathy and countenance to "the weaker party."

To this our reply, and the reply of our friends all over the world, was that the Southern attempt at revolution differed widely from the Revolution of 1776 in this, that the South revolted against a government under which it had voluntarily placed itself, and from which it had received no injury, and that the avowed and sole object of the revolt was not political independence simply but the perpetuation of human slavery over half the American continent; not freedom for the revolters, for that they had, but bondage for others; not, in short, the object which had made almost all preceding rebellions justifiable and glorious, but another and most detestable one—the creation of a political system based upon the doctrine that God had made the poor and weak to be the cattle of the rich, bought and sold and bred for simple gain. The Republican press, to its honor, never tired of dwelling on this distinction between this rebellion and the rebellion of 1776. It was by the aid of this distinction that we won the support of the best and purest men of European countries; it was this that supported the Lancashire operatives under their privations, and it was this, too, that comforted hundreds of thousands at the North when the tide of suffering and sorrow had risen so high that no merely political gain seemed worth the prolongation of bloodshed and devastation. The Tribune, too, which has all along been the great preacher of "moral ideas" during the war, rendered good service in upholding it; though often exceedingly weak as to the political value of the Union, on "the guilt of the rebellion" it never ceased dilating.

It now appears, however, that there really was no guilt in the rebellion whatever. There was no legal guilt, for there can be no treason, it appears, committed in "a civil war;" and if Davis & Co. could make a civil war without legal guilt, how could they incur moral guilt? If they had a right to make war on the United States at all, they had a right to make it for any object that seemed good to them. It is none of our business to spread our social and political theories on foreign soil at the point of the sword. We should not be justified in declaring war against Great Britain in order to rescue her agricultural laborers from degradation. The reason why we made war on the South was because the soil in which it sought to lay broad and deep the foundation of its accursed system was American soil; because the men engaged in this detestable attempt were American citizens; because the laws they broke were American laws; because the shame of their doings was our shame, and because their success would have proved to the remotest ages a hateful monument of our dishonor. We ask any honest man in the country to look back to 1862 and 1863, and think if, in those dark and trying hours, he was not supported and consoled by this consideration? if, when armies were giving way, when fleets seemed powerless, when Copperheads were joyous, when the whole civilized world was either mocking or pitying us, he did not draw confidence and courage from the consciousness that there was, after all, a moral element in the struggle, such as no other war ever had; that the rebellion was not simply a legal dispute, but a crime, and that the rebels were not simply bellicose publicists, but unscrupulous slaveholders raving for "niggers" and cotton?

The overthrow of this theory by The Tribune and the assimilation by it of our position to that of England in 1776, and the position of the South to that of the revolted colonies, if acquiesced in by the public, will certainly be recorded in history as the most remarkable piece of self-stultification on record. Self-stultification, too, is a very mild term to apply to it. Future generations will argue, and argue with reason, that there could not have been much moral sense left amongst a people who, after treating rebellion for four years as the blackest crime ever committed, denied when it was all over that it was any crime at all. Decency requires that we should keep up the humbug, if humbug it be, till our wounded and cripples have died off, and the files of our blattering moral newspapers have been removed out of sight. The world can stand a good deal of hypocrisy, because the hypocrite, as has often been said, at least respects virtue; but knavery which impudently avows and laughs over its own cheats and, more than that, claims for itself a place amongst the virtues, the world cannot stand.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

IF there be, as we attempted to show last week, no foundation for the theory that the municipalities have a "natural right" to govern themselves, the government of great cities, like every other question of politics, is a question of expediency. The Evening Post is, so far as we know, the only journal which takes for granted that the city must be governed by the majority of the voters living in it, and it consequently occupies itself entirely with the consideration of constitutional machinery. The New York Times, on the other hand, maintains that the majority in the city is not capable of governing it, and that no change can be a change for the better which is not a change in the constituency which elects the officers.

The theory of The Evening Post is probably that which will find most favor with the Convention. The Democratic party, which owes its existence in this State almost entirely to the city vote, will, of course, stoutly oppose any measure which deprives its supporters of any right or privilege they now possess. The Republicans, on the other hand, are only committed to one thing, but that thing is the extension of the suffrage, so that they are by no means likely to propose to take votes from the New York Irish while urging the complete enfranchisement of the negroes of the State. In fact, it would be almost as difficult to get the English House of Lords to admit the personal responsibility of the Queen as to get the leaders of any party among us just now to admit that universal suffrage is not good in all places and under all circumstances. In democracies as well as monarchies, people, let them be ever so practical in their temperament, are apt to get astride of a maxim or theory and ride it to death. We in New York are just now astride of the theory that the majority even of one locality cannot go wrong, and though it is tumbling us into one ditch after another, we keep telling the bystanders what a wonderful beast it is, and assuring them that the little accidents they witness are simply due to bad grooming, or bad saddling, or bad bitting.

The Evening Post proposes to set everything to rights in our large cities by concentrating as much power as possible in the hands of the mayor, leaving him, as at present, to be elected by the city vote, but giving him the appointment of most of the minor officials, and making him responsible for the proper discharge of their duties. This would, with other changes, be a change for the better, but alone it would not give us a good city government. It would make the mayoralty more than ever a prize for the class who now form the various "rings" and govern the city, as it would give him the filling of an enormous number of places. Accordingly, when an election drew near, the Citizens' Association and a large number of other "intelligent and virtuous citizens" would put their heads together, and seek out the best man for the mayoralty. They would find him without difficulty. He would be probably a merchant of great probity and great executive talent, and he would consent to serve. The leading journals would then all rally to his support. The 25,000 Republicans might be counted on for him with tolerable certainty, and so might a sprinkling of wealthy Democrats; but his vote, under the most favorable circumstances, would not get above 30,000.

In the meantime Mozart and Tammany Hall would meet to make their nomination. Warned by past defeats, they would take every pains not to divide their forces. The leaders would endeavor to arrange a compromise. There would be a great number of offices to divide—in the Police, in the Central Park, in the Tax office, in the Street Commissioner's office, in the Controller's office—in fact, the revenue of a European kingdom to distribute amongst functionaries and contractors. After much debate the various places would be parcelled out between the two factions, and then they would select somebody for the nomination who would be pliant enough to carry out the arrangement, and of course they would soon find him. He would certainly be a base man, perhaps a man of notoriously bad character. On The Post's theory they would not venture to offer such a man to the majority. But we know by experience they would, and we have every reason to believe they would elect him. This same party in 1855 nominated for the mayoralty a man who had been, a year previously, proved guilty in open court of forgery and swindling, and he was twice elected in spite of desperate opposition from the "virtuous and intelligent." Last year they nominated for Congress an ex-pugilist, street rowdy, and keeper of a gambling-hell, all in one person, and, to the great scandal of the "virtuous and intelligent," elected him without difficulty. It is fair to presume that the fears of "enlightened public opinion" would not be sharpened by the knowledge that a greater number of offices than ever before would be at the disposal of the victors.

Tammany and Mozart would not be in the least troubled by the reform artillery. Their constituents do not read the reform papers, and do not attend meetings of "the virtuous and intelligent." The men to whom offices had been promised would go quietly down to the wards, set the grog-shop-keepers to work, marshal their forces, hold one or two meetings in Union Square, at which the rich men, the Albany jobbers, and the Excise law would be denounced, guns let off, and lanterns waved, just to keep up the excitement; and on the day of election would seat their candidate in the City Hall by about 40,000 majority. The election won, the mayor would proceed to divide the spoils as per agreement, and the reform press would duly proceed to denounce him, as they did Fernando Wood; but he, well knowing that they could not harm him, and did not reach the public on which he relied, would pocket his share of the plunder and laugh.

Now, this is not a fancy picture. We dare any man, who knows anything about New York politics or the character of the voters who compose the Democratic party in this city, to deny that this is what in all probability would take place. We therefore regard The Post's plan of increasing the number of places at the disposal of the nominee of the majority as about as likely to put an end to corruption and misgovernment as the emptying of a barrel of petroleum on the flames to extinguish a fire.

When you have to deal with a thoroughly corrupt or ignorant constituency, all attempts to purify politics by changes in the political machinery or in the distribution of power, as long as the majority appoint the officials, whether one or many, are like attempts to change a pack of cards by shuffling them—shuffle ever so much, and the pack remains the same. There is no occult power in constitutions or charters. They depend for all their efficacy on the men who work them. The best constitution ever drawn would not make Mexico a great, free, and prosperous country. The worst constitution ever drawn would not ruin the United States. The people would meet, abolish it, and make a better one, just as they did once before. But whenever the people of the United States become vicious, degraded, cowardly, and ignorant, the days of their government are numbered. If Moses and the prophets came down and drew a constitution for them, it would be of no avail.

The plan of The Times, to surrender the city legislature to the payers of direct taxes, might work well. But there is little chance of its being adopted. It would look anti-democratic, and, therefore, the Democrats certainly, and the Republicans most probably, would reject it. And yet there is everything to be said in its favor. There is no such check on extravagance and corruption as the payment of direct taxes. Could the expenses of the city government be raised by a capitation tax, graduated by income, we think it would do much to make The Post's plan effective. But, failing this, the voting of money by the direct tax-payers only would, probably, in practice be found the best mode of stopping waste and breaking up the "rings." Of course it may be said, and Democratic orators do say, that every inhabitant of a city helps to pay the taxes—and so he does—either through his rent or the prices of his clothes and provisions; but then the poor and ignorant do not know this, and will not believe it, and the fact is, therefore, valueless for the purposes of municipal reform. The representation of direct tax-payers only might also easily be made to seem an attempt at the creation of a plutocracy, and neither party will, therefore, have the courage to touch it. The truth is, too, the rich men of New York have furnished some of the very worst swindlers of the public.

What, then, is the remedy, if there be a remedy? There are so many difficulties in our way, no matter in what direction we turn, that no candid man will feel complete confidence in any plan he may propose. The field of choice, too, is very much narrowed by the fact that so many things are excluded by party considerations. Neither the Republicans nor Democrats in the Convention can or will come to the consideration of this matter with perfectly unbiassed minds or without thinking of the possible effects of their action on Federal politics, for which reason we regard the meeting of the Convention in the present crisis as in some sense a misfortune.

But on three points we take our stand, and we know we cannot be driven from them: That the primal cause of the badness of the New York city government is the ignorance, degradation, and want of political training of the majority of the voters; that there is no immediate prospect that the character of these voters will undergo any material change; and third, as a corollary of the foregoing, that no attempt at reform which does not change the composition or character of the constituency will be successful. If a spring be muddy, the water which flows from it will be muddy, no matter what arrangement of pipes or hydrants you may make.

How can the character of the constituency of this city be changed? In two ways only. One, by improving the individuals who compose it, which for present purposes is out of the question; the other, by introducing new elements into it, or, in other words, enlarging it. In discussing this question it must not be forgotten that the problem of municipal government is not how to secure life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—for these things every citizen must look, and has always looked, to the state—but how to secure clean streets, pure water, and a good police at the lowest possible rate. Political questions, properly so called, no more come within the province of municipal government than within that of insurance or bank corporations. Moreover, we have never acknowledged the right of localities to regulate their own concerns. The State has always reserved the right to interfere with them to almost any extent short of the total abolition of local government. So that there would now be nothing new, and nothing fundamentally unsound, in transferring to the electors of the State the appointment of the chief executive officer of the city, and giving him the appointment and control of all the minor officials. This would have the effect of raising the mayor out of the foul atmosphere of local politics, and would make him as independent of the harpies who now beset the City Hall as the governor is; and it would be essential that either he or the governor should have the appointment of the city police justices. The representative branch of the government should then be made small, and should consist of one chamber of not over half a dozen members, so that none but known men would be likely to be put on the ticket, and be elected by the whole city, discarding the ridiculous theory that each ward has separate interests to be watched over; and the duties of this body should be the voting of taxes, and little else, and the votes of taxes even should be subject to the mayor's absolute veto.

This plan would contain what seems to us the best feature of The Post's plan, the concentration of authority, and it would contain what to our mind is an essential feature of The Times's plan or of any good plan, the change in the constituency. It will, of course, be met by the old objection that the electors of the State "do not understand the wants of the city;" but we maintain that the city has only one want, and this is one which all men understand, namely, honest men in office. Give us this, and all other desirable things will follow.

New York is not, in the old sense of the word, a municipality. It fulfils none of the conditions of the municipalities round which all our ideas of municipal rights have grown up. Its people are not bound together by any of the ties on which real municipal feeling must rest. It is in fact simply the great market-place of the State, the embouchure of all its great water-courses and railroads, and there is no inhabitant of the State who is not almost if not quite as much interested in its order and prosperity as any dweller in Fifth Avenue. The objections, too, which lie to the government of the city by the Albany Legislature do not lie to the election of the mayor by the whole people of the State. The Legislature may be corrupted, the people cannot be, or if they can, why the whole experiment of popular government is a failure, and we may save ourselves the trouble of further discussion. It may be said that if you have the mayor of New York elected by the State, you must also have the mayors of other large cities. And why not? Why not ordain that all mayors of cities containing over half a million of inhabitants should be State and not local officers? We may depend upon it that we have not yet explored every hole and corner of political science, that we have much yet to learn, and we may be assured also that the democratic theory does not require us to affirm the absolute infallibility of local majorities. The minority in every city, town, and village is entitled to the benefit of all the virtue and intelligence there is in the whole community. We have stoutly denied the doctrine of complete local independence and local infallibility in the case of the Southern States. Why assert it, or allow it to be asserted, with regard to this city? The whole in politics, as in geometry, is greater than a part, but it is also wiser and better.

A MASSACHUSETTS MANUFACTURER ON THE TARIFF.

It was proposed by Mr. Cooper, at the late Protectionist Convention in this city, that the new Industrial League and the Free Trade should jointly circulate documents containing on one side the free-trade argument and on the other the protectionist answer; but the suggestion apparently did not meet with favor. We regret this, because there is nothing more desirable than that the whole controversy should be submitted in a careful and deliberate way to the people. At present it is carried on by the party newspapers mainly as a party question, and the argument is so loaded with abuse and personal recriminations that it is rather difficult for a plain man to get at the gist of it.

The state of the case at present is simply this, that every living political economist of eminence, both here, in England, and on the Continent, except Henry C. Carey, advocates free trade, not as a system good for one country or one stage of industrial progress, but good for all countries and all stages—as, in short, scientific truth as impregnable as any proposition in Euclid, and treat protection as a mediæval fallacy destined to perish before long before the advance of knowledge. The American and Russian protectionists, on the other, maintain that, however sound the free trade theory may be, there are exceptions to it in practice, and that the case of a new country is one of them; that in this country protection sufficient to call manufactures into existence is justifiable, and likely to be efficient; and that, in point of fact, the assumption of the free traders that France and England would have reached their present manufacturing pre-eminence without protection is incapable of proof; and that America, Russia, and all the British colonies are only doing what England herself has done. To the argument drawn from the loss in money which protection may occasion at the outset, the answer is made, and there is no doubt that there is force in it, and that it is the answer which accounts for a good deal of the indifference of the Western farmers to free trade—that even if it does cost heavily to build our manufactures up, we can afford the loss, and want to have manufactures for moral and political reasons, cost what they may.

As it is becoming more and more probable that, as soon as the Reconstruction question is disposed of, the question of tariff and revenue will become the great political issue, all indications of how the current of opinion is running in the great manufacturing and financial centres are naturally of considerable importance, and one of the most important, perhaps, is Mr. Edward Atkinson's pamphlet on the "Collection of the Revenue," to which we called attention a fortnight ago. Mr. Atkinson is a Massachusetts manufacturer, largely interested in cotton-spinning, and does not approach the question of free trade as theorist simply, nor does he recommend a sudden jump into free trade without regard to the enormous interests which have grown up under the tariff, and which, we think, the country ought to consider as sacred as any other kind of property. We trust his brochure may be widely circulated and attentively read, and that protectionists will meet it with as able, as calm, and as courteous a statement of their own case. It is high time they dropped their epithets and insinuations, the talk of "British gold" and "British free trade," and addressed themselves pluckily to the facts and logic of the matter, because it is only by full and fair discussion that we shall ever reach a settled policy about the tariff—and a fixed policy, whether free trade or protectionist, we believe to be of the highest importance. In fact, we consider the strongest objection to protection in a country as rich as this is the constant temptation it holds out to legislative corruption, jobbing, and meddling. Acknowledge once that "interests" ought to be protected by import duties, and you open up a boundless field to political intrigue, of which the financial legislation of the last two sessions affords an excellent illustration. The great advantage of a fixed policy of free trade would be that it would leave manufacturers nothing to ask for from the legislature and the legislature nothing to bestow. But we confess, for our part, that, if the matter cannot now be settled by argument, if every question of this kind has to be settled by experiment, we are in favor of letting the protectionists have their way, say for ten years, so that their system may be fully tried.

Mr. Atkinson shows the fallaciousness of computing the wages of labor in money, and therefore the fallaciousness of supposing that whatever raises a man's nominal wages necessarily improves his condition; that all taxes are levied on production, and that a tariff is a tax; and that the accumulation of more gold in a country than it needs for a circulating medium is a folly; that international trade is, in reality, the interchange of labor. He is terribly hard on the Pennsylvania iron manufacturers, and says of Boston, his own city:

> "I think Boston to-day affords a good illustration of the evils of protection. The conditions of soil, climate, and coast indicated maritime pursuits as the province of New England men; and she engaged in them chiefly until the South forced a protective tariff upon the country. As this destroyed commerce, New England developed textile manufactures before their time, and then, becoming converted to the doctrine of protection, continued to foster them by the same process. The result is, that a large amount of the capital, and a large amount of the business capacity of Boston, which should have been applied to railroads, steamships, and commerce has gone into manufactures; consequently, Boston commerce declines, and young men emigrate. Commerce would have employed the young men at home, or in voyages ending at home; but textile manufactures employ only a few treasurers, agents, or commission merchants, and a very large force of operatives or laborers. There are too many young men for the number of places equal to their capacity, and they must migrate. I think the population of New England has not been improved by this forced establishment of textile manufactures."

JOHN BRIGHT AS AN ORATOR.

I.

The talking talent is not one of those personal gifts which Englishmen delight to honor. If in America the tendency is to overrate its merit, and to heap exaggerated rewards upon its distinguished exercise, in England there is a tendency quite as pronounced in the opposite direction. It is true that Britons find enjoyment in eloquence, for after all that can be said about them Britons are human. They are, indeed, greatly moved by eloquence and are remarkably demonstrative under its power. But when the performance is over, when the lights are out, the spell broken, and they themselves safely escaped into the cooling air, a reaction commonly sets in, and they are very much inclined to estimate the talent by which they have been so highly entertained as at best only a species of mountebank cleverness. "A mere talker," "a glib-tongue," "the gift of the gab"—these are descriptions which in England, and especially among cultivated people, are meant to be the reverse of complimentary. So much is this the case that parliamentary speakers not seldom either affect a hesitant and bungling utterance or are too conscious of the political value of its natural possession to make any effort to overcome it. There is a feeling in the land that very great sincerity must needs talk slowly, and now and then even stumble; that real thoughtfulness can never mount the swifter steeds of speech; that only shallowness and passion and hypocrisy are particularly fluent. Hence bad speaking is really an element of availability. Hence great men, placing themselves at the service of their country, will hem and haw from patriotic motives. They will inspire the reverence of their constituents by a judicious blending of coughing and stammering with their logic. They will carry an election or win the honors of a debate by the persuasive manifestation of an inability to talk. Shakespeare's Antony was a very good Englishman, rather than a Roman, when he tried to fasten upon Brutus the stigma of being eloquent: "I am no orator—as Brutus is!"

"Oh, he can speak!" Such was the damnatory verdict on John Bright which came with sneering accent from the curled lips of an English scholar, last November, with whom we happened to be walking out of the library of the British Museum. Nothing else that Thomas Carlyle said to the boys at the University of Edinburgh a year ago so delighted the English people as these witty sentences against talk which the greatest of living talkers put into that amusing talk, of more than two hours' length, on his inauguration as Lord Rector: "There is very great necessity, indeed, of getting a little more silent than we are. It seems to me the finest nations of the world—the English and the American—are going all away into wind and tongue. Silence is the eternal duty of a man. I must say that speech does not seem to me to have turned to any good account. If a good speaker—an eloquent speaker—is not speaking the truth, is there a more horrid kind of object in creation?" And straightway Mr. Punch took this last sentence, and gave it the point which all kid-gloved Britons had already applied to it, by printing it under a ludicrous cartoon representing John Bright haranguing a begrimed and gaping crowd of artisans.

Nevertheless, as we have already allowed, Britons after all are human; and the love of eloquence is a universal human instinct. Even Britons cannot in all cases with success contend against it. Natural passions are stronger than conventional ones. Thus it has happened, no doubt, that even in a country where, according to Sydney Smith, "an audience is apt to consider the man who tires them less than usual as a trifler and a charlatan," and where, according to Lord Lytton, "Hesitating, Humming, and Drawling are the Three Graces of Conversation," John Bright, by sheer force of oratory, and against the general contempt for oratory, as well as against every disadvantage of religious, educational, and social prejudice, has risen to be not only an unsurpassed personal force in England, but positively one of the institutions of England.

It must be confessed, however, that if English antipathy to oratory has in this case given way, it has done so under a provocation which all the world and succeeding ages will be likely to consider sufficient to justify so exceptional a procedure. For we believe all students of his speeches now admit that John Bright is one of the greatest examplars of a pure, manly, and commanding eloquence that any age or any language can produce.

There are some great orators whose speeches, though they may be read with delight when printed, fall heavy and dead in the actual delivery. Such an orator was Edmund Burke. On the contrary, there are orators whose speeches produce an amazing effect in the actual delivery, but furnish, when cold in type, extremely dismal reading matter to the hapless wight who may encounter them. Such an orator was Whitfield; such an orator was Lord Brougham; such an orator was Henry Clay. Indeed a great master of eloquence has by implication made this latter characteristic almost a proof of the excellence of the speech. "Does the speech read well?" said Charles James Fox, "then depend upon it, it was a poor one." But is not the perfect orator he whose speech is so fluent yet so thoughtful, so energetic in manner yet so choice in quality, so glowing with passion yet so rational, weighty, and suggestive, that while it sways the vast, throng as it leaps from the lips which first give it utterance, it still has, if fairly reported, an undying charm for the student in the closet? Such an orator was Daniel Webster; such an orator is Wendell Phillips; such an orator is that noble English statesman whose eloquence now wields the fierce democracy of England.

John Bright has a merit which is not a very common one among our own popular speakers; he uses pure English, avoiding alike the opposite vulgarisms of bombast and of slang. His style is simply perfect, racy, strong, sharp, terse, and clear, with a basis of glorious Saxon coming straight from the market and the hearth, and just enough impregnated with courtly Norman to give it elevation, nobleness, and an occasional majesty and musical pomp. This, his almost infallible taste in the choice of words, is the key to his victory over the orator-scorning fastidiousness of the educated classes of England. Whence got this Quaker demagogue that marvellous mastery of style which we university men, toiling for it through all ancient and modern lore, would now gladly give our right hands to possess? Such is the frequent and amazed enquiry of many an English scholar. "I may be nothing," said the orator modestly last year at Rochdale, "only your fellow-townsman, a man not brought up in universities or in the society of statesmen." "I have not had the same advantages which others have had," said the orator in the House of Commons a few weeks afterward, "but that fact only makes me the more value that which others have obtained." It is still common for public speakers in England, and especially in the House of Commons, to quote from the Greek and Roman classics, and such quotation is still considered to be what Dr. Johnson called it, "the watchword of literary men." John Bright never strains his mouth to utter the scholastic shibboleth. We do not remember a Latin sentence, and scarcely a Latin word, in any of his speeches, and we are sure he never spoke a Greek one. But he partly reveals the character of his favorite studies as well as the source of his exquisite English vocabulary by the snatches of English poetry which he occasionally introduces into his speeches, and always with aptness and impressive effect.

We shall not soon forget with what sweetness, in speaking of the brightening effect of a true Sunday on the toiling classes of Lancashire, he once quoted a couplet of George Herbert's:

> "The week were dark without thy light;
> Thy torch doth show the way."

We have never listened to anything finer of its kind than a passage in a very grand speech which we had the privilege of hearing him make, last August, in the town hall at Birmingham. He was describing the progress of popular liberty in the English colonies and in the United States, and then, returning to Europe, he said:

> "You will find in the republic of Switzerland, in the kingdoms of Holland and Belgium, in Norway, in Sweden, in France, and now in Germany also, a widespread exercise of the franchise hitherto unknown in our time in this country; and neither emperor nor king nor noble believes that his authority or his interest, his own greatness or the happiness of any of his countrymen, will be jeopardized by the free admission of the people to the constitutional privileges. What is it that we are come to in this country, that what is being rapidly conceded in all parts of the world is being persistently and obstinately refused here in England—the home of freedom, the mother of parliaments"—

At this point the orator paused, as if struggling for some loftier and more vivid language with which to portray the peculiar glory and, therefore, the peculiar shame of England, and then in an instant he resumed, as these fine lines seemed to flash upon his memory—

"of which one of her own poets has said,

> 'Though o'er our heads the frozen Pleiads shine,
> 'Tis Liberty that crowns Britannia's isle,
> And makes her barren rocks and her bleak mountains smile.'"

It was but an audience of working-men, yet the splendor of the quotation and its application to the argument, all the more powerful because so delicate, were fully appreciated, and the vast assemblage seemed lifted from their seats by their enthusiasm. But when the next morning that speech was laid on every aristocratic breakfast-table in England, and innumerable eyes, that could not but sparkle at literary excellence, fell upon this passage, with what a tantalized mixture of fury and delight would many a Tory squire and nobleman exclaim: "The Quaker dog! Where did he get such English? And now, see! he has broken into the very armory of our poets, has stolen their choicest weapons, and is using them to knock our brains out!"

In closing the last speech he ever made, Mr. Cobden said, "I never perorate." It may be said of his illustrious friend, Mr. Bright, that he never closes a speech without perorating. Of course we do not mean that even he perorates in the exact sense which Mr. Cobden meant—that of an elaborated strain of ostentatious rhetoric. But Mr. Bright has what Mr. Cobden had not—an oratorical temperament; and as he draws towards the conclusion of a speech his mind seems to rise to a grander and more kindling view of his theme; he sweeps over the whole a more burning glance, and, as if exulting in the amplitude of his own resources for expression, he gathers them up and pours them forth at last in his richest and most energetic sentences. An admirable instance of this habit, and one which illustrates, also, many of the best qualities of his manner, was the peroration of his magnificent speech for the Reform Bill in the House of Commons in April, 1866:

> "I have been misrepresented and condemned and denounced by honorable gentlemen opposite, and by not a few writers in their press. My conscience tells me that I have labored honestly only to destroy that which is evil, and to build up that which is good. (Cheers.) The political aims of the last twenty-five years, as they were summed up the other night by the hon. member for Wick (Mr. Laing), are my political aims, if they can be called the aims in any degree of any living Englishman. (Loud cheers.) And if now, in all the great centres of our population—in Birmingham with its business districts, in Manchester with its encircling towns, in the population of the West Riding of Yorkshire, in Glasgow and amidst the vast industries of the West of Scotland, and in this great Babylon in which we are assembled—if we do not find ourselves surrounded by hungry and exasperated multitudes—if now, more than at any time during the last hundred years, it may be said, quoting the beautiful words of Mr. Sheridan, that if this House and if its statesmen glory in the change, have I not as much as any living man some claim to partake of that glory? (Loud cheers.) I know, and every thoughtful man among you knows, and those gentlemen who sit on that bench and who are leading you to this enterprise, they know that the policy I have urged upon the House and upon the country, so far as it has hitherto been accepted by Parliament, is a policy conservative of the public welfare, strengthening the just authority of Parliament, and adding from day to day fresh lustre and dignity to the Crown. (Cheers.) And now, when I speak to you and ask you to pass this bill—when I plead on behalf of those who are not allowed to speak themselves in this House—if you could raise yourselves for this night, for this hour, above the region of party strife—if you could free yourselves from the pestilent atmosphere of passion and prejudice which so often surrounds us here, I feel confident that at this moment I should not plead in vain before this Imperial Parliament on behalf of the English constitution and the English people." (Loud and long-continued cheering.)

PARIS GOSSIP.

PARIS, April 3, 1867.

OUR cold and stormy spring is gradually approaching summer, the lilacs and laburnums are in full blossom, the magnolias of the Champs Elysées are "a sight worth seeing," as are also the wonderful beds of variegated wall-flowers at the Rond-point of that favorite avenue, and still we are plagued with weather worthy of a somewhat mild December. We had just such soaking weather after the grand cannonading of the Crimea, after the Franco-Italian campaign, after the enormous expenditure of powder on your side of the water; are we again undergoing an illustration of the correctness of the theory according to which your countryman, Mr. Espy, "the Storm-King," so pertinaciously protested his ability to bring down rain as the result of combustion and perturbation of the atmosphere on the surface of the earth, and paying our tribute of endurance to the Austro-Prusso-Italian pyrotechnic doings of last year?

The terror of coming war, which was hanging over Europe a fortnight ago, has pretty nearly vanished. Apparently neither France nor Prussia, at the bottom of their hearts, have the faintest desire to measure forces with each other or with anybody else; and the flood of official and private gaieties, not interrupted by the shadow that is now happily passing away, will doubtless go on increasing in body and rapidity, as is its wont, until the close of "the season" drives out of town every one who can afford to let himself be so driven.

Among wearers of crowns, or people nearly connected with wearers of that style of head-gear, now in Paris are King George of Greece; Queen Victoria's second son, Prince Alfred, recently created Duke of Edinburgh, and her cousin, the Duke of Cambridge; Prince Oscar, heir to the throne of Sweden, a great musician and a "splendid fellow" generally; the Duke of Leuchtenberg, nephew of the Czar, an amiable and accomplished young man, the most intimate friend of the late regretted Czarowitz; and his Imperial Highness Prince Lokoungooa Mimbou Tayo, brother of the temporal Emperor of Japan. Queen Christina, the Queen-dowager of Spain, is here with her ex-coachman and present husband, the Duke de Rianzares, a man who seems to have been worthy of the extraordinary stroke of "luck" which has made him the husband of one queen, the stepfather of another, and the father of six or eight fine daughters, all married to princes of high lineage and brilliant fortune. Queen Christina, like Grisi with Mario, seems to have been perfectly cured by this marriage of the roving mania of previous years, and to have led, with her last "wentur," a perfectly straightforward and edifying domestic existence ever since.

Two of the brilliant non-royal queens of the day—Patti and Nilsson—have been receiving ovations that must surely have satisfied even the appetite for that sort of excitement developed by a successful début on the operatic stage. The Swedish songstress—as much admired for her beauty, grace, and distinction in private life as for her artistic talent—sang with great success at the last concert at the Tuileries, had a brilliant ovation at the Pasdeloup concert, and a yet more brilliant one at her benefit a few nights afterwards, and has since had the honor of a call from Prince Oscar, who complimented her on her success, assured her that all Sweden watched her progress with interest and pride, and having talked music for some time with the gratified artiste, sat down at the piano and accompanied himself in one of the favorite national airs of Sweden.

As for Patti, who is the idol of Parisian opera-goers, her benefit was a continuous series of ovations, and such was the quantity of bouquets and crowns thrown to her at the close of the representation that the stage was literally covered with flowers. Not a few of these bouquets contained jewels and other magnificent trinkets, offered to the popular favorite by enthusiastic admirers. Mlle. Nilsson, who was present in one of the baignoires, enthusiastically applauding her friend, happened to go out by one staircase just as Mlle. Patti was coming down by the other. The two charming young women, catching sight of each other, rushed forward, threw their arms round each other, and embraced in the most affectionate style, to the great delight of the spectators of the little tableau. Mlle. Patti is going off to London for a six months' engagement; Mlle. Nilsson is also about to make a short absence, but will return in a few weeks, and reappear at the Grand Opera.

"The Grand Duchess of Gerolstein," Offenbach's new comic operetta, which is having so tremendous a run here, has just been the occasion of a serious accident to Grenier, the excellent actor who plays the part of Prince Paul in that charming farce, and who, in cutting one of the astonishing pirouettes with which he accompanies his songs, managed to break his leg. Surgeons declare themselves unable to imagine how such an accident could have resulted from the movements he was making; but the leg was none the less really broken. The unlucky actor was carried off the stage upon a shutter, and will be laid up, say his medical attendants, for two or three months to come. The oddest circumstance about this accident is the fact that the same actor, ten years ago, at the Odéon Theatre, suddenly broke the other leg in just such an inexplicable manner. The Emperor had been at the Variétés Theatre the night before the accident, much amused apparently by the brilliant absurdity of the piece; and the exclamation of one of the pretty and highly-dressed damsels who perform the part of "ladies of honor" to the Grand Duchess, on hearing of the accident, "Oh, what a pity it did not happen yesterday when the Emperor was here!" was doubtless sincerely echoed by the rest of the troupe, as, in that case, it is probable that his Majesty would have not only sent aides-de-camp to enquire after the state of the broken limb, but would have defrayed the expenses of its mending.

The rejoicing solemnities of Easter have been kept with much éclat both by the Russians and Poles resident in this city. The Polish ceremony of the "Bénit," which celebrates Easter Monday, consists in the setting out of a collation, to which all come who please. There must be upon the table a sucking-pig, roasted whole, and one or two other traditional delicacies, but the rest of the dishes are optional. The master of the house stands on one side of the door of the banqueting-room and the mistress on the other, and give half of a hard-boiled egg, a little salt, and a bit of bread to each comer that enters the room. The viands are all previously blessed by a priest; hence the name Bénit (blessed) given to this celebration. The two most splendid Bénits of this season were at the Hotel Lambert, the stately old palace of the Czartoryski family in the Ile Saint Louis, and in the elegant modern residence of Madame Sauska, between which two centres of the "Polish emigration," the Polish colony of this city divided itself.

The attacks made on M. de Lamartine, principally by the writers in the penny papers, while the decision in regard to the pecuniary aid to be given to him by the Government was still pending, seem to be subsiding, now that the matter is understood to be settled. The Government will give, it is stated, 400,000 francs, not to Lamartine himself, but to his creditors; and this sum, joined to the proceeds of the greater portion of his paternal estates, will suffice to clear off his debts. The poet's favorite residence, a small estate of no great market value, will be left in his hands during his life, and an annual sum of 30,000 francs will be paid to him during the same period by the state, so as to enable him to live comfortably for the time still left to him. This pension will cease on his death, at which period his residence, and any other property belonging to him at the time of his decease, will become the property of the state, and be sold for its benefit. M. de Lamartine had three sisters, all married, and all having daughters but no son; and the eldest daughter of the eldest sister, Mlle. de Cessiat, has just been authorized to take and to transmit to her children—should she have any—the name of the poet-statesman which has been so long, in one way or another, prominent in France.

The members of the Academy, having to fill two vacancies, have been bestirring themselves vigorously on behalf of their respective candidates. As usual, many names have been brought forward; but the Abbé Gretry and M. Jules Favre, the brilliant republican barrister, have had the greatest number of votes. Neither of these gentlemen has any special claim to the vacant arm-chairs, but personal and party motives have succeeded in securing their election. The religious world of Paris has also been agreeably excited by an unprecedented event, viz., the consecration, in the same city and on the same day, of three new bishops; that of "My Lord of Verdun" taking place at the church of the Madeleine, that of "My Lord of Nancy" at St. Eustache, and that of "My Lord of Bayeux" at St. Geneviève; and all three with such display of ecclesiastical upholstery, millinery, goldsmiths' work, music, and tableaux as even those fashionable fanes had not witnessed for many a day.

The Exhibition is growing from day to day, and is becoming both so vast and so magnificent that all doubt of its being a brilliant success has gone to join the years before the flood. Nothing comparable to that wondrous collection of marvels has ever been seen in this world; it is difficult to believe that just such a gathering will ever be got together again. Means for transporting to and from the Exhibition 11,000 people per hour have already been brought into play; but these being altogether insufficient, a M. Logerot has just solicited and obtained an audience of the Emperor, to set forth to his Majesty a project of his for conveying 40,000 people per hour from the centre of the town to the gates of the great show.

The eating department is going on brilliantly; the especial "rage" of the moment being the dinners at the Russian restaurant. But that all are flourishing may be inferred from the fact that a single restaurant, and not the most in favor, furnished yesterday 1,500 lunches and 5,000 dinners!

Correspondence.

WENDELL PHILLIPS AND EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Your paragraph last week about "old abolitionists and politics," though true in its general statement, was not strictly true in its particular facts. That there has been "a remarkable reaction" among some of the old abolitionists is certainly true, and that "in bygone days they would have nothing to do with political machinery or political forces" is equally true as regards the most prominent of them; but that there ever was a time when any one of influence among them "regarded the ballot and the bullet as synonymous terms" cannot be safely asserted. It is true that they have ever been very distrustful of the ballot as a means of reform. Some of them have treated "the ballot and the bullet"—a favorite alliteration with them—as being so nearly related as to be at least cousins-german, but none of them that I ever heard of went so far as to regard the two as "synonymous."

It is true, as you say, that the movement was one of moral suasion, but it was a moral suasion that had not only the merit of "celestial purity" of doctrine which you accord to it, but that of terrestrial effectiveness of practice, of which you make no mention. Moral suasion, as held by the old abolitionists, and as it used to be illustrated on the platform of the American Anti-Slavery Society, was the faithful and impartial application of the truth to persons, parties, sects, communities, and things as occasion might seem to require.

The doctrine contained in the sentence quoted by you from a reported speech of Wendell Phillips to the "eight-hours-a-day" men—"there is no channel but politics in which your question can be settled"—is not a doctrine of the old abolitionists generally in regard to any question of reform.

In saying that Mr. Phillips "pooh-poohed book-larnin'" you have stated the case too strongly. If you meant that he did this in effect—as of course you did—it is a pity you had not said so to avoid misapprehension. That Mr. Phillips does undervalue education, when speaking of it in connection with the ballot, or in comparsion with the ballot as a force, is a fact which friends of his are free to admit. But the original doctrine of the old abolitionists is their doctrine still. It is this: the truth fitly spoken, faithfully applied, wisely and consistently lived up to, may be relied upon—and nothing else may—for the correction of any evil having its origin in human ignorance or wickedness. A corollary from this doctrine is that no man intelligently holding it will either occupy himself with impracticable methods of "celestial purity" or rely upon men and means controlled by the maxims of political morality. He will neither "pooh-pooh" the ballot nor education. He will not put the bullet above the ballot, as some do, nor the ballot above book-learning, as do "other some." He will adjudge to each its proper value, and rely upon neither solely as an instrumentality in any great work of humanitarian reform.

M.

[We cordially agree with "M." as to the efficacy of the truth, but the difficulty is to get hold of it. Something more is needed for this than getting on a platform.—ED. NATION.]

UNION LEAGUE HOUSE,
May 15, 1867.

AT a meeting of the Board of Directors of the UNION LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA, held March 12, 1867, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, In a republican form of government it is of the highest importance that the delegates of the people, to whom the sovereign power is entrusted, should be so selected as to truly represent the body politic; and there being no provision of law whereby the people may be organized for the purpose of such selection, and all parties having recognized the necessity of such organization by the formation of voluntary associations for this purpose; and

Whereas, There are grave defects existing under the present system of voluntary organization which it is believed may be corrected by suitable provisions of law; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Board of Directors of the UNION LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA, That the Secretary be and is hereby directed to offer eleven hundred dollars in prizes for essays on the legal organization of the people to select candidates for office, the prizes to be as follows, viz.:

The sum of five hundred dollars for that essay which, in the judgment of the Board, shall be first in the order of merit;
Three hundred dollars for the second;
Two hundred for the third; and
One hundred for the fourth.

The conditions upon which these prizes are offered are as follows, viz.:

First. All essays competing for these prizes must be addressed to GEORGE H. BOKER, Secretary of the Union League of Philadelphia, and must be received by him before the 1st day of January, 1868; and no communication having the author's name attached, or with any other indication of origin, will be considered.

Second. Accompanying every competing essay, the author must enclose his name and address within a sealed envelope, addressed to the Secretary of the Union League. After the awards have been made, the envelopes accompanying the successful essays shall be opened, and the authors notified of the result.

Third. All competing essays shall become the property of the Union League; but no publication of rejected essays, or the names of their authors, shall be made without consent of the authors in writing.

By order of the Board of Directors.

GEO. H. BOKER,
Secretary.

The Week.

The Judiciary Committee has brought its labors to a close in the matter of impeachment. The vote stood five to four against impeachment, and seven to two in favor of severe condemnation of the President's course. This ends the matter for the present, very much as we expected. Mr. Ashley, it is reported, is chagrined, and will try and have impeachment ordered by the whole House next December, but if he does not do better than when he brought the subject before the House before, it is certainly not Mr. Johnson who will suffer by it. The whole thing has been an attempt of men who do not think much, but feel furiously, to give their passions full course at any cost to the nation, and it has been killed by the common sense of the community.

General Sheridan has put a somewhat amusing construction on one clause of the Reconstruction act. He removed, a short time ago, two rival boards of levee commissioners, one appointed by Governor Wells and one an old rebel board. Governor Wells sent a remonstrance to Washington, and obtained the reversal of the order from the President, whereupon the general removed Governor Wells himself as "an impediment to the faithful execution of the law," and denounces him as a dishonest and traitorous person. As between General Sheridan and any man who has been actively engaged the last four or five years in Louisiana politics, we should have no hesitation in taking the general's side. We feel perfectly satisfied that when he says any New Orleans politician, be he "patriot" or rebel, is a knave, a knave he is; and we desire, as long as martial law is down there the law of the land, that he may in all things have his own way; but we fear in this instance he will not have it. If the Government at Washington were to acknowledge that an appeal to them from the decisions of a district commander might be treated by the officer himself as offering an "impediment to the faithful execution of the law," and punished accordingly, the right of appeal would be, of course, destroyed, and the various generals would become absolute within the limits of their jurisdiction—a result which the act certainly did not contemplate.

General Pope's orders in regard to the riot at Mobile and Colonel Shepherd's suppression of a Mobile newspaper are very sensible documents. He explains his action in removing the authorities of the city on the general ground that the military are not sent into the South by Congress to do nothing, nor to do everything, but to see that life and property are made safe. This, in his opinion, they can best do—he, for his part, intends to do this—by supporting in all ways the civil authorities against insurrection and anarchy, and whenever the civil authorities, through weakness, stupidity, or malice, fail to protect the individual, by superseding them and putting capable men in their places. He acts under a law of Congress which declares that there is no adequate protection to life and property in the lately rebellious States; but what means of protection he finds in existence he intends to help as far as possible. As to the newspaper, he informs Colonel Shepherd that free speech is to be tolerated and encouraged, and editors and public speakers, no matter what they say, are not to be meddled with. The military are to wait for overt acts with which the civil power may be unable to deal.

The military officers on the frontier like to believe, and we suppose they do believe, that it is by the strong arm alone that the Indian can be kept in order; the civilian agent of the United States has an opportunity to steal from the Indian rather more than he gives him; the buffalo is disappearing; the white settler wants land and roads to the Atlantic and the Pacific, and he wants the Indian gone; it is the nineteenth century and America that the Indian lives in, yet he will not work. Evidently, these being the conditions, if the white man and the red man were to-day seeing each other for the first time, we might expect trouble to-morrow. But add to these natural difficulties the remembrance of years of treachery, of gross injustice, of bloody violence of every sort committed on all ages and sexes, and add that, owing to the subsidizing policy of the Government and "big talks" and military expeditions like the latest one of Custer's, which is described as "hunting ducks with a full brass band," the Indian half believes himself stronger than his Great Father in Washington. Moreover, there is no denying it, he is excessively hard to civilize. There never was, of any color or blood, a more untamable and, on the whole, worthless breed. One need not shed many tears if the Duke of Argyll's notion is correct that, by the process of natural selection, the earth is being given over to the races best qualified to make use of it, of which the Indian race is not one. A man may be excused for having no decided views upon the best policy to be adopted with this unfortunate people, who just at the present moment seem to be all in arms, but a government so strong as this Government ought at least not to have a policy at once wicked and so weak as to be worthless. The United States might, one would say, either spend money enough to keep the Indians fed or to keep them cowed.

Thaddeus Stevens has changed his ground a little about confiscation—that is, instead of confiscating for the benefit of the negroes simply, he wants to confiscate for the payment of the damage done by the Southern army in Pennsylvania and Maryland during the war. There is an air of sense about this, or rather would have been if it had been proposed two years ago. But these damages, if paid at all, ought to be paid by taxation and not confiscation. The demand, too, would not be unreasonable. The cost of the war is very frequently exacted by the victor, and after the Swiss attempt at secession in 1847 the seceding cantons were compelled to meet the expense of putting it down. But to talk of making the South pay anything now is preposterous. Mr. Stevens has heard the proverb about the difficulty of "taking the breeks off a Highlandman."

The offence of treason against the United States has finally been abolished by the New York Tribune. We felt, as everybody must have felt, that there was an inconsistency in retaining it after Jefferson Davis had been whitewashed, and "the guilt of the rebellion" done away with. It appears that when hostilities against the United States are carried on on a great scale by persons owing it allegiance, their act is civil war, and, therefore, not treason (vide Daniel Webster on the battle of Bunker Hill). But it is not at all likely that hostilities against the United States will ever be carried on on a small scale. A small rising is simply a riot. Americans are not such donkeys as to attempt to overturn this Government with a mob; therefore, let a man want to commit treason ever so much, he cannot do it; and an impossible offence cannot be said to exist; therefore there is no such crime as treason under our law. What induced the framers of the Constitution to define it nobody knows or ever will know.

The Tribune announced solemnly, last week, and with a fine semi-official tone, that "President" Roberts of the Fenian Brotherhood was gone to Europe to organize alliances between the Irish Republic and the various revolutionary associations on the Continent. There are, however, now no revolutionary societies on the Continent which can do more than sustain their own existence, and the simple meaning of the announcement is that Roberts has gone abroad for a summer tour to be paid for out of the Fenian funds, and that in order to keep up, during his absence, the spirits of the poor laborers and servant-girls who supply the money, the organ of the Republican party aids him in the swindle by giving as much pompous publicity as possible to his movements.

Perhaps owing to the obvious and complete failure of the eight-hour agitation and the statutes it extorted to relieve the laboring classes, there appears to be just now an incipient epidemic of co-operative associations. The primary object of most of these is to provide cheap bread, or cheap provisions, or cheap houses for their members, whose daily avocations remain as diverse as ever, but whose savings are combined to reduce that expense of living which they can least afford. It cannot be amiss to remind the movers in these enterprises that not only is success not certain nor vouchsafed to every membership, but that the highest can never be reached, no matter what their business ability, nor how careful the selection of their associates, nor how large their dividends, unless they make their own improvement a part of their scheme. The interest which attaches to the Rochdale example is due not half so much to the effect upon the imagination of the rapid multiplication of the capital, the warehouses, the factories, and the profits of the "Pioneers," as to the fruits of their educational fund—their reading-room, lecture hall, library—their added self-respect, their fixed integrity in all their dealings. We should like to perceive some indications that our associations are animated by other than purely economical motives, and have adopted in spirit the preamble of the Rochdale constitution: "The aim of this society shall be to elevate the moral and social condition of its members by receiving from them voluntary subscriptions for the purchase in common of groceries, clothing, etc."

The colored voters in Washington number, we believe, about 8,300, and the white voters about 9,800. The municipal election on Monday last resulted, however, in the success of the Republican party by a majority of something like 1,500 votes. The negroes appear to have taken the greatest possible interest in the election, and there appears to have been no division of the colored vote. The negroes are said to have had the ballots distributed to them in their churches on the day before, and on the morning of election day were at the polling-places at dawn. Or rather they were as near the polling-places as they could get, for in some of the precincts the lines in which they were formed to take their turns at the boxes were several squares in length. The feeling which has so strenuously opposed the admission of negro votes into the ballot-box appears to have done its best by means of the pettiest sort of annoyances to make the negro as uncomfortable as possible while he cast it. In some precincts the arrangements for receiving the ballots were so bad that negroes in line at five o'clock in the morning deposited their ballots at three o'clock in the afternoon. And of course there were counterfeit tickets, and every sort of attempt to deceive the ignorant. These were singularly unsuccessful, for the negroes seem to have been effectually forewarned. On the whole, this second of the elections since negro suffrage was declared the law on and below Mason and Dixon's line is not different from what may be expected in all the South. We know nothing of the candidates, but certainly the behavior of the negroes while getting ready to vote and while voting ought to cheer most of our Thomases except Benjamin Franklin Perry.

The Evansville Sentinel, a Democratic journal of Indiana, has nominated R. E. Lee for the next Presidency, and Mr. Johnson has been making a careful speech-making tour to Raleigh, and intends making another to Boston. These two facts would seem to indicate a scarcity of available candidates in the Democratic party, which is in very marked contrast with the abounding and superabounding plenty that exists among the Republicans. Mr. Johnson's chances, which we suppose are indefinitely greater than they were a year ago, he is, perhaps, not diminishing by his journey. His speeches are rather amusing here and there, but nothing like so exciting as those of 1866. They want the old energy and wild hitting, and conform more closely to the law of speeches, which is that they strongly incline to be twaddle. This is in the true vein:

> "When looking back forty years ago, and returning here to-day, I begin to enquire where are those I left behind? In the language of poetry itself,
> 'The friends of my childhood, where are they?'
>
> Echo answers, 'Where?' Some have emigrated and gone to other lands. Some have complied with the inexorable and irresistible call, and have passed to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns. I again ask,
> 'Friends of my childhood, where are they?'" etc., etc.

Mr. Seward's performances were likewise quite judicious, and "the country is happy," though we confess—man is never content—to a wish that the Associated Press and the special reporters would be a little less particular about taking down every word for print. Still, the exact truth is best, we suppose.

There has been no prediction of the price of stocks on the London market telegraphed by the Cable since Thursday last—at least none has been published by the papers here. From this we infer that the news agent has found out himself what the rest of the world knew long ago, that if he knew before the market opened what the price of stocks would be, all he had to do to make an enormous fortune was to speculate the day before and keep his information to himself instead of sending it over the Cable. He has, therefore, we trust, been operating vigorously during the past week, and, we have no doubt, is by this time able to retire from business and travel. There is something absurd in having a man of such parts engaged in making up despatches for the papers. He telegraphed three or four days ago, by-the-bye, that "there was an intense and painful feeling of anxiety throughout Europe" about the fate of the Emperor Maximilian. Now, the news agent knows as well as we do that outside the small circle of Maximilian's relatives and personal friends—that is, about 400 people out of 200,000,000—not a man, woman, or child in Europe has eaten less, laughed less, or slept less on account of Maximilian, or would feel more than a little touch of disgust even if they heard he had been burnt alive. Therefore, when the news agent telegraphed this he telegraphed what was not true; he put the newspapers to heavy expense; he tried to impose upon the public, and he neglected his legitimate business.

The war on the Plate River is still continued, the allies having declined the proffered mediation of the United States. A long letter to our minister, Mr. Washburn, gives the Paraguayan version of this complicated struggle, and is, to the best of our knowledge, accurate in its general statement of causes and purposes. The Oriental Republic, better known as Uruguay, is the bone of contention, that territory offering to Brazil the supplies which her own soil, at least under her present wretched labor system, denies her, and jointly to Brazil and the Argentine Republic the control of the Plate River and its tributaries. Paraguay has espoused the cause of Uruguay not only in the interest of its own trade, but to prevent a similar absorption of itself by the same powers, for its water-courses afford the shortest and only practicable communication between Brazil and its interior province, Matto Grosso, which, as may be imagined, has annoyed not a little the government of that unwieldy empire. So far as we can foresee, the war will not end to the satisfaction of the allies.

THE last incident of importance in the history of the English Reform bill is the passage, by a considerable majority, of an amendment depriving all boroughs containing less than 10,000 inhabitants of the right to representation. This is the natural consequence of the fact that everybody is now at last beginning to see that the new bill really establishes household suffrage, and household suffrage in small boroughs means universal suffrage, and universal suffrage in many, if not most, of these little constituencies has been shown by experience to mean the purchase of the borough by any man rich enough and ambitious enough to pay for it. A rule fixing a measure of population for a constituency was, therefore, absolutely necessary to the preservation of even a semblance of electoral purity.

JOHN STUART MILL obtained for his motion in favor of female suffrage, in the House of Commons, probably twice the number of votes that anybody expected for it, but the jocular way in which it was treated by his opponents showed how far he still is from success. We doubt very much, too, whether the lowering of the suffrage will not diminish women's chance of sharing it. Whatever favor the doctrine of female suffrage has as yet met with in England is confined to the "thinking liberals." With the working-men it has made little if any progress, and, what is, perhaps, more remarkable, at the great conference of working-men held at Geneva a year or two ago, the feeling of the body leaned strongly even against the admission of women to full competition in various branches of industry.

SINCE 1815 there has been no such assembling of sovereigns at Paris as is likely to be witnessed this midsummer. The Emperor Alexander arrived there on Sunday, and King William a little later; Francis Joseph will follow at his leisure. Victor Emanuel is not announced nor, we believe, expected to be a guest of Napoleon's, although it would be worth his while to learn from headquarters how to manage the coup d'état which the correspondents of the English press—even the best informed—are freely attributing to him in petto. The publicity thus given to his intention is the best reason for not believing in it, since except through a surprise how could he ever hope to subjugate the Parliament and people? Mazzini and Garibaldi, instead of being impracticable radicals, would become the necessity of the situation, while the very longest road to reconciliation with the Church, which the King is said to yearn for, is that which he proposes, or others for him, to take. The settlement of the Roman question will arrive with the first pretext for revolution.

ON Friday the bill adopting the new constitution of the North German Confederation passed its second reading in the Prussian Lower Chamber, and its success being now assured it will for the first time be submitted to the Senate, whose action has never been doubtful. The opponents of the bill among the Deputies were chiefly those who, as members of the late Diet, had already given full expression to their dissent and had consequently very few fresh arguments to offer. There was, besides, the example of Saxony, which most of all it was feared would reject the constitution, but which was, if we mistake not, the first state to sanction it. The remainder will chime in as a matter of course, and practically that rest which the Cable reports Bismark to have craved of the King, as soon as the constitution should have been definitely established, has already begun. That his retirement from office is more than temporary no one who reflects that the Luxembourg question is rather deferred than settled, and the Eastern question is like an open wound, will believe or (may we not say?) hope.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN VICE-PRESIDENT.

MR. PHILLIPS says he will not believe that the prejudice against the negro has disappeared until he sees a negro nominated for the vice-presidency or competing favorably with major-generals. Now, one reason why there is a prejudice against the negroes is that they have as yet as a race accomplished nothing great in war, or politics, or art, or literature. If anybody will take the trouble to listen to an ordinary lecture or speech against negro equality, he will find that it is this absence of performance and of what the French call "preuves," in the great work of civilization, which forms the basis of the whole argument. Were there one or two or three flourishing negro states built up by negro industry, honesty, skill, and valor, the negro color and conformation would go for nothing. It is the fact that there is not, and has not been in historic times, any such state which causes the negro to be reviled, persecuted, and enslaved, and which has created the current belief in his moral and intellectual inferiority. Whether this is a good foundation for such a belief, we cannot discuss here. But we must remember that all individuals of all races are judged by this self-same standard. We all owe any special respect we meet with from our fellow-men to our performances and not to our promise, or supposed capacity. In other words, everybody has a "prejudice" against the man who has achieved nothing.

Therefore we say that, now that the American negroes are free, their true friend is he who says to them: "Work, work! show that you are industrious and can get rich as white men do; obey the laws and respect your neighbor's property—that is, show that you have the political sense on which states are formed, and by which they are preserved; cultivate your minds, show that your intellectual inferiority has hitherto been accidental and not real. When you are rich and shrewd and educated and numerous you will be powerful, and power will bring you inevitably political and social honor, and nothing else will or ought. Peoples are great and respected when they have done the things on which greatness and respectability are founded."

Therefore the nomination of a colored man to the vice-presidency will be, whenever it comes, the sign not of the disappearance of prejudice only, but also of the things which cause the prejudice. Colored men need not, therefore, trouble their heads about it any more than about the presidency. It is not necessary either to their happiness, comfort, or respectability. It could not make them happy, comfortable, or respectable unless they had other things previously; and when they have the other things the vice-presidency is sure to follow, or even more honorable positions than the vice-presidency. When the ablest men at the bar are negroes we shall, we hope, have a negro Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, but not, we trust, one minute sooner. Negroes are not entitled to high rewards simply for being black any more than they deserved slavery or ill-treatment for not being white. We want fair play in this matter for everybody, but we cannot have fair play if the gammon of the negro's injudicious friends cannot be checked. It is no more a hardship to the black to be excluded from high office because he does not command the confidence of his fellow-citizens than it is to the white man. If a negro has a right to be made a vice-president in order to show that people have no prejudice against him, so has everybody else in the community, and exclusion from high office is a slur. The only remedy for this sort of thing is the admission of every adult male and female, not insane, a pauper or a criminal, to the vice-presidency or some other post of honor. The thing may be done by a simple amendment to the Constitution declaring every citizen of the United States fulfilling the above conditions to be a vice-president on taking the oath of office. Whether we should be any better off when this was done would remain to be seen; but we each of us at least would have the consolation of knowing that it was no longer in the power of nominating conventions to ignore our claims. If we stood on Mr. Phillips's ground we should go further, and insist on having a negro vice-admiral. As long as this office is monopolized by a white man we should, reasoning from his premises, assert fearlessly that there can be no security for the colored race.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Business among the publishers is getting very dull, and will be duller before it is livelier. Messrs. Hurd & Houghton are going to publish very soon a volume of poems, the title of which is not yet decided upon, by Miss Phœbe Cary, a pleasant singer with some natural notes. "Conversations on Ritualism," a book of Hurd & Houghton's which we have before announced, will soon be for sale, and except these two it is quite probable that this house will put forth nothing new till fall. The firm is quite busy with its improvements at the "Riverside" establishment at Cambridge.——D. Appleton & Co. add to former announcements but one new publication, a book entitled "The Human Element in the Inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures," by J. F. Curtis, D.D.——By the mention of "Conversations on Ritualism," we are reminded that Messrs. Pott & Amory, of this city, and the Rev. Orby Shipley, who edited the essays which, as a book, are known by the title of "The Church and the World," have entered into an arrangement under which an edition of that series of essays, a presentation of the ritualistic case, will be put upon the market at a reasonably low rate. Mr. Shipley is now editing a series of semi-monthly papers, entitled "Tracts for the Day," which those interested in the new movement may get from Pott & Amory.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers, of Boston, announce a volume of poems which will be very gladly welcomed by all lovers of poetry, its author being Jean Ingelow. As we guess, the new volume will not be different in any important respect from the old. But it is not saying anything damaging or depreciatory to say this of Miss Ingelow, in whom there is not, as in most late minor poets, much of trick or mannerism soon tiring and disgusting the reader, but everything is honest, simple, and sweet. The ballad of "Winstanley," which some years ago was published in the Boston Transcript, if we remember right, is a part of the new volume, but by far the larger part has never yet been printed. "A Story of Doom" is the name of the book.——Messrs. Ticknor & Fields announce "The Life of Colonel Ulrich Dahlgren," by his father the Rear-Admiral; "A Lover's Diary," a poem by Miss Alice Cary; and Hawthorne's "Note-Book in America," of which we have had probably a good half in The Atlantic Monthly. It will be followed by his "Note-Book in England" and his "Note-Book in Italy," of which, so far as we know, the public has seen nothing. The volume of Thackeray's "Early and Late Papers" is not to be immediately succeeded, we believe, by the other volumes which the editor's preface seems to half promise us.——"Is it I?" is a little book by Dr. H. B. Storer which Lee & Shepard will publish. It is a companion for the "Why Not?" of the same author—a book to be recommended.——"Ohio during the War," which citizens of that State will read with great satisfaction, is a forthcoming book, by Mr. Whitelaw Reid, which will be published immediately by Messrs. Moore, Wilstach & Baldwin, of Cincinnati.

—An author now resident in Boston writes to us in behalf of a work which he has recently published. "What I would like," he remarks, "would be a short notice under your book-heading, saying that you would recur to this again; and then in the next week or week after examine the argument." How easy it seems as he explains the process! It is partly out of consideration for him, and not wholly from a sense of duty to the public, that we hereby decline to accede to his request.

—Mr. John Harvard Ellis is the editor of the works of Anne Bradstreet, the earliest of American female poets, who, as "A Gentlewoman of New England," published in 1650 a volume of poems which are well enough known. The volume hardly keeps the promise of its title, which announces the contents as "Several Poems compiled with great variety of wit and learning, full of delight; wherein specially is contained a complete discourse and description of the four elements, constituting, ages of man, seasons of the year, together with an exact epitome of the three first monarchies, viz., the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman commonwealths from the beginning to the end of their last king, with divers other serious and pleasant poems." To the poems are now prefixed seventy-six pages of Mrs. Bradstreet's other writings in prose and verse, now for the first time published; also, a biographical introduction and notes from the hand of Mr. Ellis. The book will contain a portrait, on India paper, of Governor Bradstreet, and a woodcut of the old Bradstreet house in North Andover, from the hand of Mr. Henry Marsh, a remarkable engraver, whose work—what of it we have seen—would add value to any book of which it should form a part. The volume, which is from the press of John Wilson & Son, is sold only to subscribers. A small edition is published by Mr. Abram E. Cutter, of Charlestown, Mass., who, if this venture proves successful, will publish, in the same expensive and beautiful style, the works of Michael Wigglesworth and other early poets of the country.

—The Rev. N. S. Folsom, formerly of Meadville, Pa., now of Concord, Mass., has been for years engaged in translating Tischendorf's text of the Four Gospels, and has been intending to publish the four immediately after the publication in Germany of the eighth edition, on which Tischendorf is at present laboring. The work goes on but slowly, however, in the hands of the great German, who has as yet advanced no further than into the first chapters of Mark. Mr. Folsom has therefore determined, in case there is much more delay, to publish separately next autumn his translation of Matthew according to Tischendorf's last edition. This rendering will be an attempt at the most literal exactness. The notes will always give the literal rendering if the text departs from it, and for the rest will extend not much beyond the explanation and support of deviations from the common versions. The various readings of Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, and others, so far as the difference from the common version can be made to appear by translation, will also be given, together with the manuscript authorities on which the more important various readings depend.

—Mr. Armand, a pseudonymous German novelist, gives a chapter of American history in his recent "Friedrichsburg: die Colonie des deutschen Fürsten-Vereins in Texas" (Leipzig, 1867). It appears that some philanthropic German princes, having heard of the swindling to which German immigrants were exposed in this country, decided, in 1830, to buy land in America, and to offer it to such of their subjects as desired to remove. Deeming Texas a fit territory for their purpose, they sent thither several emissaries to report on the land. Two German gentlemen, named Fischer and Müller, residing at that time in Texas, got wind of the intended purchase, and obtained of the Mexican Congress that part of the plateau of Texas extending from the Rio Llano north to the bend of the Colorado from east to west, on condition that they should within a fixed period people the grant with a certain number of colonists. The German princes now came forward and bought of these speculators their title for the snug sum of $200,000, and straightway advertised their paradise throughout Germany. Prince Carl Sohns zu Braunfels, who, the next year, first essayed a settlement with two shiploads of emigrants, found the new purchase to be far distant from the sea-coast and from the American colonies, and as the path to it lay through the "howling wilderness," wisely abandoned all idea of seeking it. He bought a new tract of land at the mouth of the Guadalupe River, and having founded New Braunfels, shortly afterwards himself departed for Germany. All was flourishing till the arrival, some months later, of 8,000 immigrants, which caused at once the greatest scarcity of food and the most disastrous epidemics. In consequence, fifty families were despatched one hundred miles north to the Piedernales River, and there founded Friedrichsburg, not far from the Rio Llano and the Fischer-Müller grant. With such a basis a taking historical romance for Germans who look with longing eyes towards America could hardly be difficult to construct.

—In 1862 the Governor-in-Chief of the Windward Islands sent to the British Colonial Secretary a despatch in which he stated that the disease of leprosy was increasing in Barbadoes and the other islands within his jurisdiction, and in view of this fact and the fact that the disease was popularly believed to be incurable, and therefore, to the great misery of the lepers, was at once feared and neglected, the governor suggested that the secretary should call on all governors of British colonies for a report on the disease, its proper treatment, etc., etc. The Royal College of Physicians, at the secretary's request, prepared a list of questions to be answered by the governors, and promised to collate the documentary evidence which should be collected. They did so, and have just published a report which embraces a very complete account of the lepers of the British Empire from the French of Tracadie in New Brunswick to the lepers of India and Hong Kong. A brief essay on the Scriptural leprosy is among the contents of the book, which altogether is interesting not to the physician alone but even to the general reader, the leprosy being of all diseases to which men are subject the one which most forcibly addresses itself to the imagination. The book is among the latest importations of Messrs. Scribner, Welford & Co.——Other new works received by the same firm are Mr. McCulloch's "Treatise on Metallic and Paper Money and Banks," "Essays on Reform," "Questions for a Reform Parliament,"—including several questions of importance in any free government,—Edward Freeman's "History of the Norman Conquest of England," and a "Manual of Moral Philosophy," by William Fleming, D.D.

—A volume of memoirs, so very interesting that we had thought of urging their translation and republication in this country, turns out to be a literary forgery of a very inexcusable kind. Forgeries in the interest of a faith, or for money for the forger's pocket, or for mystification, are susceptible of some palliation or slight excuse. This recent one, however, seems to have been nearly objectless. The title of the book is "Anne-Paule-Dominique de Noailles, Marquise de Montagu," and it was published by the children of that lady, and under the sanction of the House of Noailles, the editor being a M. Auguste Callet. The facts and details, it was stated, were all taken from Madame de Montagu's journal and correspondence, which, it was said, furnished in abundance materials of the most trustworthy character. Callet has since asserted and proved in a court of justice—the Tribunal Civil de la Seine—that many of the most affecting and striking incidents in the book he invented; that the journal above-mentioned was not in existence when he composed and wrote the "Memoirs;" that fragments of an imperfect copy were all of it that was extant, and that, in doing his work as editor, he was compelled to betake himself to his imagination. He brought suit against the Duc de Noailles to recover additional payments which he claimed. He failed; for the court held that he had been sufficiently paid for his labor, and that his suit was an inequitable attempt to extort more money than he had earned by making the fraud known.

—The exclusive right to publish the works of the late Alfred de Musset, which has hitherto vested in the house of Charpentier, expires next month, and the property in them reverts to his brother Paul and a female relative. The net income from their sale amounting to sixty thousand francs yearly, the publisher has not viewed without alarm the termination of his monopoly—nor without precautions. Hundreds of thousands of copies, it is said, he has manufactured in advance of the demand, expecting for some time longer to discourage competition, and reap his abundant reward. But the heirs are not disposed to endure this attempt upon their rightful revenue—lawful revenue, perhaps, but this is what the Société des gens de lettres, to which M. Paul Musset belongs, is about to establish, if it can, by judicial process. The question is an interesting one, in a literary as well as in a legal point of view, and however it may be decided, there will probably be very little admiration for the sharp practice of the defendant.

—Among recent French books we notice two—a memoir of Prince Eugene de Beauharnais, by M. Fourmestraux, which is said to excel rather in its superb typography than in the novelty or the completeness of its contents; and Les Postes en 1848, by the veteran journalist, M. Etienne Arago. In narrating his installation at the head of the post-office bureau, in the name of the Republic, he tells how he was obliged to depose his predecessor by writing his dismissal on the spot. Reading over his hasty scrawl, he remarked that he had committed a grammatical error, which, for a man of letters, was no light matter. But, he added, one may be permitted to write bad French (en mauvais français) when one has fought like a good Frenchman (en bon Français). The joke was capital, but M. Dejean probably failed to appreciate it.

EDUCATIONAL.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, one of the earliest institutions which has brought into service the national land-grant, has just issued its second annual catalogue, showing a corps of sixteen professors and a company of one hundred and thirty-seven students, who are thus grouped: In the first year of instruction, 64; in the second year, 24; in the third year, 22; and in special courses, 27. The course of studies extends through four years, and during the first two years is preliminary and disciplinary, while in the last two it is professional and technical. Six special courses are open to the choice of students after completing the prescribed instructions of the first two years, namely: 1. Mechanical engineering; 2. Civil and topographical engineering; 3. Practical chemistry; 4. Geology and mining; 5. Building and architecture; 6. Science and literature. The degrees which are to be conferred will correspond with these six departments of the school. The institute now occupies the spacious and beautiful edifice erected for it on the Back Bay lands in Boston, adjacent to the equally fine edifice of the Boston Society of Natural History. Furnished with an able and enterprising corps of instructors, and situated in the centre of the manufacturing and industrial life of the Eastern States, near to the manifold libraries and collections of Boston, this scientific school is unquestionably destined to exert a most powerful influence in promoting a knowledge of the practical sciences, and in training with thoroughness the inventive, investigating, and constructive powers of New England young men.

—The building erected for the Yale School of the Fine Arts, by the liberality of Mr. A. R. Street, of New Haven, at a cost of $175,000, has just been thrown open to the students and the public. The well-known collection of Colonel Trumbull's historical paintings has been transferred to the new rooms, together with some other works of art belonging to Yale College, including Allston's "Jeremiah," lately presented by Professor S. F. B. Morse, and a marble statue of "Ruth," by G. B. Lombardi, lately given by W. Thompson, Esq., an American gentleman resident in France. One of the most interesting pictures of the collection is the picture by Smybert representing "Bishop Berkeley and his Family," generally admitted to be the earliest picture embracing more than one figure ever painted in this country. This additional circumstance is worth mentioning: Smybert came over from England with Dean Berkeley to be the head of a department or school of the fine arts which was to constitute a part of the dean's proposed university. The scheme for founding a new institution having failed, the library of Yale College soon became the possessor of a fine collection of books, presented by the "Dean's bounty;" and now the Yale Art School counts among its historical art-treasures a portrait of the philosopher, painted by the professor elect for the dean's proposed "art school."

—The "New Jersey School Law" recently enacted by the Legislature of the State—a re-casting of the school system of the commonwealth—deserves to be carefully studied by all the administrators of public instruction. It is now one of the most compact school laws in the country. Among its good features may be mentioned the power bestowed on the State Board of Education; the organization of State, county, and city examiners to determine the qualifications of teachers; the assessment of a town-tax, not less than two nor more than four dollars, for every child in the commonwealth. On the other hand, the district system is still maintained, and corporal punishment is by law prohibited. The Annual Report on Public Instruction in New Jersey for 1866 has also just been published.

—While the State of New Jersey is prohibiting by law the infliction of corporal punishment in schools, a committee in Cambridge, Massachusetts, of which Prof. W. P. Atkinson is chairman, have come to an opposite conclusion. They advise that the power to punish remain as heretofore in the hands of the teacher, with the exception that corporal punishment shall not be inflicted on girls over twelve years of age. It is said with great truth that if the power to punish is taken away from the teacher his authority is seriously impaired, and the school discipline is weakened. On the other hand, teachers must be held responsible for the abuse of the power by judicious oversight of the school committee, and it is certain that in many places the schools would be greatly improved by diminishing the whipping. All over the country the theory and practice of school punishment are now under discussion.

THE JESUITS IN NORTH AMERICA.*

Mr. Parkman gives in the present volume the second part of his history of the short-lived French dominion in North America. His first volume described the abortive attempt of the Huguenots to establish themselves in Florida, the cruel destruction of their colony by the Spaniards, and the vengeance wrought upon them in turn by the Frenchman de Jourgue, together with a narrative of the gallant and useful career of Samuel de Champlain, the founder of Quebec. His third volume is to be devoted to that French exploration of the Valley of the Mississippi of which the memory still subsists in so many mispronounced names, from the Gulf of Mexico to Lake Superior. But whatever may be the interest of these narratives, and the importance of the facts on which they rest, it is certain that this touching story of the Jesuit missions in Canada is no less dramatic and instructive. It has peculiar and picturesque interest from the fact that the enterprise was, in a great measure, a delusion and a failure—a delusion consecrated by the most earnest conviction and the most heroic effort, a failure redeemed by the endurance of incalculable suffering. The Jesuit undertaking as it stands described in Mr. Parkman's pages has an indefinably factitious look—an expression intensely subjective, as we call it nowadays. Its final results were null, and its success at no time such as to gratify the reason of the missionaries. Nevertheless they persisted through unprecedented hardship and danger, baptizing, preaching, rebuking, exploring, and hoping. Their faith, patience, and courage form a very interesting chapter in the history of the human mind, and it is to our perception more as contributions to that history than as a stage of the process of our American civilization that their labors are valuable. It is very true that these labors were not without a certain permanent and wholesome effect. The missionaries aimed at the sky, and their missiles reached the tree-tops. Their example and exhortations, if they failed to elevate the Indians to the practice of even the simpler virtues, or to make them good Catholics, made them to a certain extent bad heathens, and softened their most characteristic usages. But, on the whole, we repeat it is when regarded as a portion of the history of the Church and the ecclesiastical spirit that their exploits are most interesting. It is our impression that they share this character with most of the various Jesuit missions—certainly with those of the great Xavier. When the human mind wishes to contemplate itself at its greatest tension—its greatest desire for action, for influence and dominion—when it wishes to be reminded of how much it is capable in the direction of conscious hope and naked endurance, it cannot do better than read the story of the early Jesuit adventurers.

Mr. Parkman's narrative is founded chiefly on the reports regularly transmitted to France by the active members of the order, and from which, frequent as are his citations, we cannot help wishing that he had given more copious extracts. These reports were minute, frequent, and rigorously truthful—that is, if the writers told of miracles and portents they told of none but such as they themselves believed. The relations are marked apparently by great simplicity of tone, great credulity, and very great discrimination with regard to the Indian character. The missionaries were keen observers of the manners and impulses of the savages, as, indeed, it was of vital importance to their own personal safety that they should be. The Indians were the most unpromising material for conversion. Generally they were obstinate, intractable, and utterly averse to the reception of light; occasionally, however, they would consent to become Christians; but on such a basis! Their piety was more discouraging than their obduracy. Mr. Parkman gives a very vivid picture of the state of the savage populations at the time of the early settlements—a picture beside which the old-fashioned portrait of the magnanimous and rhetorical red man is a piece of very false coloring. Mr. Parkman knows his subject, and he mentions no single trait of intelligence, of fancy, or of character by which the Indian should have a hold on our respect or his fate a claim to our regret. The cruelty of the Canadian tribes is beyond description. They had no imagination in their religion; they confined what little they possessed to the science of torture. A prominent feature of this science was their voracious cannibalism, for in the enthusiasm of the practice they frequently neglected to await the death of their victim. When perchance they did, they danced about him as he stood in the stocks, shouting into his ears who would eat this morsel and who the other. Add to this their incredible squalor, their ignorance of any rule of decency, however elastic, the utterly graceless and sterile character of their legends and traditions, and finally the dismal severity of the climate in which they managed to support existence—their ceaseless struggle with winter, famine, and pestilence—and we have a conception as accurate as it is painful of the life of our aboriginal predecessors, and of the civilization which flourished on this continent during the long black ages in which Europe lay basking in light—such as it was. Let us not despair of our literature. During the lifetime of those great writers and adventurers about whom French and English critics write the brilliant articles which occasionally minister to our discouragement, Hurons and Iroquois were biting off each other's finger-ends on the shores of the St. Lawrence, and Mohawks, in the beautiful valley which perpetuates their virtues, were laying open the skulls of pious Frenchmen.

We have no space to trace in detail the various incidents and vicissitudes of the Jesuit mission. It lasted for forty years; and during this period was made illustrious by every form of heroism and martyrdom. Its failure was the result of several causes—of the purely religious character of the French establishments, of the superficial and mechanical nature of the conversions, and of the ceaseless internecine warfare of the different tribes, terminating in the supremacy of the Iroquois, the most cruel and intractable of all, and the extirpation of the Hurons, among whom the Jesuits had found their best proselytes. Quebec and Montreal were wholly priest-governed—the latter, indeed, priest-settled. The emigrations from France were under ecclesiastical auspices, and entirely wanting in any desire to turn the material resources of the country to account. On the contrary, all excessive prosperity, all superfluous comfort, were discouraged and prohibited. The motive of emigration was a strictly sentimental one, and the enterprise undertaken only for the greater glory of God. The interests of this life were consulted at most only in so far as to secure proper defence from attack. Agriculture was neglected, trade restricted, and the neophytes were instructed only in the Catechism. An Ursuline convent was founded at Quebec, and a number of enthusiastic volunteers were recruited among the ladies of France. To the female members of the mission Mr. Parkman has devoted a vividly-written chapter. The reader will readily understand that among those grim celibates in those snow-choked pine forests the interests of population were left to take care of themselves; and he will transfer a glance of approval down the map to the latitudes where prolific Dutch farmers and Puritan divines were building up the State of New York and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In 1650 Gabriel Druilletes, one of the Jesuit brothers, made an expedition across the country from Quebec to Boston, where he had occasion to be forcibly struck with the difference in the character of the French and English settlements.

> "He says," writes Mr. Parkman, "that Boston (meaning Massachusetts) could alone furnish four thousand fighting men, and that the four united colonies could furnish forty thousand souls. His numbers may be challenged; but, at all events, the contrast was striking with the attenuated and suffering bands of priests, nuns, and fur-traders on the St. Lawrence. About forty thousand persons had come from Old to New England with the resolve of making it their home; and, though this immigration had virtually ceased, the natural increase had been great. The necessity, or the strong desire, of escaping from persecution had given the impulse to Puritan colonization; while, on the other hand, none but good Catholics, the favored class of France, were tolerated in Canada. These had no motive for exchanging the comforts of home and the smiles of fortune for a starving wilderness and the scalping-knives of the Iroquois. The Huguenots would have emigrated in swarms, but they were rigidly forbidden. The zeal of propagandism and the fur trade were, as we have seen, the vital forces of New France. Of her feeble population, the best part was bound to perpetual chastity, while the fur-traders rarely brought their wives to the wilderness. . . . . To the mind of the Puritan heaven was God's throne; but no less was the earth his footstool. . . . He held it a duty to labor and to multiply, and, building quite as much on the Old Testament as on the New, thought that a reward on earth as well as in heaven waited on those who were faithful to the law. . . . On the other hand, those who shaped the character and, in great measure, the destiny of New France, had always on their lips the nothingness and the vanity of human life."

In heaven alone, then, they found their reward. Their story is far more romantic and touching than that of their Protestant neighbors; it is written in those rich and mellow colors in which the Catholic Church inscribes her records; but it leaves the mind profoundly unsatisfied. Like all sad stories, it carries a moral. What is this moral? However well disinterestedness and self-immolation may work for individuals, they work but ill for communities, however small. The Puritans were frank self-seekers. They withdrew from persecution at home and they practised it here. They have left, accordingly, a vast, indelible trace of their passage through history. The Jesuits worked on a prepared field, in an artificial atmosphere, and it was, therefore, easy for them to be sublime. However they, as a group—a very small group—might embrace suffering and martyrdom, the paternal Church courted only prosperity and dominion. The Church was well aware of the truth at which we just hinted—that collective bodies find but small account in self-sacrifice; and it carefully superintended and directed the fervent passion of the Jesuits. The record of these latter in Canada is unstained by persecution, for the simple reason that French Protestants were not allowed to enter their circle. In this circle they freely burned themselves out. The Church could afford it on the part of the Catholic world at large, and as for individuals each had but his own case to manage. Of how well each performed his task, Mr. Parkman's pages are an excellent record. They furnish us, too, with a second inference, more gratifying to human vanity than the other, and that is, that religion, in spite of the commonplace, intellectual form which it has recently grown to assume in many quarters, is essentially bound up with miracles. Only the miracles are a tribute of man to God, and not of God to man. It may be fairly said of the Jesuit missionaries that, in the firmness of their endurance of horrible sufferings, they fairly broke the laws of nature. They broke at least those of their own temperaments. The timid man hourly outfaced impending torture, and the weak outlasted it. When one can boast of such miracles as these, what is the use of insisting on diseases cured by the touch of saintly bones, or of enthusiasts visibly transported in the arms of angels?

DECLINE OF THE ROMAN REPUBLIC.*

Mr. Merivale has done a good thing in publishing a new edition of his history of "The Last Century of the Roman Republic," no doubt the most compact, accurate, and readable account of this period in the English language. We wish that his plan had permitted him to recast it so far as to make it strictly an introduction to his great work, the chief defect in the plan of which is that it begins at a date (the death of Sulla) which was not an epoch, or the beginning of an historical period, and that it needs, therefore, a more elaborate introduction than he has provided. But, after all, to have done this would have been to write a new work, and it is easy, if one desires, to use the first five chapters of the smaller work as an introduction to the larger. The rest of the volume covers the same ground as the first three volumes of the "Roman Empire." It is, however, by no means an abridgment, but an independent work, written earlier, complete in itself, and fuller in many points than the larger history.

The five chapters which we have mentioned present a rare combination of compression without meagreness, correctness without detail. The statement of the various political questions upon which parties were divided is all that could be desired for a common reader, while those most familiar with the subject can hardly fail to gain in clearness and vividness of notion by their aid. Probably the best of these discussions is that upon the Municipia and Italian Allies, chap. 3; but that upon the Agrarian Laws, chap. 1, is also excellent.

We are surprised to find two or three inaccuracies which one would have thought a careful revision of the work could hardly have failed to detect. Page 9, among the friends of Tiberius Gracchus are mentioned Publius Mucius Scaevola (the consul) and "Lucius Licinius Crassus, the most renowned orator of the forum and the senate." But the orator Crassus, being born B.C. 140, was only seven years old at the time of the tribunate of Tiberius Gracchus, B.C. 133; his first political act was the impeachment of Carbo in 119. Mr. Merivale has here confounded him with Publius Mucius Mucianus, brother of the consul Scaevola, but adopted into the family of the Crassi, and, like all members of the family from which he sprung, distinguished alike for a profound knowledge of law and a broad and liberal statesmanship. A similar mistake is made on page 104, where the tribune whose bold radicalism struck the spark that kindled the flames of the first civil war is called Sulpicius Galba instead of Sulpicius Rufus—a natural enough mistake, perhaps, inasmuch as he is generally known as Sulpicius, and the Galbas are the best known family of the Sulpician gens. We think Mr. Merivale hardly does justice to this brilliant and ardent young reformer in saying that "under the pressure of debt he was ready to sell his services to a patron who could hold out to him at least a distant prospect of sharing the spoils of Mithridates;" and that, "taking Saturninus as his model, he studied only to surpass him in audacity." This is the view commonly taken of Sulpicius; and it is true that he was fiery and headstrong—influenced too much by his passions, it may be. And he had some reason to be—he who had seen his friend Drusus murdered, and his friend Cotta driven into exile by the oligarchy, and whose honest opposition to the illegal candidacy of his friend Caius Cæsar had brought upon him the violent animosity of the powerful family of the Cæsars. But we cannot believe that the intimate and trusted friend of Drusus, Cotta, Lucius Crassus, and the Scaevolas was the villain that Plutarch paints him. If he had been, we may be very sure that the aristocratically-minded Cicero would never have drawn so attractive a picture of him as that in the "De Oratore," or let him pass without rebuke in the "Brutus."

Another mistake, even more surprising, we find on page 63, as to the office of the pontifex maximus. "This engine of government," he says, "could still be handled only by patricians." On the contrary, the plebeians had more weight in the pontifical college than the patricians. A certain number of places in the college were necessarily filled by plebeians; the other places were open to both orders indifferently, so that some members must be, and all might be, plebeians. Mr. Merivale is surely familiar with the memorable canvass for the chief pontificate, B.C. 63, in which the young Cæsar, a patrician, defeated the venerable Catulus, a member of an illustrious plebeian family.

We find on page 8 some instructive remarks upon the social tendencies which Gracchus strove to resist, and which Mr. Merivale regards as at once less harmful and more irresistible than is commonly maintained. There was, it is certain, a rapid centralization taking place in landed property—the same absorption of small freeholds in great estates which is observable in England at the present day; further, the same abandonment of other industries and conversion of immense tracts of land into pasturage which is observable in Scotland. "This has been traced," says Mr. Merivale, "to natural causes, and no legislation could have effectually controlled it." After describing the peculiar adaptedness of Italy to grazing, he adds: "As soon as political restrictions were got rid of (in the subjection of all Italy under one government), properties became enlarged, and embraced tracts of both hill and plain together. Then first these countries began to reap the fruit of their natural capabilities. Proprietors found it their interest to breed cattle in greater numbers, and to reduce in the same proportion their cultivation of grain. An attempt to check by violent means the course of this natural process could hardly fail to be attended with disastrous consequences." To a certain extent this is all true; but in describing this "natural process" Mr. Merivale overlooks two considerations of great importance. What made it possible for Roman nobles and capitalists to raise less grain and turn their broad domains into pastures? What but the fact that the whole civilized world was plundered of grain to supply the Roman market? And what made it possible to buy out and crowd out all the small proprietors, until there was hardly a vestige left at last of the old Italian yeomanry? What but the existence of slavery—the fact that free labor cannot subsist by the side of unpaid labor? One can hardly talk of natural movements, of the laws of supply and demand, in such a state of things as this.

For this very reason, however, that the source of evil lay so far back—behind the fundamental principles on which the Roman polity was based, and which Tiberius Gracchus believed in as religiously as Scipio Nasica—no remedy could have more than a temporary and superficial effect. It may or may not be possible to check the centralization of labor and property in England; at any rate, it has not its origin there in the same causes as in ancient Italy. The modern parallel is not England, but our Southern States; our "poor white trash" owes its existence to the same cause that annihilated the Italian yeomanry. For a class of independent small farmers cannot exist side by side with slave labor in its developed form—that is, owned and worked by capital as an investment. So long as slavery was patriarchal, the slave a member of his master's family, it was probably not inconsistent with the best social relations possible in that rude age. But when familia came to mean gang, when estates came to be worked like rice and sugar plantations, solely for the profit of absentee proprietors, there was an end of honorable free labor. It is true, the social tendencies which the Gracchi tried to check were irresistible, but only because slavery was in the way—because Roman political economy did not teach that slavery was a blunder, and heathen morality did not teach that it was a sin.

The lessons of Roman history are full of instruction for us Americans, and we know no book better calculated for general readers to learn the facts upon which they rest than that before us. We hope that some publisher will think it worth his while to bring it before the American public.

MARTIN VAN BUREN ON AMERICAN POLITICS.*

The observations of an old and shrewd politician upon the parties and public men of his time, when made without the restraint to which every man in the possession or pursuit of office is naturally subject, could scarcely fail to be interesting to a people so much occupied with politics as are our own. If made in a spirit of perfect candor, and without any reserve except that which a sense of propriety would dictate, such confidences would be delightful reading. But such freedom cannot reasonably be expected from one who has spent two-thirds of his life in training himself to reticence, evasion, and extreme caution. And certainly no one will find such confidences in this volume, and no one who is familiar with the character of its author will be surprised that such is the case. Nevertheless, in so far as the author has given expression to his opinions, he has evidently done so with a desire to be sincere in his statements and candid in his judgments.

* "Political Parties in the United States. By Martin Van Buren, Ex-President of the United States." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1867.

The opening of the book—the initial proposition upon which all its arguments are based, and which gives tone to the whole—is so pre-eminently characteristic of Mr. Van Buren, that we can scarcely conceive of its being written by any other man. Yet it has something in it so ludicrous, so suggestive of the mere politician as distinguished from the statesman, that we wonder to see it allowed by the author's friends to appear in print. What do our readers suppose was, to the mind of Mr. Van Buren, the cardinal distinction between the Democratic and the Federal or Whig party? Was it their difference of opinion as to the sphere or mode of government, the relative rights of the State and Federal governments, the proper relations of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, or even questions of banks, tariffs, or the like? Not at all. The great difference between the rival parties which seems to have impressed Mr. Van Buren, and which he makes the text for his entire disquisition upon the political history of the country, is, that the Democratic party prospers when the caucus system is faithfully carried out, and that its opponents do not! Those who suspect us of exaggeration may satisfy themselves of the correctness of this statement by reading the first half-dozen pages of the book.

Having delivered his mind of this conviction, however, Mr. Van Buren does not recur to the subject again; but, like many other preachers, delivers a sermon which has no discoverable connection with his text. He reviews the whole theory and policy of Alexander Hamilton in a manner that will meet the cordial approval of every old-fashioned Democrat, while we do not see how its spirit can be considered unfair, even by those who most heartily sympathize with Hamilton; for, though they may not be willing to admit that Hamilton's doctrines of government were precisely such as Mr. Van Buren attributes to him, they cannot reasonably expect any Jeffersonian Democrat to agree with them upon that point. Mr. Van Buren very frankly confesses the injustice which he, in common with his whole party, had done to Hamilton, in imputing to the latter a desire to bring about a war with France, and fully clears him from that charge. But he maintains that Hamilton was essentially a monarchist, and that his advocacy of protection, a national bank, a funding system, etc., was induced less by a belief of their immediate benefit to the nation, than by a conviction that the patronage thus created, and the interests thus bound up with the Federal Government, were necessary to give that government an overshadowing influence, and to furnish it with those means of corruption which, according to authorities upon which Mr. Van Buren relies, Hamilton deemed to be essential to the working of a popular government.

Among the most interesting and instructive chapters of this work are those which review the claims of the Federal judiciary to lay down a rule of interpretation of the Constitution which shall bind all other departments of the Government. On this subject Mr. Van Buren held to the last the doctrines of Jefferson and Jackson, nor was he moved from them by the prospect of decisions favorable to his party. He dissects the claims put forward on behalf of the Dred Scott decision as keenly as he does the case of Marbury and Madison, in which the Supreme Court for the first time attempted to dictate to the executive department. The two cases have an important point in common with each other, and with the case of the mandamus against Governor Dennison, of Ohio, in 1860, in which it was sought to compel him to surrender a person guilty of an act punishable by the black-laws of Kentucky, but not criminal under the laws of Ohio. In all these cases the court gave a long expression to its views upon the merits, and concluded with deciding that it had no jurisdiction of the controversies. The Ohio case had not been decided when Mr. Van Buren wrote; but he clearly sets forth the impropriety of this mode of treating the subject as illustrated by the other cases. Nor can he resist the temptation to point out the fact that the chief-justice who delivered the Dred Scott decision, and the President who referred to it as conclusive upon all departments of the Government, were both old Federalists, who imported the heresy into the Democratic party. The evils which would result from the admission of such supremacy in the courts are forcibly stated by Mr. Van Buren; and this part of his book deserves the study of every one who desires to form sound views upon the theory of politics.

The writer becomes less ingenuous as he approaches the period of his own active participation in public life. He could not bring himself to admit the unfairness of the manner in which his party dealt with John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay from 1825 to 1829, nor the general lapse of the Democratic party from its original doctrines in respect to protection. He endeavors to account for Henry Clay's advocacy of a high tariff by imputing it to a desire to secure the favor of the disbanded Federalists; but it is difficult to reconcile this theory with the notorious fact that New England, which was the stronghold of Federalism, was almost unanimous in its opposition to the protectionist tariffs of 1816 and 1824. It would have been more generous and, we think, more just to give the same credit for sincerity to Clay that the writer freely gives to Hamilton.

Mr. Van Buren did not live to see the destruction of slavery, and evidently wrote at a period in which that result was looked for only in far distant ages. He almost ignores the subject; it may be because he had no profound convictions in relation to it, or it may be merely because he did not live to complete his review of political history. The brief allusions which he makes to the contests arising out of the "domestic institution" create a painful impression of his insincerity in 1848, and betray throughout the politician rather than the statesman. This, however, is no more than was to be expected.

The work, as a whole, has much interested us; and we are glad to learn that it is to be followed by a biography of its author, to be prepared by Mr. Charles H. Hunt from materials left by Mr. Van Buren himself. The ex-President was not a model statesman, and was obliged by his ambition to use some tools of doubtful character; but he was not so bad or so unwise as his political opponents believed while he was in power. Yet he introduced a system of political management which has inflicted great evils on the country, and his name will probably never cease to be associated with the deterioration of politics which has inevitably followed the pursuit of office for the sake of profit, rather than from a desire to serve the public good.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.*

IT is unfortunate for the country that its attention is so much occupied on financial questions by men wholly uneducated in political economy. We use the term education, in its properly limited sense, as that mental training and discipline which enable the individual to think clearly and correctly. An educated political economist is not one who has thoroughly learned the banking business, but one who can reason correctly, or, at least, is sure not to reason falsely, on financial subjects, and who, where he lacks knowledge, is fully conscious of his own ignorance. This education must be had before the mind is absorbed by the active business of life or never. If he begins at the desk he will be, in finance, what the commercial college book-keeper is in mercantile life.

Such is clearly the case with Mr. Gibbons. He exhibits all that narrowness of view, that adhesion to pet notions, and that inability to see things from more than one standpoint which mark the so-called practical man, and distinguish him from the man of thought and education. Like most such men, he thinks that the entire social system is kept in motion by the particular operation in which he has been engaged. Loans, deposits, circulation, and specie are the four elements which make up his universe. Of the subjects of his book he knows no more than an intelligent Illinois farmer. Practically, he knows less; for, if the farmer had been called on to write a book on the liquidation of the national debt, the effect of taxation on the industry of the country, and the management of the Treasury, he would, conscious of his ignorance, have first sought to understand the subject. Wanting this consciousness, Mr. Gibbons does not inform himself, but rushes into print, thinking he knows all about it. He is, indeed, intimately acquainted with financial operations at the great moneyed centre, but is ignorant of all else. He talks and thinks "shop" throughout. "Currency," he says, "is capital; and the currency of a country is the most important part of its capital. The New York Clearing House stepped to the rescue, saved the nation, and moved the rebellion out of its way." We fancy that if Messrs. Maynard & Noyes have felt a proper pride in the reflection that the stirring General War Order No. 1 was written by the President with their ink, they will contest this claim put forth for the Clearing House. How would our armies ever have been organized and our troops disciplined without the general orders of the War Department? And how, they will triumphantly ask, would the general orders ever have been written if they had not furnished the ink?

Mr. Gibbons's financial speculations being on a par with those which are continually poured forth by the daily press, are worth criticising only where they chance to run with the current of popular opinion. Such are his views of the payment of our debt. He sees the money raised by taxation paid into the Treasury, and seems to think that is the last of it, so far as its effect upon the prosperity of the country is concerned. He therefore exclaims: "The true meaning of taxation is—the withdrawal of capital from labor and commerce." The facts that as fast as the national debt is paid off the bondholders must, either directly, or indirectly by loans to others, employ all the money they receive in building houses, mills, railroads, or other forms of productive capital; that they can do this only by employing bricklayers, carpenters, joiners, and machinists to build; and that, consequently, for every dollar of money applied to the payment of the debt there is a demand for one dollar's worth of skilled labor; that, in other words, the money is simply transferred from one person to another, he does not see at all. The truth of these propositions, and the falsity of the doctrines opposed to them, are so strikingly illustrated by notorious contemporary facts, that it is wonderful everybody does not see them. We have been raising unprecedented sums by taxation, paying some 300 millions, principal and interest, of our debt in a year, in the midst of lamentations about the terrible effect of so great a burden upon the labor of the country, and yet never before has there been such a demand for skilled labor, and never before were the laboring classes so nearly masters of the situation. What, pathetically asks Mr. Gibbon, is to become of the carpenters, caulkers, and joiners if we cease to build ships? But when a good mechanic can get for building houses as much pay as some of the State governors got before the war, is it wonderful that we cannot compete with our neighbors in shipbuilding? This whole will-o'-the-wisp resolves itself into this: that our joiners, caulkers, and glaziers are not going to build ships at three dollars per day when they can get four or five dollars in other employments.

If we want any further demonstration of the puerility of the popular fears which our author seeks to aggravate, let us see what the debt really amounts to when divided among the producing classes. Roughly, it amounts to sixty dollars for each inhabitant. It is due from those who do not hold bonds to those who do. The former are debtors, and the latter creditors, and neither in their relations nor in the conditions and effects of payment does the case differ from that of a private debt. Let us take as a representative of the debtor class John Smith, carpenter, who owns no bonds at all and supports himself entirely by his daily labor. Making allowance, on the one hand, for his comparative poverty, in consequence of which he pays less than the average of taxes, and, on the other hand, for his wife and three children, whose share of the debt he must assume, it will be a liberal estimate to say that he owes $180. The annual interest will be $10 80. Earning $3 to $4 per day, the interest costs him three days' labor. An annual payment of $11 55 will, according to Mr. Gibbons's tables, cancel the whole debt in forty-seven years. The payment, it must be remembered, is made entirely in labor instead of money, because Mr. Smith gets all his money back again in payment for the barn he helps to build for his neighbor, the bondholder. Now, imagine Mr. Gladstone congratulating John Smith on his energy in devoting $20 of his income to the payment of his debt, several hundred writers proclaiming that if the creditor calls on Mr. Smith for more than twelve dollars in any one year he will paralyze his industry instead of making him work all the harder so as to earn the money, and Mr. Gibbons arguing that you must give him a century and a half to pay up, and the reader has a picture of the case as it stands.

It fortunately happens that the views of the Indian herb doctors of our financial system are so diversified that, like a combination of poisons, they may prove comparatively harmless. Thus, Mr. Gibbons has his antidote in Mr. Ferris, a writer showing all of Mr. Gibbons's ignorance of political economy, without his extensive knowledge of the office of bank-notes. As a California bullionist, his financial views are diametrically opposed to those of Mr. Gibbons. We advise all who read one to read the other also; but we must say to those in doubt about reading either, that two more profitless books do not often appear on so grave a subject.

Terra Mariæ. Threads of Maryland Colonial History. By Edward D. Neill. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)—The author offers these gleanings from the Congressional Library as supplemental to the contents of previous more or less general histories, and as suggestive of new researches to those who have a care for the past of Maryland. They are loosely connected in chapters of chronological sequence, and are often as unsatisfactory as a lost trail in the wilderness; but nevertheless they furnish agreeable reading, and the chapter on the several Lords Baltimore, the proprietaries of Maryland, is not lacking in chronological precision or completeness, at least there is no lack for which Mr. Neill is responsible. Chapter vii. is perhaps the most entertaining—"Society during the Eighteenth Century, and Causes which led to Union with other Colonies in a Declaration of Independence."

Altogether, one learns how far the religious toleration commonly attributed to the Catholic founders of the colony was real, sincere, or merely prudential, and how little attention was given to education, seeing that among the paupers and convicts that were shipped to Maryland, as to Virginia and South Carolina, were schoolmasters that were sold like any mechanic for indentured servants, and who sometimes had to be advertised as runaways. Pretty extended and pleasantly minute accounts are given of the Jesuit missions, the Quakers, the Labadists, who resemble the Quakers not slightly, and the Methodists, who have so outgrown the disciples of what was once the State religion that in 1860 there were counted 541 Methodist to 158 Episcopal churches. Thomas Paul, of the Friends, and Jonathan Boucher, of the Church of England, spoke manly words against slavery, and wise prophecies of material and moral ruin. Asbury and Coke, Methodists, would have petitioned the Assembly for the emancipation of the negroes, and tried to obtain the signature of Washington. "He did not see it proper," say they, "to sign the petition," though "he informed us that he was of our sentiments, and had signified his thoughts on the subject to most of the great men of the State." To these protestants the eloquent voice of William Pinkney was added; and all were needed, though ineffectual, to destroy a system for which such laws had been enacted as denounced the scruple that the baptism of negro slaves was synonymous with manumission, and enslaved the white wife of a negro and the offspring of the connection, and in which slave-breeding began to be very early a lucrative pursuit on all the large plantations. In recording all these facts about the now extinct "institution," Mr. Neill shows a sympathy for freedom that is perhaps to be thought creditable in a secretary of the President.

The names of individuals preserved in this book have a special interest for the three contiguous States which Mason and Dixon's Line divides. The chapter on boundary disputes does not allude to that famous survey in which William Penn showed such dexterous diplomacy, though his prolonged contest with Charles Baltimore is described under this head.

The American Fruit Culturist, etc. By John J. Thomas. (New York: William Wood & Co. 1867.)—This work is, in fact, a revised and enlarged form of the "Fruit Culturist," a standard work that has passed through many editions during the last twenty years. It is a convenient manual of about 500 pages, excellently adapted to the wants of a very large class who wish a concise and, at the same time, explicit and reliable work on fruit culture. About one-third of the work is devoted to "general principles and practice," the remainder to a more detailed description of special kinds of fruits. In the first part the general principles of the growth are considered, the preparation of soil, transplanting, pruning, grafting, cultivation, preparation of fruits for market, preserving, canning, mishaps, profits and losses, and so on, plainly considered from a practical rather than a theoretical point of view. In the second part, after giving general directions regarding the distinct species of fruits treated of, there is a technical description of the more desirable and standard varieties. The work is illustrated by 481 cuts, the most of which are very good. There are a few minor faults which do not materially mar the usefulness of this truly admirable work; but we notice one error which may put some of its readers to trouble, especially as it relates to a subject quite generally misunderstood. In the directions given for sending scions, cuttings, etc., by mail, the author, after giving excellent directions as to how they should be packed, states (p. 37) "the names should be written with pencil on the ends, and no paper used for this purpose wrapped around them, as it absorbs the moisture," etc. He illustrates this further by two cuts.

Now this is just what Congress, perhaps, intended to allow when it passed the act allowing cuttings, seeds, etc., to be sent by mail at special rates of postage; but the interpretation of the law is different. The Department has officially decided that no writing whatever, nor printing—not even a number placed upon the specimens—can be allowed in such a package without violating the law and subjecting the whole to letter postage. "A card, printed or impressed upon the wrapper" of such package, is allowed, nothing more. We are aware that this law is habitually violated through ignorance, and that this strict interpretation very nearly destroys its usefulness; nevertheless thus it stands, and not infrequently postmasters carry it out to the letter (as all are instructed to do), to the serious annoyance of the recipient of such packages. We suggest that the author unite with the farmers and fruit-growers of the country, and have Congress so amend the act that the directions given in this work shall be allowed; every individual concerned will be a gainer and the Government will not be a loser.

Weights and Measures according to the Decimal System. By B. F. Craig, M.D. (New York: D. Van Nostrand.)—The most lucid, accurate, and useful of all the hand-books on this subject that we have yet seen. It gives forty-seven tables of comparison between the English and French denominations of length, area, capacity, weight, and the centigrade and Fahrenheit thermometers, with clear instructions how to use them; and to this practical portion, which helps to make the transition as easy as possible, is prefixed a scientific explanation of the errors in the metric system, and how they may be corrected in the laboratory. The book deserves the special attention of teachers.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

ANOTHER SOUTHERN CHEVALIER.

EX-GOVERNOR PERRY, of South Carolina, is writing letters in the papers of his State loudly conjuring his fellow-citizens to vote against the constitutional convention called under the Reconstruction act, and singing the superiority of military government over any species of government in which negroes are allowed to share, and in fact talking in the wild, senseless, and usually unpractical way with which Southern statesmen have made the world so familiar. His last letter is an unusually good specimen of his style. After discussing the duties of Southern men from the "honorable" point of view, and showing that negroes must not be allowed to vote in South Carolina because the English commonwealth of "1640," the French republics of 1792 and of 1848, and the Mexican republic of our own day had all proved failures, he characteristically winds up with quoting a "spontaneous effusion of a spirited and patriotic heart" in the shape of a letter "from a noble lady of South Carolina." This is the letter, and the whole of it:

> "I believe I speak the feeling of at least every woman in South Carolina when I say we heartily endorse your views, and each and every sentiment you express in your recently published letters. We pray you to continue your efforts to save us from such dishonor and such degradation, to which the pain of twenty violent deaths were preferable, and may Heaven aid you in recalling the manhood of our State to a sense of what is due at least their race."

It will be seen that there is not much in it. In fact, there is nothing in it, except the assertion of one woman of South Carolina that all the other women agree with Governor Perry in his "views," and wish he would keep on expressing them. Nevertheless, it is quite evident that Mr. Perry believes that this stuff may be made not only to do duty as an argument, but as a vindication of himself and his later performances; for, says he, "such patriotic and spirited sentiments from one lovely woman fully compensate me for all the criticism and abuse which have been heaped upon me." Now, this little touch, revealing the delight of a middle-aged politician at having some rather extravagant talk of his on a most momentous question approved in a rather silly letter by "one lovely woman," is the kind of thing which makes good and moderate men at the North and elsewhere feel discouraged about the future of the Southern whites. With the best wish in the world to let bygones be bygones, one is puzzled to know how to deal with men to whom politics is so much an affair of sentiment and so little an affair of hard common sense as it seems and has always seemed to be to the bulk of the Southern planters. We suppose it would be difficult to overestimate the extent to which they were seduced into ranting and railing in defence of slavery by the picturesque view of slave society, or the extent to which they were seduced into going to war by the notion that they were "cavaliers," and that it would be pretty to see "cavaliers" with long hair on horseback fighting Puritans on foot. There can hardly be a doubt that thousands of simpletons, old and young, were driven to the field by a thoroughly mediæval sensitiveness to feminine censure or applause. But it caps the climax to find a grave, elderly man, when the fighting is all over, supporting an argument in defence of submission for an indefinite period to military government by quoting a little outburst of admiration of himself and his doings from "one lovely woman."

When a man discusses politics in this frame of mind, it is very difficult to know how to take him or the community which he represents. The ordinary arguments used in political discussions are of little use in dealing with them. There is no use in talking of expediency to gentlemen who are striving to win female smiles, and whom "lovely women" are exhorting "to die twenty violent deaths" sooner than follow the commonplace, sensible course which you recommend to them, and yet expediency is, or ought to be, the weightiest of all considerations in politics. There is no earthly way of making reconstruction pleasant to the South; there is no way of arranging the admission of negroes to political life that will prevent its being a bitter pill for nearly every Southern white. Nobody expects it to be pleasant; but then it is unavoidable. It has to be swallowed. The alternative of such Southerners as do not like it is expatriation or suicide. To sit down as Governor Perry is doing, and whine and bellow against it, with the "lovely women" at his back, is not only not manly—it is silly.

We could understand Southern men seeking to avoid action under the Reconstruction act, and especially in South Carolina, where the negroes are in the majority, if there was the smallest chance that delay would change the situation. It is true that the act prescribes the retention of the Southern States under military government until the qualified majority choose to act; but, then, supposing the other States act, as they are likely to do, no sensible man can suppose that South Carolina would be allowed by Congress to stay out in the cold for an indefinite period. Nothing can be surer than that, if the majority persisted in refusing to bring her in, the minority would be at last allowed to do so. The spectacle of a State governed permanently by military force is one which the people of the North would not long endure.

But Mr. Perry acknowledges now that the majority in South Carolina is against him. He says the negro votes in all districts except one outnumber the whites, and his only hope of defeating the convention lies, he confesses, in the ignorance of the blacks. Many negroes in the interior, he thinks, will not have heard of the convention or know anything about it, and others will vote with their employers. But this is a defence which time, and a very short time, too, is sure to remove. Let the convention be defeated now through negro ignorance or subserviency, and we may be sure the Radicals, both black and white, would double their efforts to enlighten them, so that in a very few months the issue would have to be tried over again, and the result would probably be very different. Mr. Perry and his friends would then find themselves dragged into the Union by the negroes, just as they now fear they may be, but the delay would have irritated everybody whose irritation is of any consequence, both blacks and whites. It would have confirmed the negroes in their growing hostility to their old masters, and would have justified the doubts and denunciations with which the extreme Radicals of the North are now assailing the latter, so that Mr. Perry would be forced sorrowfully to confess that his last end was worse than his first.

We deprecate as much as anybody can do the course which Messrs. Stevens, Phillips, and others are pursuing at this moment. It would be difficult to find words strong enough to characterize the performances of those who are trying to persuade the blacks that it is office or confiscation they are to seek through their votes, and not protection for the fruits of their industry. A more detestable sight than an educated orator preaching this lesson, and preaching nothing else, to this unfortunate race on their very entrance to freedom and civilization, we cannot well conceive of. We do not doubt that it is exercising a most injurious influence on the negroes, and on their account every good man ought to set his face against it.

But it is on their account alone that it is to be feared. Mr. Perry knows, and every Southern man of sense knows, that the plan of taking away white men's farms to give them to negroes finds no favor in Congress or out of it amongst any sensible or influential portion of the community. There is about as much real danger to Southern property from negro voting as there is from an invasion of St. Dominicans. If Mr. Perry and others like him would sit down and do a little thinking instead of basking in the smiles of "lovely woman," he would see this as plainly as we farther North, to whom "noble ladies" never say a word of approval. A wholesale or even very extensive confiscation of property by the majority in any State is never likely to take place, because the public sentiment of the other parts of the Union would forbid it, and would find means, we may be sure, of making itself felt. The one thing which is least likely to happen in our politics is the introduction or toleration anywhere of any practice shaking the security of property. Even in the wildest of our border communities a man may commit as many murders as he pleases, but if he takes to horse-stealing the people rise upon him. In fact, over-sensitiveness on this point is one of the great weaknesses of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Moreover, the negro population of the South will have always to rely on its natural increase for its growth, while the white population is swollen every year by an enormous immigration. Let it appear that political tranquillity is once restored in the South, and we may be sure that, slavery being gone, the great and advancing tide, which is now eating every year farther and farther into the heart of the Western wilderness, will begin to steal very rapidly into the Southern forests, and to swamp the black vote everywhere. There is not the ghost of a chance that in ten years there will in any Southern State be a black majority, and that the ballot will be of any use to the negro except to defend the fruits of his own toil. There is danger just now, however, that the negro may be led astray, and that his education in civilization may, by bad counsels, be made bitterer and harder than it need be. But there is no danger that Southern whites will have to pass through any heavier ordeal than they ought to expect and than they really deserve. What the South needs now is common sense, and the suppression of "cavaliers" and blustering orators, and—we regret to say, too—of "lovely women." A more malignant political influence than these same "lovely women" are now exercising all over the South is not to be found on the continent, but it is to be hoped that Southern men will get free from it. Politics, they must learn, is not a "tournament." The great problems of the science are not solved by tilting at rings under the eyes of Queens of Love and Beauty, but by the diligent study and right use of the common facts of life. The South is not an enchanted land; the negro is not a dusky giant in a big castle, seizing white men, babies, and tender ladies, and making ragouts of them. So we have no longer any need of knights-errant, and the old Southern armor, the lance of vituperation, the shield of bombast, the helmet of rant, may be put into the local museums.

STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION.

TAXES are burdensome even when lightest, and unequal in their operation even when most fairly assessed. But the system of taxation which exists in the United States, and in most of the several States, is one of the most unequal and unjust in the civilized world, and, contrary to all theories about democracy, the inequalities of the various methods of taxation which are in use favor the minority and oppress the majority of the electoral class.

We shall not say anything in this place of the taxes imposed by the Federal Government, as that subject will receive our consideration separately at some other time, and has, moreover, received able treatment at the hands of Commissioner Wells, Mr. Edward Atkinson, and others. But in the State of New York, at any rate, the local taxes are heavy enough to make the mode of their levying a question of great importance, and yet the subject has received comparatively little attention. A few years ago the Board of State Assessors made a somewhat elaborate report, setting forth with much earnestness the injustice of the present system and proposing a change, which, however, did not reach the root of the trouble, and would have accomplished nothing if it had been adopted. The Legislature discussed the matter during part of one session, but the war and the taxation necessitated by it entirely diverted the public mind from such local questions. It is time that the subject should again be taken up, and the great increase of taxation has made it more than ever necessary that it should be levied upon equitable principles.

The method at present in use in the State of New York is as simple as it is unjust. With the exception of an insignificant sum raised from licenses, etc., the whole amount is levied upon accumulated property, and three-fourths of the burden falls upon real estate. Much more than half the personal property that is actually assessed is situated in the city of New York, and an immense proportion of it consists of the property of corporations, but for the existence of which scarcely any personal property would be reached by the tax-collector. Their annual exhibits of affairs and their desire to exaggerate the amount of their capital make them the easy prey of the assessor. But every one knows that vast amounts of personal property in the hands of individuals escape taxation altogether. It is the general opinion of statisticians that the value of personal property in every civilized nation largely exceeds the value of all its real estate. But even if we suppose the two kinds of property to be of only equal value in this State, it results that land bears fifty per cent. more than its proper share of the taxes.

The disproportionate taxation of land, however, is not now so unjust as it once was, because the Federal Government raises an amount of imposts larger than those of the States combined, and levies them almost exclusively upon personal property. Yet it would be desirable, upon every ground of economy and political purity, that the General Government should be able to resign the collection of its taxes to the States, and it never can do this until the States have adopted an equal system of taxation.

For the present, however, a more important point for consideration is the total exemption from direct taxation of all who spend as much as they earn, or nearly as much—a class which includes a vast majority of the electors in cities, though not a majority in the rest of the State. The inevitable result of such a system is to make this large class indifferent to the duty of economy in public affairs. It is undoubtedly true that they are ultimately reached by the operation of natural laws, and compelled to pay some share of the public expenses through their landlords, tailors, grocers, and the like; but this is not realized by one in a hundred of those who have heard the fact stated, and has not even been heard of by most of the class referred to. The rent does not rise and fall in precise harmony with the taxes, nor can the wisest of men tell precisely how much has been added to it on that account. How can ignorant and careless men be expected to trouble themselves with such a question? We all know that they do not, and that two-thirds of the voters in New York city have not the least idea that, by voting for an extravagant or corrupt alderman, they are voting a penny out of their own pockets.

A change upon this point seems to us an indispensable condition of reform in the affairs of all great cities. In some way or other at least three-fourths of the electors should be compelled to pay direct taxes, rising and falling in exact conformity with the expenses of government. A mere poll-tax, such as is levied in several States, never varying in amount, would not answer the purpose; for no degree of economy in public affairs would diminish the tax. The amount necessary to be raised should be divided in certain fixed proportions; one part to be levied upon real estate, another on personal estate, another on incomes not arising from accumulated property, and another on the male residents twenty-one years of age. Every demand of taxes should be made by means of a paper, on which should be printed a brief statement of the amount of taxes levied for the city and State respectively, with a comparison of the amounts levied during the year or two previous. No one should be allowed to vote without having paid his personal tax, though we would not have any one allowed to escape the tax by omitting to vote.

The injustice of putting all the burdens of government upon accumulated property—in other words, upon the thrifty and economical—is palpable. Every man, however poor or however extravagant he may be, derives some benefit from good government, although undoubtedly the property-owner derives more. Let the property-owner pay most, but not all of the expense incurred for the common welfare. But, as we have said, we are more concerned for the effect upon the government of allowing a large class of voters to suppose that they have no interest in good government than even for the injustice suffered by individuals.

It might be possible to devise some plan by which tenants should be encouraged to pay their landlords' taxes or some part of them. In England every householder pays taxes in person. Every owner of chattels worth over $250 might be required to pay a direct tax on his property. We do not urge these, or any other points of detail, because we desire at present to fix upon the minds of our readers the single proposition that universal taxation is the legitimate and necessary companion of universal suffrage. We would not restrict the right of suffrage, but we would most decidedly extend the round of the tax-gatherer.

PERSONAL BEAUTY AS A POLITICAL FORCE.

A MAN can no more help it if he has great personal attractions than the Spice Islands can help being sweet or Pennsylvania can help having anthracite coal. They must be put in precisely the same category with the things which in the case of countries the political economists denominate natural wealth; and we should like to be shown a reason, if it must be held right for a community to use to the fullest extent all its stores of natural wealth, why it must be held wrong for the individuals composing the community to do the same thing. Indeed, we may go further, and say that no one but a trades-union man will long maintain—in fact, the trades-union man will not maintain it long—that it is anything but extremely immoral in a man to refuse to employ as fully and as energetically as he can all gifts of whatsoever kind which by divine allotment are his. It is, of course, his duty to see that the ends he aims at are justifiable, but having once convinced himself of that, he needs be under not the slightest apprehension that he disobeys the Golden Rule if habitually he, so to speak, "looks his prettiest" and does likewise. We do not care, however, to go into the moral casuistry of what is practically a plain enough question; we wish only to point out that Mr. Horace Greeley, even as a political economist alone, is abundantly provided with an answer to some recent fault-finding on the part of the Springfield Republican and the New York Times.

These journals, which are quite apt to oppose any of what may be called Mr. Greeley's politico-personal acts, have animadverted with some severity on his latest move, that of sowing his portraits broadcast, to use a rural metaphor, over the rural districts. A man's laboriously acquired learning, these journals say, his painful industry, his practised ability in business, his accumulated pecuniary capital, his improved and cultivated intellectual powers, he may be allowed to use in the struggle for political honors or for success and profit in the conduct of a newspaper. But they maintain that for a man to seek advancement by means of his personal beauty is wrong; that it is unfair to his competitors that gifts and graces of feature, of shape, of movement, of complexion, got without cost and without merit, should be used to promote the aggrandizement of their lucky possessor. So they would have Mr. Greeley stop the distribution of his portrait. To this modest demand we have been daily expecting a reply from Mr. Greeley in the columns of his organ. As yet he has made none; but that this is not because there is no sufficient reply to be made we have already shown, and we have looked at the absurdity of it from but a single point of view.

Whether it is right or wrong to employ for political purposes this natural endowment, "the student of the historic page," as Mr. Everett and some others call him, will, at any rate, think it almost impossible to overestimate its political value. The books of the Hebrew prophet show him how the personal advantages of a young profligate drew the hearts of the men of Israel away from the man after God's own heart; the newspaper of the day before yesterday tells him of a coachman made husband to a queen of bluest blood. And, between the days of Absalom and the days of the Duke de Rianzanares, what ready reckoner will count up for the student before mentioned the names which are to be put in the same list of men whom their hair or their legs or their faces or their stature has made changers of dynasties and arbiters of the fate of nations? He will read of the marvellous face of Alcibiades, which beguiled the soul of the wisest of the heathens and took captive Tissaphernes the barbarian no less than Socrates; which charmed all Athens first and then charmed all Sparta and enslaved Thrace, taking away the glory of "the face that launched a thousand ships;" he will read of Sulla, of whom the Chalcidian soothsayer, observing attentively the turn of his form, the motions of his body, and the beauty of his aspect, predicted that he must infallibly one day be the greatest of men; and not only among the chosen people, among the austere Romans, among the intellectual Greeks, will he find these men whose faces have been their fortunes, but in the annals of all ages and of every realm, from the smallest island in the Pacific to the wide empire of Trajan, and from the Cornewaile of romance to the Scotland of fact. So it has been since the oldest times, when might was right, and human nature was reddest in tooth and claw; so it will be when this age of photographs and illustrated newspapers with portraits of "self-made men" has long given place to the coming age when the fairer half of creation shall pass judgment on the claims of rival candidates for Congress. Mr. Greeley is as amply justified by the testimony of history as by the voice of his favorite science.

And speaking of the coming age of female suffrage, of course it becomes a question—too interesting, alas! to most of us—whether, when the days of prediction are actually upon us, the female estimate of manly beauty will vary sensibly from the standard which is now set up; and if so, how it will vary. That it will change is a thing to be expected; when and how no man can tell. If we take as indices of the present drift of female opinion on this point the words of the women who may be presumed authorized to speak for the sex, we all know how fatal to Mr. Greeley's claims would be the conclusions to which we should be compelled. The ideal of the female novelists for a number of years has been a short man with a dark complexion—and, by the way, a man with a light complexion does not take so well in a photograph as we could wish—with deep-set eyes, blazing sometimes like carbuncles, and at other times reminding one of the tremulous lustre of the star of evening. Then, too, the hero has a voice of great strength and compass, now like the clarion, now like the clarionet. As the special correspondents say, he is "grave of feature, corrugated of brow, indomitable of chin, resolute and sagacious of nose;" one of his legs is a trifle shorter than the other, though you would hardly observe it when he walks; he has a good deal of hard muscle on his jaws; he has an arm like Heenan's, and a hand like Maud's, and a chest like two soldiers on parade, or thirteen inches from breast to back; his lips writhe like earth-worms under the flowers of sulphur of his rhetoric, and set like a vice when he locks the door and relates to the young woman the story of his life; his complexion is pallid; the chances are that he has double teeth all round. The hero is not solicitous to follow the fashions in his dress; indeed, he might, without shocking our notions of verisimilitude, be depicted stealing into an alley-way for the purpose of tucking one leg of his trousers into the leg of one of his boots and mashing in his hat with his fist; for we must say that as we read about him the fair writers leave on our mind the impression that he is the least bit in the world of a humbug. There he is, however; and unless we do wrong to think that female novelists, who are women writing mainly for women, do not know what women like, we are afraid Mr. Greeley and none of the rest of us who are his "even Christian" in the matter of beauty, or who, without being just that, are of the same general type of beauty, can hope to do much in the political way after the ballot-box is open for the votes of the sex.

To be sure the tide may turn completely, though we confess we do not see that if it does there is much more hope for Mr. Greeley and for most leading politicians than there will be if it runs as now. Certainly we have no desire to see the old types of heroes coming into fashion again. Few of us can wear a Spanish mantle any more than Mr. Greeley, or, for that matter, the editors of The Times and The Republican; few of us have curly hair or clustering hair or rolling eyes or drooping moustaches. Thaddeus of Warsaw would beat us out and out for a senatorship or the presidency. Nor, on the other hand, have many of us chestnut-brown hair falling to our waist, which we wear without powder, nor cheeks blended of the lily and the rose on which the down of youthful manhood is just beginning to appear. When women vote we drop our aspirations. In that day how shall he run for the White House who wears overshoes and a bad hat and has the asthma slightly and carries an umbrella? Old stagers may then as well consider themselves razed from the book of honors, and look on photographs as a vain expense.

HOW SHALL WE SPELL?

NO. III.

WE have established, as we think, in our former articles the true reason why we adhere so stoutly to our present modes of spelling, showing that it is a pure and simple conservatism which by no means founds itself upon useful principles, historical or other, but only in certain cases hides itself behind them. We may next enquire what reasons we have for finding fault with this conservatism and its results, and for wishing and attempting to overthrow them.

In the first place, English orthography violates the true ideal of the re lation of written language to spoken, and of an alphabetic mode of writing. To those who have never looked into the subject it may seem that a phonetic spelling, giving one sign to every sound and one sound to every sign, is a rude and simple device which an enlightened ingenuity might well enough be tempted to enrich and adorn by mixing it with elements of higher significance. But the student of language knows that the case is far otherwise; that an alphabet is the final result of centuries, even ages, of education and practice in the use of written characters. As a historical fact, writing began not with representing spoken language, but with trying to do over again what language does—to put occurrences and ideas directly before the mind by intelligible symbols. Only later, and by an indirect process, were men brought to see that, having already produced one system of means, namely, words, for bodying forth thought and knowledge, it was needless to devise another and independent one for the same purpose; that their written tongue might best undertake simply to place before the eye their spoken tongue. The great step toward the perfection of writing was taken when it was fully subordinated to speech, and made to represent the names of things instead of things themselves. But even this only brought it out of the purely pictorial into a hieroglyphic stage, where it long continued, awkward and unmanageable; and another difficult and protracted process of development was necessary, in order to impart to it a phonetic character, so that it should signify words no longer by simple indivisible symbols, but by characters representing sounds. Our best illustration of the whole history is furnished in the Egyptian monuments, where we see signs of every kind—purely didactic pictures, figures of objects representing those objects themselves, other figures standing for the names of the objects they depict; others, for some part, as the consonants of those names; others, at last, as single letters for the initial sound of their names—all mingled together and exchanging with one another, making up a system of writing not less inconsistent than the English and infinitely more intricate and troublesome. The Egyptians were too conservative to seize upon the one practically valuable principle which their system contained, and carry it out consistently, casting aside its inherited encumbrances. But what they could not do was within the power of another people. Every one knows that our own alphabet goes back, through the Latin and Greek, to the Phenician; and it is at least exceedingly probable, though far from admitting of demonstration, that the Phenicians learned to write of the Egyptians. Either of the Egyptian or of some other analogous history of alphabetic development the Phenicians inherited the results, and their alphabet was a simple scheme of twenty-two characters, the names of which (aleph, "bull," beth, "house," etc.; whence the Greek alpha, beta, etc.) began respectively with the sound which each represented. Yet this system, while it discarded everything but the purely phonetic part of the Egyptian, was no complete phonetic alphabet; it wrote the consonants alone, leaving the vowels to be supplied by the reader. It received its full perfection only upon passing into the keeping of the Greeks; they converted some of its superfluous characters into vowel-signs, added others, and produced at last an instrumentality which could and did set faithfully before the sight the whole structure of spoken speech. Among all the alphabets of the world, ancient and modern, there are few, excepting the Greek and its derivatives, which have attained this completeness, to which there does not cleave some taint of a pictorial or a syllabic character.

The Latin alphabet, taken from the Greek, fully accepted and carried out the phonetic principle, rejecting some of the Greek signs and devising new, so as to make an exact adaptation of its modes of writing to its modes of utterance. Nor have its descendants, in their turn, meant to do otherwise. But it is very difficult to maintain the principle in perfect purity, because the spoken forms of words change more insidiously than the written; all tongues which have had a long written history have become more or less "historic" in their spelling, change of orthography lagging ever behind the heels of change of pronunciation. And peculiarly unfavorable circumstances, which in no small part can be distinctly pointed out, have suffered to grow up a greater discordance between the written and the spoken speech among us than in any other community of equal enlightenment. This is the whole truth, and any attempt to make it appear otherwise savors only of the wisdom of the noted fox who lost his brush in a trap, and wanted to persuade himself and the world that the curtailment was a benefit and a decoration. Every departure from the rule that writing is the handmaid of speech is a dereliction of principle, and an abandonment of advantages which seemed to have been long ago assured to us by the protracted labors of many generations of the most gifted races known to history. The handmaid has no right to set up to be wiser and better than her mistress in a single particular. That the written word in any case deviates from the spoken is a fault which may, indeed, admit of palliation, even amounting to excuse, but which it is an offence against all true science and sound sense to extol as a merit.

We have, of course, no intention of bringing forward the unfaithfulness of our orthography to the highest ideal of a mode of writing as a sufficient reason for an orthographic revolution. A grand practical question, which touches so nearly the interests of so many millions of writers and speakers, is not to be settled by sentimental considerations—by this which we have adduced upon the one side, any more than, upon the other, by the gratification of the small class of curious heads who may delight themselves with seeing Greek and Latin and Old English utterances dimly reflected in our modern spelling. But it was desirable, and even necessary, to draw out the exposition, in order to show that the phonetists have the advantage upon their side, not less in regard to the principle involved in the cause they are defending than in regard to the convenience and enlightenment of the historical student of language.

It is upon practical grounds that our final judgment of the value of English orthography must mainly rest. The written language is a universal possession, an instrument of communication for the whole immense community of English speakers, and anything which impairs its convenience and manageableness as an instrument is such a defect as demands active measures for removal. Now, no one can question that the practical use of our tongue is rendered more difficult by the anomalies of its written form. We do not, indeed, easily realize how much of the learning time of each rising generation is taken up with mastering orthographical intricacies; how much harder it is for us to learn to read at all, and to read and write readily and correctly, than it would be if we wrote as we speak. We accomplished the task so long ago, most of us, that we have forgotten its severity, and decline to see any reason why others should ask to be relieved from it. Teachers, however, know what it is, as do those who for want of a sufficiently severe early drilling, or from defect of native capacity, continue all their lives to be inaccurate spellers. Such may fairly plead that their orthographical sins are to be imputed, in great part, not to themselves but to the community which has established and sustains an institution so unnecessarily cumbrous. We may see yet more clearly the nature of the burden it imposes by considering what it is to foreigners. Our language, from the simplicity of its grammatical structure, would be one of the easiest in the world to learn if it were not loaded with its anomalous orthography. As the matter stands, a stranger may acquire the spoken tongue by training of mouth and ear, or the written by help of grammar and dictionary, and in either case the other tongue will be nearly as strange to him as if it belonged to an unknown race. It is doubtless within bounds to say that the difficulty of his task is thus doubled. And this item must count for not a little in determining the currency which the English shall win as a world-language—a destiny for which it seems more decidedly marked out than any other cultivated speech. In view of what we expect and wish it to become, we have hardly the right to hand it down to posterity with such a millstone about its neck as its present orthography.

It is, moreover, to be noted that a phonetic spelling, far from contributing, as its enemies claim, to the alteration and decay of the language, would exercise an appreciable conserving influence, and make for uniformity and fixedness of pronunciation. So loose and indefinite is now the tie between writing and utterance, that existing differences of utterance hide themselves under cover of an orthography which fits them all equally well, while others spring up unchecked. No small part of the conservative force expends itself upon the visible form alone, whereas if the visible and audible form were more strictly accordant, it would have its effect upon the latter also. The establishment of a phonetic orthography would imply the establishment and maintenance of a single authoritative and intelligible standard of pronunciation, the removal of the more marked differences of usage between the cultivated speakers of different localities, and the reduction of those of less account; and it would hold in check—though nothing can wholly restrain—those slow and insidious changes which creep unawares into the utterance of every tongue.

One thing more is worthy of at least a brief reference, namely, that a consistent spelling would awaken and educate the phonetic sense of the community. As things are now, the English speaker comes to the study of a foreign written language, and to the examination of phonetic questions generally, at a disadvantage when compared with those to whom other tongues are native. He has been accustomed to regard it as only natural and proper that any given sound should be written in a variety of different ways, that any given sign should possess a number of different values; and it requires a special education to give him an inkling of the truth that every letter of our alphabet had originally, and still preserves in the main, outside of his own language, a single unvarying sound. His ideas of the relations of the vowels are hopelessly awry; he sees nothing strange in the designation of the vowel sounds of pin and pine, or of pat and pate, or of pun and pure, as corresponding short and long, although we might as well assert that dog and cat, or that sun and moon, are corresponding male and female. And he reads off his Latin and Greek in tones that would have driven frantic any Roman or Athenian who suspected it to be his own tongue that was so murdered, with unsuspecting complacency, even flattering himself that he appreciates their rhythm and melody. It is not the least telling of the indications he furnishes of a sense for the fitness of things debauched by a vicious training that he is capable of regarding a historical spelling as preferable to a phonetic—that is to say, of thinking it better to write our words as we imagine that some one else pronounced them a long time ago than as we pronounce them ourselves. A thoroughly consistent spelling would be a far more valuable means of philological education than such a one as we now follow, were the latter twice as full as it is of etymological suggestiveness.

We are, then, clearly of opinion that a phonetic orthography is, of itself, in all respects desirable, and that there is no good reason against introducing it save the inconvenience of so great a change. Every theoretical and practical consideration makes in its favor. At the same time, our hope of a reform is exceedingly faint. No reform is possible until the community at large—or at least the greater body of the learned and highly educated—shall see clearly that the advantage to be gained by it is worth the trouble it will entail; and whether and when they will be brought to do so is very doubtful. At present the public mind is in a most unnaturally sensitive condition upon the subject; it will listen to no suggestion of a change from any quarter in any word or class of words. The great need now is to enlighten it, to show that its action is the result of a blind prejudice alone, and really founded on none of the reasons which are alleged in its support; that there is nothing sacred in the written word, that language is speech, not spelling, and that practical convenience is the only true test of the value of an orthographic system. Until this work is accomplished all reformers will be likely to meet the fate of Noah Webster, one of the best-abused men of his generation, and for one of the most creditable of his deeds, the attempt to amend in a few particulars our English spelling—an attempt for which (however fragmentary it may have been, and ill-judged in some of its parts) we ourselves feel inclined to forgive him many of his false etymologies and defective definitions. We have read in the story-books that a certain Prince Nosey was condemned by a malevolent fairy to wear a portentously long nose until he should himself become convinced that it was too long, which salutary but unpalatable truth was kept indefinitely concealed from him by the flattery of his courtiers. The English-speaking people are in somewhat the same case; and though fairy days are now over, and we can no longer hope that our superfluous nasal inches will drop off the moment we recognize their superfluity, we know that at any rate we shall not lose them sooner because we shall not sooner be willing to set about the work of ridding ourselves of them. Of course our words would look very oddly to us now in a phonetic dress, but that is merely because we are used to them in another. So our friends the ladies, if they should suddenly appear before our sight in the head-gear which they are going to wear year after next, would shock us and provoke the cut direct; yet we shall by that time be looking back to the bonnets of this season as the height of absurdity. If once brought to the adoption of a consistent orthography, we should soon begin to regard with aversion our present idiographs and historiographs, and wonder that we could ever have preferred, or even tolerated them. It is easy now to raise a general laugh against the man who writes news "nuz;" but so the Englishman can count upon an admiring and sympathizing audience among his own countrymen when he turns against the Frenchman that crushing question, "What can you think of aman who calls a hat a 'shappo'?"—and the appeal is really to the same narrow prejudice and vulgar ignorance in the one case as in the other.

The future is a very long period, and a great deal is possible in the course of it. There is no telling, spite of present appearances, that the public temper may not come to admit, some time, the introduction of improvements of one kind and another into our orthography, which shall prepare the way for a more thorough reform. Meanwhile we look with interest and respect upon the effort of every one who is laboring toward that end, since however little he may seem to accomplish, he is at least contributing his mite toward the arousing of public attention to the subject, and helping perhaps to inaugurate a change of feeling.

Respecting the farther difficulties—many and serious, and only partially apprehended by the greater part of those who undertake the making of phonetic systems—which beset the labors of the orthographic reformer, and render his success doubtful, even supposing the preliminary obstacle of which we have been treating to be cleared away, we have left ourselves no room to speak, nor is this, perhaps, the proper place to discuss them.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, May 17, 1867.

THE most amusing, if not the most important, event of the last fortnight has been the Reform meeting in Hyde Park. When I last wrote to you it was expected not without anxiety. Ominous paragraphs were appearing in the newspapers. The police, it was said, were being assembled in force. Troops were being massed in London. Nay, there were mysterious hints at Armstrong guns and grapeshot, as though we had been on the verge of another French revolution. This excitement was partly due to the extremely unsatisfactory tone taken by the Government in the House of Commons. Mr. Walpole is member for Cambridge University, and is the very ideal of what a university member should be; that is to say, he is an absolute incarnation of respectability, a model of deportment, and a man of naturally commanding presence. He spoke with such solemnity, and at the same time with such vagueness, that only three points seemed to be clear; first, that the Government apprehended considerable danger; secondly, that they meant to do something very awful; and, thirdly, that they did not quite know what the awful thing was to be. The terrible Monday morning came, and the respectable West-End population rather expected to go to bed with its throats cut. On looking at The Times its fears were dissipated. Mr. Walpole had found out—nay, had known all along, but had at last announced—that he had no legal right whatever to stop the meeting. All his pomposities had been mere vague bluster, just as in England old-fashioned people sometimes put up a notice to trespassers that spring-guns are set on their premises, though spring-guns are a legend of the past. It was, in short, a game of brag between Mr. Walpole and the Reform League, and the Reform League won. The prohibition being thus removed, the meeting lost all its spice. It was not to be suppressed, and nobody much cared to go. However, it was a fine evening, and forty or fifty thousand persons collected and listened in perfect good humor to a little stump-speaking, whilst the ragged edges of the crowd amused themselves partly by chaffing a special constable or two, and partly, also, by affording occupation for some strolling card-sharpers, and chiefly in simple "loafing" and enjoyment of the summer weather. Next day Mr. Walpole resigned his office, entirely on account of his health. In fact, as Mr. Disraeli carefully explained, he had wished to resign for the same reason two months ago. It is a pity he did n't!

The artificial excitement caused by the extreme folly of the Government has completely died away; and I must say that, in spite of public meetings and writing in newspapers, I do not think that Reform anywhere excites a very strong feeling. This is partly due to the confused nature of the issues now before the House of Commons. Mr. Disraeli's tactics have met with a success which, I confess, has surprised me, but which is much more creditable to his ingenuity than to the sincerity of any part of the House. To the Tory party, he says, I offer household suffrage in name, but I fence it round with so many safeguards that it will be practically innocuous, and we shall thus steal a march upon professed reformers. To the Radicals, he says, the safeguards I offer are really so small that for practical purposes you will have household suffrage. The Tories follow because Tories are good at following, of which, perhaps, the ultimate cause is that assigned by Mr. Mill, namely, that Tories are stupid. Radicals follow because they hope that even if Mr. Disraeli's restrictions are carried, they will work too badly to stand; and thus that Mr. Disraeli will have outwitted himself. And, finally, Mr. Disraeli has one argument far more convincing than any other with the half-hearted of all sides. If you do n't vote for me, he says, I will dissolve. Now, a dissolution means that every member will have to meet another election; or, in other words, to spend sums varying from some hundreds up to many thousands of pounds. And this argument generally clinches the discussion. The moderate Liberals who wish for an open and above-board extension of the franchise, but not so far as household suffrage, are more perplexed than any party, for Mr. Disraeli has fairly taken the wind out of their sails. The chances still are that the bill will pass; but no human being can say, until the new registration of voters, what its operation will be, nor whether we shall have really made a large stride or merely stepped forward with one leg and back with the other.

Meanwhile the Liberal party has been to a large extent demoralized. Mr. Gladstone, however, has apparently recovered his self-command, and has shown several symptoms of taking a more decided liberal course than heretofore. His weak point has always been his disposition towards High

Church views, which are naturally associated with Toryism in politics. He has, however, this session gone against church-rates, in favor of the opening of the universities to all sects, and has lately pronounced strongly against that iniquitous institution, the Established Church in Ireland. After a long sleep, this question, which excited violent debates after the first Reform bill, seems to be again awakening, and a very lively discussion took place upon it the other day. The state support of a religion which is in a trifling minority is, of course, totally impossible on any rational grounds, and Mr. Gladstone put the obvious arguments against it with his usual logical force. The main reason for its continued support, beyond the fatality which seems to beset all our Irish legislation, consists in the sense that there is a much larger question in the background. The Irish Church is a kind of outpost or bulwark of the Church of England. No one can doubt that an effective measure of reform in one case would increase the party—at present a very small one—which is hostile to the Establishment in the other; and symptoms are not wanting which show that we may before long have a more vigorous contest than has hitherto been waged as to the rights and position of the English Church. Thus Lord Shaftesbury brought forward a measure in the House of Lords the other night which indicates the rapid growth of a very dangerous element. He proposed some legislation with the view of restricting the garments—I beg their pardon, vestments—at present used by the English clergy. It was decided very properly that it would be better to wait until a commission should have settled what was the present state of the law. At first sight there is something childish in a solemn parliamentary debate as to whether a clergyman may wear a green robe or a white one—a lively discussion upon matters which might be better left to a milliner. Still the ritualistic movement has really become of very serious importance. It is said that there are two thousand churches in England which have lighted candles flaming upon their "altars" instead of unlighted candles standing on their communion-tables; and a flaming candle is equivalent in Protestant eyes to the mark of the beast. A book has been published called the "Directorium Anglicanum," which has the highest authority among the party. It contains such regulations as these: That the priest is never to take the chalice at one draught, lest by reason of the impetus he should unintentionally cough; that before "mass" he is not to wash his mouth or teeth, but only his lips, with his mouth shut, lest the taste of water should be intermingled with his saliva; that, as it puts it, "if a fly or a spider should fall into the chalice after consecration, it should be warily taken out, ofttimes diligently washed between the fingers, and then burned, and the ablution and ashes must be preserved near the altar." Again, we are informed that "if any one by accident should vomit up the Eucharist, the vomit is to be burned, and the ashes preserved near the altar. And if he be clerical or monk or deacon, he must do penance forty days; if a bishop, seventy days; if a layman, thirty days." Now, in one sense, this tomfoolery is certainly beneath contempt. In another, as implying an approximation to the Romish theory of sacerdotalism, it is more serious. In any case, if the gentlemen who play at it want the real thing, they ought to go to Rome, and the sooner they get there, the better for their own consciences and the reputation of Englishmen for common sense; and, as far as they are concerned, there is little else to be said except that a man in a transition state between two extremes generally occupies a very ridiculous position. Unluckily, these ritualists play their antics in parish churches. In London it matters little. People who like what their supporters call æsthetic services, and their opponents religious pantomimes, may, of course, go to their churches, and those who dislike them may go elsewhere. But in the country, where the parish church is the only provision for religious services, the case is very different. If there is anything fixed in the heart of the middle-class Englishman it is his Protestantism; the higher classes have of late years shown a decided tendency in other directions; the strong-minded are almost universally more or less sceptical, and the weaker vessels show a hankering after the refinement and "repose" of Rome or semi-Romish creeds. But the true British tradesman or farmer is a dogged Protestant; he hates the Pope and things savoring of Popery; his chief intellectual enjoyment is listening to a good Low Church sermon, and Mr. Spurgeon is the orator who most precisely corresponds to his taste. In country districts it is very common for the people to go to the church in the morning because it is respectable, and because the squire and the parson go there and consider that the regular attendants have a certain claim upon their liberality and patronage; in the afternoon the same people go to the Wesleyan or Independent chapel because they really like it. It is, indeed, their only approach to intellectual employment during the week. In many parts of the country—in Wales, for example, and in the eastern counties—dissent is undoubtedly the favorite creed of the great mass, although they may nominally, and for the purposes of respectability, be Churchmen. Consequently there is a large body of the population which hangs, so to speak, loosely upon the Church, and might always, by a little extra pressure, be driven into the opposite camp. Ritualism seems to be going some way towards supplying this pressure; it is alienating a considerable body of laymen more decidedly than before from the Establishment, and giving an additional lever to those who object to the union between church and state. The Wesleyan Methodists, for example, have always been on friendly terms with the Church, and have co-operated with a large party within it, but they are beginning to doubt whether it is not, after all, a mere "rag of Popery." That these feelings will produce any tangible result or cause any serious legislation is highly improbable. It has always been a condition of the very existence of the Church of England that it should embrace as many extremes as possible; if one party were excluded, the result would simply be an addition to the number of external enemies, under which the position of the Establishment would become precarious. I only wish to point out that the process of keeping the extremes together is daily involving more difficult tinkering. To ride six horses at once is always a difficult feat, and when the outsiders begin resolutely to diverge there is a chance that some one will get a fall.

CRETE.

Canea, Crete, April 23, 1867.

Affairs here drift slowly. Omar Pasha has gone out with a large army, uniting in several attacks 16,000 men and 12 guns. His declared policy is one of extermination for all armed resistance, but the Cretans have replied only by rising en masse and assuming the offensive. Even the women of Sphakia are arming, and the people are blocking all the roads and in every possible way destroying the communications.

Omar Pasha has and deserves a high reputation as a soldier, but he is an old man now, and he comes to a country where strategy is difficult and tactics impossible, where he must take to bush-fighting and rock-scaling, and his suite do not seem very confident of success.*

I must confess that he made on me a most favorable impression, and seemed a man strongly to attach his subordinates to him. Rigorous and hard in discipline, and quite awake to the necessity of observing the laws of civilized warfare, he will exhaust the offensive means of his Government, and at the same time spare us the horrors the Albanian administration of Mustapha Pasha introduced here. Already the country within the lines begins to show a degree of security and quiet that it has not had for a long time. Irregularities are promptly put down, and with the exception of having hundreds of rough Mussulmans, into whose hands rifled muskets are put for the first time, banging away like boys on Fourth of July all over the country, ignorant of range or penetration, we are in a measure assured of tranquillity and safety. The Pasha assured us that in a month he would have things in a way of settlement, but others who have seen him since say that he is not so confident now; and one distinguished member of his staff openly expressed to the commandant of a foreign man-of-war his doubt of accomplishing anything decisive. The Cretans feel that the Porte is playing its last card, and they have only to trump it and the war is over. This will make fighting obstinate, and we may expect to hear of the heaviest carnage yet known in the island. The army, once 46,000 men, now is, with reinforcements of three or four thousand, not much above 20,000. The Cretans are estimated at 40,000 in all the island.

---

* This is the only kind of fighting of which Omar Pasha has had any experience. His really active service has been against the Bosnians and Montenegrins. On the Danube he did nothing except wait.

VISION AND VAPORS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

When good fortune vouchsafes to the veteran editor of The Tribune a clear glimpse of men and things as they are, through some rift in the vaporous whims that encompass him, his vision seems to be excellent. For example, in his issue of the 28th inst. is an editorial classification of the several grades of loyalty and disloyalty in the South which is certainly discriminating as a qualitative if necessarily imperfect as a quantitative analysis. The editor distributes the population of the late rebel States into five classes, thus: "1, White Unionists who never faltered. 2, Black ditto. 3, Original Unionists who became rebels. 4, Original Secessionists now loyal.

5, Implacable rebels." His estimate of the number of people represented by each class is appended to each. The figures I omit as not possessing special value, and as irrelevant to the point I have in mind. That point is the singular relation subsisting between the editor's comments on class No. 5 and his pet whim of "Universal amnesty and impartial suffrage." Of the "implacable rebels"—whereof he assumes the existence of 2,000,000—he talks after this vigorous fashion :

> "This body of malignants are as ready to-day to burn negro school-houses, insult the female teachers therein, and assault negro camp-meetings as they ever were. They are the instigators of New Orleans massacres and Mobile riots. The country can have no solid peace till they are suppressed or driven out. They cannot be won over to loyalty, no matter by what means ; but they may be isolated, and so exposed to discipline or reduced to insignificance."

To unanointed eyes, unilluminated by any other than the light of average common sense, it is difficult to see how "universal amnesty" is going to accomplish these tolerably radical preliminaries to a "solid peace"—or any one of them. How will it placate the implacable? How will it suppress, drive out, isolate, or expose to discipline the aforesaid body of malignants?. And how does Mr. Greeley manage to hold in one brain, albeit a large one, such comical diversities of sentiment, such an incongruous jumble of opposites, and yet preserve that "innocent expression of face" that some writer talks about? Seasonable New Books.

TO BE PUBLISHED EARLY IN JUNE.

I.

A RUSSIAN NOVEL—FATHERS AND SONS. Translated from the Russian of Ivan Serghcievitch Turgenef. By EUGENE SCHUYLER, Ph.D. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

The publishers would state that this work has been issued upon its literary merits without regard to the fact of its being, in some sense, a "curiosity." Purely as a novel, they believe it fit to rank with the best productions of our time. As a picture of Russian life and institutions it, of course, possesses more value than any work yet published in America.

II.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from the New York NATION. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Some of the most valuable and successful books recently issued in England have consisted of essays reprinted from the high-toned critical and literary weekly newspapers which have hitherto been almost peculiar to that country. The publishers present this volume, composed from an American journal which the first scholars of the country have thought worthy to rank with The Spectator, The Examiner, and The Saturday Review, in the full assurance that it will obtain, as it deserves, equal favor and equal permanence with the English reprints of the same description. THE NATION'S staff of contributors embraces so many distinguished names in our literature, that a dull or worthless collection could scarcely be made from the files of the paper.

III.

THE MAN WITH THE BROKEN EAR. Translated from the French of Edmond About. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

One of those peculiar novels, based on scientific theories, in which M. About has been distinctively successful. The chief feature of the book is a very humorous though philosophical illustration of the fact, that when a man dies he will be apt to find it more comfortable to remain dead than to return to life fifty years after his demise. The speculation in natural science on which the story is founded is more interesting in itself, more elaborately developed, and more entertaining in its supposed consequences, than any other of M. About's books. Another equally interesting feature is a humorous contrast of the spirit of the Napoleonic era with that of the present age. The whole book is written in M. About's best vein.

UNION LEAGUE HOUSE,
May 15, 1867.

AT a meeting of the Board of Directors of the UNION LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA, held March 12, 1867, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted :

Whereas, In a republican form of government it is of the highest importance that the delegates of the people, to whom the sovereign power is entrusted, should be so selected as to truly represent the body politic ; and there being no provision of law whereby the people may be organized for the purpose of such selection, and all parties having recognized the necessity of such organization by the formation of voluntary associations for this purpose; and

Whereas, There are grave defects existing under the present system of voluntary organization which it is believed may be corrected by suitable provisions of law; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Board of Directors of the UNION LEAGUE OF PHILADELPHIA, That the Secretary be and is hereby directed to offer eleven hundred dollars in prizes for essays on the legal organization of the people to select candidates for office, the prizes to be as follows, viz.:

The sum of five hundred dollars for that essay which, in the judgment of the Board, shall be first in the order of merit;

Three hundred dollars for the second ;

Two hundred for the third ; and

One hundred for the fourth.

The conditions upon which these prizes are offered are as follows, viz. :

First. All essays competing for these prizes must be addressed to GEORGE H. BOKER, Secretary of the Union League of Philadelphia, and must be received by him before the 1st day of January, 1868; and no communication having the author's name attached, or with any other indication of origin, will be considered.

Second. Accompanying every competing essay, the author must enclose his name and address within a sealed envelope, addressed to the Secretary of the Union League. After the awards have been made, the envelopes accompanying the enccessful essays shall be opened, and the authors notified of the result.

Third. All competing essays shall become the property of the Union League; but no publication of rejected essays, or the names of their authors, shall be made without consent of the authors in writing.

By order of the Board of Directors.

GEO. H. BOKER,
Secretary.

I.

NEIGHBORS' WIVES.

By J. T. TROWBRIDGE, author of "Neighbor Jackwood," etc. 1 vol. 12mo, $1 50.

"The story is marked by droll humor, sharp delineation of character, and sppreciation of moral principle. The characters are drawn in ench a manner as to exhibit the strong and weak points of human nature in striking contrast. Noble characters, equal to great sacrifices, are set off by specimens of the weakest and meanest of mankind. Thrown in to relieve the sober shades of the picture are creations in the pleasantest vein of the author, and whose funny traits are very amusing."—Boston Journal.

II.

ON THE BORDER.

By EDMUND KIRKE, author of "Among the Pines," etc. 12mo, $1 75.

"On the Border, by Edmund Kirke, is the title of a very taking war romance by one of the most interesting writers of the day. Kirke always 'carries his eyes with him,' sees for himself, and draws his own conclusions from his own facts. He feels like a patriot and writes like a man. He is an original thinker."—Albany Post.

III.

STEPHEN DANE.

By MISS DOUGLAS, author of "In Trust; or Dr. Bertrand's Household." 12mo, $1 50.

"Miss Douglas's stories have not been long known to the reading public, yet the reputation which the author has gained is already an enviable one."—Portland Press.

"The characters are drawn with much power, and the story is an interesting one."—Boston Advertiser.

The Week.

THE President returned to Washington on Saturday after a short, and perhaps dull, but perfectly inoffensive tour. He has not said a word in public during the whole of it that was not perfectly harmless. If he could only have shown similar self-restraint last summer, he would stand higher not only as a statesman but as a rhetorician than he does now. His speeches on the way to the tomb of his lamented father were not very finished specimens of oratory, nor yet very full of thought, but they far surpass anything we had the pleasure of hearing from him at the North a year ago.

GOVERNOR WELLS having declined to comply with General Sheridan's request to vacate his office, was informed by the latter that he would, if necessary, be expelled "by force," whereupon the governor, to use his own eloquent and expressive language, "surrendered to the sword"—this being a figurative and gubernatorial way of saying that he surrendered in order to save Brigadier-General Forsyth the necessity of taking him by the collar of an ordinary black broadcloth coat, and dragging him out of the governor's room. General Sheridan has written a letter to Secretary Stanton, justifying his action and giving an account of Mr. Wells's official career which is anything but flattering. As we have said before, we think the country will heartily approve of General Sheridan's course, and will readily believe his account of any Louisiana politician. The only question was whether the Government at Washington would feel justified in sustaining what at first appeared to be the removal of an officer simply for having appealed from the military commander's decision; but General Sheridan now explains that Mr. Wells's deposition has been due to his general character and that of his administration. We believe it is the testimony of every honest man who has set foot in New Orleans—since General Butler left it, at least—that a more corrupt, self-seeking set than many of the leading Unionist politicians of that city there does not exist, and worse record of knavery than a strict investigation of the affairs of the First National Bank would reveal it would be hard to find, as it was through this establishment that they carried on their operations. That an honest soldier like Sheridan should have at last got his hand on them, as well as on their rebel neighbors, and should as thoroughly understand their character, will give hearty satisfaction to everybody who believes, as we do, that no political opinions, however "sound," can make knaves and charlatans anything but a curse to the community.

WENDELL PHILLIPS has paid his respects to Horace Greeley on the subject of Jefferson Davis's release, and the charge of inconsistency brought against himself, in a letter which, though plausible, could not bear the test of dates, as Mr. Greeley convincingly showed in his rejoinder. "T. W." has of late shown such languor in debate that we were beginning to fear "H. G." was about to have the field in which he has achieved so many triumphs all to himself, when Mr. Phillips appeared on the scene, and at once closed with the Champion. "May the best man win!" as they say in the P.R. In Mr. Phillips's letter, which appears in The Anti-Slavery Standard, he maintains that Davis deserved hanging if Wirz did, which is certainly true. Mr. Phillips's doctrine about trial by jury is, however, novel. He says "he would no more honor Davis with a jury trial than he would an adder," from which it appears that trial by jury is a kind of privilege intended for good men, or at all events only for the slightly bad. For the very wicked, we presume, courts-martial are good enough—a theory which reminds us of the story of the Irish priest, who, complaining of the bad behavior of his flock, whom he had scolded in vain, and being advised to try the Gospel upon them, replied scornfully that "he was n't going to waste the Gospel on the likes o' them."

ACCORDING to all accounts that we get, Judge Busteed's behavior on the bench (we say nothing of his behavior when not on the bench) is perfectly adapted to make the judicious grieve and the vulgar laugh, and both with excellent reason. His latest and most widely notorious performance is in the epistolary way. A correspondence between him and an ex-Governor Watts, who practises in his court, is published in the Alabama papers, in which the judge of the United States District Court of the Southern District of Alabama lies down while Mr. Watts puts his foot on his neck, to the great delight of all citizens of Alabama, as well those who are as those who are not fond of the United States Government. Judge Busteed had addressed rude and insulting language to Mr. Watts during the trial of a case in which the latter was of counsel, whereupon Watts withdrew from the court-room. That the judge's manner is habitually insulting and farcically consequential does not rest on the testimony of Mr. Watts alone. People go to his court-room for the amusement of watching his behavior. On the morning after Watts's withdrawal the judge sent him a note, which begins with "My dear Watts," informing the lawyer that "your usually genial manners and your professional learning make your companionship very desirable," and requesting him to revoke his intention of giving up his practice in the District Court. Mr. Watts replied in a note that would have been excellent but for a bit of brag—which, however, he could hardly help; they are born so in those places—to the effect that "it would ill comport with the candor and sincerity of my nature," etc., etc. Judge Busteed will never forgive him for the neat snubs in it, which are severe enough, one would think, even for Busteed.

We have a good deal to say about the competitive plans for the new post-office in this city which have been on exhibition for some days, but are prevented saying it this week for want of space. One expression of opinion, however, it will not do to delay, and that is that all but two or three of the plans are wretchedly poor, and that the award is likely to prove a complete farce. Nominally, the commissioners are kept in ignorance of the names of the competitors; in reality, they know them as well as the owners know them. During the exhibition the canvassing for the different candidates was going on as loudly as if the room were the lobby of a caucus, and in fact a very large number of the worthy citizens who have attended the exhibition have no more idea of its being a trial of simple merit than of its being a rowing match. It is to be hoped that even if the award is made, the Government will not allow any action to be taken under it, as the whole affair has been and is likely to be very discreditable to the city and to the country at large. None, or next to none, of the leading architects have sent in designs.

Mr. Greeley's "upright jurist," Judge Underwood, of the Virginia District, lately, while sitting in admiralty, convicted a man of treason without a jury, and decreed the confiscation of his property. This sounds like a joke, but so did the judge's "charge" to the grand jury a month ago; but it is literal truth. The Supreme Court reversed the decision with appropriate comments. We have tried in vain to think of an illustration that will make the absurdity of this performance thoroughly plain to those who know nothing of legal proceedings. The nearest we can come to a perfect illustration is the case of a rear-admiral trying a man for heresy, and putting him in irons for unsoundness on the question of the federal headship of Adam. Judge "Dick" Busteed, who, as a lawyer, is a worthy compeer of the illustrious Underwood, is apparently doing what he can to surpass him in the strangeness of his doctrine. It is not long since he charged the grand jury in Mobile that indictments might be found againt people for "ingratitude" to the Federal Government. He has since, it is alleged, done worse things than talk nonsense, and we sincerely trust that when Congress meets it will, "all business and excuses being laid aside," devise some means for relegating these two gentlemen to private life. Judge Underwood is, we believe, a worthy man, who in his present position is the victim of other people's carelessness, and could probably be induced to vacate for a consideration; but we greatly fear the Honorable Richard Busteed is impeachable; and we hope that if so, something will be done in December to bring him at once to justice. They are both a terrible disgrace to the country, and especially to the North, for they were appointed during the war.

The Chicago Tribune announces a revival of Fenianism in that city, as well as in other parts of the Northwest, and pronounces the organization to be unusually well equipped and ready for action. The Brotherhood are very anxious that no information should get abroad as to their plans, but still they have no objection to its being known in the United States that they intend shortly to invade Canada. We are able to fix the exact date of the invasion, owing to the fact that President Roberts left full particulars with the New York Tribune previous to his departure on his European tour, which that paper published for the information of American citizens exclusively. We are, therefore, not guilty of any indiscretion in mentioning that this important movement will take place in the month of August, and it is confidently anticipated that it will take the Canadians completely by surprise. "Prominent Fenians" say that it will be extraordinarily bloody.

The New York Times, defending itself against the charge of bad political economy, in objecting to Mr. Greeley's distribution of his portrait amongst the subscribers to The Tribune, invites us, as the French say, to express our opinion as to the propriety of offering two portraits—one of Jefferson Davis and the other of Horace Greeley—as an inducement to persons to subscribe to The Times. Everybody, of course, knows his own business best, and we feel some reluctance about offering any advice on a point of this sort. But we need have no delicacy about saying that, whatever influence the distribution of two such portraits would have on the circulation of The Times, to the community at large it could not but be productive of good. We recommend, however, that for the sake of the moral effect the two portraits be contained in one picture, or at least in one passe-partout, and that they be presented in the character of the American Ahriman and Ormuzd; or, if it be deemed undesirable to give them a mythological character, as the embodiments of the False, the "Ornary," and the Wily, and the True, the Beautiful, and the Confiding, respectively—the lineaments of Jefferson Davis furnishing the type of the one and those of Mr. Greeley of the other. We should anticipate the happiest results on the minds of the young from the presence of such a work of art in the parlors of the subscribers to any respectable periodical.

A "personal difficulty" of the kind that makes the South so agreeable a country for a civilized man to live in occurred last week at Natchitoches, Louisiana. The chief surviving actors in it were a couple of nephews of Governor Wells, and the fact that one of them, besides being his nephew, was by his appointment a judge of the Supreme Court of the State, will do something to reconcile many people to General Sheridan's view of Wells's character—a view, by the way, which is held to the full, whatever some politicians may pretend, by every honest Radical in the State of Louisiana. The Supreme Court judge was R. B. Jones, and of his two brothers one was a doctor and one, a lawyer we presume, is described as a partner of C. W. Stauffer. Stauffer not only quarrelled with his partner but drew down on himself the enmity of the Joneses by being a candidate, and a popular candidate, for the State Convention. In the time-honored fashion he was notified that he might leave town or be shot on sight. On Monday week Stauffer, while on his way to a justice's to have the Jones brothers bound over to keep the peace, was attacked by the judge and the doctor. He was defending himself as well as he could when John Jones came up with a double-barrelled shot-gun and killed him on the spot. The stage of civilization which Natchitoches has reached may be estimated by the fact that, having murdered his man, Jones rode round to Mrs. Stauffer's, called her to the door, and told her that he had killed her husband. He then made his way out of town, and his brothers successfully resisted an attempt made by the sheriff to arrest them, that functionary being wounded in the head and his assistant in the arm. It was not good as a political measure; it was expensive; it never was at any time systematically carried out; but so far as keeping down the native barbarism of the region and giving a man a chance to live and enjoy the fruits of his labor, we suppose the military occupation was the best form of government the Southwest has ever been under.

The present fitness of the South for maintaining the administration of justice, even apart from cases involving color or political sentiments, is shown very strongly by what happened at a principal town in North Carolina the other day. The testamentary capacity of a wealthy citizen of Chowan County, deceased, was before a jury of white men not one of whom could read or write. The trial lasted a fortnight, and very conclusive testimony was offered in behalf of the contestant by a distinguished expert in insanity, of this city. The jurors deliberated three days upon the evidence and upon the charge of the judge to find that the testator was not of sound mind, and the will in question accordingly not his last. Nevertheless, the verdict was in favor of the will. To complain that so recondite a problem as what constitutes legal insanity ought never to have been committed to such uninstructed men, is really to find fault with the institution of the jury, and the case may well afford an argument against what we are pleased to consider one of our fundamental liberties. What deserves attention is the reason that seemed to be chiefly assigned by this particular jury for their contrary decision: A man who could buy land and niggers could n't be insane! One could tell with his eyes shut that it was a "poor-white" panel.

There is little news from England. The Opposition in the House of Commons have everything their own way, and the Reform bill bids fair to be passed without containing a vestige of Mr. Disraeli's original plan. It is, however, not at all unlikely that the House of Lords may throw it out at the close of the session. This would excite intense popular agitation, and lead to great trouble during the autumn, and prudent men would therefore avoid it; but, in the matter of reform, peers are not prudent men. They are, however, getting lazier and lazier, and less and less willing to risk their ease for any object whatever.

Owing to the determined remonstrance of the English Liberals, headed by Mr. Mill, the Ministry gave way at the last moment, and consented to reprieve Burke, who alone of the Irish Fenians was marked out for execution. Burke's health is in such a condition that he does not seem likely to gain much in length of life by the commutation of his sentence. All those who have been tried have behaved admirably during the proceedings, and have met their fate with great manliness and fortitude. A tithe of the courage which they have shown in court would, if displayed in the field, have saved the rebellion of 1867 from being utterly ridiculous. Nobody has made a better appearance in court than Burke, and yet he and his followers ran away, after firing one volley, from a foe not one-twentieth part of their own number, and he was found hiding ingloriously in the first ditch he came to. Mr. Mill's argument against the infliction of the death penalty was that it was unnecessary, that it would disgrace the English Government, and that he did not despair of seeing the day when Fenianism would die of Irish prosperity, and all Fenian convicts be amnestied.

The collector of the Cable news in London has been unusually brilliant this week, having gone, as we fully expected he would as soon as we found he was able to predict the price of stocks, into sporting and fashionable life. His accounts of the Derby and of the Ascot races have been remarkably fine. Of Ascot he tells us that "the company was more select than that in attendance on the Derby. The ladies appeared in gay costume. White and blue and white and lilac were colors much worn by the ladies present." He also mentions that "the day was fine, and the usual scenes were witnessed on the road." This delightful man has a brother apparently in Paris who gets up Cable despatches there, and we think must be a person of a still finer vein of sentiment and loftier ideas. The attempt to assassinate the Emperor of Russia occurring on the same day with the great review drew from him, we are glad to say, the remarkable prediction "that the Czar would receive universal congratulations." He also informs us "that the entire press of Paris united in condemning the assassination." This information is very valuable as showing the extraordinary improvement which has taken place in the morals of the Paris editors. How short a time it seems since they used to shout with barbarous joy whenever an attempt was made to murder a monarch, and load the assassin with eulogies! The sourest sceptic as to the moral and political value of the Cable must surely be shaken when he reads the messages that these two worthy gentlemen furnish to our "great dailies."

It appears that it is not "those conditions of him"—namely, his personal cleanliness and his advanced age—as Mr. Ruskin says it is, nor yet is it his gigantic and portentous hat, a cross between an umbrella and a beehive, which draws down upon Mr. Carlyle, "whene'er he takes his walks abroad," those injurious cries from the cabmen, those dancings and howlings from the street boys, those volleys of half-bricks, those enquiries as to his mother's ignorance or knowledge of her son's whereabouts. In fact, there are no howlings or gibes or other insults. Mr. Carlyle, with every appearance of scorn, stigmatizes Mr. Ruskin's late jeremiad as "a paragraph altogether erroneous, misfounded, superfluous, and even absurd." "Permit me to say," he writes to the newspapers, "in reference to a newspaper paragraph now idly circulating," etc., etc., "that it is an untrue paragraph." This must cover with shame the face of Ruskin, who leapt like a tiger on the poor British plasterer, cabby, bill-sticker, and other working-class persons, and who now may retire abashed. Idle talk about Mr. Carlyle's hat, about his "tumbies," about the length of his pilgrimage "in this wale," are henceforth equally out of order. We are glad to believe that if he were to play hop-scotch in the Chelsea thoroughfares with a second-hand grenadier shako on his head, "those conditions of him" would subject him to no more personal inconvenience in the neighborhood of London than if he were at Mentone or Nice.

All fear as well as all prospects of a war in Europe seems to have passed away. Nearly as many monarchs are collected in Paris as the elder Napoleon had round him in the theatre at Ulm, and there is even talk of disarmament, but no sovereign is likely to be willing to begin. Moreover, the value of disarmament in any particular state, as an indication of pacific intentions, depends greatly on the organization of the military force. In Prussia the reduction of the regular military force would mean very little; in France it would mean a great deal; and as no rule is likely to be provided for the reduction of all to the same real level, disarmament will hardly take place. The attempt to assassinate the Emperor of Russia in Paris, and the expressions of feeling it has called forth from the French, will very likely lead to greater cordiality between the two powers than has prevailed since the Crimean war. The success of the Exposition and the assemblage of so many crowned heads in Paris unquestionably more than compensates the French public for their check in the Luxembourg affair, and may do much to wipe out the memory of the Mexican failure. Martial as the French are, they like glory without war better than glory with it, and Paris being the centre of Europe, are not very particular as to how it becomes so. The political centre it can hardly be said to be any longer; but then the present festivities of which it is the theatre, are evidently helping to hide this fact from the people. The expressions of opinion called forth by the late threats of war, in all but the Opposition literary circles of Paris, showed clearly how rapidly the French are losing their bellicose temper, and becoming comfortable and pacific and commercial. When a provincial journalist declared the other day that it was better to be a Swiss or a Belgian than a Russian or a Turk, he expressed, in an exaggerated form, the feeling of increasing dislike of mere martial glory and increasing love of industry and political freedom, which is now spreading in France. There are serious rumors afloat as to the condition of the Prince Imperial's health, but they are probably set a-going by Legitimists, although they are not without foundation.

The only question which now remains to vex the souls of first-class potentates in Europe is the Eastern question. Omer Pasha has confessedly failed in Crete. He holds the plains, but can apparently make no impression on the mountains, in which the main body of the insurgents is securely lodged. He is old, and failing in energy, and although his only experience of warfare is of mountain warfare, his fire and enterprise seem gone. Moreover, reinforcements in Turkey are not easily had; and the contest will probably drag on till the European Powers interfere through their weariness of the spectacle. The Sultan, who apparently knows what the salvation of the empire is better than either of his predecessors, and has suffered less from harem life, has, it is said, determined on visiting Paris. He will be the first Sultan who has ever left his own dominions except at the head of an army engaged in hostilities, and the first since Mohammed II. who has ever visited a Christian city out of Hungary. What the effect on him of a few weeks in Paris will be, it is impossible to say; but it is not at all improbable that it may overwhelm him with despair, and lead to the dissolution of the Ottoman empire sooner than it is now looked for.

It is not likely that the attempt to assassinate the Emperor of Russia was the result of conspiracy or combination. If there had been cool heads to plan it, a better opportunity would have been chosen for the execution of the scheme. We observe that the New York Herald boldly insinuates that it knew beforehand that something of the kind was brewing, which puts the editor—inasmuch as he sent no telegram to Paris—very much in the position of an accessory before the fact.

Notes.

LITERARY.

We announced, a week or so ago, a book in preparation by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, based upon a recent German book written by Eugen Richter and entitled "Die Consum-Vereine." "Co-operative Store Societies: Their History, Organization, and Management," is the title which the book bears in its English dress, and it is to be shortly followed by two others, "Co-operative Labor Societies" and "Co-operative Credit Societies." The literature of this subject, though hardly an echo of it has reached this country heretofore, and though it makes no great figure in English catalogues, is large in French and in German. Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt intend to give the American student the gist of the works of Schultze-Delitzsch, Batbie, Véron, Poulet, Horn, Le Marchant, Tidd Pratt, Holyoake, and others, and to the "Co-operative Labor Societies" will add "a carefully prepared history of the movement in the United States." To this end members of co-operative societies may efficiently contribute, and it seems very desirable that they should contribute, by forwarding copies of their charters, by-laws, and kindred documents in which their history may be discoverable.——W. A. Townsend & Adams announce "The American Stud-Book," which will give pedigrees of all American and imported blood-horses, and in a supplement a history of all horses and mares that have ever trotted in public. The work is said to be the result of ten years of labor on the part of Mr. J. H. Wallace. It will be sold to subscribers only, as also will be Mr. S. D. Bruce's enlarged and revised, in fact re-written, edition of Frank Forrester's "Horse and Horsemanship." Other newly-revised and enlarged works, to be published by the same house, are Mrs. E. F. Ellet's "Practical Housekeeper" and S. B. Brittan's "Man and his Relations." Books entirely new which Townsend & Adams announce are, besides the stud-book above-mentioned, a complete treatise on the use of the muzzle-loading and breech-loading rifle, written by Mr. Edward C. Barber and entitled "The Crack Shot," and a book by Mr. Joseph Cairn Simpson on breeding, rearing, and training trotting horses, called "Horse Portraiture."——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will publish this summer a story in verse, "One Wife Too Many," by Edward Hopper, who is the author of one or two other volumes of rhyme.——Mr. M. Doolady's next volume of the "Diamond Thackeray" will be "The Newcomes," which will have the benefit of Mr. W. L. Alden's editing, an advantage which will be shared by all the forthcoming volumes of this edition, though "Pendennis" did not have it, and was in some small particulars the worse for not having it. "The Newcomes" is to have twelve illustrations and is announced for the 15th of June.——Robert Clark & Co., of Cincinnati, have in press "Vineyard Culture Improved and Cheapened," by A. Du Breuil, Professor of Viticulture and Arboriculture in the Royal School of Arts and Trades, Paris, translated by E. and C. Parker, of Longworth's Wine House, with notes and adaptations to American culture, by John A. Warder.

—For almost a quarter of a century Mr. W. A. Townsend has been concerned in the republication in this country of Dr. William Braithwaite's Retrospect of Medicine and Surgery, a magazine of which the outside world knows little or nothing, but for which American physicians, to the number of some seven or eight thousand, are steady subscribers. Mr. Townsend, who has just formed a copartnership with Mr. F. W. Adams, of Boston, and who is about to extend quite largely his business operations, now proposes to reprint the London Chemical News, a periodical whose second title explains better its scope, for it is also a Journal of Physical Science. The Chemical News already has something of a circulation in this country, but its high price has put it a little out of the reach of many who are interested in its subject matter. The price of the reprint will be but two dollars and a half a year, while that of the original work is twelve dollars. The reprint will be an exact one in every particular, but the numbers instead of being issued weekly will be issued monthly, the first one in the first week of next month. As we believe Mr. Townsend has always paid Dr. Braithwaite and his son a certain share in the profits of their Retrospect, we suppose an equitable arrangement has been or will be made with the English proprietors of The Chemical News. Besides these two reprints, the firm of W. A. Townsend & Adams intend to keep for sale a complete stock of standard works and new works on medicine and surgery, and on the physical sciences in all their branches. The list of the house already includes a variety of such books as those of the unfortunate Herbert, who, as "Frank Forrester," wrote the best works on American field sports that we have.

—The Fourth of July orator is becoming so much a thing of the past that most people will hesitate to believe that so late as July 4, 1859, no further west and south than in Rome, Tennessee, a human being did actually speak as in the passage following. Prayer was offered, says the printed account of the anniversary services, by the Rev. Ira W. King, the Declaration of Independence was read by the Hon. Alfred L. Bains, and then the oration of the day was delivered by an "attorney-at-law of Nashville," whose name we will not mention. We recommend the pamphlet, which was published at the place of delivery, to Mr. W. Gilmore Simms, who has preserved for us so much verse that helps us to understand the Southern country. Let us remark that the oration is all alike, no part better and no part worse than this:

> "Secondly, our national dangers and prospects should be accurately realized. Danger is the concomitant of power, the damper of enthusiasm, and the attendant of vicissitude. Preachers work with it, statesmen and politicians feel of it, rogues and rascals tamper with it; fancy is its workshop; the passions are its playhouse; steel, lead, coffins, and gunpowder are its nicknacks. To hierarchies it is safe and vitalizing; to principalities it is ruthless and nauseating; but to democracy, lurking and desultory, it spawns politicians like tadpoles, and mounted with their regimentals, sly and slippery, it lubricates sensibilities with pity, braces despondency with enthusiasm, pays despair with hope, bridging gulleys with alternatives all big with disunion, and when the last lonely lane of expediency is travelled and the last drawbridge of desperation cut, floundering on the brink of agony, sinewless and beaten, croaking a nation's death-knell, it rivets its doom on type and stump, rips from anarchy its grave-clothes, sews them with muscles of liberty, but to swap regimentals for the tomb.
> "'There riots the blood-crested worm on its dead,
> And the yellow skull serves the foul toad for its bed,
> And snakes in the nettle-weeds hiss.'"

—From the railway station at Scrooby, in Nottinghamshire, on the borders of Yorkshire, can be seen the outline of the moat of the old manor house in which Pastor Robinson, Elder Brewster, Mr. Bradford, afterwards Governor Bradford, and their little company of Separatist or Brownist fellow-worshippers, used to meet for Divine service. These men were "the leaders of the Pilgrim band, the founders of the civil and religious liberties of America." In a lecture delivered at the Friends' Institute, London, in January last, by Mr. Benjamin Scott, chamberlain of the City of London, the lecturer threw out a suggestion that Americans and Englishmen, who already have united in erecting a memorial building in honor of Penry, "a Separatist martyr," should unite in setting up a monument on the site of the old manor-house, to which Americans might make pilgrimage as reverential as to the tomb at Mount Vernon or to the grave of Lincoln. It was Mr. Scott's purpose in his lecture to defend this thesis: "The 'Pilgrim Fathers' were not Puritans but Separatists (who were the first advocates of perfect freedom of conscience at the Reformation)—they did not, as has been reported of them by some writers, persecute for conscience' sake either Roger Williams, the Friends, or any person." The lecture, which opens, by the way, with an anecdote that very strongly reminds one of the well-known story in which Raleigh sets forth the value of historical records, is well worth reading, for it gives much New England history in a very brief compass, and it brings clearly before the reader a distinction often lost sight of—namely, that between the Separatists who landed at Plymouth and the Puritans who founded Boston. We find in the lecture this story, which, so far as we know, has not before been printed: Lord Macaulay and Earl Stanhope (Lord Mahon), as commissioners for decorating historically the House of Lords, were appealed to respecting an erroneous inscription which had been placed under Mr. Cope's picture of the Pilgrim Fathers landing in New England. The inscription, which apparently had more defects than the one alleged against it by Mr. Scott, stood thus: "Departure of a Puritan Family for New England." After hearing Mr. Cope and examining the proofs of incorrectness submitted to them, the commissioners, Mr. Scott says, ordered the words "Puritan Family" to be removed, and the words "Pilgrim Fathers" substituted. Mr. Scott does not tell us who the objectors were. The lecture, which will be read throughout with pleasure, may be found in the May number of The Historical Magazine.

—The audacious speculation of some American acrobats who have imported their circus into Paris, as if in posturing and riding and balancing on the tight rope they could astonish the countrymen of Blondin, has caused a decided sensation in advance by the "magnifiques affiches" which announced the first performance. These placards—we know what they are, but it seems that they almost startle the walls which Haussmannism has spared. Mural literature, in fact, has suffered a decline in France since the 2d of December. The bill-sticker has become "suspect," and even the Quartier Latin has to resort to sidewalk showers of loose papers when Rogeard or some other revolutionist wants a hearing.

—About the first of May there died in Paris an octogenarian, Count d'Ourche, who for the latter part of his long life was a solitary and a reputed sorcerer. Remarkable stories are told by those who sometimes dined with him, of invisible hands performing admirably the service of valets or playing tricks with the guests at table. He was the medium who presided at the first manifestation of table-tipping in Paris, and by his help some who placed papers on the tombstones of the dead got, as they believed, direct communications in writing. Neither this nor other eccentricities which preceded and followed it, his aversion to the bald and passion for long hair, or his making a pet of a tame lioness, would entitle him to mention here. But he had, on the authority of M. H. de Pène, a formidable library, of which the world has no second, composed exclusively of the works of all ages and in all languages relating to magic, oracles, sorcerers. Voluminous it was, yet he never would arrange it, saying that the spirits were his librarians. The tombstone correspondence brought also and perhaps chiefly into notoriety the Baron de Guldenstubbe, concerning whom and his sister one may consult Mr. Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," and, by way of a corrective, "The Invisibles," a remarkable work just published by Lippincott.

—In the Berlinische Zeitung of the 12th and 19th of May appeared a communication from Consul J. J. Sturz, a most worthy and enlightened gentleman and ardent friend of America, replying generally to a large number of his correspondents who desired to learn the present state of this country. Mr. Sturz has recently returned from the United States, after traversing the eastern half of the continent pretty thoroughly, and as he had visited the same parts for the first time nearly forty years ago, he was able to depict in forcible terms the contrast between then and now. He narrates his fruitless endeavors in this interval to break up the land monopoly of Brazil in order to open that magnificent country to German immigration, and then holds up the policy of our Government to the admiration of his readers. Unceasing attention to the progress of these States for so long a period has rendered Mr. Sturz probably the best informed student of the Union—statistically speaking, at least—in Europe, and perhaps we may say even better informed than any one among us, who do not take such pains to study our own institutions. He accurately compares the attractiveness of the new West and the old, and devotes himself chiefly to Missouri as the most desirable home for his countrymen, especially in connection with the adjacent mining territory and the future Pacific Railroad. He warns them, however, against colonizing the South until every vestige of inequality and caste oppressiveness has been obliterated, and until its educational advantages are similar to those of the North; and as his words are potent in Germany with the people and the Government, we wish the South could profit by them and offer through its emigrant aid societies something better than cheap lands, minerals, and water-power.

—The twelfth volume of Wagner's report on the progress of chemical technology ("Jahresbericht über die Leistungen der chemischen Technologie für 1866") has just been published at Leipzig. This work is, according to Prof. A. W. Hofmann, unrivalled for precision and completeness, and should be in the hands of every industrial chemist. It contains the latest acquisitions to chemical technology during the year, as described in books, pamphlets, and in all the European periodicals.——Under the title "Deutsche Abende" ("German Evenings"), Berthold Auerbach, one of the first German novelists, perhaps best known by his novel "On the Heights," has edited a new series of lectures and essays on literary subjects. The book is dedicated to the Crown Princess Helene of Russia, and contains, besides others, essays on Goethe, Schiller, Uhland, Fichte, Hebel, and on the "Weltschmerz," (the discontentedness of the new school of German poets, Heine, Lenau, etc., with the world). Auerbach's style is acknowledged to be the best in Germany.——The history of the Jews in Portugal ("Geschichte der Juden in Portugal"), written by Dr. M. Kayserling, brings to light some interesting facts. We learn from the book that in Portugal, as in other countries, commerce in mediæval times was almost entirely in the hands of Jews. Their specialty here was the trade in Moorish slaves. If a Moor bought and imported by Jews went over to Christianity, he was, according to law, to be sold within two months after having been baptized; after that term, he became, if unsold, property of the crown. All Jews were by law compelled to wear six-cornered pieces of red cloth on their garments in order to be easily recognized. They were of course under severe restrictions relative to intercourse with Christians.

EDUCATIONAL.

A PAMPHLET has lately been published by Hon. A. D. White, of Syracuse, chancellor elect of the "Cornell University," proposing a scheme for the organization of the institution which has recently been founded at Ithaca. Our readers are aware that, by a fortunate combination of the national land-grant with the munificent gift of a single wealthy and enlightened gentleman, an immense fund, rivalling, if not surpassing, the endowment of either Harvard or Yale, has been secured for the establishment of a new university. The acknowledged ability of the chancellor elect, his love of true learning, and his freedom from mere conventional or traditional restraints, give great value to his announcement of a proposed organization, and his pamphlet becomes in consequence a very interesting contribution to the university discussions which are now so much in vogue.

We shall endeavor, in a very few words, to point out some of the projected features. The new institution is not to be "a college" in the usual acceptation of the phrase in New England nor in Old England, nor is it to be a "university" in the French or German sense. It is rather a place where young men at the ordinary "college age" (say from sixteen upwards) may be admitted to the university variety and freedom of instruction. Many different "combinations of studies" have accordingly been contrived to meet the wants of different minds, and, of course, the old theory of the New England college and the German gymnasium and the English public school, that all educated young men require a similar fundamental preparation for professional life, is abandoned, and the choice of special courses is given to the student at a much earlier period than has heretofore been deemed the best. Two fundamental divisions of the university are proposed, the first including nine "special" courses, and the second including five "general" courses. Young men, as we understand it, may enter the "special" courses after pursuing a "general" course, or without any such preliminary training. The nine special courses (not exactly corresponding to the ancient muses) are as follows: Agriculture, mechanics, engineering, commerce, mining, medicine, law, jurisprudence and history, education. Theology, philology, natural history, astronomy, physics, etc., are not recognized as constituting separate departments. Evidently the "practical" side of learning has chiefly been kept in mind. In fact, these special courses are those of a polytechnic or scientific school. The five "general" courses include a classical course like that of the older colleges, two courses in which modern languages wholly or partly supplant the ancient, a select scientific course, and an optional course, to be made for himself by any student. Twenty-six professorships are proposed. The cast of the institution may be seen in the proposal to have at the outset but one professorship of ancient languages and none of comparative philology. There are, on the other hand, four chairs of history, municipal law, constitutional law, and political economy, and three for agriculture, agricultural chemistry, and zoötechny.

In addition to this scheme of the professorships, the pamphlet lays down the principles which should guide the trustees in electing the faculty. Most of the views presented on this subject are eminently sensible. So, too, are the suggestions which are made in respect to the relations of the officers to one another and to the students. Obviously routine and buckram will not thrive under Chancellor White's administration. The tuition will be at a very low price. The salaries of the professors will also range low, from $1,000 to $2,250. Dormitories will be provided by the college; board will not. Physical culture will receive especial attention, and manual labor will be encouraged. No specific creed or sect will be favored in the institution. The report shows great familiarity with the practical working of several of the foremost colleges of the land, and the glimpses behind the scenes which it sometimes affords are quite fresh and instructive.

THE REIGN OF LAW.*

We think that it would be a profitable enterprise for some American publisher to reprint this book. It is one of the best of its class published in recent times. Popular treatises on natural theology and the theological bearings of modern scientific ideas have degenerated to such merely sermonical discourses, or else into partisan treatments of scientific questions (which seek to gain support from religious ideas rather than to give support to them), that a genuinely philosophical work of the olden stamp—showing power of thought and an earnest purpose, at least—has a peculiar claim to respect, even if it be not entirely successful in removing the difficulties which religious philosophy has encountered in the changed aspects of modern science.

That these difficulties are great it would be prejudice to deny. The idea of the "supernatural," which is still the prevailing one, as a power of operating independently of orderly or natural causes—as one which interferes with them or sets them aside—such a supernatural power finds little favor with thinkers most advanced in scientific culture. To such thinkers the willingness to believe in an arbitrary exercise of creative power appears to indicate not so much the ripest discipline of faith as a defective discipline in science; and though miracles are not thereby excluded from a scientific conception of nature, yet their definition demands amendment. Miracles, as conceived by our author, involve not less than natural events the operation of natural causes, the use of natural means, and an observance of natural laws. To make an event miraculous it should involve, he thinks, a supermaterial instrumentality—that is, it should involve a special design or thought or have a purpose—and it should be superhuman either in its designs or in its command of means, though this command is not manifested by changing the laws of the means employed. It consists rather in a power which is not in its nature superhuman, a power to combine causes and make them means to an end through an observance of their laws. Interfering with laws thus signifies, according to this view, the power to convert them to use by combining them and turning their courses instead of arresting their operations. This implies, however, the existence of free causes which can so turn to use the forces of nature. But the human will is not, according to our author, a pure type of such a power, though the higher sentiments of the human heart appear to him to present such types. By the freedom of the will he does not mean freedom from motives. The reign of law which extends throughout nature, which requires that creation itself should be by means and according to the laws of already existing things, extends also over the "realm of mind." "By freedom," the author says, "we do not mean that any of the phenomena of mind, any more than any of the phenomena of matter, can arise without 'an antecedent,'" and he expresses his idea of the manner in which man is subject to the law of causation by these words from Mill's "Examination" of Hamilton: "That his (man's) volitions are not self-caused, but determined by spiritual antecedents in such sort that when the antecedents are the same the volitions will always be the same." "But," the author adds, "this word 'antecedent' is one of the many vain words in which metaphysicians delight. The highest antecedents which we can trace as determining conduct are to be found in the constitution of the mind itself. Love is an antecedent; so is reverence, so is gratitude, so is the hunger after knowledge, so is the desire of truth. Higher than these—further up the chain of cause and effect—we cannot go" (p. 341).

This passage discloses one of the most curious of the misunderstandings which are so common between the two great schools of philosophy. Our author obviously understands the words "spiritual antecedents" as if synonymous with the "spiritual*ly* antecedent"—that is, higher up in the hierarchy of moral worth and power—an interpretation natural enough to one versed in the conceptions of the ancient metaphysics. But if our author had been equally familiar with the tenets of positivism, he would hardly have chosen Mr. Mill's words as expressing his idea of law in the "realm of mind," for from the context and the general tenor of Mr. Mill's writings it would have been evident to him that by spiritual antecedent Mr. Mill meant that state of the spirit—that is, of the mind and the character—which is immediately antecedent in time to an act of volition. The vagueness of the expression is not so much in Mr. Mill's use of the word antecedent as in our author's understanding of the word spiritual. He would also have known that the sentiments of love, reverence, gratitude are regarded by this school as also effects, the effects of inheritance, education, and the circumstances of life, and that the chain of cause and effect which this school contemplates reaches backwards and forwards in time indefinitely, not upwards and downward in the "spiritual" hierarchy.

This want of familiarity with the doctrines of the modern scientific philosophy has led our author into other still more curious misunderstandings in his criticisms of Mill and Comte, which we have not space to notice. We have commended his book in spite, therefore, of many serious blunders, because in this respect he is not much inferior to the best of the writers of his school, and because in freshness, liberality, and originality his book surpasses most similar recent treatises.

He allows to Mr. Darwin's "Law of Natural Selection" some share in the origination of the adaptations in the organic world—a power, at least, to preserve and perfect the adaptations and contrivances of designing skill. He is also cautious not to ascribe intentions to nature in the sense of final causes or ultimate intentions. He contends, nevertheless, that immediate intention is shown in the structures and functions of organic beings, in contrivances and adaptations, which he appears, however, to ascribe to nature as a whole, rather than to the mental or tentative and contriving powers in the lives of the several races of animals and plants which these contrivances benefit.

With our author, as with all writers on natural theology, the natural evidences are read in the light of a metaphysical tenet, namely, that design is (or involves) a free power, is something more than taking advantage of circumstances in their empirical combinations. It is supposed to involve the power of making the combinations in the first instance, and independently of an empirical knowledge of causes or of acquired powers of combination in thought. And it is upon this tenet rather than upon the facts of natural science that the issue of the debate really turns; and the debate, it should be borne in mind, is not upon the tenableness of the positions meant to be established by these arguments, but rather on the validity of the proofs adduced.

Of the scientific merits of the book, we have but a word to say. The author contributes to the illustrations of design in nature an interesting discussion of the "machinery of flight" in the wings of birds, and by this and other scientific matters makes his book a very readable one.

A NOVEL FROM RUSSIA.*

What a novel should have this novel does not lack. Rather it possesses, in large measure, several of the requisites of a really excellent novel, and we feel sure of its taking an honorable place among the more valued contemporary works of fiction. There can, at any rate, be no doubt that novel readers will thank Mr. Schuyler for a most readable addition to their stock of stories; it is a great deal to say nowadays for a novel of any length, but, after beginning "Fathers and Sons," it will be found easier to go on to the end than to stop. And if it be the end of novels that they be readable, as of comedies, according to Dr. Johnson, that they make people laugh—and certainly a tale that cannot be told seems to want the main thing—then this that we have already said is praise enough. But "Fathers and Sons" is not wholly dependent for its interest upon its plot, upon its freshness of incident, the strangeness of the manners depicted, the rapidity of movement, the dramatic situations, the careful and sometimes poetical painting of natural scenery, the humor, the pathos—though these are among its characteristics; still less is it wholly dependent upon the glimpses it gives us of the working of various social forces which are now operating upon Russia—though these also it offers us. The author is successful in the novelist's highest labor—in conceiving and delineating his characters. He does not paint with elaboration, but he sketches with a vigorous and accurate pencil;

and in Bazarof, Arcadi, Paul Petrovitch, Nicholas Petrovitch, Katia, best of all in poor old Vasili Ivanovitch and his wife, he has given us real men and real women.

The central figure is Eugene Bazarof, the nihilist. "You, then, believe in science only?" Paul Petrovitch says to him; and for answer to the aristocratic elderly ex-dandy, the doctor's son says, as brutally as he can: "I have already had the honor of telling you that I believe in nothing." Not only that; but he is not so much a questioner of old authority as a hater of all authority; it is not that he searches after truth with dispassionate mind, but he revolts against the shadow of a curb and seeks the mastery for himself. Religion, filial piety, the tenderness due to age, the respect given to woman, the consideration owed to weakness, he scoffs at. He is by nature a materialist; all that which he calls "the romantic," as love, poetry, justice between man and man, offends him, and without well knowing what is meant by the ideal and the spiritual, he gibes at them bitterly. What he is in politics may be imagined; there are, perhaps, more like him in Siberia, bad a republican as he would make, than in any other part of the empire; but the author is discreetly silent on political questions, and that Russia has an autocrat, a political, social, and religious life in which "nihilism" must grow rank, one would not discover from reading this book. Bazarof's self-conceit, ambition, and courage are boundless, his intellect powerful, his passions not weak. For the rest, he is a young man, the son of a military surgeon, his own profession is the medical, his means are small, and his personal appearance is not prepossessing: "Unbuttoning the collar of his coat, he let Nicholas Petrovitch see him full in the face. He had a long and thin face, with a broad forehead, a nose thick above and sharper towards the end, large, greenish eyes, and long, drooping moustaches of a sandy hue; a quiet smile played on his lips, his whole physiognomy expressed intelligence and confidence in himself."

This young man his friend Arcadi, who, like most other friends of Bazarof, is the nihilist's disciple, takes down into the country to the house where his father Nicholas and his uncle Paul are residing. Arcadi is an ordinary youth of good intentions, easily influenced, naturally a little sentimental. His father and his uncle stand as representatives of the old order of things in Russia. The time of the story is in the year 1858; the serfs are in the transition state between serfdom and freedom. Nicholas Petrovitch, whose estates are large, who is a kind-hearted, unassuming man, somewhat scholarly, a little dreamy, accepts the new ideas without fully understanding them and without being at all able to carry them into practical effect. Ill-health and sorrow have made him old before his time. Paul Petrovitch, bred a soldier, and in his youth gay and dissipated, after rising to the grade of captain, left the service. He was infatuated with a lady of high rank, of frivolous life and not of irreproachable behavior, who yet had in her character enough that was beyond the comprehension of the captain in the guards to keep him her slave till she died. Then, with polished manners, with aristocratic habits of mind, without any mental resources of importance, prematurely old, he retires to the country and lives there with his brother, brooding over his past life, never escaping from his memories of the woman, taking no part in the management of the farm business, reading French novels and English reviews. With these gentlemen Mr. Bazarof does not get on in the very best manner possible. They do not and cannot understand him wholly, nor do they like at all what they do understand; and as for him, he is constitutionally incapable of understanding what is best in them. What is not best is patent and gets no mercy from him.

When the story first leaves the country house of the two brothers it departs from the strict line of its development. "Fathers and Sons" ceases to be an appropriate title; it is no longer occupied with the contrast between two generations of Russians, the conflict between opposing ideas. We have a long episode, in which, to be sure, we get an amusing sketch or two of some Russian progressives, of poor Sitnikof, of silly little Madame Kukshin, who is illuminated to a high degree, and refers among other foreign authors to Proudhon, Bunsen, Macaulay, Cooper, and Emerson; but in all this part of the book the author has pretty effectually lost sight of his theory, and really has given us in a most dramatic episode Bazarof in love. A characteristic sort of love it is. He succumbs to Madame Odintsof, "a very fine woman," as the English say, an able woman, and a personage whose character is portrayed with perhaps greater carefulness than that bestowed on any other of the author's figures. Neither Bazarof nor Arcadi is man enough to be master of her, though the nihilist makes a great impression at first, and though what she takes to be the devotion of young Arcadi seems at the last to have touched her more than she had thought. But both are too raw, and she is an experienced woman of the world. The scenes at Nikolskoia, however, though fine, are episodical, and without delaying we go on to see our "Fathers and Sons" again, to see the young men at the little farm of Bazarof's father and mother—a dove-cot, or rather a rabbit-hutch, which our young bird of prey wonderfully flutters, first with joy, afterwards with grief, and again with the deepest grief. The mother the author has given us in a set description, which, however, is by no means his best or most used way of putting his characters before our eyes, and in this instance is rather to be credited to his theory in this novel than attributed to his theory of novel-writing in general:

> "Arina Vlassievna was a true type of the lesser Russian nobility of the old régime; she ought to have come into the world two hundred years earlier, in the time of the grand dukes of Moscow. Very impressible and of great piety, she believed in every possible omen, in divinations, in witchcraft, in dreams; she believed in the 'Yourodivi,' in familiar spirits, in wood spirits, in evil conjunctions, in the evil eye, in popular remedies, in the virtues of salt placed on the altar on Holy Thursday, in the approaching end of the world; she believed that if the tapers of the midnight mass at Easter were not extinguished, the buckwheat harvest would be good, and that the mushrooms do not grow after a human eye has looked on them; she believed that the devil likes places where there is water, and that all Jews have a blood-stain on their breasts; she was afraid of mice, of adders, of frogs, of sparrows, leeches, thunder, of cold water, draughts of air, horses, gnats, red-haired men, and black cats, and considered crickets and dogs impure creatures; she ate neither veal, nor pigeons, nor crabs, nor cheese, nor asparagus, nor artichokes, nor hares, nor water-melons (because a cut melon recalls the cut head of St. John the Baptist); and the mere thought of oysters, which she did not even know by sight, made her shudder; she liked to eat, and fasted rigorously; she slept ten hours a day, and did not go to bed at all if Vasili Ivanovitch complained of a headache. The only book which she had read was entitled Alexis, or the Cottage in the Forest; she wrote, at the most, but one or two letters a year, and was admirably skilled in sweatmeats and preserves, although she did not put her hand to anything, and did not usually like to stir from her place.
> "Arina Vlassievna was besides very good, and not wanting in a certain common sense. She knew that there existed in the world masters to command and men of the people to obey, and that was why she found no fault with the obsequiousness of inferiors, and with their grovelling salutations; but she treated them with great gentleness, never let a beggar pass without giving him alms, and criticised nobody, although she was not an enemy to gossip. In her youth she had an agreeable face, played on a harpsichord and spoke French a little. But during the long journeys of her husband, whom she had married against her will, she had grown fat and forgotten the music and French. While she adored her son, she was very much afraid of him; it was Vasili Ivanovitch who administered her estate, and in that respect she left him full liberty; she sighed, fanned herself with her handkerchief, and lifted her eyebrows with fear when her old husband began to talk to her of reforms in process of execution and of his own plans. She was distrustful, continually on the watch for some great misfortune, and began to weep as soon as she happened to remember anything sad. Women of this sort are beginning to become rare; God knows whether we ought to rejoice at it!"

Poor old Vasili Ivanovitch appears plainly enough in these two extracts:

> "As soon as he arose the next morning Arcadi opened the window, and the first object that met his eye was Vasili Ivanovitch in a Tartar dressing gown, with a pocket handkerchief for a girdle, working in the kitchen garden. Noticing his young guest, he leaned on his spade and called to him:
> "'Good morning! How have you passed the night?'
>
> "'Very well,' replied Arcadi.
> "'You see before you a sort of 'Cincinnatus,' replied the old man, 'I am preparing a bed for the autumn radishes. We live now in a time, God be praised for it, when every one is obliged to support himself with his own hands; one cannot depend on others; we must work for ourselves. Whatever may have been said to the contrary, Jean Jacques Rousseau was right. Half an hour ago, my dear sir, you would have surprised me in a very different position from that in which you see me. A peasant came to consult me about a case of dysentery; I—how shall I say it?—I gave him an injection of opium; I drew a tooth for another. I proposed to the latter to take ether, but she would not consent to it. All this I do gratis—en amateur. For the rest, I have nothing to blush for; I am a plebeian, homo novus; I have no coat of arms, like my beloved wife. But would it not be agreeable to you to come here in the shade, to breathe the morning freshness before breakfast?'
> "Arcadi went out to join him."

The young man and the old talk for a little while in the garden, and by and-by the old man says:

> "I will say to you without a compliment, the friendship which exists, according to what I see, between you and my son delights me very much. I have just left him; he has risen very early, according to his habit, which you ought to know, and is walking about the neighborhood. Permit me to ask a question: Have you been long acquainted with my son?'
> "'We became acquainted last winter.'
>
> "'Indeed? Let me ask one more question. But we might sit down. Permit me to ask you as a father, with all frankness, what you think of my Eugene?'
> "'Your son is one of the most remarkable men I have ever met,' responded Arcadi with animation.
> "The eyes of Vasili Ivanovitch opened suddenly, and a slight flush colored his cheeks. He dropped the spade which he had been holding.
> "'You think so?' he began.

“‘I am certain,’ continued Arcadi, ‘that a great future awaits your son; he will make your name illustrious. I was convinced of it at our first meeting.’

“‘How—how so?’ said Vasili Ivanovitch with an effort. An ecstatic smile played upon his large lips, and did not leave them.

“‘Would you like to know how we became acquainted?’

“‘Yes; and generally’——

“Arcadi began to speak of Bazarof with even more animation than on the evening when he danced a mazurka with Madame Odintsof. Vasili Ivanovitch listened to him, blew his nose, gathered his handkerchief up into both hands, coughed, tossed back his hair, and at last, no longer able to contain himself, he leaned towards Arcadi and kissed his shoulder.

“‘You have made me the happiest of men,’ said he, without ceasing to smile. ‘I must confide to you that I—that I idolize my son! I do not speak of my poor wife; she is a mother, and she has the feelings of one. But for myself, I dare not let my son know how much I love him; it would displease him. He cannot endure effusions of that kind. Many persons even reproach him for this firmness of character, and attribute it to pride or insensibility; but men like him ought not to be measured by the same standard with common mortals—do n't you agree with me? For instance, any one else in his place would have made demands on the paternal purse. Well, he has never asked us for a kopeck too much, God knows.’

“‘He is a disinterested, honorable man,’ said Arcadi.

“‘A model of disinterestedness. As for me, Arcadi Nikolaïtch, I am not contented with idolizing him—I am proud of him, and what flatters my pride the most is the thought that some day the following lines will be read in his biography: ‘The son of a simple regimental surgeon, who, however, early understood him, and neglected nothing for his instruction.’ . . . The old man's voice was choked.

“Arcadi pressed his hand.

“‘What do you think?’ asked Vasili Ivanovitch, after a moment of silence; ‘it is not in the medical career that he will arrive at the celebrity which you predict for him?’

“‘No; but, doubtless, even in that he may be destined to take his place among the most learned.’

“‘What, then, is the career which’——

“‘That is hard to tell now; but he will be celebrated.’

“‘He will be celebrated,’ repeated the old man, and fell into a profound reverie.

“‘Arina Vlassievna asks you to come to tea,’ said Anfisushka, who was passing by with a dish of raspberries.

But it is not our intention to tell the story. No one, we will say in conclusion, need take it up with the expectation of finding it a work of art without obvious imperfections, nor with the expectation of finding in it more about Russia than will just whet his curiosity to learn more. It must be remembered that the book was written for Russians, and it must be remembered, too, that a Russian novelist writes, as you may say, in chains. But it is a very good novel indeed, and makes us wish for translations of others of Turgenef's works. We hope, let us say here, that if Mr. Schuyler should confer that favor on the public, he will allow himself a little more freedom of expression. His first pages, very noticeably his first sentences, are forbiddingly stiff; but as he goes on, this fault in great part, indeed almost wholly, disappears. And no doubt it would be an improvement if in the introduction to the next edition the right pronunciation of the proper names were indicated. We say in the next edition, because we are pretty confident that Turgenef will go upon our shelves along with Ruffini, Auerbach, d'Azeglio, and other foreign novelists of our day who, having been naturalized, have become favorites among us.

ONE PHASE OF OUR SCHOOL SYSTEM.[*]

THE seven educational journals named below are but a part of those which reach us more or less regularly, as well as of those which we only know by repute. Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, California, all have monthly journals supported by the teachers of these States respectively. Vermont and Connecticut, somewhat remarkably, have allowed theirs to die, to the benefit of Massachusetts, and perhaps of New York. The only one on our list not strictly local is The American Educational Monthly, which probably owes to its name its extensive circulation at the South. For the rest, we have no means of judging how much they are taken outside the State limits; from the transmigrations of teachers some little interchange may be inferred. Believing that these represent very fairly together the intelligence and the zeal of the best portion of our professional instructors, and individually the vital condition of the people of each State in regard to education, we have compared their contents for the month of April, making, for the sake of the coup d'œil, no account of their accidental variation from their average merit.

We find, then, of miscellaneous essays the following: On judging of educational methods by their effects, in favor of liberal education, in favor of a State university (Ohio), on unconscious influence, on Anglo-Saxon as a common-school classic (Kansas), on the uncertainty of school-district boundaries; together with “Notes Orthoepical, Orthographical, Etymological, and Syntactical” (Ohio, W. D. Henkle), the pre-Columbian discovery of America, the biography of Pestalozzi, a serial educational novel (Am. Ed. Monthly), a school dialogue. Of contributions that may be classified, we have, on teaching in general: Report of an object lesson on the expansion and contraction of water, “my school,” absurdities of teaching, school management; together with an account of a certain examination of teachers, and articles on the duties of principals and the condition of primary schools. On the practice of teaching: the proper mode of studying Latin grammar (Mass., Geo. B. Emerson), language versus grammar, the teaching of definitions and etymology, of reading as an art and by the word-method, of geography, of map-drawing, on drawing as an aid to observation; together with an illustration of a peculiar analysis of numbers. Of official reports and documents we have: Extracts from the annual reports of State superintendents, of a normal-school superintendent, of the Boston superintendent (Ohio), rules for the government of schools in Waukesha County (Wis.); with extracts from the catalogue of the University of Kansas, the State geologist's report, and the constitution of the Kansas Historical Society. Other selections do not need to be enumerated, a good deal being done in the way of “padding.”

So much for the body of the journal. In the editor's department we may expect to meet the best reflections on current events within the province of the journal, mixed with a pot-pourri the most readable and often the most suggestive of all the contents. Here naturally find a place practical suggestions to teachers, often in response to enquiries; personal intelligence, obituary, etc.; reports and other school documents, and a general conspectus of State, United States, and foreign educational news, correspondence, book notices, and again selected articles in great variety. The American Educational Monthly devotes some attention also to science and art. The latitude of the editorial department is shown by its admitting the sayings of Josh Billings, and the discussion of a license law for liquor-dealers (Kansas). One subject only is twice treated of in these April numbers—corporal punishment—and in each instance it is extenuated if not defended. The Massachusetts Teacher contains the ludicrous manifesto of the sub-masters of the Boston schools apropos of Parton's Webster, with Prof. Atkinson's forbearing reply; and illustrates the confusion that reigns in our English grammar by comparing twenty-four different definitions of an adjective obtained from forty-three distinct text-books. The majority of the contributions being signed simply with the initials of the writers, it is impossible to say in how many instances they are the productions of women. Miss Frances H. Turner's excellent paper on the primary school system is reprinted with commendation in The Massachusetts Teacher; but we can mention no other woman's name as the author of any article in the six remaining journals. In one of these a school dialogue ridicules “woman's rights,” and “strong-minded women” who are foolish enough to think they want the suffrage and ought to have it, and who send a petition to Congress to say as much for themselves.

We imagine that all would agree in awarding the palm for ability, perhaps also for typographical clearness and beauty, to The Massachusetts Teacher, the oldest of all; to The Michigan Teacher, the youngest, for superior vitality and systematic arrangement. The two States thus coupled together reveal their consanguinity better than at any other point of contact; and if, as it bids fair to do, the child outstrip the mother, it will be because it has her blood, her instincts, her faith, her experience, and is not bound by her traditions—has a reputation to make, and not to rest satisfied with, and has possibilities of physical expansion which are denied to her. For we cannot help thinking that the very excellence attained by the common schools in New England has affected the teachers in a way which is hostile to progress, and has diminished to an unfortunate degree their interest in journals conducted by and for their profession. It is thus we account largely for the decadence of journals once established, in the conduct of which it probably became evident to the editors that they must either fill their pages with borrowed matter, or with matter of their own and zeal of their own; or, in default of leisure for such exertion, must abandon the publication. No intelligent educator would be satisfied with borrowing, and only one enough in earnest to be thought a doctrinaire would consent to fill all gaps caused by the indifference of his associates. In the West, we apprehend, there is more of interest felt by the teachers in their work, and in having a medium for the interchange of opinion and experience. The editors attend chiefly to their especial department, appearing less frequently in the ranks of contributors. Not that they lack ideas and theories, and do not lead the sentiment of their profession—far from it. The Ohio Educational Monthly (at least in the specimen before us) has a larger number of original communications than has any of its fellows, while its honorable editor may be congratulated on having draughted the memorial that inspired the act establishing a national bureau of education.

Judging merely from the relation of the teachers of a State to their official mouthpiece—as to whether it is really used by them, or is but the mouthpiece of its editor—we should anticipate greater things from the West than from the East. The question of the education of women, for example, is likely to be settled sooner on the prairies than on the seaboard. But we do not forget the causes which have detracted from the importance of these journals, and which forbid too hasty an inference of the sort we have been making. Their peculiar value is and must ever be their fostering a spirit of fraternity and emulation among teachers, such as is, perhaps, nowhere so well and so naturally exhibited as among the instructors of the freedmen. This spirit will grow as the profession increases in respectability. The profession will be most respected when it is adopted as a life-long pursuit, and not as a temporary living, which will be when teachers are paid not according to the competition for places, but to the immense responsibility which devolves on the instructors of youth. In that day teachers will be able to support their own journals handsomely with money and with thoughts, will even consider them indispensable. At present, with a just appreciation that not alone is that education which assumes the name, but all that goes to discipline and inform the mind, they are driven to select the best of the cheap literature of the day ; and "cheap" in this connection does not mean what it did twenty or ten years ago, notwithstanding the high price of paper. A dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half for an educational journal may be dearer than four dollars for The Atlantic Monthly or two dollars for The Weekly Tribune ; and some must choose.

There are, then, these obstacles to the prosperity and right development of the journals under consideration: First, the poverty of their clientèle, owing to the inadequate compensation which is given to teachers ; Second, the instability of the profession, due to the low estimate of its importance by the multitude that resort to it, and the scanty livelihood it affords ; Third, the consequent want of means to pay good salaries to editors and to be independent of voluntary contributions ; Fourth, the rivalry of more popular, miscellaneous, and able periodicals, that teem with purchased articles and illustrations, and are the channels of the news, the most agreeable fiction, and the best thinking of the current hour. Against these we have only the esprit du corps, unequal in Vermont, unequal in Connecticut—the weaker as we approach the centres of intellectual life and literary production ; nevertheless destined, we hope and would fain believe, to prevail at last. We desire earnestly that these journals should be and should thrive in every State of the Union, and to that end we shall not cease to enlighten the people as to what truly constitutes education, and what sacrifices and expenditures they ought to make to advance and extend it.

PROFESSOR HOPPIN'S TOUR IN ENGLAND.*

WHOEVER would see England through the eyes of an American scholar of cultivated judgment, able to admire and yet able to discriminate, will read with a relish Professor Hoppin's newest recollections of English travel. They are written, as the author explains in the preface, "with the freedom which an American is accustomed to exercise upon all subjects, and yet in no spirit of bitterness or hostility, but, on the contrary, in a spirit of reverence and love for the great land of our fathers." This kindly filial spirit is conveyed in the very title, "Old England ;" and the promise of the title is much better verified than was true in the case of Mr. Hawthorne's caustic observations upon "Our Old Home." Professor Hoppin does not discuss, excepting incidentally, the political institutions of England. He turns his eye upon other parts of England and English life, upon the picturesque scenery, the stately cathedrals, the places memorable in history, the haunts of the poets, and upon the phases of society that present themselves to a traveller's notice. On all these topics he discourses thoughtfully, and now and then with a spontaneous eloquence. Since the day of Silliman's Travels, or even of Irving's Sketches, England is supposed to have become familiar to Americans. It is common to hear Englishmen rallied for their ignorance of our geography. But how many educated Americans can make a map of the counties of England ? A vast majority of our people who go abroad see only a few of the great towns of England which lie on the principal railways. Few undertake to explore the country or make a study of its physical and social characteristics. Professor Hoppin expresses the hope that he may do something to turn the current of travel into the ways which he has traversed himself with so much pleasure. Among the most interesting passages in his volume are the criticisms upon English art. He has a higher opinion than is generally entertained of the value of the collections of paintings which are found in England, as compared with the galleries of the Continent. His interest in the old cathedrals, the grand monuments of mediæval religion, is an enthusiasm. His remarks upon them and upon architectural monuments generally, show the trained eye of the connoisseur. Graphic descriptions of natural scenery are interspersed throughout the volume. We may instance the chapters upon the lake country and the vivid account of a terrific storm at Land's End—"the prow of England, where she plunges into the Atlantic." Professor Hoppin's familiarity with English authors gives a classic flavor to his description of places, especially such as have been commemorated in verse. As might be expected, he lingers long at the universities, dwelling upon the historic memories of these venerable establishments. The criticisms upon public men are uniformly candid. The author notices in particular the distinguished preachers, from Maurice and Melville to Spurgeon and Cumming, some of whom he met in private ; but he pours out his warmest tribute of admiration at the grave of Frederic W. Robertson, of Brighton. It proves how the power of self-sacrifice and earnestness is able to subdue all hearts, that, with the exception of a few insignificant sectaries, men of all creeds utter words of heartfelt respect for this youthful preacher. The truly Christian and catholic tone of Professor Hoppin's volume is indicative of wide culture. After expressing his want of sympathy with ritualism, he adds (p. 423): "I must confess that the few 'High Church' clergymen in whose society I happened to be thrown, though I could not agree with them at all in their views, were personally by far the most scholar-like, refined, and interesting men of all the English clergymen whom I met." In another place (p. 482) he writes: "I have had the privilege of joining in prayer and praise with all kinds of Christians, with High and Low Churchmen, with German Lutherans, with Moravians and 'Plymouth Brethren,' with American Methodists, with Independents and Baptists, with Irvingites and those who look for the second coming of Christ, with Quakers and Roman Catholics, with Greek and Armenian Christians, with men of many different languages and races, with Copts and Syrians, with some whom I consider in the main errorists, and I may say that, with much of human vanity and error in them all, I have found in all that in which I could heartily unite, and more real piety and faith than I was worthy to participate in ; and I will enjoy the thought, that there is more of the spirit of Christ on earth than many good men think ; more of the truth of the one living Lord sown deep in the sorrowful hearts of men, which shall at some time spring up in immortal light from the dark earth. Let us at least so hope."

The Hand-Book of History and Chronology, etc., European and American, for the XVIth, XVIIth, XVIIIth, and XIXth centuries. Rev. John M. Gregory, LL.D. (Chicago : Adams, Blackmer & Lyon.)—There are three features which render this manual superior, for school purposes, to the histories commonly in use : 1st, The selection of a limited portion of modern time connected immediately with the present age, and embracing the most important movements and achievements of the human race ; 2d, The comparison, by centuries, of events in all the leading countries in Europe and in America ; 3d, The constant reference to authorities from which the outline of dates may be filled in by the teacher or pupil at pleasure. In aid of this plan a chart has been devised by the author, to be used in connection with his book, which by a simple arrangement of squares represents every year of each of the four centuries treated, and with varied lettering and national coloring tells at a glance the time, place, and relative significance of each occurrence. Other charts of wider scope, perhaps, we have seen occasionally, but we do not remember one so comprehensible as this, while some are overwhelmingly minute in their details. The publishers are prepared, should this venture prove successful, to fill out the Christian era in four similar charts of four centuries each. We hope they may do so ; but, as the author remarks in his preface, in discussing the proper mode of studying history, from any given epoch one can take a departure which will land him presently in China or in the garden of Eden ; and therefore we advise most students (and most teachers, for that matter) not to wait till the series is completed, but rather to explore at once the field already mapped out. Whoever shall attempt to master one century, or even one decade, will confess that life is fleeting, and will also probably learn that history is of quite as much value in fragments as in the whole that the human mind can grasp.

MR. McCULLOCH'S LAST LETTER.

ON the 30th of April last, forty-three "merchants, manufacturers, and professional men of Boston" cordially invited Secretary McCulloch to meet them at dinner and give them an opportunity to express their appreciation of his ability and integrity.

Mr. McCulloch's answer is dated May 22—a severe trial, no doubt, to the patience of the forty-three—and is, like everything that Mr. McCulloch writes, full of wisdom. Though nominally addressed to forty-three private, though distinguished, "men of Boston," it is really an official declaration of the views entertained by the Secretary at that time on the condition and prospects of the national finances, and hence it can scarcely be on account of its private character or from regard for the feelings of the forty-three inviters that the letter has received so little notice from the public press. The indifference, whatever cause it may arise from, is certainly not warranted. It is true the letter is long without containing any very striking novelty of statement, idea, or expression, but there are a great many good, old, sound conservative ideas in it that cannot be repeated too often, and that in this progressive age we are too apt to lose sight of. To these Mr. McCulloch clings with steady perseverance and a faith utterly regardless of consequences; and in addition to the old-time wisdom there is sufficient new wisdom in it to justify us in giving this last letter of our Secretary's a hearty consideration.

We, and all public men with us, have to thank the Secretary for furnishing us with another striking and warning example of the danger of writing letters instead of making speeches. Mr. McCulloch's off-hand remarks after a Boston dinner with weighty "merchants, manufacturers, and professional men" could be made light of by those who disagree with him, while even his friends and supporters would scarce dare to appeal to them in seriousness. But when the Secretary, in the Treasury at Washington, after three weeks' delay, sets forth his views in writing, his staunchest opponents are compelled to listen, while his friends know precisely what to rely upon. Thus, when he assures the forty-three that he will administer the Treasury so as to merit their confidence, we may laugh at doubting Europe, that values our "promises to pay" at 73 cents on the dollar, and repose upon our greenbacks as upon gold and silver bars. When he assures them that they must not expect the next debt statement to show a decrease of debt, but even that a temporary increase is unavoidable, our first thought is to measure the possible increase. When he assures us that he has not for some months past reduced the circulation of United States notes, we naturally turn to rebuke our Wall Street friends for their constant clamor against contraction, which they pretend is the cause of the tight money market; and when, on the 29th day of May, seven days after being written, this important document is published in the New York papers, and gold and stocks begin to advance thereupon, we dare not rebuke the heartless men, Wall Street speculators and gold gamblers, who insinuate that it was a nice thing for the forty-three Bostonians to have known the Secretary's views in advance of the outside public.

If it were not lamentable, however, it would be laughable to see the contrast between Mr. McCulloch's letter, dated May 22, and the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to the people of the United States dated June 1. The increase in the debt, which on May 22 was unavoidable, has on June 1 become a decrease of $5,171,000; the contraction which on May 22 had for some months past, and for four excellent reasons, been suspended, has on June 1 resulted in a withdrawal of currency amounting to the enormous figure of $39,000,000, and the faith of the forty-three in Mr. McCulloch's ability to administer the Treasury so as to merit their and their fellow-citizens' confidence is somewhat rudely shaken.

The fact is, that Mr. McCulloch and all future Secretaries of the Treasury had better confine themselves in their after-dinner remarks or their ante-dinner letters to simple facts, and not indulge in prophecy. The present Secretary has scarcely ever made a public statement relating ever so remotely to the future which has not been completely contradicted by himself or falsified by events within a very short time, and each time the result has been more and more mischievous. In the present instance we can only wonder at the mysteries of the Treasury accounts which could have kept the Secretary himself so entirely in the dark. We do, seriously and sincerely, believe in Mr. McCulloch's integrity of purpose; but we also believe that he is controlled in many things, against his will or without his knowledge, by unprincipled underlings and a vicious system, both inherited from the time of Mr. Chase, both symbolized by Mr. Chase's "private memoranda," both demonstrated by Mr. Fessenden's unwillingness to put his name to any important paper emanating from the Treasury, both bearing fruit in the present condition of the Government balances in the national banks—to which we refer below—and both lending color to the rumors current in Wall Street that the statement has been made to look favorable by the intentional withholding of requisitions and other measures well known to the initiated.

It is not, however, for the sake of pointing out Mr. McCulloch's minor errors, or in order to warn him against the dangers of prophecy, that we refer to this remarkable letter. Our main object is to protest against Mr. McCulloch's interpretation of the duties to which he is assigned. The Secretary of the Treasury is appointed to obey the laws made and provided for the collection and disbursement of the public revenues. When he seeks to make laws, when he undertakes, in imitation of the sumptuary enactments of bygone ages of ignorance and barbarism, to force the people of the United States, at his bidding, to increase their production, to cease their speculation, to diminish their extravagance, he only renders himself ridiculous. Mr. McCulloch wants to check speculation by contracting the currency. Does he forget that there are bears in Wall Street as well as bulls—men as ready to speculate for a fall as for a rise? Is he ignorant that his letter has done more to induce speculation than any one event of the last three months?

Mr. McCulloch wants to increase production by contracting the currency and lowering prices. Does he not know that men hesitate to produce on a declining market, and that the stoppage of production is more than half due to his foolish and persistent threats of that contraction and return to specie payments which never comes? Mr. McCulloch wants to restore to the American people their former habits of economy, all by the magic wand of currency contraction. The American people are quite competent to judge of the wisdom of their expenditures. They began to economize, as many a pinched face and threadbare coat will prove, long before Mr. McCulloch undertook the care of their individual pockets. Whatever remnant of extravagance may have remained is rapidly disappearing before a more impressive teacher than contraction—the tax-gatherer. The law authorizes Mr. McCulloch to contract four millions a month. He preaches contraction on all occasions, but "for some months past has not reduced the circulation." "He is as much persuaded as ever of the importance of contraction," but he fails to contract mainly in order that contraction may not be accused of causing some existing financial evils. On May 22 he writes page after page to make this clear to all men's minds, and on June 1 shows that he has virtually contracted thirty-nine millions during the month.

We have directed Mr. McCulloch's attention to the national balances in the national banks for the following reason: At the close of March it was commonly reported in Wall Street that the Treasury was very short of currency, and no little surprise was expressed on the appearance of the April debt statement showing a currency balance in the Treasury of over thirty-four millions. The surprise diminished, however, when the subsequent quarterly bank statement showed that the Treasury had over twenty-seven of the thirty-four millions on deposit with national banks throughout the country—of course free of interest. Now, it is a remarkable fact that for the last six months the amount thus deposited has varied very little, and certainly has not fallen, as far as the public is aware, below twenty-seven millions, looking very much as though these twenty-seven millions were on a sort of permanent deposit, or could not be entirely relied upon to be forthcoming if wanted suddenly. It is also rumored that even in Mr. Chase's time of abundance certain Treasury drafts on banks in this city were not promptly met, and many people are inclined to think that a good part of the twenty-seven millions referred to would meet the same fate if urgently called for. Here are important topics for Mr. McCulloch's next letter.

THE RIGHTS OF "THE PEOPLE."

In discussing the subject of municipal government a fortnight ago we spoke of the prevailing tendency to ride political theories to death, having in our minds The Evening Post's doctrine that the local majority in this city has almost if not quite as much right to do as it pleases as the majority of the whole State. That journal furnished on Friday last a much better illustration of the truth of what we had been saying on this subject than we had ever expected to see in its columns. It appears that anybody who believes that the majority of voters on this island are not fit to elect the municipal officers and levy the taxes distrusts "the people," does not believe "the people" are fit for self-government, and is, in fact, an enemy of democracy. Nor is this all. Anybody who advocates less frequent elections and longer terms of office also distrusts "the people;" so that, in fact, unless you are in favor of electing the mayor by universal suffrage, and giving him the appointment of every other official, and abandoning all claim to State interference under any circumstances, you hate or fear "the people." In short, if you suggest any departure from the great Cæsarist plan of universal suffrage and "one-man power," you are, before you know it, the foe of "the people." It seems to us that in giving the mayor the right to appoint officers instead of having them all elected The Post also betrays a distrust of "the people." If "the people" can elect a mayor, they can elect everybody else, and to propose to take away from them the power of doing so seems to us clear proof of covert doubts of "the people's" capacity, which, however, as we ourselves sympathize with the plan, we promise not to expose.

What follows, however, is more serious. The Post says:

> "But all discussion of this subject returns at last to the point that the people here, if they were entrusted with the management of their local affairs, would mismanage them. In the first place, this is a mere assumption, which has no proper place in a grave argument. It is not susceptible of proof, for the people here have not had a trial. But even if it were true, we reply the people have a right to mismanage their own affairs, and no class or set has a right to take them out of their hands."

The plan of hiding the real nature of propositions under a cover of fine words or of words of doubtful meaning, is as old as the art of dialectics. There could hardly be a better example of the way the thing is done than the foregoing. The assertion that "the people has a right to mismanage its affairs if it pleases" will probably seem to a large number of The Post's readers simply a strong statement of sound democratic doctrine. In reality it is an assertion of the superiority of the majority to the moral law. When some expounders and defenders of democracy use the word "people," they generally use it as a kind of dumfoundering formula, like the "de par le roi" of Louis Fourteenth's Exempts, and expect all dissenters to sink into awe-stricken silence; but when such doctrines as we have quoted above are gravely put forward by a paper of The Post's standing and with The Post's real claims to respect, especially in a State in which the constitution is under revision, it behooves us not to be frightened by fine phrases, but to state exactly, in plain English, what this talk of "the right of the people to mismanage its affairs" really means.

"People," we need hardly say, always means majority. It sounds finer and more impressive than majority, but then this is really all it comes to. Therefore, when any one says, as The Post says, that "the people has a right to mismanage its affairs," he means that the majority has a right to govern badly. Now, "governing badly" means taking other people's money in taxes and making no return for it, but putting it—drawn as it is from the pockets of the poor and industrious—into the pockets of the idle and the vicious, and thus encouraging them in their idleness and vice, and demoralizing the young by the spectacle of their behavior. It means the denial of justice to the poor and oppressed, the bad treatment of prisoners and captives, the corruption of judges, the breaking of contracts, and general weakening of man's faith in his fellows, and the paralysis of industry by the spread of insecurity. In great towns it means, in addition to all these things, plague and pestilence and famine, the degradation of men and women to the level of beasts through their exposure to the unchecked greed and villany of rich and unscrupulous scoundrels; it means foul water, foul air, foul streets, foul houses—everything, in short, that tends to debase humanity both physically and morally. When, therefore, you say that "the people" has a right to mismanage its affairs, you say in a roundabout and sonorous way that if two hundred men and women are left on an island, fifty-one of the men have a right to rob the other one hundred and forty-nine persons of the fruits of their industry, and to spend it in riotous living, to make their abodes hateful, the air they breathe pestiferous, and to debauch the minds of their children by the spectacle of unpunished fraud, corruption, and licentiousness.

We need hardly say that no such doctrine has ever found a resting-place in any Anglo-Saxon community. When the rule of the majority was established in America, it was not an irresponsible rule. "The people" has no more "divine right to govern wrong" than kings have. Majorities act in subjection to the moral law just as much as individuals. The Evening Post admires, and justly admires, the New England towns, and refers to them and their origin as admirable examples of democratic principles embodied in fit and beautiful political machinery, and recommends a close imitation of them in the government of this city. We beg to remind The Post, however, that the democracy of New England, whether in town or State, has never claimed absolute power. If there be one feature in its rule more marked than another, it is the emphasis and persistence with which it has acknowledged its subordination to the great principles of morality, its obligation to legislate "in the fear of God," and with an ever-present consciousness that the rule of the majority, like all other rules, was a trust and not a "right." A man may have a right to waste his own money, to submit to the exactions of thieves and peculators, or share their plunder with them, but the doctrine that any two men have a right to force a third to submit to such a régime is, of course, as absurd as it is monstrous, and has never received the smallest recognition in any political community in America, and, we sincerely trust, never will.

We protest, too, most emphatically against the notion that the majority, even if they are blackguards, drunkards, gamblers, or swindlers, have "a right" to send men of their stamp to legislate for them and the decent, industrious, or intelligent minority—to vote away their money, regulate their schools and their courts of justice. The power, they may but ought not to have; the right, never. In no plan of government fit for any community but a band of brigands ought such a doctrine to find any place. Its very appearance here shows how the representative theory has run to seed in the fat and nasty political soil of this city. When the majority elect a ruffian or swindler or a cheat to discharge a public trust, they are guilty of just the same moral offence as a bad monarch or president who, in like manner, should abuse his appointing power. It seems less heinous, perhaps, but only because the guilt is divided amongst a greater number of people. If Louis Fifteenth had made a pimp prime minister, the pimp's being a fair representative of his master would not have made the appointment justifiable; and when the Sixth Ward sends a ruffian to the Common Council or to Congress, the ruffianism of the constituency does not alter the character of the transaction. The majority has simply abused its trust.

We believe most firmly in the government of the majority. We think there is no government so likely to consult the general interest, and act for it. But we do not believe in its supreme wisdom or holiness. We believe it is sometimes wrong and sometimes mistaken. We believe it is often guilty of wickedness and injustice and folly, like all other human beings or collections of human beings armed with absolute power. But from its decisions there is no appeal in this world except to its better reason, its nobler impulses; and it is the duty of journalists and preachers and moralists and statesmen who have the privilege of living under the rule of the majority of an enlightened community to keep its conscience alive by constantly reminding it of its frailty and liability to error. A worse service no man can render "the people" than to assure it of its exemption from moral responsibility.

Finally, let us repeat, the majority to which, under our present political system, all citizens of this State owe allegiance in all matters not of national concern, and from which the minority everywhere in all counties and towns has a right to claim protection for purse, health, and liberty, is the majority of the people of the State of New York, and not the majority who in this or that city elect the mayors and common councilmen. It is with the State of New York the dwellers in this city have cast in their lot, and not with the Island of Manhattan. It is on the intelligence, sense of justice, and patriotism of the people of the State that decent men who fix their abode in this city, and bring their children up in it, have to rely; and we trust the Constitutional Convention will remember that the State cannot get rid of its responsibility to the minority here under cover of any theory of the rights of "the people." "The people" is not to be found either in the Sixth Ward or on this island, but over the whole State. The doctrine of the omnipotence or infallibility of every little knot of men which squats on a patch of soil which happens to be called a "ward" or a "town" or a "county" is anarchical in its very nature.

WOMEN AND JURIES.

It appears to be a settled principle of jury-made law that offences against chastity may be punished with death by the woman's nearest male relative, or, in default of a male relative, by herself, and that no warning need be given to the culprit nor explanation asked of him. Moreover, it is no longer necessary that he be taken flagrante delicto in order to warrant his killing, or that the evidence against him be at all conclusive. A simple statement of a woman that a man has insulted or seduced her is now regarded by juries as sufficient to justify his being slain unawares, with all his imperfections upon his head. We might fill a column with illustrations of what we are here asserting, in the shape of stories of cowardly murders perpetrated by women, or friends of women, which juries were asked in vain to punish.

The last case of this kind is one of which everybody in this State is now talking—the murder of Mr. Hiscock, a member of the Constitutional Convention at Albany. He is shot suddenly by one of his friends, a General Cole, and in defense of his crime the murderer tells three different stories—first, that Hiscock had violated his wife; secondly, that he had seduced her; and thirdly, that he had simply insulted her—all of them resting on the statement of the wife herself, who, it appeared, did not discontinue her intercourse with Hiscock in consequence of anything that had happened. The only bit of corroborative evidence drawn from the husband's observation consisted, it seems, of the highly suspicious circumstance that the murdered man asked him one day, "when was he going away?" So that if Cole should be acquitted we shall have fresh support for the theory that any woman who has a jealous or crackbrained husband, and little regard for her own reputation, may have any man shot or knifed by reporting him as having behaved unhandsomely to her. In fact, a bad woman who had tried to seduce a man and failed, might in this way gratify her rage and desire of revenge by having him incontinently "taken off;" and if juries allowed this doctrine to take root and flourish, the best and most proper man in the community would hold his life at the mercy of any worthless couple who happened to have an acquaintance with him and might for any reason desire his destruction.

The law, we believe, forgives the slaying by a husband of a man taken in adultery; but it does so not because it approves of the practice of avenging one's own injuries, but because it supposes some injuries to be too great for ordinary mortals to submit to them in cold blood. In other words, it is presumed that a man who witnessed his own dishonor would be sure to lose all self-control. But there is in this no sanction whatever for the modern doctrine that if A. hears or suspects that B. has been ruining his domestic peace, he may go in search of him with deadly weapons, and whenever he meets him, be it days or months afterwards, kill him on the spot. In fact, a good many of these moral murders are now committed not only in cold blood, but by gentlemen and ladies who are not much troubled at all by the loss of their "honor," and sleep just as soundly as if they still had it in their keeping. They kill "seducers" simply because it is "the thing" to do, and the public expects it of them; or because they think it will procure them a little pleasing notoriety. Nothing could better prove the debauched condition of public opinion, as expressed by juries, than the fact that some of the murderers whose wrongs have excited most sympathy have been themselves rakes and adulterers of the worst kind, and, after polluting other people's homes for years, have been supposed —poor fellows—to be incapable of enduring the pollution of their own.

We all know the way in which these beautiful justifications of the uncontrollable indignation of the injured husband or the betrayed woman are got up. The murder is generally committed in some public place, so that there may be plenty of witnesses. As soon as it is done, the murderer, though pale, becomes perfectly calm, and surrenders without difficulty, and after giving some slight signs of intended but easy-to-be-foiled suicide is conducted to prison, where he is the object of marked attention on the part of the jailer or his wife, and is waited on soon after by some of the liveliest and most graphic members of the "reportorial corps." Then come the most delicious moments of the whole drama. The murderer gives his own version of his wrongs, with the delightful consciousness that he cannot be contradicted, the only person who could contradict him being dead. He tells of his agonies, of "the fire in his brain," his sleepless nights, his horrible misgivings, his early happiness, his passionate love, his wonderful sacrifices for "the frail being" for whose sake he has assassinated; and down it all goes on paper, and soon appears in print. And while the tale is fresh the newspapers are never weary of making additions to it, and the hero enjoys more notoriety than ever he hoped in his wildest dreams. When the day of trial comes on it is a grand day. The court is crowded; the audience and the jury lay in extra pocket handkerchiefs; the prisoner is dressed simply, but with care, and wears an interesting and melancholy air. The leading masters of balderdash at the bar are engaged for the defence, and the defence consists mainly of fulsome praise of the assassin and abuse of his victim. All that fustian can do is done to make woman appear a kind of pretty animal without sense, or discretion, or conscience, whom any naughty man can seduce, and whom naughty men must, therefore, let alone on pain of death. Then comes the description of the husband's agonies, if the husband be the murderer. He is presented to the jury as a mad bull, whom the mere sight of "the destroyer of his peace" rouses into uncontrollable fury, and who has to go about trying to kill him by a law of his being, just as tigers have to prowl and spring and tear in order to satisfy their hunger.

Now, we think the better portion of the public has reached the conclusion that we have had enough of this sort of thing; that it is high time that the old doctrine that premeditated killing, no matter what the provocation may be, is murder, and deserves, in the interest of society, to be punished as murder, ought to be reasserted. The only possible excuse that can be put forward for the conduct of juries in refusing to convict "injured husbands" for killing seducers in cold blood, is that the honor of wives cannot be preserved in any other way; but this excuse we imagine very few men would be willing to accept as valid if presented to them in its naked simplicity. If wives need any legal assistance in preserving their virtue, it ought to be supplied in the regular way, by making adultery a criminal offence; so that when a man is accused of destroying anybody's peace, he will at least get a hearing for his version of the affair; and even if he is to be put to death on conviction, will be put to death with decent human formalities instead of being shot like a mad dog. But pending the provision of legal punishment for these offences, wives and husbands must be left to take care of their own honor, and must find other means of taking care of it than the use of deadly weapons against anybody the wife chooses to point out as her "betrayer." We think that, however opinions may differ as to woman's fitness for the suffrage, very few people will be found to deny that, in her present state of mental and moral development, married women, at least, ought to be able to take care of their own chastity, and ought to be made to do it, and be punished, if anybody is punished, when it is lost. Their whole training from childhood up is concentrated on their preparation for this one duty, and society and the church have surrounded the discharge of it with the most terrible sanctions. Married women, too, have what young unmarried women have not, the knowledge and experience necessary to warn them of their danger; and there is something false and ridiculous in the popular theory that when they fall they are the innocent victims, the men the real criminals. Women, to be sure, are proverbially "frail," but so are men; and in the existing state of opinion a woman brings to the violation of the marriage vow a much stronger and more deep-rooted sense of the sin of it than a man does, and is therefore, on any sound theory of accountability, by far the guiltier of the two. The theory of woman's character and position on which blame, in cases of adultery, is now distributed, and on which the murder of seducers is justified, is really very little superior to that set out in the laws of Menu. She is so helpless, so conscienceless, so ready to fall, that to throw temptation in her way is considered the foulest act a man can commit, and it is so hard to keep her from falling that public sentiment authorizes the husband to assassinate his best friends in broad daylight for the protection of her purity.

The case of young, unmarried women is, we admit, different. Whether rightly or wrongly, they are so educated that they neither know when they are running risks nor how to guard against them, and as long as this system of education is or has to be continued, fathers and brothers must be armed with summary powers for protecting them or the legal penalties of seduction must be made vastly heavier than they are now. But, as a matter of fact, the women who take the law into their own hands and kill their faithless lovers and secure impunity from juries, are hardly ever youthful innocents. They are generally tolerably mature spinsters, who know perfectly well what they are about, both when they are lavishing their affections on the unworthy object, and when they are pistolling him for running away, and there is probably no more repulsive spectacle to be witnessed than the mock trials of offences of this kind by which our courts are sometimes disgraced. In fact, side by side with the agitation in one portion of the community for woman's admission to greater social freedom, is growing up a tendency, in another portion, to release her more and more from both legal and moral responsibility. There is strong reluctance abroad to convict a good-looking woman of any offence whatever. We even doubt whether Bridget Dergan, who killed her mistress the other day in New Jersey, would, though not good-looking, have been convicted had she simply killed her master. But when it is made to appear that love is at the bottom of a young woman's crimes, juries become deaf to the claims of order and law and morality. As soon as the tender side of the tragedy begins to show itself in the evidence the jurymen wipe their eyes, the court blows its nose, the counsel's voice grows husky, and the "poor young thing" is dismissed with the deepest emotion, and the friends of the dead man sneak to their desolate homes amidst the frowns of the indignant and virtuous crowd.

JOHN BRIGHT AS AN ORATOR.

II.

THE only living Englishman who can be spoken of as a rival in eloquence of John Bright is that admirable scholar, that ornate, diffuse, Ciceronian orator, that high-minded statesman, Mr. Gladstone. Upon the question, so often discussed abroad, of their comparative merits Louis Blanc has given an opinion which very characteristically is both a verdict and an epigram: "Mr. Gladstone would be the first orator in England were there no Mr. Bright, and although there is a Mr. Bright, Mr. Gladstone is unquestionably the first orator in the House of Commons." In thus awarding the palm to Mr. Gladstone for parliamentary eloquence and to Mr. Bright for that sort of eloquence which is most effective with popular assemblages, the brilliant exile has no doubt expressed the general conclusion of English society, though we incline to think it is a conclusion which will not be confirmed by the next generation.

But aside from any comparison between the two men, if we take a critical inventory of Mr. Bright's stock of faculties as contributing to his success in oratory, we shall not get far without being struck by the observation that his very greatest faculty is the faculty of keeping all his other faculties in poise. He has imagination; he has enthusiasm; he has courage; he has fluency; he has wit, humor, sarcasm, the gift of invective; he has the power of statement, both for facts and for arguments; but far more serviceable than any one of these gifts is the gift of preventing any one of them from running away with him. In other words, Mr. Bright seems to have that very uncommon thing, common sense.

We are aware that the charge most frequently made against Mr. Bright by cold, timid, and conservative critics in England, is that he lacks precisely this balance of mental power. But it may be suspected whether, after all, this criticism does not come from people who themselves lack the very balance which they accuse him of wanting. Is it not legitimate to remind them that the warmth of emotion and the occasional vehemence of speech which Mr. Bright exhibits in the popular cause may, under the circumstances, be a proof of a well-regulated mind; and that their own insensibility to the moral force and the pathos of the popular claims, instead of indicating a philosophical nature, may rather mark an ill-regulated and a deformed one? Unless philosophers are to be defined as human beings not allowed to keep a conscience or a heart, is it not true that the argument for a great people's redress may at last become so urgent that even a philosopher shall have the right to employ Dr. Young's stern assurance:

"On such a theme 't were impious to be calm;
Passion is reason, transport temper here?"

At all events, it is natural that politicians who are nearly frozen to death with social selfishness, or nearly frightened to death at the ominous advance of liberalism, should look upon the democratic ardor, the faith in man, and the courage of John Bright as madness; just as Coleridge's fellow-students at the university, who, carousing till two or three o'clock in the morning, voted him drunk, for the very excellent reason that, having been studying Greek all the evening instead of drinking champagne, in their opinion he looked "so very queer."

A delightful chapter might be written on the wit of John Bright; and this gift of wit is one of his most effective weapons of success as an orator. It not only illumines and relieves the weightier passages of his speech, but it mows down prejudice and carries rout and dismay where serious argument would be simply swamped in stupidity. Not even Disraeli can punish an opponent so severely; for the wit of Disraeli, though keener and more subtile, is absolutely without humor: it is neither so hearty as Bright's nor backed by so genial a power of reasoning. Mr. Bright's wit is thoroughly human; it is broad, spontaneous, and sympathetic; and even when it seizes its victim and binds him to the whipping-post, and lays on without counting the lashes, it does so with such a genuine and magnetic glee that even the poor devil himself who keeps account of the strokes must break into laughter in the midst of his yells.

When, in the Reform struggle of 1866, Mr. Lowe and Mr. Horsman seceded from the Liberals, and began to put on airs, and to have much to say about their new party, John Bright made infinite fun of "this party of two," as he called it, by comparing it to a Scotch terrier, "which was so covered with hair that you could not tell which was the head and which the tail." The roars of mirth with which both sides of the House shook that night reverberated through England, and thenceforward for many months. At all the political meetings somebody was sure, at the fitting time in the evening, to rouse again the merry shouts of the people by elevating upon the platform a huge print of this hirsute and bicephalous beast, images of which were in demand in all parts of the kingdom. It was in the same speech that Mr. Bright produced even greater effects, both in the House and in the country, by speaking of the bench on which the new party was sitting as "the cave of Adullam, where were to resort every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented;" and thus the ridiculous nickname of "Adullamites" was born into the vocabulary of English politics—a jest which did more service in checking treason to the Liberal cause than all the grave orations that had been made within twelve months.

But Mr. Bright's wit, even when it does not flash out in these great epochal displays, whereby a joke of his has sometimes changed the face of English politics and upset or confirmed a cabinet, may be constantly observed dancing and gleaming along the edge of all his utterances. Replying to a conservative speech of Bulwer Lytton's last spring, he said:

"The right honorable baronet comes down once or twice during the session, and makes a speech which gives great satisfaction to the House, provided you do not pay the least attention to what there is in it. I mean that in tone, manner, and imagery we are pleased; but I am grieved when I find to what side he gives his great influence. In his speech last night he used generous words of the working-men, and told us how there was a tie not only of interest, but of respect and affection, between the rich and the laboring poor. But to give them compliments of this kind and flattery of this nature, and not votes, seems to me to be a thing which will go down very ill with the great body of the people, who are asking that at least some of them may be admitted to a representation in this House. It reminds me very much of that couplet, which I am sure the right honorable gentleman will remember, from Shenstone:

'He kicked them down stairs with such a sweet grace,
They may think he is handing them up.'"

There seems a sort of irony in that appointment by which such a man as John Bright was to find himself born among a sect distinguished by the tenets of meekness and non-resistance. In how facetious a mood Destiny must have been when it arranged that the most renowned of living Quakers should be the most pugnacious of living politicians! Appreciating to the full the English love of fair play, of pluck, manliness, and magnanimity, the hereditary follower of George Fox has the spirit of a knight-errant; he ranges over the field of politics as if for the very joy of combat, to rout monsters from their caves and despots from their castles, breaking a lance with every defiant horseman, and eager to rescue all weak mortals that suffer under wrong. Jousts, skirmishes, battles, seem to be his native element. There are persons whose creeds are written upon their faces, and the catechism they swear by is recited in their gait. No one reads "Quaker" in the features or the bearing of John Bright. Of the middle height, broad-shouldered, thick-set, with a smooth, open English face—none the less English that it retains just a tinge of the national attribute of haughtiness—with small gray eyes, raying out a discriminative sort of kindness, before which folly, meanness, and insincerity must stand very uncomfortable; with a mouth compressed, imperious, and eloquent, and that kind of firm, strong, combative chin, which those men have of whom it is usually said that "they will not stand any nonsense"—he moves along the stands or fronts the Tory benches with an air rather more than resigned to any little disturbance that his intimate enemies may feel inclined to precipitate upon him. We do not suppose that Cobden fell behind Bright in saying severe things, not only of but to the privileged classes across the broad aisle of the House of Commons; but it was always evident that Cobden said these things reluctantly. It is quite possible that Mr. Bright feels a similar reluctance, but no one, from Mr. Bright's manner, would be likely to accuse him of it.

There is a story told of the two friends which illustrates this point of contrast between them. It is said that they were once driving down to the House of Commons together, upon occasion of a great debate in which they were to take part. Cobden, as usual before speaking, was anxious and depressed. Bright, on the contrary, was full of the gaudium certaminis, anticipating the proud rapture of the coming fray and of their own inevitable victory. "I know you can enjoy it all," said Cobden, "and perhaps it is so best. But I hate having to beard in this way hundreds of well-meaning, wrong-headed people, and to face the look of rage and loathing with which they regard me. I had a thousand times rather not have to do it; but it must be done."

We have directed attention to the extraordinary prominence of combativeness in Mr. Bright's nature, because it enables us to indicate an equally prominent quality in his oratory. That oratory being the unaffected effluence of the man himself, is steeped through and through with this combative element. His sentences are braced up and muscular with the spirit of warfare. They are constituted of noble English; they are permeated by wit; they rear a very solid structure of fact and argument, but their form and hue and moving life are contributed by his moral and passionate nature. His rhetoric is the rhetoric of strife. The words of John Bright have the Luther-like ring; they are half-battles. Each sentence smites like the blow of an old warrior's axe. He seems to go into a speech as a ship-of-war does into battle, clearing the decks and sending all non-combatants below. He has carried to perfection what William Wirt referred to as "the feliciter audax, both in manner and expression." Kinglake, the historian, has wittily accounted for Mr. Bright's power as an aggressive orator by noting the inseparable connection between his heart and tongue. "Besides that, he was honest and fearless; besides that, with a ringing voice, he had all the clearness and force that resulted from his one-sided method of thinking, he had the advantage of generally being able to speak in a state of sincere anger." It seems that Mr. Bright would largely sympathize with the idea of preaching held by John Knox, who used to refer to his successors in the ministry as "the faithful men that God of his mercie shall appoint to fight after me." It is a confirmation of what we have been saying that during Mr. Bright's whole career, early and late, the descriptions of his oratory one meets with commonly fall into the imagery of strife. Said Henry Colman, twenty-one years ago:

> "Bright is a sort of Quaker, plain-spoken, fearless, denunciatory, and excessively bitter, because he has been often baited both in and out of Parliament, and scents the hounds before they get upon his track; and so far from flying seems to delight in turning round and holding them at bay, occasionally stopping the yelping of a cur by the slap of his tail, or tossing a fierce mastiff upon his horns high in the air."

Said Louis Blanc, not long ago:

> "John Bright's sentences sound to the charge, ringing like the blast of a bugle."

To state the impression which the rising of Mr. Bright in Parliament makes upon an observer, it would perhaps be accurate to say, under favor of the amiable gentlemen of the P. R., that he always looks as if he "meant business." The vast majority of speakers there do not so impress you. They appear to have risen to test the acoustic qualities of the chamber, or to get a little elocutionary practice, or because they know that their constituents will be expecting a speech from them, or to obtain the proud satisfaction of seeing their names the next day in The Times, or even, as a waggish member, Mr. John Hardy, once confessed, "in pure self-defence, just as one is compelled to smoke on entering a room filled with smokers." Accordingly, in much of the speaking of the House of Commons there is an indirectness, an incertitude, a rambling and shambling method of getting to the point, even an indifference about ever getting there at all; a lack of positive conviction; an absence of earnestness; an abject loitering in commonplace, unredeemed even by the unctuous bluster, the innocent and jubilant rhodomontade, of an American Congressman; and finally, timidity—that last infirmity of ignoble minds—a timidity that cowers before the puerilities of conventionalism with an abasement deadening to every spark of original thought or feeling. Mr. Bright differs from most other speakers in the House of Commons just as a man with an animating and a grand purpose differs from a man without any particular purpose at all. This is indeed the tonic of his eloquence. Then, too, Mr. Bright early learned that whosoever in this world has anything worthy to do or say must rid his soul of the fear of man—if, indeed, as in Mr. Bright's case seems unlikely, he ever had such a thing as the fear of man in his soul. Thus, with something to say, and perfect courage to say it; with a sense of justice, a tenderness of heart, and an excitability that flame into insupportable indignation over wrong perpetrated by the strong; with an utterance grave, powerful, fluent; with a love of details in narrative or statistical argument sufficient to give body to the aspiring soul of his eloquence; with an imagination kindling over his theme and giving to it both warmth and unity, yet saved by his logical sense and his humor from that fault of Curran's whereby "his flights of eloquence were commonly flights from the cause of his client;" with his theoretical notions of right tempered by a knowledge of the practical difficulties in the way of reducing these notions to reality; he is the master of a diction at once terse, copious, splendid, and effective; of an

"Eloquence that charms and burns,
Maddens, soothes, and wins by turns."

It is painful to be obliged to mention that though Mr. Bright is but fifty-six years of age, the physical power requisite to popular oratory is failing him. His mental conditions were never so perfect as now. He is fully ripe. His intellectual touch along the keys of expression is now firm, precise, full, confident. All his later utterances have those precious qualities which only years and the best fruition of years can give—breadth, solidity, compactness, a balanced and calm wisdom, the stormy enthusiasm of an earlier day mellowed by the generous lessons of sorrow. Now more than ever has Mr. Bright the spiritual fitness to be a great political teacher for England and the world. But the living voice is the only vehicle of expression he has ever employed, and his voice has lost its endurance. He seems to have a seated bronchial disease. The last time we heard him, in August, 1866, he spoke with an appearance of difficulty and pain. It was only by great moderation, by frequently pausing, and especially by soothing his throat with wine at almost every sentence, that he was able to get through at all. And this has been his experience ever since.

PARIS GOSSIP.

Paris, June 1, 1867.

Rossini's last party was one of the most brilliant he has ever given. Nearly all the leading musical artists of the day lent their talents on the occasion, producing an effect not to be rivalled by any ordinary concert. Carlotta Patti, encouraged by the ovations she has been receiving in her tour through the French provinces, has at last consented "to produce herself" in this city, and has conquered, on her first appearance, a place in the foremost rank of living singers. Her voice is of a different timbre from that of her sister, but equally beautiful and equally flexible; her artistic training has been the same, and equally successful. Though, perhaps, a handsomer woman than the admired Adelina, Carlotta is slightly lame, and therefore refuses to appear on the stage, confining herself to concert-singing, in which walk she seems destined to a career as triumphant as that of her sister upon the stage. Madame Persiani, formerly a musical star of the first magnitude, but wise enough to retire from the operatic firmament before its lustre had begun to wane, has just departed this life, to the regret of the musical world and of a large circle of friends. This lady, on whose name the charming anagram sine pari (without equal) was composed by an enthusiastic admirer, had resided for many years in Italy, where she had made a brilliant and happy marriage.

The literary world, rather given to getting up of rows about anything and everything susceptible of being made a pretext for squabbling, after venting its indignation on the municipal authorities for not having put up a new flag at the Théâtre Français in honor of the Exhibition; on a well-known feuilletoniste for stating that it was Fiorentino who had the honor of devising, with Alexander Dumas, the plot of "Monte Cristo," whereas that honor is angrily claimed by Auguste Maquet, documents in hand; on the London Tailors' Union for sending funds to aid their Paris brethren in their present strike, "obviously with a view to getting the Paris trade transferred to London;" on the strike of the journeymen hair-dressers, which threatens to interfere with the perfection of Parisian toilets; and finally upon Victor Hugo, whose principal works are being revived at the Français, because this revival keeps out newer authors who want to get in, and because Paris generally withdraws its sympathy from the absent, and after pouring contempt upon Lamartine for being willing to accept the pecuniary reward, in regard to which the Government has sent in a plan for the consideration of the Senate, has been chuckling over the neat little rap on the knuckles given to Garnier-Pages by the maire of one of the arrondissements of Paris, has been growling over the stupidity of a subordinate in another of the mairies, called on to register the birth of the baby who has raised Alexander Dumas, senior, to the dignity of grandfather, and has been blowing all its horns and beating all its drums over the election of the Abbé Gratry and M. Jules Favre to the academic chairs left vacant by the decease of M. Cousin and M. Barante.

All who have ever met M. Garnier-Pages will remember the unflagging perseverance with which he remembers, and causes all about him to remember, that he was raised to the dignity of Minister of Finance by the short-lived Republic of 1848. A Frenchman's ideal, in nine cases out of ten, is to be a minister, and the gentleman in question is no exception to the rule. Though a democrat of the most pronounced type, as far as regards unwillingness to admit the existence of a superior, M. Garnier-Pages still is, and always will be, in spirit and feeling, the occupant of the dignified and influential post he formerly held; and whenever he goes into society he gets himself into an arm-chair in the corner of a room, never stirs from it until he leaves, and there, getting round him a little court of friends and admirers, he holds forth on the events of the late Republic, constantly interspersing his reminiscences with "When I held the portfolio of finance," or, "When I had to defend, in the Chamber, the project which as Minister of Finance I felt it my duty," etc. This gentleman having to serve as witness to a civil marriage a short time ago, was much amazed on reaching the mairie at finding twelve couples already waiting there, thus causing a long delay to the couple to whose party he belonged, and threatening to keep the ex-Finance Minister absent from his place in the Legislative Assembly until the close of a certain debate in which he was to take part. "How very inconvenient," he whispered to the maire, who was putting on his scarf preparatory to calling up couple No. 1; "I was hoping to get back quickly to the Chamber."

The functionary addressed, defining the unexpressed wish in the mind of the ex-minister, replied, with a sly smile, "The delay is indeed annoying; but I could never venture, in presence of so stern an advocate of equality as yourself, to favor later arrivals at the expense of parties who, having arrived earlier, have a right to take their turn before them!" Whereupon M. Garnier-Pages, feeling himself caught, bit his lips, but said nothing.

The registration absurdity was perpetrated in this wise. Dumas, Jr., who, two years ago, married a Russian lady, Princess Narishkine, has just been presented by that lady with a daughter, and, as the weather was bad, the delighted father went off to the mairie next day to have the child registered, leaving the baby at home, but taking with him the witnesses required by law; but the clerk refused to make the registration unless the father brought a certificate from the doctor. Armed with this document, Dumas, Jr., presented himself next day; but the clerk, learning that the child was to be named Jeannine, and not finding that name in the calendar, again refused to register. Dumas, Jr., went off to get an authorization from the maire, but, on returning to the office, found it closed for the day. Next day, when Dumas, Jr., went back to the office, the clerk refused to register the child unless he saw the deeds attesting the name, rank, etc., of the mother. Dumas hastened back to his house, procured the documents, and returned with them to the office, when the clerk declared that the legal delay (twenty-four hours) having expired, he could not make the registration. But Dumas, fairly out of patience, insisted so energetically in his demand that the clerk at last consented to make the necessary entry; but only on condition that the birth should be after-dated by twenty-four hours, so as to shield himself from the charge of having registered the child after the period assigned by the Code. Finding remonstrance useless, Dumas consented to this change of date; but, as soon as the registration was completed, brought the batteries of his eloquence to bear upon the vexatious official, insisting with such abundance of demonstration on the enormity of the crime of "falsification" he had committed, and drawing so frightful a picture of its possible consequences, that the clerk, ashamed, subdued, and terrified nearly out of his wits, became as pale as death, and at length burst into tears. Having brought his persecutor to this point, and satisfied with this avenging of his wrongs, Dumas then withdrew, leaving the unhappy clerk to his reflections. And thus it has come to pass that Mlle. Jeannine Dumas will always be, de par la loi, one day younger than her real age.

The admission of the two new members to the Academy is looked forward to with the utmost eagerness, the many piquantes anecdotes that have been circulating in regard to the candidateship of the two members having raised to the highest point the curiosity already stimulated by their contrasting antecedents and convictions. When Count de Falloux, director of the Academy, waited on the Emperor to submit the double election as usual to the Imperial sanction, his Majesty replied, "I very willingly ratify a double election in which the Academy has given a great proof of evangelical charity by uniting two men whom so many reasons seemed to keep apart." To which ingenious utterance, delivered with the quiet half-smile peculiar to him, his ex-minister, with an answering expression of countenance, replied, "I think, sire, that the Academy has been inspired less by evangelic charity than by the spirit of its mission. It has remembered that it is the republic of letters, and that as such its duty is to welcome the various representatives of French genius in its brilliance and its independence. Under Louis XIV. it chose its elect among the Fronde, and under Louis XV. it elected philosophers." This little dialogue, in which the Emperor while ratifying the new elections with the best possible grace, so cleverly abstained from mentioning the names of either, and in which the distinguished orator of the brilliant aristo-democratic Utopia of Neo-Catholic Ultramontanism contrived to hint so many things in so few and simple-seeming words, has been intensely enjoyed from one end of Paris to the other. But what will excite yet more keenly the curiosity of Paris is the interview that (in accordance with the custom which makes it incumbent on each new member after his admission to pay his respects to the sovereign in a solemn audience at the Tuileries) will bring the eminent republican barrister face to face with the Emperor of whom, ever since the establishment of the Empire, he has been so bitter, persistent, and systematic an opponent.

JUST ISSUED:

"CARMINA YALENSIA,"

A new collection of College Songs and Music, as sung by the Students of Yale and other Colleges, with Pianoforte accompaniments, compiled and arranged by FERD. V. D. GARRETSON, of the Class of 1866, and comprising all the old popular and standard college songs, with numerous pieces not hitherto published. The famous "Wooden Spoon Lanciers" and the "Song of the Spoon," also, the celebrated "Christmas Anthem," as sung by the Beethoven Society of Yale, are included in this collection.

NATURE AND LIFE.

BY ROBERT COLLYER, "THE BLACKSMITH PREACHER."

"Full of lessons drawn from the external world in its beauty and sublimity, and of the sympathetic and fraternal reading of the experiences of the human soul. The many readers this genial, hopeful, and poetic book, with its catholic good sense and spiritual fervor, is to have, will find in its pages those qualities of mind and heart which some of them have found so instructive and attractive when expressed by the living voice of the sincere and earnest preacher."—Transcript.

Seasonable New Books.

I.

A RUSSIAN NOVEL—FATHERS AND SONS. Translated from the Russian of Ivan Serghelevitch Turgenef. By Eugene Schuyler, Ph.D. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

The publishers would state that this work has been issued upon its literary merits without regard to the fact of its being, in some sense, a "curiosity." Purely as a novel, they believe it fit to rank with the best productions of our time. As a picture of Russian life and institutions, it of course possesses more value than any work yet published in America.

II.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. Reprinted from the New York Nation. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

Some of the most valuable and successful books recently issued in England have consisted of essays reprinted from the high-toned critical and literary weekly newspapers. The publishers present this volume, composed from an American journal which the first scholars of the country have thought worthy to rank with The Spectator, The Examiner, and The Saturday Review, in the full assurance that it will obtain, as it deserves, equal favor and equal permanence with the English reprints of the same description.

III.

THE MAN WITH THE BROKEN EAR. Translated from the French of Edmond About. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

One of those peculiar novels, based on scientific theories, in which M. About has been distinctively successful. The chief feature of the book is a very humorous though philosophical illustration of the fact, that when a man dies he will be apt to find it more comfortable to remain dead than to return to life fifty years after his demise. The speculation in natural science on which the story is founded is more interesting in itself, more elaborately developed, and more entertaining in its supposed consequences, than any other of M. About's books.

IV.

FRITHIOF'S SAGA. From the Swedish of Esaias Tegner, Bishop of Wexiö. First American edition. Edited by Bayard Taylor. 12mo, $1 75.

"One of the most remarkable productions of the age." —Longfellow.

"No poetical work of modern times stands forth so prominently and peculiarly a representative of the literature of a race and language."—Extract from Mr. Taylor's Preface.

V.

KING RENE'S DAUGHTER. Translated from the Danish of Henrik Hertz. By Theo. Martin. 16mo, gilt top, $1 25.

"A welcome gift to our literature."—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

"One of the most simply beautiful little dramas in any literature. No one can read the play once without a disposition to return to it again and again, and he may do so with the full assurance that each time he will be rewarded with the discovery of new beauties."—Round Table.

VI.

POEMS. By Robert K. Weeks. 16mo, cloth, gilt top, $1 25.

"A work which deserves, and we believe will receive, at the hands of those whose appreciation is the student's great reward, the recognition and homage due to the vital spirit of poetry."—Round Table.

"Should Mr. Weeks never write another line, his claim to an honorable mention among American poets would be secure."—Springfield Republican.

VII.

THE JOURNAL OF MAURICE DE GUERIN. 12mo, $1 25.

"The most secret and sacred confidences of a man whose character and genius were peculiar and lofty."—Round Table.

"He has written pages which will live as long as his language."—Nation.

"His descriptions are pictures, his thoughts passions, his affections music."—Liberal Christian.

VIII.

THE HUGUENOT GALLEY-SLAVE. Being the Autobiography of a French Protestant condemned to the Galleys for the sake of his religion. 12mo, $1 50.

"Open the book where you will, and it is almost impossible to lay it down again. 'It is,' says M. Michelet, a book of the first order, distinguished by the charming naïveté of its recital, by its angelic sweetness, written as if between earth and heaven."—London Reader.

"A more valuable contribution to the records of genuine martyrology could hardly be found. The style of the narrative in its graphic simplicity reminds us of Defoe; but the well-authenticated facts which it relates are more interesting than fiction, and the incidents not less strange."—London Quarterly Review.

IX.

FAITH UNWIN'S ORDEAL. By Georgiana M. Craik. 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1 25.

"The vicissitudes of the story are worked out by the hand of a master. Sensation writing there is none; but though from the beginning of the tale there are but four prominent figures constantly before the reader, their presence never tires."—London Reader.

The Week.

IT is not often that we meet with so scathing an exposure of the results of carelessness and haste in the transaction of important business as is to be found in Mr. Stanbery's "opinion" on the power of the military commanders at the South. The Reconstruction Act was undoubtedly intended by Congress to make the military officers supreme in their districts, but it was framed in such a way that no machinery was provided for carrying on the reconstruction process at all. This was remedied by a supplemental act, and now the two having been submitted to an acute lawyer, he drives a coach-and-six through them; shows that the State governments which the act was intended to displace are still in existence and in full vigor, and that the military commanders, who were selected with so much care, are simply peace officers subject to the civil power Mr. Stevens now calls for a meeting of Congress to amend the bill, but we should think he and some of his colleagues would be heartily ashamed of their work. They appeared to think during the session that the great duty of loyal men was to drive bills through the House without letting the Democrats debate them. We wonder if what has happened will teach them that the "previous question" is a two-edged sword, and that freedom of debate is just as likely to serve the promoters as opponents of measures. Had the Reconstruction Act been thoroughly discussed, there is hardly a doubt that its glaring defects would have sooner or later attracted the attention of some lawyer on one side or other, and that, let party spirit have been ever so strong, self-love would have tempted him to expose them.

THE District Attorney's challenge to the array in the case of Surratt was successful, Judge Fisher ruling that the law requires that the city registrar of Washington, the city clerk of Georgetown, and the clerk of the Levy Court, should, in making the lists of persons qualified as jurors, act separately; but in selecting jurors' names from the lists, should act conjointly. In this case they never acted conjointly. The law passed in 1862 was designed by Congress to take out of the hands of one man—the marshal—the unlimited power of making up juries, and lodge it, where there would be less danger of its being corruptly used, in the hands of three men. The trial, which was long in getting under way, seems to be now moving forward with reasonable speed. The Government expects to prove that the prisoner was present at the murder, aiding and abetting; that the plot to murder was not a hasty scheme of Booth's concocting, but long premeditated; that on the 10th of April the prisoner was recalled by Booth from Montreal to Washington; that on the 14th of April he was in Washington, and two hours before the murder purchased disguises to be used by the assassins; also the places of his concealment in Montreal will be shown, and that on his way to England he confessed his connection with the conspiracy. So far, the strongest testimony against the prisoner is that of Sergeant Dye, who swears, as he swore in the trial of Payne, Mrs. Surratt, and the others, that a few minutes before the murder he saw two men, one of them Booth, talking in front of Ford's theatre, and afterwards heard the one whom he did not know call out to Booth three times, telling him the hour, which he read on the clock in the vestibule. Dye now recognizes Surratt as the "neatly dressed man" who was with Booth on that occasion.

THE nomination of candidates for the next Presidency has begun in earnest. A great many of the country papers, and even some of "the great dailies," are conducting it with the utmost seriousness, and apparently with strong faith in the value of their own predictions. General Grant is a very general favorite with them, and this is really the only strong ground which has yet presented itself for believing that he has no chance. We notice, too, expressions of impatience from political managers now and then touching the general's extreme reticence. This is very comical, inasmuch as outspokenness would certainly ruin him in the estimation of these very men. Wendell Phillips is Grant's leading opponent, as he has concluded, from an accurate comparison of Grant with the Duke of Wellington, that Grant is a knave, and a cowardly knave to boot. Chief-Justice Chase comes next, and his enemies of course, by way of making the canvass pleasant for him, accuse him of diffusing devoted agents through the country in the shape of bankruptcy commissioners. Horace Greeley, we are glad to say, has been nominated by the Blue Earth Southwest, a Minnesota journal. Mr. Greeley deserves this, and we trust the Blue Earth Southwest will not let his claims be forgotten. The design of Providence in permitting the existence of "minor editors," by which Mr. Greeley was so much puzzled, is now made plain. Senator Wade is also a candidate for the "chief magistracy." The Independent speaks of him as "one of our grandest public men," which is almost a nomination, and several other journals and special correspondents speak of him as "Old Ben Wade," a kind of appellation which, when often repeated, is fully equivalent to a nomination. In truth, the possession of a good, popular nickname may be said to be an essential preliminary to a good newspaper nomination for the Presidency—a fact of which Birdofredum Sawin was aware when he requested his friends to keep calling him in the columns of their journals "The One-eyed Slarterer." "Old Ben" himself does not, however, rely on his nickname, as he is out in Kansas preaching confiscation, which is what our milliners would call the "latest novelty." Mr. Phillips says it is a French fashion, but we have shown elsewhere that Mr. Phillips is mistaken. There are other candidates, but either their modesty or their merits leave us little to say about them at present.

We beg The Evening Post to understand that when we say we believe the rule of the majority to be the best rule, and a rule from which there is no appeal except to the better sense and nobler impulses of the majority,—we mean the majority of the whole political community and not the majority of each of the arbitrary divisions into which the community may see fit to cut up its territory. We have said this already as clearly as we know how to say it. If the majority of the State of New York should prove incapable of managing its affairs, we should conclude that republican government in this State had proved a failure; but when the majority of the Sixth Ward proves unable to manage its affairs, we simply conclude that the greater portion of its inhabitants are an ignorant and degraded set, and we appeal to the intelligence of the community at large to protect us against their bad behavior. The Post's claim of divine rights for all clusters of squatters would, if sound and generally acknowledged, have prevented the reform of the London Alsatia, and would certainly convert some districts here into dens of thieves. Even if it were true that all towns or districts could be elevated and educated by the practice of local government, the constant accession of foreigners to the population of New York would prevent the success of the process in this city. No amount of municipal independence here will make the Irish peasant fit the minute he lands to vote away the property of New York merchants and mechanics, and this, notwithstanding The Post's foolish fond belief to the contrary, is one of the first public acts of most Irish immigrants who settle here.

A singular, and we believe novel, form of lottery has been resorted to by a tobacco dealer in this city. He puts a hundred-dollar bill in one of the many hundred tinfoil packages of chewing tobacco which he sends out every day, so that every purchaser gets not only a package of tobacco, but a chance of one hundred dollars. The scheme has been so successful that rival dealers have been entirely driven out of the field. This plan of pushing sales is applicable to many other kinds of business. It might, for instance, be adopted by publishers of popular periodicals. Why not, instead of loading every half-dozen subscribers with a sewing-machine, or a tea-service, slip a fifty-dollar bill into one of every thousand or ten thousand copies put up in wrappers? Think of the joy of the mother and the children when, on cutting the leaves to get at the poetry, or that repertory of wisdom, "The Family Column," a new fresh greenback dropped out. How the anecdotes and the moral paragraphs would be seasoned by such a windfall!

The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain was a thankless, dissatisfied grumbler when compared with Mr. John Ennis, or Mr. John Reid, of this city. Those gentlemen are more thankful for nothing than any persons we have ever heard of. They are out in a letter felicitating the trade organizations of New York and vicinity on the fact that, "after years of patient and persevering work," this State has passed an eight-hour law. Mr. Ennis and Mr. Reid ought to telegraph words of joy to the men and brethren in Connecticut, where we hear that Democrats and Republicans are uniting cordially in putting an eight-hour law through the Legislature—a performance which is infinitely disgraceful to both parties, that is, to the whole community, for it shows how long and how successfully the politicians have fooled the people that they have the impudence to offer it so transparent a humbug as the present bill. It is in all respects like every other one of these measures; it ordains that eight hours shall be considered a working day; and it adds a proviso that employer and employed may agree upon the length of a working day. As Mr. Ennis truly remarks, "We have not yet harvested what we have planted, watered, and grown with so much care and anxiety;" and why he should think he has harvested anything is a question which an extremely small child might ask, and which it would confound an aged philosopher to answer. The Working-men's Union calls a convention, to meet, we believe, on the 27th instant, and there seems to be in the language of the call a promise of moderation which will, we think, be kept by the action of the delegates. Strikes, as the experience of Chicago has recently shown, are out of the question for the present, and each day more is known and more is thought about co-operation.

What proportion of negro blood will prevent a man's being a white male citizen in Kansas has recently been decided by Judge Brewer, of the First District Court in that State. J. H. Morres, a citizen of Leavenworth, of whose parents one was white and one a mulatto, tried to vote at the late election, and was denied the privilege on the ground that he was a man of color. This he denied, and afterwards sued the judges of election. Judge Brewer said, no man with any negro blood had ever been allowed to vote in Kansas; but as the question had never before come up in the State courts, it should be decided in the light of authority and reason. The clause of the State constitution which excludes from the polls all but white male citizens is avowedly borrowed, he said, from the constitution of Ohio. Repeated decrees in Ohio have declared that a man is not a member of the negro race when more than half his blood is derived from other than negro sources. So much for the authorities. As for the light cast on the matter by reason, the court was of opinion that the theory of our Government being universal suffrage, that construction of laws which best consists with the natural theory should be adopted; 2d, that to put a man in a position of inferiority is not humane; 3d, that the words of description apply not to color—if they did they would keep many white men, so called, away from the polls, and admit many lighter-colored "colored men," so called—but to race, and there seems no good reason for saying that a man who is more Caucasian by blood than he is negro should be set down as a negro. The plaintiff got nominal damages; and the question, which is an important one, will, it is likely, go to the Supreme Court. We hope, at all events, that it will not be the fault of our colored fellow-citizens if it does not.

We venture to conjecture that the Anti-Catholic riots at Birmingham, of which the Cable brings us the news, are in reality Anti-Irish riots, bred by the Fenian movement. The Fenians, who are in considerable force in all the manufacturing towns in England, have for some months threatened outbreaks, in the Confederate style, by way of a diversion, and in Leeds and Bradford preparations for such an emergency were actually made by the authorities during the disturbances in Ireland. The feeling between the Irish laborers and the English mechanics, never very cordial, has probably by this time become one of intense hostility, and ended in violence. The danger of this has long been foreseen by everybody but the unconscionable knaves who head the Fenian Brotherhood, and who, by such attempts as that on Chester, did all they could to rouse the feeling of the English masses against them. The most radical Englishman, no matter how much he may sympathize with Irish wrongs, is apt to become a bit of a tiger at the prospect of seeing an Irish mob let loose in his streets. We cannot help hoping, however, that we are mistaken in all this, and that the interpretation put on the matter by The Times and Tribune is the correct one. There is a strong anti-ritualistic feeling amongst the English lower classes, and an anti-ritualistic riot, bad as it would be, would certainly not be so mischievous in its effects as an Anti-Irish one. The Tribune mentions some recent occurrences at Birmingham which strongly support its theory.

The betting at the last Derby has proved so disastrous to a great many people that the whole moral aspects of horse-racing are receiving an amount of attention in England, as will be seen by our correspondent's letter, such as they have hardly ever received before. Goldwin Smith writes to The Manchester Examiner, attributing the prevailing absorption in this form of gambling, at least on the part of the upper classes, "to the absence of any worthy object of interest or desire;" and he predicts that it would disappear, or be greatly abated, "if England had a Parliament capable of being the organ of national inspiration and effort, and if great questions were once more handled in earnest by great men." We are afraid the evil lies deeper than he seems to think. By some men betting on horse-races is, no doubt, pursued simply because it furnishes an agreeable kind of excitement; but nine-tenths of the betters pursue it simply for the chance of making money without labor. The rage to get rich rapidly is to-day at the bottom of the gambling mania in all civilized countries, whether it takes the form of betting on horses or selling stocks on time; and the rage to get rich rapidly is due to the fact that the growth of science and the opening up of new countries have, within the last forty years, enormously increased the facilities for making fortunes in legitimate trade. The lucky strokes made by investors in industrial enterprises, in our time, are such as in the last century only fell to the lot of very fortunate gamblers, and the result is that the popular mind is everywhere unsettled by them; and the vast crowd who writhe under the contrast between others' wealth and their own poverty fly to the course, or the stock exchange, with an avidity and recklessness of which the public does not know one half.

The French are slowly progressing with their new plan of army organization. The Chambers have come to a compromise with the Government by assenting as to the strength of the disposable force, while reserving to themselves the power of authorizing the calling out of the reserves. Beyond this there is little worthy of note in French politics. Everybody in Paris is absorbed in the royal visitors and in the Exhibition, of which our own daily papers are full usque ad nauseam. Our readers may remember that during the war alarm of April and May we maintained that most of the fear was caused by rumors for which it was not possible those who were most active in spreading them could know of any basis, and that the military preparations which were observed in France had no connection with the actual crisis. We find a confirmation of this view by M. Eugène Forçade in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, which we may be excused for quoting:

> "The Luxembourg affair . . . had also its comic side. The blind alarm which it caused for some days was a singular phenomenon. This feeling had a character of idiotic fatalism. There were a great many people who declared war inevitable with a sort of stupid obstinacy, as if they had received a communication from the prophetic pages which the divine children deliver to Michael Angelo's sibyls. According to them, the King of Prussia wanted war, M. de Bismark wanted war, and the French Government wanted war. The military precautions taken in France, and which were the natural and regular preparation which the war department ought to have begun long before, and which would have been made under any circumstances however peaceful, were represented as immense and precipitate arming. One had to be proof against ridicule to be bold enough to avow a belief that peace was still possible."

We have mentioned M. Simon's studies on the French population elsewhere. It is engaging attention as a military question, however, still more than as a humanitarian one. It appears that the population of France increases less rapidly than that of any other European state, except some of the old Italian principalities; and that in France the ratio of increase even is steadily diminishing, so that had the population gone on increasing at the regular rate during the last thirty-four years, over four millions more children would have been born than have been born, and the adult population would have been about two millions and a half greater than it is. In fact, unless figures lie greatly, the reproductive force of the nation is declining; and should no change occur in the rate of increase, France will fifty years hence have only 47,000,000 to oppose to the 67,000,000 of inhabitants which Prussia will boast. This is a grave matter, and the French economists are getting more and more uneasy about it, and trying to get the military men and the court to look at it seriously. The decline is not due to a decrease in the number of marriages, for this number is proportionately as great in France as in England, but in the main to the lateness and unproductiveness of marriages. It appears that the number of persons condemned to perpetual celibacy in France is already very large, and is increasing. There are 42,527 Catholic priests paid by the state, and 53,829 chaplains attached to factories, or drawing their support from other private institutions, besides deacons and sub-deacons, and 90,343 nuns, making in all 204,477 celibates of both sexes—the population of a large town. Then there are generally about 500,000 men in the army, between the ages of twenty and twenty-seven, composed of the very flower of the population, who are forbidden to marry, and who rarely do marry for two or three years after they leave the service, so that nearly a million of persons are either prevented from marrying at all or from marrying early, and the obstacles, both moral and physiological, to productiveness in late marriages are well known. M. Le Fort, who discusses the matter in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, is satisfied that in these two facts, the celibacy of the clergy and of the soldiers, he has found the cause of the decrease of population; but we doubt if they are fully adequate to account for it. Most Frenchmen, civilians as well as soldiers, marry late, and the small number of children to a family in all classes of French society has been often remarked, and is probably due to a high standard of living, to the absence of commercial enterprise, and to the Frenchman's ingrained habit of looking to small savings, and not to push or hard work, as the means of making a provision for his family and his old age.

For many months there has been only one question in Italian politics of any moment, and that is the question of finance, and the only decision that has been reached as yet as to the best means of meeting the deficit, which is now a regular feature in the financial system of the kingdom, is the sale of 600,000,000 francs worth of Church property. Arrangements for this purpose had been made with some Paris capitalist—Rothschild, some say, Erlanger, others say—but at the last moment these gentlemen, whoever they were, refused to carry out their agreement unless the Italian Government came to an amicable understanding with the Church, and the affair, at the last accounts, hangs in uncertainty. The influence which caused the failure of the first attempt is believed to have emanated from what is called in court jargon "the highest quarter," which being put into English probably means the Empress, who, in all that concerns the Church, is not only a Spaniard, but a Spaniard of the eleventh century. That influence of this kind should succeed in breaking off negotiations, or rather an agreement, for a government loan, would be difficult of belief if we did not know that wealth forms only half the stake for which a European financier plays; "social position" forms the other half, and this is one of the few things which monarchs still have in their gift. The south of Italy is in an awful condition with brigandage; and so are the Papal States. The Pope's brigands are birds of his own hatching, as he encouraged them while they were supposed to be fighting for the King of Naples, and it is almost treachery for him now to turn on them and try to catch and kill them. The difficulty about the brigands all over Italy is neither their numbers—though this is great—nor the nature of the country—though this renders it easy for them to elude the troops—but the almost total destruction of the moral portion of the social bond by centuries of bad government. The interest of individuals in public order and prosperity has probably never been so low in any European country since the Middle Ages as it is in Southern Italy, and it will take a generation or two of good courts, good police, good roads, and general prosperity to restore it.

The Jews of Jassy, in Moldavia, were last month the victims of a revived mediæval persecution, contrived for them by the Roumanian minister of the interior, Bratiano. They had suffered not long before from a popular outbreak, but this official went so far as to eject them summarily from their homes and fixed property, and then ordered his police to proceed against them as vagabonds. Without regard to age or quality, and without a show of trial, large numbers of them were arrested, chained, and dragged into exile. An appeal to the Great Powers received sympathy from France and Austria, and the iniquitous measures were speedily revoked. It is not to be supposed that Prince Charles connived at their passage, and the occurrence only shows the mental condition of his subjects and counsellors. It is curious to note that at the same time the Government was preparing to adopt the monetary convention concluded between France, Italy, Switzerland, and Belgium, and, by thus admitting as legal tender the coin of those countries, was taking one step forward towards the western civilization. Bratiano is an old liberal—or rather republican—and was even a good deal of "a red" in his early days, which makes his performance all the more extraordinary.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Artemus Ward once remarked to Mr. Carleton, the publisher, that when he next wrote a book he 'd let Mr. Carleton write it. It did not, however, take the showman long to become quite reconciled to the publisher's editorial supervision, which, as everybody knows, is seldom more needed than in the case of wits who live by their wit, and, of course, make for money many a most melancholy joke. Mr. Carleton has in his hands materials for at least two new volumes of selections from "A. Ward's" writings, both the earlier and the latest, and will soon issue one of them. It is to be made up of his letters to Punch, several other pieces which he wrote while in England, and some early letters. The illustrations, in respect to which the other volumes of A. Ward were not at all admirable, will be from a new hand, and are spoken of highly. We have not seen them. They are from designs by Mr. J. H. Howard. A life of the author is reserved for a future volume. Another humorous writer, whose writings G. W. Carleton & Co. will before very long put into book form, is Mr. J. Stanton. He is known in Brooklyn, where his popularity is considerable, by letters written in George Arnold's "McArone" style, and published under the signature of "Corry O'Lanus.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce a book entitled "The Turk and the Greek; or, Creeds, Races, Society, and Scenery in Turkey, Greece, and the Isles of Greece." Its author is Mr. S. G. W. Benjamin, who, the other day, wrote an article entitled "Crete" for Harper's Monthly, and, we believe, a part of his book has already appeared in that magazine, in The Springfield Republican, and in other periodicals. Mr. Benjamin, the son of an American missionary, was born in the East, and, though educated in this country, has repeatedly visited Greece and Turkey, and may be supposed very familiar with those regions. The Hon. F. Hassaurek, formerly United States Minister to the Republic of Ecuador, is the author of "Four Years among Spanish Americans," which also is announced by Hurd & Houghton—a book that ought to be instructive and entertaining; not many Americans, except American ministers and officers in the naval service, know much about the Pacific side of South America, and if Mr. Hassaurek has made good use of his opportunities his book will be fresh.——Leypoldt & Holt are ready to furnish owners of the Tauchnitz Thackeray with "Denis Duval," and will soon be ready to supply also "The Roundabout Papers."——A new publishing house just established is that of A. Simpson & Co., who will publish the following named periodicals: The N. Y. Medical Journal, of which Dr. William A. Hammond and Dr. E. S. Dunster are editors; The Quarterly Journal of Psychological Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence, edited by Dr. Hammond; The Philobiblion, a work that will have to be taken by all bibliophilists, whether by that name we mean lovers of books or of bibliography. It will be in the excellent editorial hands of Mr. George P. Philes. A. Simpson & Co. will also act as publishers of the publications of the Agathynian Club, a learned sodality which did not begin its work exceedingly well when it issued the "Advice to the Officers of the British Army" as its first book, but which goes on as well as could be desired with its black-letter "Proverbs of Erasmus" and its promised "Works of the Famous Antiquary, Polydore Vergil," which will be its third issue. Messrs. Simpson & Co. put forth a list of works in general science, in medical science, and in general literature, to which we will refer hereafter.

—Mr. Hinton Rowan Helper has, within a day or two, published a very singular book with the absurd title "Nojoque." Readers of the famous "Impending Conflict" will remember that, although that work was anything but a slaveholder's book, it yet was written in the interest of "the white man," and their surprise will be less than that of persons who know Mr. Helper and his book from hearsay only when they are told—we use the author's own language—that "the primary object of this work is to write the negro out of America, and that the secondary object is to write him (and manifold millions of other black and bi-colored caitiffs little better than himself) out of existence." "And thou, too, Ethiopia!" the author says on his title-page, quoting the prophet Zephaniah, "against thee, also, will I unsheathe my sword." So far as we can judge from a hasty examination of the book, which we expect to consider more carefully at some future time, it is one of the most striking examples existing in our literature of the insane lengths to which a man may be carried by the operation of a single idea dominating a nature marked by even more than an average Southerner's deficiency of humor.

—It is among the small secrets of the literary world that a great part of the remarkable success of The Pall Mall Gazette dates from its publication, in its early days, of Mr. James Greenwood's "Amateur Casual" paper. It had, and is still having, very many echoes, none of which are particularly good even as imitations, and none of which have a tithe of the success of the original. The latest we have seen is among the best. It is published in the same journal, and tells how the author, disguised as a tailor, went to see for himself whether the tailors on strike in London use intimidation to prevent a journeyman's doing work if he so chooses. Perhaps the cases constantly reported in the English papers leave very little doubt that intimidation is sometimes used, but the writer wished to convince himself beyond a doubt and to discover the mode of procedure employed. The "picket" on duty near the shop where the pretended "knobstick" got his parcel duly followed him, and when a conversation was brought on by the amateur tailor, took the latter to a small public house, where several men on strike argued the question with the "knobstick," and finally induced him to go with one of their number and have his name put on the books by one of the officials of the league; he did so, and "descended the stairs in the full glory of a trades-unionist and a pound a week." According to the writer's own account, it would seem that in his desire to make sure whether or not "knobsticks" are threatened and beaten, he showed an expectation of violence, and, perhaps, a fear of it, which may have been the reason why it was not employed. Still, it appears also that the men into whose company he fell were reasonable and respectable people, and not of the intimidating kind. This, it seems, may pass as the outward form and semblance of the British tailor: "My costume was a pair of threadbare black trowsers, very tight about the hips, a long, gray waistcoat coming close to the chin, an old scarf rolled twice around the neck, with, of course, no collar, a rusty dress-coat, short in the sleeves, and to crown the edifice one of the most shocking bad hats that ever was seen."

—In 1701 the standard height of the French drummer was 1.624 metres; in 1803 it had been found necessary to reduce it to 1.598 metres; in 1818, which, to be sure, was at the end of many bloody and destructive wars, the standard height was only 1.576 metres; but in 1860, after forty years of comparative peace, the standard was still descending, and a drummer was only 1.560 metres high; and out of the 325,000 young Frenchmen who annually reach the age of twenty-one 18,000 are too short to be admitted into the army—that is, they are less than five feet and an inch in height. Besides these 18,000, there are no less than 91,000 others who by reason of disease or deformity are excused from military service, or, in other words, no less than one-third of the entire youth of military age in France are found to be too sickly or too small to be soldiers. These things are true, if we may depend upon the facts given by M. Jules Simon in his "L'Ouvrier de Huit Ans," a work called forth by the Government project of reorganizing the army. M. Simon is an opponent of this scheme, which practically doubles the severity of the conscription. He asserts that the French race is degenerating physically, and that the population of France is increasing very slowly; that if compared with the population of other European countries (except, perhaps, Spain) it is relatively diminishing from year to year. The population of England, for example, doubled within the half century between 1800 and 1850; France against this 100 per cent. of increase has but 30 per cent. to show. The causes of this state of things, according to M. Simon, are these three: 1. The conscription takes into the army the largest and healthiest of the youth of France, and makes marriage impossible to them for nine or twelve of their best years, and sometimes for their lives, while the feeble and unsound marry and have children; 2. The urban population increases at the expense of the country population, which goes more and more into the towns to engage in manufacturing employments—moreover, the discharged soldier prefers the town to the country; 3. Women and small children are employed in the manufacturing business of the towns, and the offspring of the women, badly cared for at the best, are far less likely to grow up to maturity in the crowded city than in the country. It is said that of the children of the artisan class who are put out to nurse in the country no less than 95 per cent. die before they are a year old. It is difficult to believe that this mortality is not desired and brought about purposely, and we have heard this asseverated by other observers. Even in Lyons, of the children who are kept in the city, the mortality among those of the lower classes under one year old reaches only 53 per cent.

DR. BIGELOW'S MODERN ENQUIRIES.*

NOT only in the title of Dr. Bigelow's book, but in the dedication, in the preface, and in divers other places, is strikingly apparent the feeling of comfort and self-satisfaction which he derives from the thought that he is sailing down the stream of progress at a rate which keeps him in general quite abreast of all the other craft engaged upon that exhilarating voyage. It is dedicated to a friend whom he evidently thinks he has left far up the stream in his wake; and it is heralded by a minute and circumstantial announcement of sundry errors in the log-books of the learned laggers, by the due correction of which the author hopes to ensure them a more rapid and comfortable passage. It was but a short time since, we are told, that "the great changes effected in European civilization about four centuries ago were ascribed to the revival of classical learning, and not to their true cause, the discoveries made in physical sciences and arts." Now, we do not remember having seen, either in Mr. Mill's "Logic" or in any other treatise on scientific method which we happen to have read, any inductive canon for ascertaining the relation of a presumed effect to a presumed cause which chronologically succeeds the effect. And we think that if Dr. Bigelow had taken the trouble to study a little more closely those retrospective sciences which he would fain see condemned as unprofitable, he would have hesitated somewhat before ascribing effects which took place four centuries ago to causes which came into existence less than three centuries ago. We have all heard of the writer who, with more zeal than caution, attributed the literary activity of Italy in Petrarch's time to the recent invention of printing; and we all know that Dr. Draper in his "Intellectual Development of Europe" supposes the imaginary institutions of that interesting etymological myth, Numa Pompilius, to have been due to the mystical instructions of Pythagoras. We know not whether Dr. Bigelow had those wholesome examples before his eyes; but he has at any rate committed an anachronism equally gross. Modern physical science can hardly by any license of phrase be said to have begun earlier than the time of Galileo and Bacon, at which epoch the Renaissance had already been vigorously going on for a century and a half. Might we not, then, reverse matters, and say that it was the Classic Renaissance which gave the original impulse to physical discovery?

The thesis is one which we do not intend to argue here, our business being not to expound our own opinions, but to call attention to Dr. Bigelow's. Our author is betrayed into a similar disregard of chronological probability when he tells us that the first three centuries of the Christian era, with all ancient literature before them, went steadily from bad to worse; while modern times, with modern literature and science before them, have been going steadily from good to better. Dr. Mommsen and Mr. Merivale are, as we retrograde classical students think, excellent, nay, incomparable authorities on Roman history, and they will be found to differ from Dr. Bigelow's opinion that the three centuries after Christ went steadily from bad to worse. And as for modern times, how long, pray, have they had modern literature and science before their eyes? Where was modern literature when the modern career of progress commenced? How much of it had Dante, Chaucer, or even Shakespeare to feed on? How much of modern science was instilled into the youthful minds of Leibnitz, Spinosa, Descartes, and Bacon? Those gigantic intellects were nurtured upon the strong diet of ancient speculation. Modern literature is the effect, not the cause, of modern progress, and it is to the fruitful intercourse of the modern with the ancient mind that our progress, as manifested alike in science, philosophy, and literature, is primarily due. One cannot help thinking that Dr. Bigelow's acquaintance with the studies which he derides has not reached to an intimacy with Scaliger's "De Emendatione" or with Ideler's "Handbuch." Nor can any one be astonished, after traversing such a chaos of crudities, at meeting this opinion, that our only cause for wonder is that the human race after remaining stationary for so many thousand years should ever have advanced at all in civilization! Doubtless, if we suppose that ancient civilization was on the whole a failure, that the early Christian centuries went steadily from bad to worse, that mediæval scholasticism, metaphysical enquiries, everything, in short, save the purely utilitarian sciences of recent days, is to be held little better than worthless—doubtless, if in the very teeth of history and common sense we believe all this, we shall have great cause for astonishment at the civilized condition we are now in.

To him, however, who is by long habit accustomed to look upon human history as a whole—who, by dint of pursuing those classical studies of which Dr. Bigelow grudgingly admits that they may possibly refine the fancy and improve the style, has arisen to some appreciation of the mental, moral, and social characteristics of bygone ages, the subject of human progress with all its manifold complications and its endless suggestions will present nothing astonishing or inexplicable. To any such appreciation of the life of ancient times Dr. Bigelow has most certainly never attained. We know of few things in recent literature more idle and frivolous than his remarks on the Homeric poems. Evidently for him all human history might be expunged save that which concerns the last three centuries, and that hitherto unsuspected epoch when the physical discoveries were made which ushered in the Renaissance, without making any very lamentable gap in the scheme of the universe. If the stream of progress cannot be followed without bringing us to such a maelstrom of ungrateful irreverence for the worthy achievement of the past, we should beg for our part to be allowed to steer our little bark up the quiet waters of some sylvan tributary or to run it abruptly ashore on some convenient sandbank, that whatever else we lost by so doing we might at least retain our sympathy with the feelings and speculations, the glorious deeds, and even the errors, of those great societies of men who lived long ago, and but for whom very much of our boasted civilization would never have been attained. But the stream of progress leads to no such fatal whirlpool. Dr. Bigelow's views concerning education are not in advance of the age, but behind it. So far from classical scholarship declining as other branches of study advance, it was never so ardently or so successfully pursued as in our own day and generation. Bentley and Scaliger were no doubt giants of scholarship greater than any we now behold. But they might well have given half their grammatical and critical learning for a tithe of the living knowledge of antiquity possessed by a Grote, a Bréal, or a Donaldson. Contempt for antiquity, exclusive devotion to physical studies, were characteristics of the eighteenth century rather than the nineteenth, which is marked above all else by its enlightened respect for antiquity, and by its brilliant achievements in philology and history. Dr. Bigelow's views upon education might rather have come from the century which produced a Rousseau than from the century which has produced a Grimm and a Müller.

When Dr. Bigelow restricts himself to dissertation upon subjects lying within his peculiar sphere of investigation, he is far more satisfactory. His paper on the contagiousness of cholera is a good specimen of scientific reasoning. The essay on self-limited diseases is an admirable thing; and with his trenchant criticisms on the old "heroic" or "Sangrado" practice no student of natural science can help sympathizing. His papers on the war, at the end of the volume, were hardly worth reprinting.

MR. BANCROFT, JOSEPH REED, AND BENJAMIN RUSH.*

THE publication of the ninth volume of Mr. Bancroft's history has been followed already, within the year, by a series of critical and acrimonious pamphlets which together exceed it in bulk, though relating only to the contents of a very few of his paragraphs. To say nothing of his ability, the compass and fulness of his investigations, the deliberateness with which he issues instalments of the fruits of his toil, and the emphatic and unsparing way in which he announces his own judgment or opinions, all favor the impression that he has established a formidable, if not a final, tribunal. The decision which will slowly be reached upon the issues raised between him and his many challengers will decide whether the results of his long labors are, or are not, to secure him permanent reputation and authority. Reference has already been made in these columns to the pamphlet by Mr. Wm. B. Reed, in which that gentleman addressed himself to meet what he regarded as the aspersions cast by Mr. Bancroft alike upon the private and public character of his grandfather, Joseph Reed, President of Pennsylvania. Since Mr. Bancroft's critics have given him so much work to do, aside from the completion of the task of his lifetime, he has led the public to understand that not only the severest judgments he has pronounced upon some high military officials in the Revolutionary war are softened within the terms which facts would justify, but also that he has in reserve a vast mass of materials of prime authenticity and of a character damaging to individuals which provocation may induce him to draw upon. Let his critics and oppugners be cautiously mindful of these reserved resources; Mr. Bancroft's research has been keen and inquisitive; the severest critics of his style and of his character as a historian never have denied that he is a man of really great acquisitions.

* "Joseph Reed: A Historical Essay. By George Bancroft." New York: W. J. Widdleton. 1867.

"A Criticism of Mr. W. B. Reed's Aspersions on the Character of Dr. Benjamin Rush, with an Incidental Consideration of General Joseph Reed's Character. By a Member of the Philadelphia Bar." Philadelphia: Collins, Printer. 1867.

It is remarkable that the issues thus far opened between him and his critics relate to no impersonal public matter, no charge of bias, partiality, or perverseness in the proportions of treatment or importance assigned to incidents in the progress of the war, but wholly to alleged slanders or depreciatory judgments upon individuals. These individuals so assailed have, in every case, found either a grandson or a grand-nephew to come to their defence against Mr. Bancroft.

If we look for the prompting or justification for himself which has led Mr. Bancroft to pursue his unrelenting scrutiny into the character of Joseph Reed, we shall probably find it in these sentences in his pamphlet: "No book that I have ever read contains such libels on Washington's conduct and ability as the biography of Joseph Reed by his grandson. The wrong is concealed under occasional words of praise, and under statements and language that wear the aspect of innocence and good intentions; but if the narrative is severely examined and truly weighed, William B. Reed will be found to charge Washington with imbecility, in order to make room for the ridiculously false pretension that much of what was done best in the war of the Revolution was done by the Joseph Reed whose character, career, and estimation among his fellow-men" are investigated in the pages before us. Mr. Bancroft, therefore, sets himself to prove that Joseph Reed was "shuffling, pusillanimous, and irresolute; that he was governed by selfish considerations, and, in moments of crisis, was of no significance; that his character was tainted by duplicity; and that, as a vacillating trimmer who, in 1774 and 1775, was not heartily in the cause of his country, he, near the end of 1776, meditated defection." Mr. Bancroft affirms that he shall treat his subject as one fit for scientific investigation, by producing from his note-books a chronological statement of authenticated facts. He distributes his matter into three parts: "I will first trace the unsteady career of the 'President' to the close of 1776; I will next consider if his subsequent general character is such as to rebut the testimony respecting his previous infidelity; and I will lastly explain why it was proper and necessary for the ends of history to hold him up in the light of truth."

The elaborate and exhaustive method and the intensity of feeling which Mr. Bancroft has spent upon this subject show how thoroughly he is convinced of the impersonal and praiseworthy motives which prompt his labor. Possibly what proves his sincerity also brings under question his fairness, moderation, and judicial impartiality in the case. So severe and unsparing is the development of his argument, through the cumulative character of the evidence and the running comment upon it, that he would have been wise on his own side to have reduced or balanced its severity by some allowances. Thus some genial concession might have been made on the score of filial partiality in a biographer; and this, too, not only on the ground of natural feeling, but as justified by regard to facts, for a grandson in an intelligent family, holding converse with the world, receives by tradition and through domestic confidences information and impressions which explain, clear up, palliate, and justify some perplexities, infelicities, and cross-workings of things of which the outside world has no knowledge. Of these explanatory or palliatory constructions a man in public life has an especial need, and ought to have the generous benefit. Such a biographer, and his readers and his critics, may do well to keep in mind the sweet charity for which good Bishop Jeremy Taylor pleads so delightfully when he reads our human nature with so full and mild a glance:

> "Every man hath his indiscretions and infirmities, his arrests and sudden incursions, his neighborhoods and semblances of sin, his little violences to reason and peevish melancholy and humorous fantastic discourses, his fondness to judge favorably in his own cases, little deceptions, and voluntary and involuntary cozenages, ignorances, and inadvertencies, careless hours, and unwatchful seasons."

Again, so far as the charges against Reed of timidity, pusillanimity, backward-looking, questions about composition with the enemy, and half-heartedness in the cause may be referred for their symptoms and manifestations to occasions of despondency, the integrity of his character is not thereby brought under distrust. Who was there in the early years of the war, in public or private life, that did not feel and yield to that despondency? Only a large, deep, irresistible influx of it, and not any lack of manliness or patriotism, was the mastering agency which induced an actual majority of the professional men in most of the colonies to remain "loyal" or neutral. We may gather from the confidential letters of every patriot, including those of Washington himself, dark forebodings almost of despair. We can afford now to speak the fair truth—that it was the French alliance, not Washington nor Congress nor our own armies, that secured our independence.

Nor even does anything which we have seen on the record in black or white, as coming from the pen of Reed, expressive of distrust or impatience or misgiving as to the qualities or the competency of the great chief himself, substantiate the charge of unfriendliness, still less of malignity, towards him on the part of one who came so near to him. Reed, Lee, and Greene were not the only high military officers who, in their restlessness or anxiety or calm judgment, felt and expressed such distrust. We have no doubt that the occurrence of expressions of that tenor has led to the quiet destruction of many a contemporaneous record and letter which contained critical, querulous, and slanderous reflections that were put to shame by the glorious results which approved the competency of Washington. But he was not then, he could not be, we do not hesitate to say that he ought not to have been even to the members of his military family, what he is to us to-day. Mr. Sparks used to tell a pleasant story, which, as we heard it more than once from his lips and not in privacy, we will venture to put in print. He was spending the day with old John Adams in his retirement at Quincy. As the two were about passing from the parlor to the dining-room, Mr. Sparks lingered to look upon a portrait of Washington, hung on the wall, which caught his eye. Mr. Adams, as if impatient of his delay, took hold of his arm and moved him along, saying with infinite nonchalance, "A pretty good likeness. That old woodenhead got a good deal of his reputation by knowing how to hold his tongue."

The matters for allowance to which we have referred would have reduced or qualified the scorching severity of Mr. Bancroft's invectives against Joseph Reed. But even then an ugly inventory of charges would remain to be relieved only, if they can be relieved at all, by a counter ransacking and traversing of evidence by his grandson. The most damaging specification of all is that involved in a letter of Reed's to Charles Lee, published (we know not how he came by it) by Mr. George H. Moore, in his choice monograph, "The Treason of Charles Lee," etc. This letter—an ill-omened and a sadly sepulchral document—drew forth a reply from Lee which, by a strange contingency, fell into the hands and passed under the eye of Washington. Washington would have been astounded if he had seen the letter of Reed, which he never did. But he would have been something more than astounded if it had been submitted to his perusal after the writer's own account of its tenor or contents—so unlike to the truth—had been confidingly received by him and accepted as a preliminary to the restoration of kindly feelings between them. Compared with this humiliating exposure—which we sincerely hope, for the credit of human nature, Mr. W. B. Reed will be able to parry or relieve—all else in Mr. Bancroft's pamphlet, though some of it is damaging to the subject of it, is of reduced importance.

The second pamphlet whose title we have given professes to have been written by a volunteer who, having been informed that the descendants of Dr. Rush did not intend to come to his defence against the treatment he had received from Mr. W. B. Reed, takes up the matter as an American in the interest of patriotism and historic truth. Besides making some general and particular references to most of the specifications dealt with by Mr. Bancroft, the writer of this pamphlet devotes himself especially to asserting the integrity of Dr. Rush on the points at which Mr. Reed had impugned it, and to a renewed argument in support of the charge originally alleged against Joseph Reed by that eminent physician. When the famous "Cadwalader Pamphlet" appeared, some eighty-four years ago, putting into sharply defined and aggravated form the reflections on President Reed's patriotism and integrity which had been circulating in private, and with more or less of vagueness, the subject of these reflections supposed he had reason to regard Dr. Rush as the anonymous originator and virtual author, under the name of "Brutus," of these severe charges. Dr. Rush's friends maintain his own allegation that he had no further agency in the matter than that of giving his testimony on one very important point when he was summoned to do so by a gentleman whose statements had been challenged as false.

The burden of the imputation cast upon President Reed, first circulated in private conversation, and then allowed by him to pass without notice, but afterwards flatly and boldly endorsed in print by General Cadwalader, was that Reed had contemplated treachery to the American cause in December, 1776. This imputation was further enforced by the allegation of Major Lennox that Reed had even consummated that treachery. The writer before us restricts himself to dealing with the imputation in the form alleged by Cadwalader. Among the witnesses on whose testimony the general relied was Rush, whose evidence went no further than the showing that Reed in conversation with him had palliated or justified defection to the American cause in the case of others, and had thus implied self-justification if he himself should see fit to follow their example. The doctor testified that the conversation occurred as he was riding with Joseph Reed a few days before the battle of Trenton, on the 26th of December, 1776, from Bristol to headquarters, near New Town. General Cadwalader alleged that about the same date Reed expressed the same feelings to him so strongly as to indicate a meditated purpose. The efforts of Mr. Reed's grandson to meet and nullify this testimony are the occasion which the "Member of the Philadelphia Bar" finds for taking part in this embittered strife. It is not for us to enter as umpires or arbitrators between the disputants, dead or living. The revival of the controversy suggests to us a thought which presented itself with our first reading on the subject, though singularly enough it does not seem to have occurred to the writers on either side. It is this: Was it not strange that those patriotic men to whom Reed confided what they afterwards regarded as a purpose of treachery did not at once expose and disable him, instead of allowing him to assume new and important public trusts? Did not their apathy or inaction indicate that, at the time, his words passed with them only as an expression of impatience, vacillation, or despondency?

MISS RAVENEL'S CONVERSION.*

MR. DE FOREST, who has written other books, but whose acquaintance we make for the first time in this novel, is a very lively writer. He is hardly to be called a young man, but as he appears in this story one would take him to be a man just at the end of his youth, tolerably well satisfied with himself, tolerably well satisfied, therefore, with the world, courageous, clear-headed, bright-minded, witty, yet whose wit, if analyzed, would not seldom appear to be of the order of Lord Dalgarno's—which, says Scott, was sometimes levity and sometimes the play of abundant animal spirits—a quick-eyed observer, and, to describe him briefly, a man, so far as concerns his habits of thought, his opinions, his culture, who is the natural product of an excellent New England town. As a novelist, we may add that, so far as concerns the more striking characteristics of his style, a not injudicious but decided admiration for Charles Reade has had something to do with his production.

All this is talk about the author and is not in strictness reviewing his book. But the book is full of Mr. De Forest. We say so not meaning the words to be understood in their bad sense. But Mr. De Forest's plan of writing, like Mr. Reade's, admits of the constant presence of the author upon the stage as manipulator of the figures; like Mr. Reade, he is constantly favoring the reader with his own reflections and comments upon the action as it goes on, button-holing him, so to speak, and taking him into his confidence—a practice of which the tendency is sometimes in the other direction, but most frequently, we believe, tends to make the figures seem puppets; finally—and here is his weakest point as a novelist—he certainly fails to give his personages so much life and separate individuality as to make us accept them for real and forget the writer. So, after reading the story, we find ourselves pleased with Mr. De Forest, willingly ascribing praise to him, and thinking of him rather than of his characters, Dr. Ravenel and Miss Ravenel and the captain in love with her—we really have to reopen the book to get his name—Captain Edward Colburne.

One exception we make to this assertion regarding the personages of the story. Carter is well depicted; daguerreotyped from nature. We all have seen just such men, and all can recognize Mr. De Forest's accurate and spirited portraiture. He is a Virginian, a graduate of the school at West Point, a good soldier, not well furnished with brains originally, and somewhat demoralized in intellect and more demoralized in character by the stupid dissipations into which our army officers were so often driven by the dull life in frontier forts and Southern arsenals. We all remember how, in the beginning of the war, such men were gladly taken by our Northern governors for colonels of volunteer regiments; how they were apt to McClellanize; how, in spite of an aversion to negroes and a weakness for whiskey, they became, by dint of knowing their business and by hard fighting, first brigadiers and then major-generals, and how occasionally some of them as well as some volunteers were suspected of worse faults than cursing the Radicals, too courteously entreating "true Southern gentlemen," and indulging a weakness for wine and women. A good specimen of this class, with its mingled virtues and faults—chief of the latter being the misfortune of having been born a fool—Mr. De Forest has given us in his John T. Carter, colonel, and by-and-by brigadier-general of volunteers. The character is not one abounding in subtleties, enough of its traits can be painted from the surface indications, but, such as it is, Mr. De Forest has set it before us vividly.

This handsome officer with his thirty-five years, his ruddy-bronze complexion, his audacious eye, his mighty mustachios, his easy assurance, his manners not unlike those of her native Louisiana, captivates Miss Lillie Ravenel. She is a small, female secessionist, eighteen or nineteen years old, whose father, a staunch Unionist, has been forced to fly from New Orleans at the very beginning of the troubles, and has "refugeed," as they used to say, in the city of New Boston, which is in the New England State of Barataria—a city and State which some people believe to be New Haven and Connecticut. Miss Ravenel, for her part, makes prize of the heart, not so case-hardened as the colonel's, of a good young man, Edward Colburne, a graduate of the college at New Boston, an attorney not yet in good practice, a good fellow as well as a good man, but a little colorless, commonplace, young, and, on the whole, of no consequence, though like many another such youth he turns out to be a valiant and enduring soldier. After Bull Run the governor of Barataria commissions Carter as a colonel and Colburne as a captain, their regiment being the 10th Barataria, and the two men say good-bye to the Ravenels and put to sea under sealed orders which consign them to Butler's expedition against New Orleans. The city is taken, and the doctor and his daughter go back to their old home, where at once Miss Ravenel's conversion from secession to loyalty takes place. It consists in this simply: that an empty-headed young lady, who had liked the secessionists partly because she was born empty-headed and partly because she was born in Louisiana, undergoes a change of feeling when she discovers that her father's Unionism makes him and herself odious to their former acquaintances. The book is ill named, from a circumstance which is in itself trifling, and which is in no way of the least importance to the story. The Ravenels, of course, continue their acquaintance with the colonel and the captain; the young lady, a good deal against the wishes of her father, who likes Colburne, marries Carter; her husband is by-and-by led into temptation by a creole lady—a Frenchwoman of Louisiana—and falls; she discovers his faithlessness, and, while he is away campaigning, goes back to New Boston; he is by-and-by killed in battle, and the widow of course marries Colburne.

The plot, then, is of the simplest; as we have said, the characters we find not interesting, and with one exception not well drawn—in fact, it would be saying too little not to say that they are, for the most part, the old familiar figures; yet the book is a readable book, and the author is, on the whole, to be congratulated on his success. So much nowadays is packed into a novel that it is possible for us to say all this, and not be inconsistent with ourselves. These are some of the things that will make the book liked, and on account of which we have read it with some pleasure, and recommend its perusal to our readers: First of all, the author is a lively and quite agreeable companion. Then there is, in the first chapters, a rather good satirical description of the society which supports existence in our better sort of college towns. We hear it whispered by the way that New Haven is not well pleased with this part of the new novel, but, we suppose, several other towns in more than one other State of the Union have an equal right with New Haven to be offended. Perhaps this passage may serve as well as any for a specimen of this portion of the book:

> "The Whitewood house was of an architecture so common in New Boston that in describing it I run no risk of identifying it to the curious. Exteriorly it was a square box of brick, stuccoed to represent granite; interiorly it consisted of four rooms on each floor, divided by a hall up and down the centre. This was the original construction, to which had been added a greenhouse, into which you passed through the parlor, carefully balanced by a study, into which you passed through the library. Trim, regular, geometrical, one half of the structure weighing to an ounce just as much as the other half, and the whole perhaps forming some exact fraction of the entire avoirdupois of the globe, the very furniture distributed at measured distances, it was precisely such a building as the New Boston soul would naturally create for itself. Miss Ravenel noticed this with a quickness of perception as to the relations of mind and matter which astonished and amused Mr. Colburne.
> "'If I should be transported on Aladdin's carpet,' she said, 'fast asleep, to some unknown country, and should wake up and find myself in such a house as this, I should know that I was in New Boston. How the professor must enjoy himself here! This room is exactly twenty feet one way by twenty feet the other. Then the hall is just ten feet across by just forty in length. The professor can look at it and say, Four times ten is forty. Then the greenhouse and the study balance each other like the paddle-boxes of a steamer. Why will you all be so square?'"

Then there is some interesting reading descriptive of the days when Butler and Banks ruled and reigned in New Orleans, and not a little peculating and debauchery went on there. The account of Chief-Quartermaster Carter's cotton "speculation," and his purchase of steamboats, will help people to understand what the Department of the Gulf was in the days of military rule. We quote with pleasure—part of which only is due to the Cracker story—this little picture of a major-general in New Orleans. The time of the occurrence is after the removal of General Butler, and the picture is very good so far as it goes:

* "Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty. By J. W. De Forest." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1867.

"'Is the major-general pleasant?' asked Lillie with an inconsequence which was somewhat characteristic of her. She was more interested in learning how a great dignitary looked and behaved than in hearing what were his opinions on the subject of freemen's labor.

"'I do n't know that a major-general is obliged to be pleasant, at least not in war time,' answered the doctor, a little annoyed at the interruption to the train of his ideas. 'Yes, he is pleasant enough; in fact something too much of deportment. He put me in mind of one of my adventures among the Georgia Crackers. I had to put up for the night in one of those miserable up-country log shanties where you can study astronomy all night through the chinks in the roof, and where the man and wife sleep one side of you and the children and dogs on the other. The family, it seems, had had a quarrel with a neighboring family of superior pretensions, which had not yet culminated in gouging or shooting. The eldest daughter, a ragged girl of seventeen, described to me with great gusto an encounter which had taken place between her mother and the female chieftain of the hostile tribe. Said she, 'Miss Jones, she tried to come the dignerfied over mar. But thar she found her beater. My mar is hell on dignerty.'—Well, the major-general runs rather too luxuriantly to dignity. But his ideas on the subject of reorganizing labor are excellent, and have my earnest respect and approbation. I believe that under his administration the negroes will be allowed and encouraged to take their first certain step toward civilization. They are to receive some remuneration—not for the bygone centuries of forced labor and oppression—but for what they will do hereafter.'"

We get also some satire upon the custom which prevailed among our Northern governors of dispensing military patronage not with an eye single to the advantages of military service, but with a side glance, necessary we suppose, to the exigencies of politics. And finally, to put the best last, there is some excellent description of campaigning in the terrible swamps and forests of Louisiana and in the trenches at Port Hudson. We would gladly quote in proof of the justice of this praise the account of the first assault on Port Hudson and the repulse, and the stirring battle-piece where we witness the brave death of Carter. It is as a picture of the military service in the Department of the Gulf, "a novel of the war," that we think best of the book. So considered, it deserves more praise, we think, than any of its numerous rivals for popular favor, and is so well worth reading that, though we are constrained to pronounce the work a poor novel, we are quite willing to say that it is a poor novel with a deal of good in it.

This first edition contains a great many typographical errors, some of them so gross as only to be accounted for by supposing gross carelessness in the proof-reader.

MR. LONGFELLOW'S TRANSLATION OF THE DIVINE COMEDY.

IN our first article on this translation we half promised ourselves the pleasure of comparing the different versions of certain passages with that of Mr. Longfellow; but we intended this to be rather in witness of the fidelity than of the beauty of Mr. Longfellow's work. The sense of this beauty must be left to the English reader; if he does not find the work pleasing in itself as an English poem, he cannot be expected to like it, and he could not be blamed if he preferred the fidelity of an interlinear, literal prose translation before all that Mr. Longfellow has achieved. The difficult problem which our translator proposed himself remains unsolved if, with his perfect loyalty to his original, he has not united poetic perceptions and sympathies far transcending the scholar's faculty. We believe he has done this, and we accept the result of his labors as a solution of the problem. We think his translation incomparably the best that has been made. Whether it is the best that can be made, remains for proof. Man is so constituted that probably every one of Mr. Longfellow's Italian-reading critics will feel that he could better it if he would, and will probably reserve his effort for that moment of leisure when mortals purpose to amend themselves.

There is abroad, together with the schoolmaster who half educates the popular mind, a shrewd doubt whether a poet of Mr. Longfellow's supposed essential gentleness and sweetness could possibly translate a poet of Dante's supposed essential ruggedness and fierceness. Somehow, people have been taught to look upon Dante as a monster of extraordinary force and activity, who is for ever doing prodigies of vigor; like a statue of the worst Renaissance period all tense with muscular action, whatever mood it represents. We need not pause to combat this notion, or the doubt born of it, further than to explain that in passages of peculiar force Mr. Longfellow's task must have been simplified, for he had there merely to give the exact equivalent of the Italian in a language of superior directness and compactness. It is probable that the translator's patient and exquisite art was as severely tasked to render lines of narrative, of description, and of argument as the fiercest outburst of his author's wrath or scorn. There is also quite as much of scholarly skill and poetic sympathy demanded by the softer and more lyrical moods of Dante as by his dramatic strokes. In the nineteenth canto of the "Purgatorio" is that song of the siren to translate which, as Mr. Longfellow has translated it, must be, as we think, a costlier triumph than any six of the "strongest" lines in the "Inferno:"

> "'Io son,' cantava, 'Io son dolce Sirena,
> 'I am,' she sang, 'I am the siren sweet,
> Che i marinari in mezzo il mar dismago,
> Who mariners amid the main unman,
> Tanto son di piacere a sentir piena.
> So full am I of pleasantness to hear.
> Io trassi Ulisse del suo cammin vago
> I drew Ulysses from his wandering way
> Al canto mio; e qual meco s' ausa
> Unto my song, and he who dwells with me,
> Rado sen parte, sì tutto l'appago.
> Seldom departs, so wholly I content him.'"

A siren's song, indeed, and a perfect echo of the meaning and the music of the Italian! Is it not amusing after this to read it in Cary's translation?

> "'I,' thus she sang,
> 'I am the Siren, she whom mariners
> On the wide sea are wildered when they hear:
> Such fulness of delight the listener feels.
> I from his course Ulysses by my lay
> Enchanted drew. Whoe'er frequents me once
> Parts seldom; so I charm him, and his heart
> Contented knows no void.'"

How Mr. Longfellow meets the complex difficulties of his work will be seen, we think, in an extract from the episode of Ugolino, where there is a fusion of the qualities of picturesqueness and drama which form so great a part of Dante's genius. The reader recalls how Ugolino, relating to the poet his imprisonment in the Tower of Famine, breaks forth:

> "Cruel, indeed, art thou, if yet thou grieve not,
> Thinking of what my heart foreboded me,
> And weep'st thou not, what art thou wont to weep at?
> They were awake now, and the hour drew nigh
> At which our food used to be brought to us,
> And through his dream was each one apprehensive;
> And I heard locking up the under door
> Of the horrible tower; whereat, without a word,
> I gazed into the faces of my sons.
> I wept not, I within so turned to stone;
> They wept; and darling little Anselm mine
> Said, 'Thou dost gaze so, father, what doth ail thee?'
> Still not a tear I shed, nor answer made
> All of that day, nor yet the night thereafter,
> Until another sun rose on the world.
> As now a little glimmer made its way
> Into the dolorous prison, and I saw
> Upon four faces my own very aspect,
> Both of my hands in agony I bit;
> And, thinking that I did it from desire
> Of eating, on a sudden they uprose,
> And said they: 'Father, much less pain 't will give us
> If thou do eat of us; thyself didst clothe us
> With this poor flesh, and do thou strip it off.'
> I calmed me then, not to make them more sad;
> That day we all were silent, and the next.
> Ah! obdurate earth, wherefore didst thou not open?
> When we had come unto the fourth day, Gaddo
> Threw himself down outstretched before my feet,
> Saying, 'My father, why dost thou not help me?'
> And there he died; and, as thou seest me,
> I saw the three fall one by one, between
> The fifth day and the sixth; whence I betook me,
> Already blind, to groping over each,
> And three days called them after they were dead;
> Then hunger did what sorrow could not do."

Turning from this to the different English versions of the same lines, it is hard to see where any in any part equals it, while in their entirety it is quite idle to compare them. The last terzines:

> "Quivi morì, e come tu mi vedi
> Vid' io cascar li tre ad uno ad uno
> Tra 'l quinto dì e 'l sesto; ond' io mi diedi
> Già cieco a brancolar sovra ciascuno,
> E tre dì gli chiamai, poich' e' fur morti:
> Poscia più che'l dolor potè il digiuno," are thus translated by Cary:

> "There he died; and e'en
> Plainly as thou seest me saw I the three
> Fall one by one 'twixt the fifth day and the sixth:
> Whence I betook me, now grown blind, to grope
> Over them all, and for three days aloud
> Called on them who were dead. Then fasting got
> The mastery of grief."

Mr. Ford, who has rendered this episode well and with a due sense of its beauties, must say for his rhyme's sake,

> "I did not weep, turned marble in my woe;"

> "Frantic with grief I bit my hands, and they > Deeming that hunger made me furious grow;"

> "Then hunger, more than sorrow, finished all;"

missing in each line, and throughout the whole, some delicate meaning and subtle grace which Mr. Longfellow gives us.

> "Three days upon the dead my cries resound,
> Then grief no longer could with hunger cope," sings Mr. Brooksbank, who seems to have here an eye rather to the title of Dante's whole work than his local meaning.

Mr. Cayley is brought by his terza rima, if nothing worse, to the horrible pass below:

"Then did I both my hands for fury gnaw.
But they perceiving me, rose up amain,
Believing I had done so for my maw."

The version of this episode by Mrs. Ramsay is one of the most pleasing of the rhymed translations, and is rather faithful, but the strong figure,

"Tu ne vestisti
"Queste misere carni e tu ne spoglia," is paraphrased,

"From thee we had
These wretched bodies; take them back again;"

and throughout the version there is sacrifice of light and delicate meanings in which there is much Dante lost.

Mr. Wright's translation is bad, almost of course—so bad that we must give the whole of it if we would give a full sense of its absurdity. Happily this is not necessary.

"Thou gav'st us birth," say the children, in language suited to their delirious state, and otherwise his translation is weakened, inflated, and distorted.

Not one of these translators, however free with the original, has won a grace beyond the reach of Mr. Longfellow's fidelity; but all fall as far below him in beauty of diction and poetic dignity as they do in loyalty to Dante. On comparing the version of our translator with that of Mr. Rossetti, who has proceeded upon the same principle of perfect literality and line-for-line rendering, it is very remarkable that in the whole thirty-six verses cited only one verse should be found the same in both versions. Mr. Longfellow is uniformly more faithful than Mr. Rossetti, and that he is more artistic and spirited, we suppose no one will deny who looks at the work of both. We do not quote Mr. Rossetti's version of this passage; but we can equally well exhibit the difference between his performance and that of Mr. Longfellow in the episode of Francesca:

LONGFELLOW.

"'Sitteth the city, wherein I was born,
Upon the sea-shore where the Po descends
To rest in peace with all his retinue.
Love, that on gentle heart doth swiftly seize,
Seized this man for the person beautiful
That was ta'en from me, and still the mode offends me.
Love, that exempts no one beloved from loving,
Seized me with pleasure of this man so strongly
That, as thou seest, it doth not yet desert me;
Love has conducted us unto one death;
Caïna waiteth him who quenched our life!'
These words were borne along from them to us.
As soon as I had heard those souls tormented,
I bowed my face, and so long held it down
Until the Poet said to me, 'What thinkest?'
When I made answer, I began: 'Alas!
How many pleasant thoughts, how much desire,
Conducted these unto the dolorous pass!'
Then unto them I turned me, and I spake,
And I began: 'Thine agonies, Francesca,
Sad and compassionate to weeping make me.
But tell me, at the time of those sweet sighs,
By what and in what manner Love conceded,
That you should know your dubious desires?'
And she to me, 'There is no greater sorrow
Than to be mindful of the happy time
In misery, and that thy Teacher knows.
But, if to recognize the earliest root
Of love in us thou hast so great desire,
I will do even as he who weeps and speaks.
One day we reading were for our delight
Of Launcelot, how Love did him enthrall.
Alone we were and without any fear.
Full many a time our eyes together drew
That reading, and drove the color from our faces;
But one point only was it that o'ercame us.
When, as we read of the much-longed for smile
Being by such a noble lover kissed,
This one, who ne'er from me shall be divided,
Kissed me upon the mouth, all palpitating.
Galeotto was the book and he who wrote it.
That day no farther did we read therein.'
And all the while one spirit uttered this,
The other one did weep so that, for pity,
I swooned away as if I had been dying,
And fell, even as a dead body falls."

ROSSETTI.

"'The territory I was born in sits
Upon the shore whereat the Po descends,
To be at peace, he and his followers.
Love, which takes quickly to the gentle heart,
Took him for the fair person which was reft
From me, and still the mode offendeth me.
Love, which excuses no beloved from love,
Took me so strongly of the cheer of him
That, as thou seest, yet it leaves me not.
Love brought us unto one the self-same death:
Him who in life destroyed us Caïna waits.'

These words were proffered unto us by them.

When I had hearkened those offended souls,
I bent my face, and held it down so long
As till the Poet said to me, 'What think'st?'

'Alas!' when I responded, I began,
'How many tender thoughts, how much desire,
Brought these along unto the woful pass!'
Then I turned round to them, and spoke myself,
And I began: 'Francesca, these thy pains
Make me to weep, mournful and pitying.
But tell me,—at the time of the sweet sighs,
Whereat and in what way did love concede
That you your dubious longings recognized?'

And she to me: 'There is no greater grief
Than to remember one of happy time
In misery: and this thy tutor knows.
But, if thou hast desire so powerful
To be acquainted of our love's first root,
Like him will I do who doth weep and speak.
Reading we were one day, for our delight,
Of Lancelot, how love constrained him:
We were alone, with no suspiciousness.
More than one time that reading struck our eyes
Together, and discolored us in face:
But it was only one point conquered us.
When as we read about the longed-for smile,
How by so great a lover it was kissed,
This one who from me ne'er shall be disjoined,
Trembling all over kissed me on the mouth.
A Galahalt was the book, and he that writ:
Further that day we read in it no more.'

Meantime, as the one soul was saying this,
The other wept so that, for pitying,
I failed at heart, as though I should have died;
And down I fell as a dead body falls."

The sincerity of Mr. Rossetti's wish to accurately reproduce Dante is not less questionable than his failure to do so, and it appears to us that his version wants metrical grace in the same degree that it wants literality. After allowing him all the praise that can justly be given him, the need of such a version as Mr. Longfellow's, which preserves in a strong and perfectly coherent poetic feeling all Dante's meaning, is undeniable. Mr. Rossetti sometimes mistranslates, but his chief disqualification is that he is no poet—has not even a good ear for rhythm.

At first glance the reader feels a certain dissatisfaction with Mr. Longfellow's translation of the inscription on the gate of hell; and after many readings we confess that we cannot escape the unpleasant impression of the phrase "city dolent," though we perceive the advantage of preserving the musical change from dolent to dole and dolorous in succeeding lines. Let the reader, however, take these lines and compare them with the original, and then with the wild and sometimes ludicrous versions of others, and he will discern their exceeding skilfulness and their unquestionable superiority:

LONGFELLOW.

"Through me the way is to the city dolent;
Through me the way is to eternal dole;
Through me the way among the people lost.
Justice incited my sublime Creator,
Created me divine Omnipotence,
The highest Wisdom and the primal Love.
Before me there were no created things,
Only eterne, and I eternal last.
All hope abandon, ye who enter in."

ROSSETTI.

"Through me you pass into the grieving realm;
Through me you pass into the eternal grief;
Through me you pass among the kin that 's lost.
Justice impelled my Maker, the All-High;
The Puissance Divine created me,
The supreme Wisdom and the primal Love.
Before myself created things were not,
Unless eternal—I eternal last.
Leave off all hope, all ye who enter in."

FORD.

"By me is reached the city doomed to grieve;
By me the grief that must eternal prove;
By me the people lost beyond reprieve.
Justice my mighty Maker first did move;
Omnipotence Divine my structure rear,
The supreme Wisdom and the primal Love.
Save things eternal none created were
Prior to me: eternal I remain:
Despair for ever, ye who enter here."

WRIGHT.

"Through me ye enter the abode of woe;
Through me to endless sorrow are ye brought:
Through me amidst the souls accurst ye go.
Justice did first my mighty Maker move;
By power Almighty was my fabric wrought,
By highest Wisdom and by primal Love.
Ere I was formed no things created were
Save those eternal—I eternal last:
All hope abandon, ye who enter here."

CAYLEY

"Through me ye pass into the city of woe;
Through me ye pass eternal woes to prove;
Through me among the blasted race ye go.
'Twas Justice did my most high Maker move,
And I have been the work of power Divine,
Of supreme Wisdom and of primal Love.
No creature has an elder date than mine
Unless eternal, and I have no end.
O ye that enter me, all hope resign."

It is not worth while to give the versions of Mrs. Ramsay, of Thomas, and of Brooksbank, or to comment upon the quality of the different versions above, further than to note the exceeding badness of Mr. Rossetti's, which is no more literal than some of the rhymed versions, and yet has all the awkwardness of mere literality.

We are sensible of the injustice of criticism which compares part with part, for it necessarily fails of conveying an idea of the whole in either case; but it is the only means of comparative criticism possible in the limited space of a newspaper, and Mr. Longfellow suffers equally with the rest. We must do a kindred injustice to our translator when we attempt to represent, by means of extracts, the absolute value of his work. The best to be said of it is that it is certainly Dante. After that, every one must acknowledge that it has a delightful music, and a fresh original quality in the English so resolutely faithful to the Italian. There is remarkably little inversion, and not one inversion that need obscure the sense for a moment, though the sense is often hard in itself, or at other times is so simple that the reader's own unwillingness to accept the plainest purport of the words as Dante's meaning makes difficulty for which he is tempted to blame the translator. There is in Mr. Longfellow's work an occasional excess of literality, as in the line,

"If were the King of the Universe our friend," and the diction is now and then disagreeably characterized by the use of words like antelucan and serotine, which translate Dante into the English dictionary rather than the English language. But these are blemishes extremely rare in a performance that wins greater liking and honor the more closely it is studied and examined. To whatever part of the poem we turn, it seems to us that the translator has been equal to his most difficult task, and we should hardly know which part of his version to praise most. We have already let it praise itself, so far as quotation can go, in the passages quoted from the "Inferno;" but we think neither of these is finer than the description of the Wood of Thorns, or the story of Ulysses, or the scenes of grotesque horror about the lake of pitch, or the canto telling of Cavalcanti and Farinata.

The present version of the "Purgatorio" is exquisitely responsive to the spirit of the original; less sombre than that of the "Inferno," but not less beautifully solemn and grand. The sublime picturesqueness of the poem is felt as in the Italian itself, and we perceive how, in such a passage as this describing the approach of the celestial pilot, the translator has shared the exaltation of his original:

"And lo! as when, upon the approach of morning,
Through the gross vapors Mars grows fiery red
Down in the West upon the ocean floor,
Appeared to me—may I again behold it!—
A light along the sea so swiftly coming,
Its motion by no flight of wing is equalled;
From which, when I a little had withdrawn
Mine eyes, that I might question my Conductor,
Again I saw it brighter grown and larger.
Then on each side of it appeared to me
I knew not what of white, and underneath it
Little by little there came forth another.
My master yet had uttered not a word
While the first whiteness into wings unfolded;
But when he clearly recognized the pilot,
He cried, 'Make haste, make haste to bow the knee!
Behold the Angel of God! fold thou thy hands!
Henceforward shalt thou see such officers!
See how he scorneth human arguments,
So that nor oar he wants, nor other sail
Than his own wings between so distant shores.
See how he holds them pointed up to heaven,
Fanning the air with the eternal pinions
That do not moult themselves like mortal hair!'
Then as still nearer and more near us came
The Bird Divine, more radiant he appeared,
So that near by the eye could not endure him,
But down I cast it: and he came to shore
With a small vessel, very swift and light,
So that the water swallowed naught thereof.
Upon the stern stood the Celestial Pilot;
Beatitude seemed written in his face,
And more than a hundred spirits sat within."

Then, how charmingly all the quaintness and tenderness of that description of Dante's meeting with the Countess Matilda beside Lethe is given us, so that the scene affects us like some lovely painting painted when art was a soul and not a mere intelligence:

Which, tow'rd the left hand with its little waves
Bent down the grass that on its margin sprang.
All waters that on earth most limpid are
Would seem to have within themselves some mixture
Compared with that which nothing doth conceal,
Although it moves on with a brown, brown current Under the shade perpetual, that never
Ray of the sun lets in, nor of the moon.
With feet I stayed, and with mine eyes I passed
Beyond the rivulet, to look upon
The great variety of the fresh May.
And there appeared to me (even as appears
Suddenly something that doth turn aside
Through very wonder every other thought)
A lady all alone, who went along
Singing and culling floweret after floweret,
With which her pathway was all painted over.
'Ah, beauteous lady, who in rays of love
Dost warm thyself, if I may trust to looks,
Which the heart's witnesses are wont to be,
May the desire come unto thee to draw
Near to this river's bank,' I said to her,
'So much that I may hear what thou art singing,
Thou makest me remember where and what
Proserpina that moment was when lost
Her mother her, and she herself the Spring.'
As turns herself with feet together pressed
And to the ground, a lady who is dancing,
And hardly puts one foot before the other,
On the vermilion and the yellow flowerets
She turned towards me, not in other wise
Than maiden who her modest eyes casts down;
And my entreaties made to be content,
So near approaching, that the dulcet sound
Came unto me together with its meaning.
As soon as she was where the grasses are
Bathed by the waters of the beauteous river
To lift her eyes she granted me the boon.
I do not think there shone so great a light
Under the lids of Venus, when transfixed
By her own son beyond his usual custom!
Erect upon the other bank she smiled,
Bearing full many colors in her hands."

The beautiful mysticism of the ensuing canto, delighting with every sweet sight and sound, is a pleasure which we leave untouched to the reader's enjoyment, as we must leave a thousand other pleasures in the poem. Here at last that much suffering reader will find Dante's greatness manifest, and not his greatness only, but his grace, his simplicity, and his affection. Here he will find strength matched with wonderful sweetness, and dignity with quaintness—Dante of the thirteenth century and Dante of eternity. There has been no attempt to add to or take from this lofty presence. Opening the book we stand face to face with the poet, and when his voice ceases we may well marvel if he has not sung to us in his own Tuscan. "I suppose," said Blake, when questioned of the language used by the spirit of a great poet in converse with him, "I suppose that he spoke in his native tongue, but it sounded to me like the most noble English."

NEW BIBLICAL DICTIONARIES.[*]

THE first work named below is to be comprised in six volumes. It will undoubtedly be the most complete and popular depository of the knowledge which it aims to reduce under one alphabet. Its wide range can, without quoting from its prospectus, be best indicated, perhaps, by a selection from the vocabulary of the volume before us. We meet, then, Abbé, Abelard, Abraham's bosom, Abraham a Sancta Clara, Absalom's tomb, abyss, afternoon, Alexandrian Library, Apollo, appearances of Christ, Areopagus, ass of Balaam, Augustine (St), auricular confession, auto da fé; Bacon (Francis), Bartholomew's Day, Baxter (Richard), Beautiful Gate, behemoth, Belgium, Benedict IX., benefit of clergy, Bentham (Jeremy), Bible Societies of Great Britain, bloody sweat, bondage in Egypt, bowing at the name of Jesus, bowing towards the East, Brazil, Buddhism, Bull (papal), bulrush, Byles (Mather), by-word, Bzowski. The catholicity of the work appears also in its mention of Joseph S. Buckminster along with that of Lyman Beecher, and in giving a separate title to the African M. E. Church.

It is an ungrateful as it is (and partly because it is) a comparatively easy task to point out errors in so laborious a compilation; while at the same time it is quite impossible to criticise profoundly what, as the preface states, is contained in no single dictionary in the English or in any other language. Let us begin, therefore, by praising the design of the book, and the industry of its editors in collating, rewriting, and composing the various articles. More than half those in the Biblical department "are wholly original, and nearly all contain important new matter." "The articles on the several Christian denominations have either been prepared by ministers belonging to them, or have been submitted to such ministers for examination and correction." To this add the very important service of sifting for the student's reference the bibliography of each topic—a tedious and delicate undertaking, for which, however, the fairness and erudition of the editors are a sufficient guaranty. As far as practicable, the sources from which the dictionary is chiefly derived are acknowledged with due credit. In the list occurs Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie, German edition, a very full authority in matters of theology. The preface, however, alludes to the Rev. Dr. Bomberger's translation, which was begun in 1856, but suspended during the war, and which the editors hope may be resumed and completed. They do not mention its remarkable lack of typographical and scholarly accuracy, but we may assert of it that, in some of its parts, scarcely one Hebrew word in ten is correctly printed, and we are almost tempted to think that Drs. McClintock and Strong have borrowed from this quarter some of the errors in the same language which mar their work. We know the difficulty of being accurate even with the modern languages, but Hebrew surely is nothing if not faultless.

[*] "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature. Prepared by the Rev. John M'Clintock, D.D., and James Strong, S.T.D." Vol. I.—A, B. New York: Harper & Bros.

"American Edition of Dr. William Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. Revised and Edited by Prof. H. B. Hackett, D.D., with the co-operation of Mr. Ezra Abbot, A.M., Assistant Librarian of Harvard University." Parts I., II. New York: Hurd & Houghton. Sold only by subscription.

Take the first page, fifth title, for example. In Aaron, the first two Hebrew vowels are transposed, the shorter coming before the longer. On the second page, title "Aaron, Acharon," in the word torah, law, the long a is wanting. Under the following title, tephiloth, prayers, is made to end in ch instead of th. Page 27, title "Abrabanel," the words translated by Early Prophets are printed in the English order, instead of the usual inversion of the substantive and adjective in Hebrew; and, finally, the last Hebrew word under the same title has two errors in it. All these, it may be confessed, are slight, especially to one conversant with the language. But what, to return to the title already quoted on page 2, shall be said of "Aaron, Acharon?" Will it not be supposed that the second name is a synonym for the same person, as Shakspere for Shakespeare, or else an additional name? The comma and the following capital letter would certainly justify this inference. But acharon is simply Hebrew for ultimus, the last; just as we write "Pliny the younger," and the French "Dumas fils." The same remark applies to the following title, but with double force, because here we have "Aaron, Ariscon, or Harishon"—apparently three synonyms. Harishon stands for priscus, the ancient or first. Ariscon is probably a Gallicized form of the German rendering of harishon, viz., harischon. Both or neither should have been given. If either, we ought also to have under "Marcus Aurelius" the French form of "Marc-Aurèle." In this case the error seems to be one of simple transfer, but is the less excusable because it is superficial, and would naturally have attracted attention in the proof-reading.

The Greek, so far as we have examined, is very correct; the German not always. French accents are so commonly neglected by writers and printers that we should be hypercritical to note their occasional omission here.

Uniformity was not to be expected, perhaps never is, in a work absorbing or employing without concert the knowledge of great numbers of writers, destitute of even the bond of the same race or language. We have already afforded a glimpse of this. Confirmation is so easy that we shall not dwell upon it. "Bohemia" has annexed to it several mediæval and Old German synonyms; "Austria" has none. But the national name for Bohemia (Czechia) is not enumerated. The Magyar form of "Attila" is said to be Atzel; it should be Etele, a very slight change from the original.

As for the "Church and national statistics" which are contained in this volume, the value of them is exceedingly questionable on general principles; and when one attempts to give the number of sectarians not only in thousands but in hundreds and tens and even units, he is certainly figuring beyond his or anybody's knowledge. In the table to accompany the article on Austria, we find that there is one Greek in Austria above the Enns, one Unitarian, and one religionist who cannot be classified! It is a pity the name of each has not been preserved. But there are other remarkable numerical coincidences in these same columns. In Venetia, the Greeks and the Protestants of the Augsburg Confession are alike reckoned at 81; and there is throughout Austria a wonderful parallel between the Unitarians and the unclassified sects. In Croatia and Slavonia, Transylvania, and the Military Frontier, they each number 31, 48,040, and 4, respectively! We hope we shall not be deemed irreverent for saying that this reminds us of one of Mr. Lincoln's stories—about the drunken fellow in court who heard the clerk read the indictment, "did steal, take, and carry away, ten boars, ten sows, ten shoats, and ten pigs," and exclaimed: "Well, that is the most equally divided gang of hogs I ever did hear tell of."

We come now to criticise the illustrations. Of those purely pictorial or topographical there can be little complaint. They are generally, not always (see the "wild boar," p. 839), an aid to the text, and the only question is whether they are worth the space they occupy. Of the maps, there can in our opinion be no question. They could not, unless they were sewed in by themselves, be of any practical value, but to let them displace reading matter is to make light of the embarrassment of choice which the editors must surely have felt in their compiling. Here, for instance, are maps of North and South America and Asia, occupying more than two and a half pages, and as worthless and unnecessary as maps could well be. On p. 551 a map of Austria is "thrown in." It embraces Northern Italy as far as the Ticino, regardless of the great cessions of 1859 and 1866, and is crowded most illegibly with names of all degrees of importance. The misspelling is dreadful; there are other cases as bad as Rzochow for Rzeszow. Once in a while the word "modern" is prefixed to the country thus misrepresented, but the intelligent reader will not be deceived. In justice to the publishers it must be surmised that the maps were not made for this work. In the succeeding volumes we advise the editors to waste no more of their precious space in a vain attempt to supersede the atlas. They include enough already to supplant many dozens of works which the average student can never hope to own or even examine, but which he could never reconcile himself to doing without. Spite of errors evitable and inevitable, this cyclopædia is undoubtedly the most useful yet constructed either here or in Europe. It is both creditable in its design and execution and timely in its appearance, and may be recommended, if not without reserve at least without hesitation, as having no rival.

The American edition of Dr. Smith's Bible Dictionary appears in monthly parts, which are expected to number thirty in all. As the original work is perfectly well known, we need not speak of its merits; in comparison with the cyclopædia just noticed, it is of course narrower in scope, and in fact is not bodily but essentially, in all its principal titles, a constituent part of it. The American editors have not sought to change its proper character, but only to improve and supplement it. Thus, they embody the appendix with the text, verify anew the Scripture references, multiply the cross-references, explain, as far as possible, the signification of Hebrew and Greek names, and readjust their accentuation, carry out more thoroughly the plan of the original to present "the corresponding forms in the Hebrew, Greek, and Vulgate, together with the variations in the two great manuscripts of the Septuagint," add fresh illustrations from recent books of travel, explain now obsolete words or phrases in the English Bible, insert new topics, and, finally, do fuller justice to the names and works of American scholars. These must all be admitted to be important improvements.

Of Part II., before us, we can say that the American notes are numerous, copious, very erudite, and entirely worthy of the original work—which all scholars know is saying a great deal. Also numerous and valuable, though less so than the notes, are the inserted articles, of which Armory, Aser, Ashtaroth, Baali, etc., are samples. The print and illustrations are fine indeed, the former uncommonly correct, especially for a reprint, and admirably so in foreign words, of whatever language. As the proof-reading was Mr. Abbot's particular charge, it is right that he should be named in this connection and high praise awarded him. Not that there are no errors; but to show how few, we annex the only ones we have detected after closely examining every Hebrew word in these 112 pages. There are others which are but seeming errors, and are attributable to the paleness of the ink. Only one occurs in the American addenda, viz., to the title "Aphrah," in which aphar is rendered "ashes" instead of "dust." "Ashes" is epher (with aleph); cf. aphar vaepher, dust and ashes. In the reprinted text, title "Ark of the Covenant," mitzad aron is not exactly quoted. "In the side of the ark" would be mitzad haaron. And again, eben shethiyah, "stone of drinking," is hardly correct; probably related to shath (pl. shathoth), pillar, corner-stone. Title "Arms:" Sion is not "a corruption of shirjon," as is suggested, but of sirjon (Jer. xlvi. 4 and li. 3—an omitted form). Title "Asaph:" chezeh, seer, should read chozeh. Title "Ashes:" there is a slight misprint, which we need not specify, in tapuah. Title "Asmodeus:" deshire should be printed deshide. Title "Avim:" for chavvi, Hivite, read chivvi. Title "Baal:" for chamon read hamon.

Critical and Social Essays. Reprinted from THE NATION. 12mo. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt.)—Of the merits of this book it does not become us to speak; typographically it is everything that could be desired. It will in some small measure replace, for recent subscribers to THE NATION, the back volumes of the paper. The following is the table of contents:—1. The Glut in the Fiction-Market; 2. Critics and Criticism; 3. Clergymen's Salaries; 4. Popularizing Science; 5. The Good Old Times; 6. Why We have No Saturday Reviews; 7. Tinkering Hymns; 8. American Ministers Abroad; 9. Horse-Racing; 10. Some of our Social Philosophers; 11. Waste; 12. Dress and its Critics; 13. The Social Influence of the National Debt; 14. Hints for Fourth of July Orations; 15. American Reputations in England; 16. The European and American Order of Thought; 17. Roads; 18. Pews; 19. A Connecticut Village; 20. Voyages and Travels; 21. Verse-Making; 22. Something about Monuments; 23. Our Love of Luxury; 24. A Plea for Culture; 25. Curiosities of Longevity.

Dime Chess Instructor. Miron J. Hazeltine. (New York: Beadle & Co.)—This thin little paper-covered volume is sufficiently illustrated with diagrams, and is written with a clearness that a good many more pretentious works do not display. We cheerfully recommend it to beginners in what Mr. Hazeltine may be allowed to call "the most elegant and elevating and intellectual pastime ever invented by man to delight his fellows;" for Mr. Hazeltine is, as he might say himself, "a worshipping priest at the shrine of the Goddess Caissa;" in other words, chess editor of the New York Clipper, and enthusiasm becomes him. He has plenty of knowledge also, as well as zeal, and has put enough of it into these eighty pages to make any faithful student of them a very fair player.

Half-tints. (New York: D. Appleton & Co.)—This is a group of short papers on various topics of society, some light (very) and some serious. The hotel, its luxuries and its extortions; fashion, its selfishness, its conjugal falsity, and its poodles; the stock and the gold exchange, their vicissitudes and frauds; the doctors and their solemn professional hypocrisies and schemes; the clergyman with his tenderness for the taste and conscience of Dives and fondness for the millinery of pulpit and parlor—these are among the themes. The author's style is generally crisp, abounding in figures, and in exaggerations not a few; occasional freshness amid much commonplace; and in spite of much affectation in expression, frequent misuse of words.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

ANOTHER MUDDLE IN THE RECONSTRUCTION PROCESS.

SOME of the generals commanding at the South being in doubt either as to the extent of their powers under the Reconstruction act or as to the mode in which they should exercise them, have solicited advice from Washington, and the President—we may be sure nothing loath—has called on Mr. Stanbery, the Attorney-General, to furnish an "opinion" on the subject. The opinion was laid before the public in the morning papers on Monday last. A few people, probably, will read it; but for the benefit of those who will not read it, its tenor and effect may be described sufficiently by saying that it denies to all military commanders at the South the right to do anything beyond "protecting persons in their rights of person and property, suppressing insurrection, disorder, and violence, and punishing or causing to be punished all disturbers of the public peace or criminals." Consequently, according to Mr. Stanbery, no commanding officer has any right to remove any judge or mayor or governor, or interfere with the process of any civil or criminal court, or with the operation of any laws actually on the statute-book, or with the obligation of any existing and lawful contract, or, in fact, to meddle in any way with the working of the State governments at the South any more than at the North, except in so far as may be plainly necessary to repress violence or insurrection or disorder. All these things, however, Generals Sickles, Pope, and Sheridan have done; and should the President act on Mr. Stanbery's opinion, Mayor Monroe, Judge Abell, and Governor Wells would be put back in their places; the military commanders would thus be humiliated, besides being shorn of nearly all their authority, in the eyes of the Southern population; every obnoxious act of theirs, however just or necessary, would be met by an appeal to the President, and the appeal would be supported by clouds of political intriguers, and by the time a decision was reached it would have lost all its value. In fact, during this most important period, when the new State organization is preparing and the negro population being called into political life, the States lately in revolt would, as long as acts of physical violence or outrage did not occur in such numbers as to furnish fair ground for military interference, remain as completely in the hands of the old government as if the Reconstruction act had never been passed.

Now, everybody knows that, whatever the act may say, this is not what Congress intended, and nobody was better satisfied of it than Mr. Johnson himself. In his message vetoing the bill he claimed for the military commanders all the powers under it which they have been lately exercising and which Mr. Stanbery now denies them—a circumstance which has set many people asking who wrote the message, or at all events who supplied the law for it. When it appeared, the popular impression was that the rough outline, at least, of the scene of horrors which Mr. Johnson predicted in it as likely to be witnessed under the operation of the new law was supplied by Mr. Stanbery, the same gentleman who now shows that it is one of the most harmless acts that Congress has ever passed. Then, it was neither more nor less than the establishment at the South of military despotism pure and simple, without a single mitigating feature. Now, it appears it is simply an authorization to military men to act as police in aid of the local authorities, and to try men for criminal offences in the absurdly improbable contingency that the local courts should refuse to exercise or make any show of exercising their authority. Certainly, if Mr. Stanbery's present construction of the law be correct, somebody cut a very ridiculous figure last spring when the act was vetoed; but whether it was Mr. Johnson or his advisers, of course we have no means of knowing.

The question now is, What is to be done or will be done? It is but just to Mr. Johnson to say that he did not call for the opinion for his own guidance, and, therefore, its appearance is no indication that he wishes to put any construction on the law different from the one he put on it last spring. But then there is some danger that, now that it has appeared, he may act on it. He is under no obligation to do so. The opinion of the Attorney-General is no more binding on him or on anybody than the opinion of any other lawyer off the bench. It expresses Mr. Stanbery's own views, ably and clearly stated no doubt, and very likely quite correct; but it in no way alters the President's duties or responsibilities. He has already declared, as solemnly as a man can, that he considers the law unconstitutional. We have little doubt that Mr. Stanbery also thinks it unconstitutional—utterly, wildly unconstitutional. Upon that point not a shadow of doubt, we venture to say, has ever crossed the minds of either of them. They have both accepted it not as a measure which Congress had a right to pass, or which it was well for it to pass, but as an evil for which there was no earthly remedy. Mr. Johnson well understood that its faithful execution was not expected or required of him; that it was the intention of Congress that this should be left to generals selected by General Grant; and, in fact, it was well known when the session closed that the President's meddling in any matter not purely one of routine would be the signal for his impeachment. The two houses went home leaving this penalty hanging over his head in terrorem. Therefore he is under no moral obligation to interfere with the action of the generals in the South in any way, unless they should commit violations of substantial justice. He does not owe it to his own dignity to do so, nor yet to the interests of society. Nothing, everybody will confess, would be gained by the reversal of the action of Generals Pope and Sheridan except a triumph for one of the local factions, while the passions of the North would be once more roused by it, to subside heaven knows when.

Is he under any legal obligation to interfere, even supposing the Attorney-General's interpretation be the true one, and the President accepts it in its full extent? None whatever. Mr. Stanbery shows by a citation from the judgment of the Supreme Court in dismissing the Mississippi bill that the duty imposed on the President by the Reconstruction act and the supplemental act, as regards the supervision of the military commanders at the South, "is in no just sense ministerial. It is purely executive and political." Now, when the President fails or refuses to perform "an executive or political act" there is only one remedy. Congress can impeach him, but no other power on earth can call him to account. Therefore, if he should put Mr. Stanbery's opinion in his pigeon-hole, and let the military commanders alone, so long as their action really hastens the end which everybody has now in view—the speedy and satisfactory restoration of the Southern States to their old places in the Union—he would have nothing to fear from any quarter. Of the wisdom of silence and self-control there is apparently not much in his composition; but, if there be one particle, he has now such a chance of showing it as has never before offered itself.

We shall probably hear a great deal of the danger to constitutional liberty of allowing even an unconstitutional law to be disregarded by military officers; but the fact is that it is to the use of arguments of this kind by persons of influence and authority that we owe most of the violations of constitutional forms which have taken place during the last six years. What is dangerous and what is not dangerous as a precedent is something on which no two men will agree, and about which nobody's opinion is worth much. What is certain is that the majority of the Northern people is determined to have justice done at the South, and to prevent all secessionists of high degree, and all knaves and charlatans of whatever degree, from in any way guiding or controlling the process of reconstruction; that it does not particularly care whether this be done with or without the forms of law; and that the less this determination is checked or resisted, the sooner will that abnormal state of things which is now exciting alarm pass away and be forgotten. The real enemies of constitutional government are those who, with their "quiddits, their quillets, and their cases," are trying to stay the execution of the national will.

We cannot conclude without calling attention to Mr. Thaddeus Stevens's letter, in which he cries out for an extra session of Congress to mend what he admits to be the defects in the Reconstruction act, exposed by Mr. Stanbery. There is a lesson in what has happened which Mr. Stevens, old and experienced as he is, we think might very well learn, and that is the mischievousness of the habit, in which he more than anybody else indulges, of checking and stifling debate on important measures. If the Reconstruction act had been fully discussed, nobody would have been the worse of it; more time would have been given for consideration, the objections of its enemies would have brought out its defects, and its friends would have had an opportunity of perfecting it before it passed from their hands. But in order that an enormous majority might enjoy the paltry pleasure of crushing a feeble and insignificant opposition, the bill was hurried through, and when passed it was found that it had provided no machinery for its own execution. A supplemental bill was then passed, and now both together, on being taken to pieces by an acute lawyer, are found to confer in terms no more authority on commanding officers in conquered territory than a commanding officer in Massachusetts might very safely and becomingly be permitted to exercise. The "previous question" has here carried its friends almost to the last ditch of absurdity and confusion.

WENDELL PHILLIPS AMONG THE PRECEDENTS.

THERE are few men in the country better qualified by nature to make valuable contributions to the political thought of the day than Wendell Phillips, but he has ever since he became a party politician chosen for some inscrutable reason merely to follow the march of the Republican party from a great height in the air, as a kind of vulture to scare the more mindless, cowardly, and laggard Radicals into a show of eagerness and activity. Those of them who do little or no thinking for themselves often get confused and begin to hesitate in their advance, but they no sooner hear his remorseless scream over their heads than they make the most frantic and pitiable efforts to get to the extreme front as the only place in which they are sure of safety from his claws and beak. He enjoys scaring them immensely, and it is amusing to watch him in clear weather making his swoops at them, and them trying to dodge him. But he has devoted himself so long to this kind of sport that he appears to have lost all fitness for anything else. He seems to feel now that his influence is mainly dependent on his keeping on the wing, and he very seldom ventures down to the solid ground of facts and arguments. Up in the sky, with his epigrams and his sarcasms and his epithets and his invectives in his talons, he is a superb and formidable object, but when he touches the earth he is, like all other big birds, so awkward on his feet, and finds it so difficult to rise again, that an active boy with a stick could knock him over.

Last week he came down with a heavy flop in The Anti-Slavery Standard, of which paper he is what is called an "editorial contributor;" and where should he light but in a cluster of historical precedents, and here, as might be expected, he is an easy prey to the most unskilful fowler. After laying down the grand rule that the object of punishment should be prevention and not vengeance, he says:

> "Confiscation of estates, especially landed estates, comes clearly within this rule. It has always been the most efficient and the least objectionable method of introducing any great social change. The Norman conquest of England was secured and made complete by a large measure of confiscation. The French Revolution achieved almost all that was really valuable in its results by breaking up and distributing the great landed estates. This killed aristocracy in France. In our own Revolution, Toryism was rooted up by confiscating the estates of the old Colonial Refugees. Land is the usual basis of government; the class that holds it must, in the long run, give tone and character to the Administration."

About the propriety of imitating in the United States in the nineteenth century the policy of the Norman filibusters in England in the tenth century there is little for a sensible man to say. But we must call Mr. Phillips's attention to Julius Cæsar's manner of subduing Gaul, and the Peloponnesian ravages in Attica in the first three years of the war, as also not unworthy the attention of gentlemen engaged in the work of "introducing any great social change." Classical precedents, we can assure him, will make twice as much impression on Congress as mediæval ones; but in any case we protest against any citation of the Norman method of dealing with England, unless accompanied with an account of the English method of "introducing great social changes" into Ireland. That Mr. Phillips should not have mentioned the case of Ireland, which is the most brilliant and crucial example in history of the value of confiscation as a social or political agent, shows of what intellectual dishonesty even the boldest advocates of the plan can be guilty.

What he says about the French Revolution is, however, a still better illustration of either the carelessness or unscrupulousness—and one is, in cases like the present, just as bad as the other—of the men who are trying to persuade an ignorant and newly-liberated race that there is nothing inexpedient or immoral in their using their votes to take away their neighbor's property, as long as they pretend that their "object" is "prevention and not vengeance," and trying to persuade the Northern people to use against a third of their own countrymen one of the worst weapons of the feudal armory, a weapon poisoned to the hilt, and which no government has ever wielded without making ten enemies for the one it destroyed, and without breeding hates which take ages to ripen and decay.

The French Revolution did not achieve any political or social result worth mention by the breaking up of the great landed estates. Only a few of the great estates were broken up, and the number of landholders in France was hardly at all increased by it. Nothing that was valuable in the Revolution was brought about by the confiscation of property except the overthrow of the church establishment, and the church property, large as it was, was politically a bagatelle. All this may be found fully set out, with facts and figures and dates, in the works of Turgot and Necker and Arthur Young, and, though last not least, in M. de Tocqueville's "L'Ancien Régime et la Revolution," books with which all "pedlers of confiscation" would do well just now to make themselves acquainted, and they are, no doubt, all in Mr. Phillips's library. If he will look into the best known of them—M. de Tocqueville's—which has been translated and widely circulated, he will find the following on this very subject:

> "It has been commonly believed that the subdivision of farms began with and was caused by the Revolution. All kinds of evidence establish the very reverse. Twenty years before the outbreak, agricultural societies deplored the subdivision of farm lands. About the same period Turgot declared that the division of estates was so general that a property barely sufficient to maintain a family was often parcelled out among five or six children, who were consequently unable to support themselves by agriculture alone. A few years later, Necker observed that the number of small rural estates had become immense. . . . I have myself taken infinite pains to reconstruct the Cadastres, so to speak, of the old régime, and I have occasionally succeeded. The law of 1790, imposing a land tax, devolved upon each parish the duty of preparing a schedule of the land within its limits. Most of these schedules have disappeared. I have, however, discovered them in some villages, and I find on comparing them with our modern rolls that the number of landed proprietors was formerly one-half, and sometimes two-thirds, of what it now is—a surprising fact, as the total population of France has since that time increased more than twenty-five per cent. Then as now a sort of mania for the acquisition of land pervaded the rural population. A judicious contemporary observer notes that land is selling above its value, owing to the rage of the peasantry to become landholders. All the savings of the lower classes, which in other countries are lodged in private hands or invested in public securities, are used for the purchase of land in France."

Arthur Young, speaking of the infinite subdivision of land amongst the peasantry, estimated that they had amongst them one-half the landed property in the kingdom. "I had no idea," he says, "of such a state of things."

> "It is, then, a vulgar error," continues M. de Tocqueville, "to suppose that the subdivision of property in France dates from the Revolution. It began much further back. It is true that the Revolution was the means of bringing into the market the church property, and many of the estates of the nobility; but it will be found on an examination of the sales, a task which I have occasionally had patience to perform, that the bulk of these lands passed into the hands of persons who held land already—so that no great increase in the number of land-owners can have taken place. They were already, to use the ambitious but accurate expression of M. Necker, 'immensely numerous.'"

It thus appears that the most valuable results of the Revolution in France were achieved not by spoliation, but by the abolition of feudal privileges, by stripping the noblesse, already terribly impoverished and almost a landless class, of all exemptions and all rights which other people did not possess, by, in short, making all men equal before the law—and we cordially recommend the trial of this plan for a few years at the South. There is about as much prospect of great estates surviving with free society and free industry rising around them and beating against them in South Carolina as in New York. Some of the largest estates in this State were held at the Revolution not by Tories, but by patriots, but where are the estates now, and where is the former political influence of the families which owned them? Nearly all the large landholders in America, in fact, were faithful to the cause of independence. The Tory landholders who were "rooted out" by confiscation would not have made a military company, and the division of their property amongst loyal men has had no effect whatever on the national fortunes either by way of prevention or cure.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

SUGGESTIONS for the benefit of the Constitutional Convention now sitting at Albany have been made by several gentlemen whose views are entitled to respect. We do not know of any, however, which cover the ground more fully than those made by Professor Lieber and Mr. David Dudley Field, each of whom has issued a pamphlet on the subject well worthy of public consideration.

We should have liked either of these pamphlets better if it had had some of the features of the other. Professor Lieber confines himself to suggestions upon particular points of the constitution, giving his reasons for every change which he recommends. Mr. Field has prepared a complete draft of a constitution, without stating his reasons for proposing changes, except in two or three instances. This plan, combined with notes explanatory of changes, would certainly be the best mode of setting before the convention and the public the reforms thought desirable.

Both gentlemen agree in recommending the abolition of the elective judiciary, the increase of executive power and responsibility, and the abolition of distinctions on account of color. They disagree entirely upon the question of state sovereignty, Professor Lieber desiring the total repudiation of that idea, and Mr. Field recommending its assertion in explicit terms, subject to the limitations imposed by the national sovereignty within its proper jurisdiction. They also evidently differ in their opinions as to the degree to which an increase in the numbers of the Legislature would discourage bribery, although the number mentioned by each is about the same. Professor Lieber has no faith in the virtue of large numbers, and urges that the lower House should not exceed 300 members. Mr. Field proposes a system which he calculates would lead to the return of about 300, and plainly regards the increase over the present number (128) as a point of importance.

The constitution framed by Mr. Field has some general features of decided merit, which well deserve the consideration of the convention, quite irrespective of the details of its filling up. The first thing which will strike the eye of any one familiar with the existing constitutions of the various States is the great superiority of this paper over them all in respect to its classification and arrangement. In the New York constitution of 1846 scarcely any one subject is fully disposed of in one place, and, of course, there is much useless repetition. Mr. Field has sought to bring every branch of a single subject under a single head, so that the reader, having found a section relating to the powers of the Legislature, for example, may be confident that his eye is resting upon every line which bears upon that point. In one or two instances, it seems to us as if he had failed to put a section in its proper place: thus, section 101, prescribing an oath of office, appears to belong to the neighborhood of section 18, defining the different branches of government; and sections 102 and 104 should follow immediately after section 17, as they all relate to elections. These, however, are exceptional instances of an error which, in all other constitutions, is the rule instead of the exception. The value of an orderly arrangement of subjects in a statute of any kind is commonly under-estimated. To our mind, it is a matter of great importance. A proper classification brings to light a multitude of anomalies and contradictions which, for want of it, have in many cases gone uncorrected for centuries. And if it is valuable in any statute, it must be peculiarly so in the fundamental law of a great commonwealth.

Some of the declarations contained in this plan of a constitution are new to this State, but very desirable for the purpose of establishing correct principles. Thus it is declared that "a constitution is the supreme law, for all times and circumstances, in war as in peace" (§ 10); that a change in the form of government works no change in the laws or obligations of the State (§ 11); and that the writ of habeas corpus can be suspended only by the Legislature (§ 65).

Mr. Field recommends a plan for the representation of minorities, allowing 2,500 electors in any part of the State to choose a member of the lower House. This would accomplish part of the end desired; but would certainly fail to relieve voters from the incubus of "regular nominations." For it is obvious that it would require a very nice calculation to determine when a candidate had received 2,500 votes, while every vote beyond that number would be wasted upon him. At the first election many electors might vote independently; but the almost certain result would be that in several cases eight or ten thousand would vote for some prominent man, and thus lose three members to their party in each case. The party that was well drilled and so divided its vote that no candidate received less than 2,500, and none more than 3,000 votes, would infallibly secure a majority in the Legislature.

Thus, supposing the Republicans to poll 370,000 votes and the Democrats 360,000, and ten Republican candidates to receive through popular enthusiasm 10,000 votes each, while the rest of the Republicans and all the Democrats received an average of 2,700 votes each, the result would be as follows: 10 Republicans, at 10,000 votes each, 100,000; 100 Republicans, at 2,700 votes each, 270,000; 133 Democrats, at 2,700 votes each, 360,000. Thus, with a majority of 10,000 against them on the popular vote, the Democrats would have 23 majority in the Legislature. The consequence would be that at the next election the Republican electors would not dare to risk voting for any man not appointed to their respective districts, which would be parcelled out by the State committee in such manner as to ensure a vote of not less than 2,500, nor more than 3,000 in each.

We are heartily in favor of any system which will accomplish the end proposed by Mr. Field, viz., the representation of minorities all over the State, and the uprooting of the caucus system; but, after much reflection, we are convinced that either the plan of Mr. Hare must be followed, providing for the disposition of all surplus votes, so that none are wasted, or else a more localized system must be accepted. We perfectly understand the objections to Mr. Hare's system as too complicated for practical use, especially where elections are by ballot. We think that a scheme may be devised which will attain the object not quite so perfectly, but nearly enough, and yet not be so complex as Mr. Hare's plan. But we cannot enlarge upon this now.

The judicial system proposed by Mr. Field consists of a Supreme Court of seven judges, and of such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish, with abundant precautions to secure the independence of all judges. We quite agree with him in thinking that the details of the system should be left to the Legislature.

Many important suggestions are contained in brief paragraphs, such, for example, as a prohibition of legislative lobbying, a requirement that all laws affecting corporations shall be general, a prohibition of banks of issue under State laws, stringent provisions for keeping up the militia, etc., which we cannot now notice. We do not observe, however, any declaration that the grants of the State may be rescinded by it, which is indispensable to prevent evasion of the clause making grants of corporate franchises revocable, as recent experience has shown.

Professor Lieber opens with the subject of pardons, which he thinks should be granted by a board instead of by a single officer. Undoubtedly the governor has too much upon his hands to enable him to attend properly to this department of his duty, but we cannot help questioning the expediency of dividing this responsibility among a number of persons. We do not doubt that the governor would gladly turn over this duty to others, but it does not follow that the public interest would be best served in that way. Nor do we think that the general influence of pardons is bad. With the arguments of Professor Lieber in favor of a broad distinction between the pardon of a man who is found to be innocent and that of one who was guilty, but has repented, we heartily concur. But it seems to us a matter for ordinary legislation, and it would be enough for the convention to leave all these matters under the control of the Legislature.

To female suffrage Professor Lieber is strongly opposed, but his statement of the argument in its favor does not seem to us fair, nor his own argument in opposition forcible. It is the universal custom of respectable men in this country to take their wives and sisters to public meetings. It is only the rough and brutalized classes who think it necessary to leave women at home on such occasions. We fancy Professor Lieber has never been to a Republican meeting in Cooper Institute or the Brooklyn Academy of Music, or he would not ask such a question. And in the rural districts it often happens that women outnumber men at political meetings.

On some other points we should be disposed to controvert the doctrines of both Professor Lieber and Mr. Field, but both have done such a good work in publishing their views, and thus furnishing valuable material for public discussion, that we forbear further criticism upon matters of detail. Few services can be rendered to the public of more value than the expression of ideas upon such important questions by men of intellect and experience.

LOOKING BEFORE AND AFTER.

In his "Man with a Broken Ear" Edmond About makes some pretty good fun by showing us a soldier of the First Empire surrounded by the men and institutions of the Second, and by bringing the ideas of 1806 embodied in his person into collision with the ideas of 1860. To get the desired force of contrast the author was obliged to feign that his colonel had spent half a century in death. So he employed very amusingly the scientific theory of desiccation which has been put in practice in the case of literal worms, but of which we metaphorical worms have never yet had the benefit. For no doubt had the colonel been one of living men he would have been engaged with more or less success in assimilating himself to the new order of things as it evolved itself from the old. To be an out-and-out conservative one must get into the grave, and, to speak in a figure, for the dubious jewel consistency it is the undertaker only who makes the safe casket.

Colonel Fougas is an entertaining but we cannot call him an extremely reasonable creature. He shares with M. Victor Hugo and several others of his countrymen a desire to hasten the day when Europe shall be one nation, of which the capital shall be magnificent France; the telegraph, the railroad, the percussion cap seem to him admirably adapted for facilitating the war upon Albion and the march of the French armies upon Moscow, Berlin, and Vienna; the gas could then be used for the illumination of Paris; finally, he commits suicide—a stupid thing for a man to do who does not live in his own day. We cannot imagine that such would be the upshot of the experiment if we, for instance, could be mummified and brought to life again among our descendants in the fourth and fifth generations. The mere gratification of natural curiosity would make the new life at least as valuable as this one, and, we should suppose, much more interesting. Doubtless we should experience some disappointment; still, if one were not wedded to one's own convictions of what ought to be and would make proper allowances, reflecting that his new contemporaries were the posterity of his old ones, he might surely be happy enough in pursuing his investigations and find occupation for a lifetime. Questions innumerable suggest themselves to which it would then be possible to get an answer, as, for example, Will mathematics pass wholly out of the metaphysical stage and will metaphysics approach the region of demonstration? Will the tunnel supposed to exist under the Hoosac Mountain be brought to light? Will democracy repudiate the Salic law? How will an Amazonian army conduct a long war in Utah? Will the Mormon slaves then come inside our lines as intelligent and despised contrabands or will they help to build earthworks and insult the invading force? In those days will a day's work be seven hours? Will there be any intemperance in Maine? Will the school committees of Massachusetts concede to babes in arms all the rights of adult belligerents? Who will be the last Yankee? Will there be any pope in Rome? Will there be any white man's government in the South, or will Wendell Phillips Perry walk arm-in-arm down King Street with Governor Small? What will be the fuel in use in 1950? How long will it take you to go into the country, to Walrussia, say, in an Andrews aëreon, and will the "aëreon lungs" take the place of the "railway spine?" Will there be a science of medicine in that age or will the allopathic gallipot still blacken the homœopathic vial? What will then be the average duration of human life, and, by the way, may a desiccated man expect to live as long as a fresh one? Will they study the Latin language in the University of Michigan, or will they translate the language of animals into the universal tongue? Will they spell phonetically? Whose great-grandson will begin Mr. Bancroft's "History of the United States" at the formation of the Federal Constitution and finish it?

Man is above all things a knowing being; he would not live his life over again; but surely any of us, to answer these questions, or other ones, would consent to be revived and would faithfully promise our desiccator to live out all our permitted days.

Nay, for our own part, if we could imagine the desiccation theory carried out on the most gigantic scale, so that the world at various stages of its development had been laid aside dry, but capable of general resurrection, we could then imagine ourselves willing, in the interest of our improvement in science, to go backward, to retrograde into any of its bygone ages, and live out the remainder of our allotted life. It looks at first blush like an unpromising period for such an experiment; but no doubt a good deal of pleasure ought to be got out of even that æon when, according to Professor Huxley, our "probable progenitor was a vertebrate of amphibious habits, scaly, with two wings, several fins, and a tail of considerable length, and shaped like the tail of a large snake."

How delightful it would certainly be, after mastering Mr. Herbert Spencer's law of evolution, to retire just a few centuries into the dim past—whose dimness would disappear as one went on—and see for one's self how, in the historic times of our race, the incoherent, indefinite homogeneity changed gradually into that coherent, indefinite heterogeneity of which we also, each of us in his humble way, form a certain part. If one knew nothing of the science of this age, or of its theology and of its philosophy no more than is found in Mr. Spencer's law, it would be a fascinating existence merely to observe the sprouting of the unconscious seeds of the stately growths in commerce, in law, in politics, in every familiar field of human cultivation which we to-day have around us. And when one got tired of life, for after all one would be human, suicide would be not in the least necessary; one would only have to turn a first class prophet, and be put to death with instant speed.

Think of walking up (A.D. 1200), to a gentleman in metal, whose house, conveniently situated near a river, and where several roads meet, should be of stone, with a ditch round it, and telling him that for all he was a baron so bold he was the germ of a Wall Street broker, a railroad director, and a divorce lawyer. The prophet, no doubt, would have his neck tied to his ankles, and be immediately given to the carp in the moat; or both his eyes would be put out, and he would be escorted to a cell on the same floor with the toothless Jew supposed to possess personal property; or any lord baron would break his pate with a buffet of his fist. Yet we suppose that one phase of this baron's character has come to its fuller development in the gentlemen in Nassau Street who advertise in the New York Herald their readiness to succor distressed dames and poor captive knights. And as for his way of accumulating wealth, they that make "a corner" in "Erie" or "Harlem" represent that side of the old robber's character with great exactness. A recollection by the wretched prophet of one or two of Mr. Parton's admirable biographies of business men would assist him to see that the baron's method of growing rich—namely, making himself master of several lines of travel, treating the wayfarer as if he were a Californian passenger, religiously abstaining from ensuring the property of the caitiff Jew, making it his rule always to carry his point, delighting in horses and the rest—are in all essential particulars carried out by the commercial lords who in our time have no fondness for the things of prophecy.

And one might stand a good chance of getting one's head knocked against the wayside cross if he were to inform the young peripatetic minstrel, with the long yellow hair, that in centuries to come from the effervescent brain of his lineal successor should proceed the foam of the "eloquent lecture," and the stale tipple of small poems. Who knows, perhaps even the despised Hebrew might make shift to jump the length of his chain and smite the prophet who should inform him that one of his characteristics, the natural odor which formed so valid a reason for murdering him, should be carried to an extreme of perfection satisfactory to the New York World by a black barbarian Ethiop.

We dare say the brethren of the monastery in that vicinage would have been harsh in their behavior to their teacher; they might have burnt him or bricked him into a wall when told that the law of evolution would assuredly give their transcribing and illuminating of manuscripts to the Bradstreet or Riverside or University press, their doling of charity to the overseers of the poor, their bell-ringing to lay sextons, their meads and gardens and vineyards to secular uses, their cure of souls to heretics and schismatics on small salaries—payable in paper, with few flagons of wine for their stomach's sake or their often infirmities—their instruction of the country people, by bawling great moral ideas into their ears, to the able editors.

The king would surely hang him for such a prediction as that, in 1867, Mr. Johnson would make a sufficient shepherd for a larger flock with thicker fleeces than any boasted by our forefathers or their contemporaries anywhere. The hind would fell him with his mattock for a prophecy that his sons should seek to live without monk or baron or sovereign lord, and that as representatives of him there should stand men of the highest as well as of the lowest power.

This field is limitless. We make a free gift of these hints to whatever philosophic student likes to pursue the subject. If he pursues it far enough he will be, among other things, the wisest of historians and not the most foolish of men. Any worshipper of the past will be more foolish, and to be the wisest of historians is something.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, May 30, 1867.

SINCE my last letter two great events have taken place. The Derby has been run, and the conditions of the franchise have been finally settled. The first mentioned always takes precedence of all other business in England, and I therefore give it the first place here. You will, indeed, care little, I should imagine, to hear the name and breeding of the winner; to be told how he broke a blood-vessel, and was supposed to be "knocked out" in the betting; how he "came" again, but was still at 50 to 1 on starting; and how his winning took the sporting world by surprise, and shook the reputation of innumerable prophets. Are not such things written at full length in Bell's Life, and The Field, and innumerable sporting gazettes and journals and chronicles, to which I must refer those specially interested? The race, however, has called the attention even of those who, like myself, scarcely know a horse from a donkey to the present position of the turf in England. The winner being a complete outsider, some enormous bets were lost and won. His owner is generally said to have won close upon £200,000, and other gentlemen are mentioned as winning over £100,000. The losses, it appears, were more equally distributed; but it is reported—I know not with what truth—that the Marquis of Hastings has lost over £150,000. What is, perhaps, even more significant, the jockey of the winning horse received from the owner £8,000 or £9,000 as a present for doing his duty. It is easy to see what all this implies. If it is worth while to give a jockey for winning a single race a sum which most barristers or physicians or clergymen would be glad to save after years of hard labor, and that for merely doing what will bring him, at any rate, great advancement in his own business, it is evident that it would be worth other people's while to pay him something for losing. The decision of the race depends entirely upon the honesty of the jockey; upon the decision of the race depend sums equal to the fortunes of a rich man, and, moreover, very often the credit of a noble family; and the jockey is tempted by sums large enough to raise him at a bound from a menial to an independent position. It is only necessary to add, in order to estimate the average strength of his principles, that a jockey is a man employed about horses. The result of this may easily be foreseen. If our noblemen and gentry do not actually do dishonorable things on the turf, their success depends upon persons who are quite ready and strongly tempted to be dishonorable. They are, whether voluntarily or not, partners with rogues; and one cannot but remember a certain proverb about touching pitch. Moreover, between actual cheating and very sharp practice there are innumerable and very delicate shades. Actually to sell a race is, of course, as bad as to pick a pocket; but, then, there are all kinds of ways of deceiving the public more or less without actually selling. There are innumerable devices for bringing a horse forwards in the betting or throwing him back, and for indirectly enabling his owner to attain the desired result of "getting his money on;" that is, making a satisfactory set of bets. The practice has been reduced to a system, with an appropriate phraseology which would swell our established dictionaries, and has generated a code of ethics equally appropriate and equally unintelligible to the outside world. To decide what is fair and what is not fair in horse-racing is a task to which only experts in the science are equal. To others, it sometimes seems that the difference between right and wrong on the turf is much like the difference in commerce between picking pockets, swindling, and "financiering;" one is cheating with gloves and the other without.

Of course we still talk the appropriate slang about the love of sport which is so characteristic of Englishmen, and the improvement of our noble breed of horses. But, as a matter of fact, the turf is as much an organized system of gambling as the rouge et noir of German watering-places. There are, doubtless, many men who take an honest interest in the horses and care more about the sport than the money. But many of those who attend most regularly know no more about horses than the gambler does about the balls whose course determines his winning or losing. One of the greatest winners of late years was said never even to look at a race or a horse. There are, in short, two parties. The regular book-makers simply lay the odds against the horses, because the odds, on an average, are always too small; the public back their own favorites, because every man fancies that he is sharp enough to pick out the winner, and, as the book-makers support themselves at the expense of the public, it is evident that the public is not so sharp as it thinks. I need only add that all the most consummate cheats and blackguards in the country have a natural gravitation towards the turf, as being a rather gentlemanlike, or at least aristocratic, way of winning money by their wits without capital or character. And it will easily be understood that the disreputable element is tending to swamp the honorable men who still take an interest in horse-racing. Lord Derby, Lord Palmerston, and many other men of high character have kept race-horses; but few men take to it systematically without losing both in reputation and money. There has been a certain outburst of indignation on the present scandal, but, of course, there is not much hope of purifying the profession; the only hope being that the honest men may retire and leave the rogues to prey upon each other. I am sorry to see that the Prince of Wales has, in the elegant language of the sporting papers, "dropped a lot of money on the Oaks," as it will not tend to improve his position; however, a little propensity to sport will not hurt his popularity.

I now turn to the Reform bill, which seems to have pretty certain prospects of success. The redistribution of seats remains to be settled, but the franchise has got through the committee. The ultimate result is that every householder who pays his rates will have a vote, and that every lodger whose lodgings are valued at ten pounds a year will also have a vote. Between the two there will be a very considerable increase of our constituencies, and possibly a perceptible stride to democracy. It is a far larger measure than Mr. Gladstone ventured to propose last year, when the Tory gentlemen accused him of going straight to the "Americanization," which in their mouths is equivalent to "diabolization" (excuse the word and the compliment), of the country. However, they will allow Mr. Disraeli to steal the horse when Mr. Gladstone may not look over the hedge, and the deed has been done without even a protest, except from Mr. Lowe. In the character of a faithful Abdiel, he made one of his forcible speeches the other night, and appealed vigorously to the country gentlemen not to throw away their position and privileges for nothing. They had, he told them, been led gradually up to the obnoxious measure as a man leads a skittish horse up to an obstacle and allows him to smell at it until he has gradually become accustomed to what once frightened him out of his wits. Mr. Disraeli fenced round the appalling object with all kinds of provisions intended for safeguards against democracy; as his party gradually became familiar with the name of household suffrage, he dropped them one by one, until they were ready to swallow the naked proposition which, if at first revealed, would have shocked them beyond bearing. His skill has been beyond praise and beyond expectation. He has substantially acted the same part as Sir Robert Peel when, as the leader of the Tory party, he granted Roman Catholics emancipation and free trade, which he had so long bitterly opposed when demanded by the Liberals. But Mr. Disraeli has done it more skilfully, for all the time that he was really making a concession, he affected to be carrying out his own principles; he has abandoned the position, boasting all the time of his consistency, and has somehow persuaded all his party, with a few exceptions, to go bodily over to the enemy's camp by declaring that the enemy were really coming to them. It is marvellously clever of Mr. Disraeli, and marvellously stupid of his followers; but I doubt whether it will be referred to hereafter as a very noble specimen of political morality. However, the radicals are quite content to receive Mr. Disraeli's concessions, and to allow him to call them obvious corollaries from his own principles. The Whig ex-ministers, whose game has been taken out of their hands, are not quite so gratified at the change.

I hope that this may be almost the last time that I shall have to refer to a question which has been treated on both sides with a singular want of earnestness, but which has come to an unexpectedly favorable result. There are still a few rocks ahead, but there is every prospect that they will be successfully circumvented.

During the last debates two subjects have been discussed which may be mentioned, because they are likely to obtain more notice hereafter. Mr Mill brought them both before the House, and was the only man who could have obtained a respectful hearing for them; for although country gentlemen still sneer at him as a "philosopher," a term which they apparently conceive to be one of reproach and to indicate a total unfitness for anything in this world, his great reputation is sufficient to force them to listen respectfully, to say nothing of the interest of his speeches. He moved, in the first place, the enfranchisement of all women who are disqualified by their sex alone. The debate which followed was very poor, consisting chiefly of the rather coarse and very stupid jokes by which any such proposal is certain to be assailed; but the motion was only rejected by 180 or 190 to 73. The minority was far more numerous than any one had expected, including several Conservatives, and I think that it indicates that the advocates of women's rights will, before long, make themselves heard in the reformed Parliament. Again, last night Mr. Mill moved the consideration of Mr. Hare's scheme of representation. Of course, there was not the smallest chance of its adoption, but it was received with a decent amount of attention, especially by Lord Cranbourne, a man of ability, though of bigoted Conservative principles. Of this, too, we shall doubtless hear more, though I confess that I by no means share the enthusiasm with which Mr. Mill and some of his devoted followers regard it.

There was a good deal of excitement here for a few days as to the fate of the Fenian leaders. The Government—pushed on, doubtless, by the bitter spirit of the dominant landlord party in Ireland—made up its mind to hang one or two of them, and announced its intention positively. There was a general cry of indignation from the newspapers—even the Tory Standard admitting the impolicy after a grudging fashion—and a deputation of seventy members from the House of Commons at last succeeded in extorting a more humane course from the Government. I am glad that we are to be spared the disgrace of a political execution, but we have been unpleasantly near it.

THE POST-OFFICE COMPETITION.

THE Commissioners appointed by Congress to procure a design for a new post-office and court-house to be erected in the City Hall park have received the competitive designs for which they advertised a few months since, have duly exhibited them to such persons as they chose to invite, and are by this time, we presume, endeavoring to come to a decision with regard to their respective merits.

The history of this undertaking is interesting not only to those who are directly concerned in it, but all who have at heart the welfare of this great city. In THE NATION of April 4, some remarks were made about the terms and conditions offered to competing architects, and comparison was drawn with the proceedings of the British Government in similar undertakings. But the work of the commission did not commence with the issuing of the official invitation. As early as January 28 of the present year, the commissioners—who had doubtless heard how the architects had turned their backs upon the commissioners for building a new State Capitol at Albany and the officers entrusted with the erection of buildings for the War Department at Washington—thought they would begin operations by asking the architects what they had better do in order to get the best building. They accordingly inserted a preliminary advertisement in the papers to that effect. The course adopted by them seemed to be a very sensible one, and was regarded by all who took an interest in the matter as a token that this commission, at least, would avoid the blunders which had characterized the performances of the Albany commissioners and have since resulted in an utter failure to get a suitable design for the State Capitol. How many answers they received, we do not know; but, one at least, was made through the newspapers, the same medium through which the commissioners had asked for advice. It was a reply framed at a respectable meeting of architects in this city, and was signed by nearly every architect of position practising in New York.

It would naturally be supposed that an answer from such a source would be just what the commissioners wanted, supposing them to be in earnest. But it is very clear that they did not want any advice at all, for the advertisement for plans which soon appeared showed that they had not accepted a single important suggestion contained in the architects' letter. This was as surprising as that they should have asked for advice in the first place, and it became evident that the commissioners, who had at first been alarmed lest they should fail to get the co-operation of good architects, now seemed disposed to set them at defiance. Outside parties, on good terms with the commissioners, talked about "self-conceited architects dictating" what should be done, etc., and it was very clear that the commissioners relied upon the tempting bait offered in the fourteen prizes to allure enough seceders to their party to make the company respectable. It was too much to expect that a commission constituted as this one is would adopt any radical reforms in their mode of procedure. They were evidently so much alarmed at their own temerity in taking one step forward that they immediately took two backward.

The official advertisement was duly published, offering a great number of prizes and giving particular injunctions that "the drawings must be to a uniform scale, without color," that "all unnecessary and inappropriate ornamentation must be avoided," and that "the first story might be estimated for iron or marble, or both," etc. The commissioners returned to their private business, and confidently waited for the coming in of the drawings, while all the leading architects were supposed to be working night and day, neglecting their regular business in the desperate race for the great "job" or the prizes.

We now come to the result: Fifty-two designs have been sent in, the authors of which stand in awful suspense, while the architects who stood aloof are being roundly abused for letting slip such a splendid chance to gain immortality.

Knowing all the circumstances, the result is not surprising. There are as least ten designs which it is safe to say are not by architects at all, but by ambitious school-boys, mechanics, and engineers; while as many more are doubtless by architects' draughtsmen, who make pretty drawings but have not the knowledge or experience requisite to execute a design in brick, stone, and iron. About ten of them are by architects of average ability, and the ground-plans and arrangement of these are such as will fulfill the requirements of the committee. But when we come to the matter of artistic treatment, we find three only that are worthy of mention.

The designs are all numbered, and it is supposed that none of the authors are known; but three days have been sufficient to show the absurdity of attempting to have an anonymous competition. During the last day the names of authors were almost as freely used in discussing the merits of the designs as the numbers that had been affixed to them.

It is a hopeless task to attempt to influence the decision of the committee, and, in fact, we take little interest in it, believing that no one of the architects represented by these drawings will eventually be employed to carry out his design. Rumor already points out Nos. 16, 17, and 18—it matters not which of the three, for they are all from one office—as the favorite designs. If engineering and wire-pulling are of any avail, one of these will be the elect. The influence of the press has been privately solicited for these designs, and we will, for our part, freely give them all the notoriety that they ask for. But an opinion on their merits would not be a flattering one; so we withhold it.

If the committee have the capacity to understand plans, or will condescend to ask some one who is conversant with drawings to explain them, they will doubtless select one of good arrangement; but it is hopeless to expect them to make any intelligent decision as to the artistic merits of any that have been offered to them.

It would be waste of time to enter into a discussion of the designs. There are many beautiful drawings, as such, and much talent has been wasted in working up worthless designs. The facts of this whole business, generally stated, are these: Some people think that architects are a set of beggars who will take up any offer that is thrown to them. The Post-office Commissioners, being blessed with the same idea, have thrown out their bait, and doubtless feel flattered that they have caught many splendid designs. They have a number of very pretty pictures, few of which are of any value. But they could have got as many by offering half the money. Business is now very dull, and there are always plenty of designers who are in need of money, and have plenty of time to spare which they are ready to expend with the hope of any remuneration, however small. But we apprehend that what the commissioners want is a building, and to build it it is necessary to have an architect with capacity to design and ability to construct. That they have designs from few of such architects is evident from the fact that so many have held aloof from the competition. We could name at least twenty of the most prominent members of the profession in this city who have taken no notice of the commissioners' offer, and that they have not been induced to send in plans is the fault of the commissioners alone. It is not mean or selfish, as some people think, for them to refuse their contributions. Architects are business men as well as artists; and men of business, as we believe the commissioners are, must realize that to get their goods it is necessary to pay the value of them. If they want first-class architects to enter their competition for a first-class building, they must offer terms which will be acceptable. We doubt not but that capable men stand ready to offer designs as soon as they are satisfied that the proper compensation will be given and full justice will be done in rendering the decision. One thing essential for the commissioners to do is to get full power from the next Congress to employ an architect and commence work, which now they cannot do. Congress should then appoint competent jurors to serve with the commissioners until the design is determined—men with technical knowledge of the art of building and the nature of architectural drawing. It would then be worth while for architects to spend some time in preparing competition drawings, and a building might be built which would at least be creditable to the commissioners and the city. The blind course which they are now following will only end in the erection of another monstrosity worse, perhaps, than our new Court-house. The only hope now seems to be in the check which the authorities at Washington may put upon them. But judging by the blunders committed in trying to get designs for the War Department building, there seems to be little to hope for from that quarter.

A WORD ON THE GOVERNMENT OF CITIES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The Nation remarked the other day that "New York is not, in the old sense of the word, a municipality," but "simply the great market-place of the State." This remark, which is equally true of most of our large cities, brings clearly before us the characteristic which distinguishes our modern municipalities from those of history; at the same time it contains a sufficient explanation of the failure of our system of city government, and a sufficient justification for having the city governed by the State, if this is the only way to obtain an honest and efficient administration. Probably, however, it would be conceded that if a good local government could be had it would be better still, and that anything which should develop for the city a truly municipal character would be likely to aid in this.

Our private corporations and other associations are as much distinguished for integrity and efficiency as our public administration for corruption and mismanagement. De Tocqueville long ago called attention to the powerful workings of the principle of association among our people, and this national characteristic has strengthened rather than diminished since his day. Our people combine themselves in every conceivable way, for every conceivable purpose, and these purposes are accomplished promptly and economically. What, then, is the reason that when we combine for the highest of all public ends, not as voluntary associations, but backed up by the power of the whole community, we fail so completely? Is it not because the immediate personal interest is wanting which gives to the town governments of New England as it gave to the democracies of ancient and mediæval history their peculiar efficiency?

Unless it is in some way possible to revive the spirit of municipality, and excite in this great conglomeration that we call a city some degree of that feeling of community which must make the life of any self-governing body, there is probably no escape for misgovernment except by calling in the aid of the State. So far, our city governments have failed to call out that sense of community which springs up of itself in small towns and in the wider concerns of State and nation. It is true the most constant and immediate interests of daily life are in question, but the responsibility is so distant—it is so much a matter of petty and undignified detail—and the individual is so lost out of sight in the huge mass, that the feeling of personality does not have room to grow up.

It would seem, therefore, that the best means of obtaining the desired end would be by some organism which should be able to appeal to the personal interests and affections of the individual in its parts, since the whole fails to attract these. This is indeed precisely what the present system aims at in the subdivision of the city into wards. But wards do not accomplish the object, for the reason that they are purely arbitrary divisions, like congressional districts, and like these shifting—shifting, that is, not by a change of boundaries, but by incessant changes of residence. The relation of the individual to the ward is even less vital and immediate than to the city.

We fall back, therefore, on voluntary, self-organized associations, such as already exist and carry on a large part of the life of the community. Out of these combinations of the several trades, professions, and industries of the city it might be possible to create such an organism as should call out the personal interest of all citizens, and bring it to bear upon matters touching the welfare of the whole. That worthless class of the community which does not live by industry, and has no claim to be considered in any scheme of city government, would find itself shut out by the very terms of the organization; while, as the bodies under consideration are governed entirely without reference to partisan or theological considerations, the whole matter would be removed from party politics.

If it is thought advisable to have two chambers in the city government, I would suggest that the upper body—very small—should be elected according to the plan of personal representation; the larger body to be composed of representatives of the various industries, the Chamber of Commerce, the bar, the trades unions, etc.; the mayor to be chosen by this legislature.

Another point, not immediately connected with this that precedes, but of great importance in itself, is the power of the voters in a city over the public expenditure. The details of national affairs must be managed by representative bodies; but many of the details of local administration may legitimately be submitted to the vote of the people after full discussion. This is the life of the New England town system. It might be engrafted upon the system of city government by providing that certain questions—all, for instance, involving a certain amount of expenditure—should be voted upon, yes or no, by the people of the city, provision being made for a full discussion of them beforehand under the auspices of the city magistrates.

COLLEGE DEGREES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: What do you mean by "the democratic principle of giving the same degree on graduation to the highest and lowest scholars?" etc. Surely this is not the rule at our colleges, e.g., at Yale the valedictorian certainly does not take "the same degree" as the student who has no "appointment" at all. If Harvard has abolished college honors, I suspect it is the only leading college that has done so. Our college honors are not sufficiently valued or sufficiently prominent, but I suspect this is quite as much the fault of the public and the students themselves as the "faculties." Nor is this the natural meaning of your paragraph, which, as it stands, would convey to a foreigner, for instance, quite a wrong impression.

Yours very truly, B.

[Our correspondent evidently mistakes the common though technical use of the word "degree" in the article in question. It is customary in most if not all of our American colleges to allow a certain number of the best scholars—generally one-third or one-half of each class—to declaim in public on Commencement Day certain essays, varying in length and in name with the class-rank of the student. It is also customary at Harvard to print upon the commencement programme a schedule showing the percentage of the maximum number of marks assigned for the course which has been obtained by each student in the first half of the graduating class. The system which we expressed a hope to see inaugurated is that of giving at the final examination several different diplomas, according to the relative merit of the students as shown by the final examinations. This seems to be a natural, not to say a necessary, consequence of an elective system of study, such as that proposed at Cambridge.—Ed. Nation.]

HONOR TO WHOM HONOR.

To the Editor of The Nation:

The oration commended by The Nation of June 13 to W. Gilmore Simms, "who has preserved so much verse for us that helps us to understand the Southern country," must be "laid at the door" of a genuine Yankee. Its author, who is the son of a most worthy Congregational clergyman of New Hampshire, graduated twice or thrice at different New England colleges before his class; raised funds at one time by personating a priest and confessing the workmen on the line of the Western Railway, and has shown his genius in various ways.

After the publication of his oration he proved himself a true Southerner by challenging a Western editor to mortal combat for speaking disrespectfully of his effort. The challenge was accepted; the combatants were to meet on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains. Tenney should read his oration at the editor; who, if he survived, would reply with an editorial. I do not know that either party has been heard from since, and it may well be feared that it proved fatal to both.

But Southern orators have enough to bear without being burdened with that oration.

The Week.

MR. JOHNSON has declared his intention of acting on Mr. Stanbery's interpretation of the Reconstruction acts, and in order to divide the responsibility has published the minutes of the Cabinet meeting at which he formed this determination, together with the votes of the different officers of the Government. Mr. Stanton appears as a minority of one throughout the discussion, thus proving, what many people have at times been disposed to doubt, that he has been throughout the late controversy a firm adherent of Congress. How under these circumstances he has been enabled to keep his place is a mystery still to be explained, but, whatever the explanation of it, his having kept it is probably creditable to the President. Mr. Stanton's influence has perhaps not been great, and it is not unlikely that it was the fear that a change in the War Department would be looked upon as indicative of an intention to appeal to force which prevented his removal long ago; but in any case his appearance at the council board to oppose both his chief and his colleagues shows that Mr. Johnson has preserved throughout the crisis some shreds of moderation. The record of Mr. Stanton's votes at the late meeting would have been of greater value if it had also contained his reasons. Those of the majority are, of course, furnished by Mr. Stanbery, and the country would have been the better of having a man of Mr. Stanton's weight state at length why he, had he been in Mr. Johnson's place, would have paid no attention to the Attorney-General's opinion.

A JULY session is now inevitable and necessary. The majority in Congress, after trying heroically to draw and pass a bill that would virtually sweep the existing State governments out of existence and lodge the supreme authority, under the Commander-in-Chief, in the hands of the district commanders, succeeded in passing a bill that left the State governments just where they were, and gave the district commanders hardly any authority whatever which is not possessed by the commanding officer on Governor's Island. This exploit was sufficiently remarkable; but they achieved one more remarkable than this, for they persuaded Andrew Johnson that the bill they had passed was one of the most frightful laws that ever emanated from a legislative body; that it put the whole South under the soldier's iron heel, and made each Federal general a pasha, and a pasha, too, unchecked by the fear of his master's bowstring. The poor President, under the influence of this hallucination, sat down and wrote in "lewd prose" a gorgeous and thrilling veto, in which he showed that the bill aimed at a clean sweep of constitutional government, and would establish a brutal despotism, and would leave good Americans nothing to live for. In fact, the deception was complete. If the business of Congress was to play practical jokes on Andrew Johnson, the majority of last session would deserve the thanks of the country. As they have higher aims, however, they are going to meet again and try their hands once more. We hope this time they will make the job complete and put every inch of the South securely in the hands of Federal officers, so that their will shall be law, and the only law, until the work of reconstruction has been done in the manner prescribed by Congress. We think, moreover, a very good use of military power would be the transportation of Governor Perry and all other obstructives to some bright little isle, there to remain, without pen, ink, or paper, till the South is back in the Union. The question before the South just now is not how to conduct a constitutional government, but how to create one; and all attempts to limit the powers of the military officers by constitutional precedents and doctrines is as absurd as to insist on the architect of the new State capitol taking Cushing's Manual for his guide in drawing the plans. People will readily forgive Congressmen for their blundering if in the coming session they will confine themselves to a rectification of their blundering in the matter of reconstruction; but the fact that gold began to rise as soon as it appeared that they were to meet in July is a striking indication of the want of public confidence in their discretion and self-control. The hot weather will, however, probably limit debate and curb zeal, and we shall see the reconstruction machine once more in good working order by the first of August.

THE President's journey to Boston has been singularly uneventful. In this city he saw few people, and those few were mostly persons on whom he had official claims for attention. At various cities along the road he received the ordinary civilities. The only outburst of enthusiasm came from Mrs. D. C. Peck, of Bridgeport, Connecticut, who handed him at the station a gushing note and a bouquet. The Masonic celebration in Boston, at which he assisted, appears to have been showy and impressive, but the reports in the daily papers are of such a character that nobody who was not present can tell much about it. Even the New York Times, which usually keeps its more excitable reporters tied up, seems to have let one loose on this occasion, and he proved nearly a match for some of The Tribune's wildest and most untamable. He reports the Masonic temple at Boston as bearing the same relation to Masonry that the Cathedral of Fribourg and the Ducal Palace at Venice bear to the "religious sentiment," but what this means it would take a "Resident Commissioner," as The Tribune calls its emissaries in Europe, to explain. The chandelier reminded him "of the regions where storm and sunshine thrust their splintery forms through the everlasting snows," and the Knights Templars in procession recalled to his softened fancy the "craftsmen" parading "the Via Sacra after the Acropolis at Eleusis was completed;" while their white aprons struck him as "more honorable than the Roman eagle!" We recommend The Times to make a "Resident Commissioner" of this gentleman. He is thrown away on provincial home jobs.

Apparently the President's tour has given much satisfaction to the President and more pleasure to the citizens of Massachusetts than was expected. Something of the civility paid him was paid to the Masonic brother, and a good deal of it to the high official, and probably some part of it to the man, but it was all civility. No cities but Philadelphia and Worcester, we believe, treated the visitor with lack of courtesy. The speeches by Governor Bullock and the mayors were not very cordial, to be sure, but, considering the President's feelings and forgetting those of the rest of us, they were better than no speeches at all. The President's were empty, and without other evidence would prove pretty well that he had assistance in producing his messages. They are very poor speeches. Mr. Seward did on one occasion put a little life into his utterances. Some hisses mingling with the applause when he was called out at Boston seem to have stung him, and he rebuked Massachusetts for keeping North Carolina out of the Union, and prophesied that the thing could not long be done. But in comparison with the equal want of dignity shown in the Secretary's telegram to Farragut, the spitefulness of the speech is pleasant rather than otherwise. But it is not to be forgotten that within the last two years or so Mr. Seward has gone through enough to account for a good deal of what in his manners is not fitting.

Sheridan was not ordered unconditionally to extend the time for registration, but was told to extend the time if he had no good reasons to the contrary. He had such reasons; and to one of them force has since been added by Sickles, who asks Senator Wilson for a great deal more money to complete the business of reconstruction in the Carolinas. The large additional expense constitutes one of Sheridan's reasons for not keeping the registrars at work; that there are no more people to be registered is another reason; that Louisiana has had as much time as the other district commanders have given is another reason. These are enough. Sheridan is not content, however, till he has told General Grant what he thinks of the Attorney-General's decision, and he adds, with a bluntness that it is not very hard to forgive, "I regret that I should have to differ with the President, but it must be recollected that I have been ordered to execute a law to which the President has been in bitter antagonism," which truth embodies a very excellent reason for Sheridan's doing all that he has done; but perhaps any very cogent reason for saying just this it would be vain to seek outside of Sheridan's own impetuous disposition. James B. Steedman, we see, has telegraphed to the President that "Sheridan must be at once removed." For those who know the two generals, the simple statement of this fact will be sufficient without comment.

The Ohio Republicans have gone decidedly ahead of their position of a year ago. One of the resolutions passed at their State Convention on Wednesday week places the party "on the simple and broad platform of impartial manhood suffrage." There is now before the people an amendment to the State constitution which provides that negroes may vote, and we begin to think its ratification may be expected. At all events, the Republican party in Ohio must be held to have purged itself with due form of the heresy of last year, and the defeat of the measure, if it is defeated, will lie at the door of the Democrats, who, if they do defeat it, will no doubt turn round as one man, from Texas to Maine, and insist on being told why the Radicals, who pretend to love the nigger, don't enfranchise him at the North as well as at the South. We shall be disappointed if New York does not follow the example of her Western neighbor, and at any rate manhood suffrage throughout the North cannot be very long delayed, it having become one of the things which everybody thinks must be done quickly before the other party does it.

We are not of those who pretend to a clear idea of the extent of Indian hostilities at the West or of the prospect of a speedy repression of them. The published telegrams abound in stories of "battles" and "massacres," some of which have been proved to be, in plain language, diabolical inventions. The despatches from the civil officials are filled with apprehension and with censure of the War Department; those from the military commanders seem to depreciate the danger—which is what we might expect from both parties. But it is painful to observe that all the ferocity displayed proceeds from the civilians, with Gov. Hunt at their head. Indeed, what some of the good people of Denver indignantly denounced as calumny in Hepworth Dixon's account of white scalping, is shown to be no calumny at this juncture. Not always, we do believe, do the far Westerners hold the life of an Indian in as much contempt as the Southerner once held the negro's, but in the hot blood caused by his depredations and violence the savage must not expect mercy, and does not, though we wish for the American reputation he might expect to be put to death in a Christian manner. He is not, however, so much to be pitied as those who, by warfare with him, are brought down to the same level of brutality; and for the sake of the generation that is educated into familiarity with this bloodshed, of which nobody may boast, it is to be hoped the miserable conflict may soon terminate.

The new minister to Mexico, Marcus Otterburg, or, as some of his friends or enemies now style him, the "Marquis d'Otterbourg," is a German of the Jewish persuasion, who came to this country a very young man, in 1852, with very few acquired advantages. He is a native of Landau, and we presume had not at that time given much attention to diplomacy, as he began life in his adopted country by opening a small cigar store at Milwaukee. In this business he failed miserably, and was pursued with some vindictiveness by angry creditors. He then, we believe, acted as treasurer for an itinerant theatrical company, of which his wife was one of the stars, and then betook himself to journalism. In this field he figured as advertising agent, and collector of "personal items," for a small German paper in Milwaukee, in which capacity he earned the gratitude of some prominent Republican politicians, and his claims for a small clerkship were urged earnestly by them on Mr. Lincoln. He was appointed Consul to Mexico as a compromise, was well received by Maximilian, but found one thousand dollars a year too small a sum with which to cut a respectable figure in court circles, and, like a sensible man, resigned. Mr. Seward insisted on his remaining at his post, however, and now, we suppose as a reward of his constancy, has made him minister. For all of this Mr. Otterburg is in no way to blame, but we think the public will agree with us in thinking that the country has not got so hard beset for public servants that it is forced to draw upon the ranks of the German-Jewish immigration whenever it wants diplomatists for posts requiring unusual tact, discretion, and training.

Senator Wade's speech in Kansas, on the relations of capital and labor, about which there has been so much talk, and in which he hinted mysteriously that something might be done by legislation to promote a more equal distribution of property, has very little importance, except as an indication of the embarrassment of the position in which some gentlemen will find themselves when the Reconstruction controversy is over. There is, of course, no way in which inequality in property can be prevented except by having an equal division of goods every ten years or thereabouts, and the probabilities are that not more than one or at most two such divisions would be necessary, as after that time those who remained within reach of Mr. Wade's legislation would have so little to divide that it would hardly pay to carry the law into effect. The energetic, industrious, sagacious, and frugal have an unbrotherly way of getting rich faster than the slothful, the lazy, the stupid, ignorant, and drunken, and, what is worse, they have an odious fondness for keeping the fruits of their own toil for themselves and their children. Unhappily, too, there is no country in the world in which this class of persons is so large as in this, and we greatly fear that, as soon as they saw Mr. Wade and his shiftless protégés proposing to go shares in their goods or chattels, they would either take arms and put him and them out of the reach of want, or they would take themselves out of the country. In either case the new régime would be short-lived and full of misery. The desire which afflicts people who want property to be fairly divided by law, and of which Mr. Wade now shows symptoms, is one of the oldest in the world, and the best known, though its forms are various. Its origin is always the same—the inbred desire of men of all races to have plenty to eat and drink and wear with little or no labor. In the ancient world it showed itself in plunder and in slavery, which is simply a disguised form of plunder—a more roundabout way of living on the results of other people's industry. In modern times it takes a much milder form, is called "charity," and the "brotherhood of man," and the "rights of the poor," etc., and breaks out in proposals for communistic legislation. The workmen of the European continent, and particularly of France, had a bad attack of it about twenty years ago, but they are rapidly recovering from it. It seems to have stealthily crossed the ocean, and is now showing itself as an epidemic in some localities amongst us. Congressmen, doubtless owing to their exhausting labors and protracted vigils, seem to be peculiarly liable to it, and we are afraid it will make terrible ravages both in the Senate and House, but particularly in the House, during the next two or three years. Like cholera, it fastens most readily on those who have no steady and healthful occupation for their minds and bodies, a fact which suggest strongly the necessity of providing some manly and invigorating employment for the national legislature after the negro suffrage and the woman suffrage shall have been disposed of. One of the worst symptoms has already exhibited itself in Mr. Wade's case, namely, the strongly expressed wish of the patient to keep "in advance" of the rest of mankind on all possible questions. Cases have occurred in which the victim has been thrown into severe convulsions by the belief that the rest of the public were catching up with him, or that he had reached the last extreme and could go no further.

A WRITER in the Wilmington Commercial argues the duty of Congress to take Delaware in hand and provide her with a republican form of government, under the well-known clause of the Constitution which Mr. Sumner thinks available for imposing negro suffrage on the North, and which the writer would also employ for correcting the unequal apportionment of political power in Delaware. His difficulty, and it is that of all those who have sought to give vitality to the clause in question, is that no State can be shown to have a less republican form of government now than when it took part in framing and adopting the Constitution, which thereupon became the certificate of its republicanism; whereas all the seaboard slave States, Delaware included, are, by the abolition of slavery, nearer the ideal republic than ever. But such an act of Congress as would satisfy the minority of legal voters in Delaware, though it might make the Union homogeneous, would not content everybody, nor would it settle the definition of a "republican form of government." There will be plenty of women and not a few men to assert that we have still only sham republics, so long as sex is a condition of the suffrage. It will do no harm if the discussion continue a little longer, so that, when our ideas of "equality" and "right" are fixed, we may amend or interpret the Constitution once and for all.

IT is interesting to know that Mr. C. L. Vallandigham never said the Northern troops should march over his dead body; that he never was the man to say there would be no war; that he opposed the war as waged by the South and as waged by the North; that during the war his crime was that he loved the old Federal Republic, not wisely, we would add, but too well. Like Swinburne's hero, he would have had the object of his affection remain uncured of her leprosy for fear that when healed she would decline to receive his addresses. Also he is very like the British regulars at the battle of Monmouth, who are said to have lived a long time after they were killed. The last tears were shed over poor Mr. Vallandigham's political tomb many months ago, yet here he is writing political letters as if it were incumbent on him to commit political suicide. It is to a Mr. Clay that Mr. Vallandigham writes his letters; and his object in writing is to deny the truth of certain injurious statements made by Senator Wilson. His only apology, he says, for noticing anything that comes from such a source, is that Mr. Wilson is the successor in the Senate of Daniel Webster, and has recently "experienced religion." We do not observe that Mr. Wilson has answered him, and this ought to persuade Mr. Vallandigham to lie down and be quiet. No one knows better than Mr. Wilson who in the political field is quick and who is dead.

THE continued retirement of the Queen, and her refusal to represent the kingdom, either in entertaining foreign potentates or London society, although she has now mourned her husband five years, continue to excite much criticism and dissatisfaction in England. The matter has been a good deal commented on already, but the London Times has lately ventured on more plain speech than any English newspaper has ever before ventured to address to an English sovereign. It warns her that the prolonged absence of the monarch from the public eye will gradually familiarize the people with the idea that the nation can get on very well without a monarch, and that if she persists in her present course she is not at all unlikely to leave the throne to her son in a damaged condition, and that what renders the experiment all the more dangerous just now is the immense change in the composition of the governing classes which the reform bill now passing will effect. Unfortunately, too, the Prince of Wales's character and pursuits are not of a nature to reconcile the country to his mother's seclusion. He has all the marks and tokens of what is called a "fast man," and does not conceal the fact that even the most trifling duties of his position bore him horribly. A century ago this might have passed without danger. In those days kings were sacred animals whom nations maintained fat and sleek, as the Egyptians did their two bulls, as indispensable to the national existence and happiness. But those days have passed away. There is still enough love of form and ceremonial left in the Old World to reconcile people to paying large salaries to kings and queens for keeping them up, but it would be highly dangerous for any monarch to persist long in doing what Victoria is now doing—drawing the salary without doing the work. Mr. Bagehot's remarkable book on the English Constitution contains a striking passage, to which the present crisis in England gives additional point, showing the influence which the growth of strictly matter-of-fact, utilitarian political communities in America and Australia exerts, and is likely to exert, in sapping the old European reverence for royalty, and he hints at the possibility of the English king passing before long silently away, and leaving the nation governed, as now, by a Parliament electing its own leader. What renders the matter all the more interesting is the gradual decline of the House of Lords, which has dwindled with tremendous rapidity in the course of half a century into a venerable form. The average attendance of peers is about five, and their political influence is about in the ratio of their industry. They are indolent, incompetent, and as a body perishing before the rationalism of the age. The creation of life peers which Lord Palmerston attempted ten years ago would have revived them, but they would none of it. It is proposed to save them from the reformed House of Commons by abolishing proxies, making a quorum necessary to the transaction of business. At present two peers may constitute the House of Lords; but it is very unlikely that any remedy would now avail. Their disease is organic, not functional. When Burke, in his magnificent burst at the close of his Warren Hastings speech, prayed that their lordships "might long stand as an ornament of virtue, and a security for virtue, the terror of tyrants, the refuge of an afflicted nation, a sacred temple for the perpetual residence of an inviolable justice," he little thought that in seventy-four years they would be within an inch of perishing from the most ignoble of all diseases—laziness.

IT appears it was the Rothschilds who agreed to lend the 600,000 francs to the Italian Government on church property, and afterwards backed out of the agreement, and then threatened vengeance if their proceedings were exposed. The Italian Ministry, nothing daunted, however, have exposed it, and hinted, amidst the cheers of the Chamber, at an appeal to the courts. A new convention has now been concluded with Messrs. Erlanger and Fould, and the money will accordingly be forthcoming. The rumors of a possible coup d'état which have been long floating about have been indignantly denied. The King is a trifle too Catholic for the tastes of his people, but of his loyalty to the constitution there is, his friends say, no question. Just at present he is occupied in getting his sons married. The projected marriage of Prince Humbert with the Archduchess Matilda, the daughter of the victor of Custozza, and the granddaughter of the more famous Archduke Charles, has failed through the untimely death of the lady, who perished in her own drawing-room, in the midst of her friends and attendants, in the bloom of youth and health, of treading on a lucifer match.

Notes.

LITERARY.

“Byron,” the book written by “the Guiccioli,” latterly known as the Marquise de Boissy, which is issued in Paris, is to be republished in this country by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, who announce it. The same house have received some of the sheets of an interesting work of which they may be called the American publishers, though it forms one of Tauchnitz’s new series of English translations of German authors. The author in this case is one not known to American readers, Fritz Reuter, and the book is called “In the Year Thirteen.” Reuter has a great German reputation as a humorous writer in both prose and verse. In the days when there was a German Milton, a German Plato, a German Voltaire, and it was the fashion to christen German authors with foreign names, Reuter would probably have been called the German Burns. “In the Year Thirteen” and some if not all others of his works are composed in a dialect—Platt-Deutsch—which bears about the same relation to literary German that Lowland Scotch bears to literary English. Mr. C. L. Lewes, son of Mr. G. H. Lewes, is the translator, and his difficult task—for to many Germans the dialect above-mentioned is unintelligible—has apparently been well done. Another book about to be issued by Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt is Spooner’s “Biographical History of the Fine Arts.” This work is well known, and in this new edition appears in a handsomer and stouter outside dress than it has ever worn before. It is printed from the plates formerly owned by Mr. G. P. Putnam, and now in the hands of Mr. J. Bouton.——Mr. W. J. Widdleton will this fall add to his reprint of “The Amenities of Literature” and “The Curiosities of Literature” two books which will complete the set of the elder Disraeli’s works, namely, a volume of “Miscellanies” and “The Quarrels and Calamities of Authors.”——Among the works announced by Messrs. A. Simpson & Co. are “Poems,” by F. S. Cozzens (author of the “Sparrowgrass Papers”); Lord Strangford’s translation of poems from the Portuguese of Louis de Camoens; a translation of Dr. Max Parchappe’s “Galileo: his Life, his Discoveries, and his Works;” “A Treatise on Melancholy,” from the French of Dr. E. Du Vivier; and “Geology for General Readers,” by David Page, F.R.S.E.——Harper & Brothers announce a reprint of Miss Strickland’s abridged “Queens of England;” of the same author’s “Foundling Willie;” and of Dr. Smith’s “Smaller History of England.”——Mr. W. V. Spencer, of Boston, will shortly publish two little books for children—“Gerty and May,” and “Aunt Zelpeth’s Baby.”——Mr. Loring, of Boston, announces that by an arrangement with Miss Florence Marryatt, her forthcoming novel will be published simultaneously in Boston and London, and also announces a reprint of a successful new novel, entitled “The Roua Pass.”

—The Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler has been censured for letting himself be photographed while in the act, or, at any rate, while in the attitude of pronouncing the benediction or of offering prayer, and has been defended as having done no more than comply with the solicitations of some of his parishioners who wanted a picture of him in an attitude in which they like to see him. A defence at least as good as this, and perhaps better, would be to plead the example of the Right Rev. Samuel Wilberforce, D.D. That dignitary of the English Church has likewise been photographed in a posture usually reserved for the place of worship. And in his case the photographer was able to do what Sydney Smith suggested to the artist who painted Moore—namely, to throw into the portrait an expression of hostility to the church as by law established. The bishop was so depicted as to make known to the beholder his views upon “these Ritchelist ways;” his attitude was that of a Roman Catholic bishop imparting a blessing. This photograph was engraved by Messrs. Hatchard & Co., and figured in the front of a pamphlet published by that house, whereupon the photographer applied for an injunction to restrain Messrs. Hatchard & Co. from selling the picture, and was favorably answered by the judge.

—A Doctor Leger, a Frenchman by birth, who once lived in this city, and who had lived in many cities at one time and another, turned up as a mesmerizer in London in 1849 or 1850. He was not then a believer in phrenology, but afterwards became such, and after making several important improvements in the newly-invented magnetoscope, he applied that instrument to phrenological investigations. We get some account of Dr. Leger, his instrument and his method, in an English book entitled “Notes and Studies in the Philosophy of Animal Magnetism and Spiritualism,” by J. Ashburner, M.D. The instrument we will not attempt to describe. Doctor Leger applied it, with remarkable results, if we may believe Dr. Ashburner, to the heads of criminals and great men, and we regret sincerely that the latter gentleman was inconsiderate enough to get a touch of the gout, and so make it impossible that he should continue the experiments of his friend, who has been for some time dead. The instrument, it appears, can only be handled with good scientific results by a man in good condition; its requirements are very severe indeed. “As a general rule,” says Dr. Ashburner, “all persons who adopt the pernicious habit of smoking lose the inestimable faculty of perceiving the refinements of high mental and moral perceptions, and none of them can manipulate the magnetoscope.” But we fancy that Dr. Ashburner does not habitually restrain himself rigidly in the matter of expression and weigh his words with exactness. In other parts of his book he insinuates that “the whole College of Physicians is tinctured with the silly sin of self-glorification.” And again he says: “Our stolid cavillers in England are not worth a moment’s thought.” And once more: “Faraday, worse than ignorant of the great interests of science.” And yet once more: “The wretched intriguer who was the author of ‘A Psychological Enquiry,’” etc., etc. Be that as it may, this is his statement of Dr. Leger’s practice, and some of its results: Leger wished to apply mathematical laws to human motive; he had, in his magnetoscope, the means of doing so, for phrenology shows that the human head may be mapped out into thirty-six bumps, which are the outward signs of organs, which are the generators or seats of motives, and the doctor discovered that by the magnetoscope can be measured the magnetic force of each organ—the instrument being tremulously alive to the least manifestation of this force, and the organs being active or otherwise in accordance with the abundance or deficiency of the supply of it. Dr. Leger took 5 as the figure expressing the average force of each organ of the brain. Five times 36, then, or 180, represents the power of brain possessed by nine out of ten men that one meets on the streets. Irish servant-girls, by the way, were found by Dr. Leger to have no more of a head-piece, so to speak, than is represented by 130 or 140. But Macaulay, according to the magnetoscope—we do not know when he submitted himself to it—had a brain force of 310; a disguised person, who, we are told, used to carry an umbrella in a peculiar manner, and did not wish his name to be known, was marked 320; Lord Ellesmere gets credit for no less than 350; Earl Stanhope for 308; Robert Owen for 314. We are sure that Professors Fowler & Wells are making a great mistake in not importing a magnetoscope, and the republication of the book is quite in their line, we should think. It is to be had of Scribner, Welford & Co.

—Other late English books imported by the same firm are: “Ireland and her Churches,” by James Godkin; “The Keys of St. Peter,” by Ernest de Bunsen; Edward Dicey’s “Month in Russia during the Marriage of the Czarevitch,” which is adorned by photographic portraits of the Grand Duke and his bride; “Pompeii: its History, Buildings, and Antiquities,” well and profusely illustrated, by T. H. Dyer; the laudatory “Life of Eyre,” by the Mr. Hume who has become the laughing-stock of the critics; “Religious Life in England,” by Alphonse Esquiros; Tupper’s “Third Series,” which, by the way, is not yet announced for republication in this country; “A Secret Nook in the Jura,” a new novel by Ruffini; “Astronomy Without Mathematics,” by E. B. Dennison; James Cranstoun’s translation of Catullus; and “The Oxford Reformers of 1498,” by Frederic Seebohm. The reformers who form the subject of the last-mentioned volume are Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, and John Colet, who is best known as the founder of St. Paul’s School in London. But Colet, in 1496 and in Oxford, was a sufficiently “liberal Christian” to speak in his lectures of the Mosaic account of the creation as “a most useful and a most wise poetic figment.” Radulphus, a friend of Colet’s, had been lecturing on the dark places of the Book of Genesis, and had begun his explanations with the words of Lamech in the fourth chapter, as if there were no dark places before that one. Colet began with the beginning. He thought "nothing could be more like nights than these Mosaic days." The lectures, which embraced other topics than the Book of Genesis—as, for instance, the theory of verbal inspiration, the union of the two natures in Christ—were delivered by Colet after his return from Italy, where, it is probable, he had fallen under the influence of Savonarola, and were attended by great crowds. Erasmus and More held towards him the relation first of pupils and afterwards of dear friends. The book is well described by its title. The men of whom it treats were, like Wycliffe, reformers before the Reformation, and this excellent account of them not only gives honor to whom honor is due, and from whom it has been, to some extent, withheld, but assists the student to understand how the Reformation came.

—The best late book of travels must be "Cathay, and the Way Thither." It is a compilation of lazy men's delights, being a collection of mediæval notices of China and of the road to that region through the territories of the Great Cham and Prester John, and also by the way of the sea. Whenever translation was necessary, it was done by Colonel Henry Yule, C.B., formerly of the Royal Engineers (Bengal), who has edited the work with great care and knowledge. It is not yet imported to this country, we believe, but we see it noticed in the English papers. They learn from it that in the thirteenth century, when King Haiton of Armenia paid a visit to China, the Chinese gentlemen were very much surprised to hear that outside the central flowery kingdom there were women who had the use of their reason, like men! Also it appears that in 1050 A.D. Pi Shing made movable types of terra-cotta; in 904, printing from stone was invented by some other Chinaman; and block-printing the Chinese had invented in 581 A.D. In the reign of Hientsung (806–821 A.D.) there was a great scarcity of copper, and the emperor, borrowing the idea from the merchants, who had had it no one knows how long, issued paper money, which, however, soon depreciated tremendously in value. Leather money had been in use in the empire so early as 119 B.C. Before the Christian era the Chinese had discovered the use of coal as fuel, and ages before the Western nations thought of them they built ships with water-tight compartments, and used to navigate them by the aid of the mariner's compass. They have long made use of portraits in the identification of criminals; and there is no telling how many of our so-called modern inventions and discoveries we shall not find, as we become better acquainted with this remarkable country, to have been anticipated by a people who after all were not so very far wrong when they called the rest of the world "outside barbarians." Other works that we see advertised are "Meals for the Million," by Cor Fydd, who seems qualified to shine in Loring's library, for she arranges one hundred and twenty-five dinners for heads of families with incomes ranging from £100 to £250 a year; G. Routledge & Sons publish "the cheapest 'Boswell's Life of Johnson' ever issued;" W. Michael Rossetti is author of "Fine Art, chiefly Contemporary;" "A Visit to American Schools and Colleges" is by Sophia Jex Blake; "The Social and Political Dependence of Women" is by an anonymous author, who, the Echoes from the Clubs says, "is certainly a man," meaning that it is good; "Shipwrecks of Faith" is by Archbishop Trench; and "The Heroes of Crampton" is by a J. G. Holland. One would say it was by our J. G. Holland, for thus the advertisement begins: "Fiction, though much abused and persistently traduced by those who do not comprehend its true mission, has always been a favorite mode of conveying truth, and has for its support the highest sanctions of Christianity. The author of the Christian system spoke evermore in parables," etc., etc.

—Mr. Schulze-Delitsch is not a government partisan. Only the other day, in the Prussian Chamber, he denounced the illegal conduct of a minister who had undertaken to fill vacancies in the judiciary. But the Prussian Government cannot be insensible to the deputy's arduous and indefatigable efforts to assure peace and prosperity to the kingdom by improving the condition of the laboring classes, notably by consumers' and other co-operative societies. They have, it is reported, and we hope truly, recommended Mr. Schulze to the favor of the French Government in awarding the Exposition prize of 100,000 francs for services like those which have rendered him so honorably famous. A Mr. Dolfus is spoken of as his rival.

—Ex-Finance Minister Scialoja received lately from Naples a letter informing him that the writer had just composed a play entitled "The Ecclesiastical Patrimony," which was crammed with abuse of M. Scialoja, and altogether so recommended itself to a scandal-loving public that the author had had no difficulty in finding an impresario who would give 3,000 francs for the copyright. But the honest dramatist, so he said of himself, was not so mercenary that he could not give the preference to M. Scialoja. "Send me, then," he adds, "the 3,000 francs, or I shall consider myself free of every engagement towards you."

—The English tract-distributors, who are making a harvest at the Exposition, have been subjected to not a little ridicule, which some of their friends think might well have been reserved for a pamphlet published in Paris by Moronval frères, rue Galande, and styled "The Poor Folks' Physician; or, Collection of prayers and supplications, precious against toothache, cuts, rheumatics, fevers, scurf, colic, burns, low spirits, etc." One of the simplest remedies set forth is that contained in the "prayer for the speedy cure of colic," to wit:

> "Put the middle finger of the right hand on the pain, and say: 'Mary, who art Mary or colic passion, who art between my liver and my heart, between my spleen and my lungs'—stop at the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and say three paters and three aves, and mention the name of the person, saying: 'God has cured thee, Amen!' "

—The Academy of Bibliophiles in Paris is about to publish beautiful and complete editions of the best French poets and prose writers. Already it has issued, under the editorial supervision of M. Louis Lacour, and with Jouaust for printer, an edition of Régnier, the sixteenth-century satirist, which is spoken of in the highest terms for its typographical finish and textual accuracy. Laid paper, new type, archaic titles and ornaments, are employed to make the book distinguished above ordinary publications. The number of copies struck off is generally not more than the number of subscribers, as is the custom in this country in similar cases.

EDUCATIONAL.

WASHINGTON COLLEGE, in Virginia, to which the Confederate General Lee began to devote his energies after the close of the rebellion, has just issued a catalogue and circular for 1867, which is much more interesting than ordinary college circulars. Among the instructors, in addition to the distinguished chief, are the names of R. L. McCulloch, whose flight from Columbia College is not yet forgotten, and Colonel W. P. Johnston, one of the personal staff of Jefferson Davis. The number of students enrolled is 399, of whom 139 are Virginians, five hail from Northern States, and the rest are from different portions of the South. The courses of study are elective, usually occupying three years. The allusions to "the seasons of unpleasantness" which have interfered with the college progress since 1861 are not rare. Among them is a severe reference to General Hunter, "under whose eyes the college that bore the name and enjoyed the munificence of George Washington was sacked." On the other hand, words of praise commemorate the students of 1861 "who joined the immortal Jackson at Winchester," and "earned from their illustrious commander the designation of more than brave young men." President Lee, we are told, "devotes himself exclusively to the duties of his office, occupying a room in the college buildings to which the students have at all times free access."

—In the House of Commons, on June 5, an interesting discussion took place on Mr. Ewart's bill providing that at both Oxford and Cambridge Universities "any person may be matriculated without being entered as a member of any college or hall, and may, if he shall think fit, join himself to any college or hall, with the consent of the head thereof, but without being obliged to reside within the same; and every person so matriculated shall in all respects and for all intents and purposes be and be considered as a member of the University, and upon joining any college or hall shall in all respects and for all intents and purposes be and be considered as a member thereof."

The bill and the motion to pass it to a second reading were supported by Mr. Ewart, Mr. Neate, Mr. Evans, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Gladstone, and others. Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir W. Heathcote, and Mr. Hardy were the chief speakers on the other side. On the one hand, it was contended that the proposed change was merely a return to that university system which existed down to the time of Archbishop Laud, and which has since been supplanted by the colleges; that their proper dignity would be restored to the professors; that a great boon would be given to poor scholars, for whom the college expenses are an insuperable barrier; that no longer as now, owing to the insufficiency of accommodation, would the worst colleges be filled at the expense of the best; that the competition for endowments and scholarships would not be limited as now to the comparatively small class that can afford to enter college and pay their way through; that the proportion of students to the population of the country would be greater, as it ought to be; and that much more attention would be paid to practical instruction, in such branches as agricultural chemistry, geology, engineering, etc. Mr. Gladstone incidentally asserted that never, since Oxford became a university, had it done so little for the poorer classes, and had so small a fraction of the clergy, the medical and the legal professions been educated there and at Cambridge. He also strongly censured, as connected with the question of cheap living and cheap education, the six months' vacation at Oxford.

To this it was replied that in the order of things the colleges, being latest, were an advance upon the old university, and that consequently Mr. Ewart's bill was reactionary, that it precipitated the colleges into untried ways, made no provision for discipline, took away the opportunity for close friendships, was so loosely worded as even to admit women, and after all obstructed the action of a highly respectable committee within the universities, who had been engaged for two years in studying the same or similar changes. The feeling of caste was also inferrible, though it received no offensive expression.

It has been acutely observed that the English people, even when pursuing a reform, turn with confidence to the past and demand instruction of history rather than of philosophy; and this debate affords a good illustration of this trait. "Englishmen," said Mr. Beresford Hope, "dislike irritating and teasing legislation." The result was that the vote stood: for the second reading, 164—against it, 150; and the bill was ordered to be referred to a select committee. Meantime the expenses of college life at Oxford continue to be £100 in place of £50; and Cambridge can show but 1,900 undergraduates against 3,000 or 4,000 at Berlin.

LEA'S HISTORY OF SACERDOTAL CELIBACY.*

AFTER a conflict lasting for ages, and at times convulsing Christendom, the celibacy of the clergy became an established feature in the constitution of the Latin Church. The Greek Church still permits the marriage of the lower orders of the clergy; deacons and presbyters retain the wives which they may have previous to ordination, while bishops, being recruited from the ranks of the regular or monastic clergy, are held to their vows and remain unmarried. This diversity is one of the points of contention between the Greek and Roman Churches. To trace the origin of priestly celibacy, the operation of the causes that promoted it, the vicissitudes of the long battle between the friends and the opposers of the practice, and its effect on the character and the influence of the Church, is a task which requires vast research. The numerous polemical works, Catholic and Protestant, especially in the period of the Reformation, are of course rich in material and in references which facilitate enquiry. The learned collection of Calixt—De conjugio clericorum—and the more recent work of Carové, are deserving of special mention. But the most important historical treatise on the subject has been the copious and erudite work of the brothers Theiner (Altenburg, 1828), a work of about the same compass as that of Mr. Lea, and the product of thorough and conscientious investigation. It must be remembered that the materials for a history of celibacy lie buried in the writings of the fathers and schoolmen, in the doings of synods and the decrees of popes and bishops, in the mediæval chronicles, in the civil legislation of all European countries, and in a hundred other obscure mines which the student must patiently explore. In truth, he can hardly qualify himself to write a full history of this single practice without at the same time performing the labor requisite to qualify himself to write a complete history of the Church—at least of the Church in the mediæval period. We do not exaggerate the merits of Mr. Lea's book when we say that it is evidently founded on a remarkably wide and profound examination of the original sources of information, its arrangement is lucid, and the spirit that pervades it is in the main just and philosophical. The learned author travels over the entire ground from the Apostolic age to the quarrel of Pius IX. with the Italian Government. Though he does not wander from his proper theme, he drops incidentally much curious and instructive information respecting the Church and society in the course of the extended period which he has occasion to traverse. One has only to turn to the chapters which describe the Hildebrandian reform and the conflict that ensued between the papacy and the empire, to convince himself of the author's ample erudition and of his general fitness for the task which he has undertaken. Altogether, the work is an extremely creditable addition to the literature of church history, and may challenge comparison with the best monographs which the German scholarship of our day has produced in this department.

Having expressed our warm appreciation of the excellence of Mr. Lea's work, we wish to offer a few critical suggestions upon several points which have attracted our notice in perusing it. We cannot concur in the literal interpretation which the author is inclined to give to Matt. xix. 12. The metaphorical sense is better fitted to the context, and is supported by examples of a similar use of the phrase by the rabbis. So the references in Meyer's Commentary ad loc.—1 Tim. iii. 2, 12, and Titus i. 6—are designed, according to Mr. Lea's opinion (p. 23) "to exclude those among the Gentiles who indulged in the prevalent system of concubinage, or who among the Jews had fallen into the sin of polygamy." This understanding of the phrase, "husband of one wife," has the support of some of the ancient expositors; but it is proved to be incorrect, in our judgment, by the corresponding phrase in 1 Tim. v. 9, where the widow who is "taken into the number"—either of deaconesses or of pious women supported by the charities of the Church—must have been "the wife of one man." That is to say—as the supposition of polyandry is out of the question—she must have been married but once. Out of accommodation probably to heathen prejudices, second marriages were made a barrier in the way of advancement to certain offices in the Church. It was a temporary recommendation or mandate, but it was not without its influence on subsequent ecclesiastical customs. In a note on p. 29, the Explicationes is quoted as a production of Justin Martyr; but that work is without doubt spurious. This circumstance, however, does not seriously affect the statements in the text with which the reference is connected. We read on p. 35 of Basilides, the Gnostic heresiarch, that he "honored the passions as emanating from the Creator, and taught that their impulses were to be allowed." We are not aware of any good reason for ranking Basilides in this category, although the work of Hippolytus has of late cast so much new light upon his system. The later Basilideans degenerated from the purity of the founder of the school. Mr. Lea supposes that the old British Church, which preceded Saxon Christianity, maintained the practice of celibacy. Some of his arguments are worthy of attention. Yet St. Patrick himself was the son of a deacon and the grandson of a presbyter. Gieseler, who gives an opposite opinion to that of Mr. Lea on this question, says that "the Irish Clement defended the marriage of a bishop as late as the eighth century" (Gieseler's Ch. Hist., Am. ed., I. 531 n.) Many English as well as Continental writers have fallen into various errors concerning the old Celtic Christianity of Britain, one of which is the identifying of the British Christians with the Asiatic party of Quarto-decimani. Christianity was probably carried over from Gaul into Britain; and in this case, whatever Oriental peculiarities were found in the old British Church must have been derived indirectly. In speaking of the Council of Constance (pp. 386, 387), Mr. Lea speculates as to the causes of the failure to effect the reforms which had been projected, and which were confessed to be imperatively required. He does not, however, state distinctly the real ground of the disappointment, which was that the advocates of reform were beguiled into the election of a pope as a preliminary measure, and that when the election was once effected, Martin V. himself and the Papal party skilfully prevented the consummation of the reformatory efforts.

In unfolding the origin of celibacy, it might have been well for the author to discriminate more sharply between Brahminical and Manichean asceticism and that asceticism which early arose and spread in the Christian Church. There is a fundamental difference. The Oriental asceticism rested on a theological dualism, whereas everything of that sort was cast out as a heresy from the Church, and the asceticism of Christians sprang from the antagonism of flesh and spirit—from the struggle which the law of Christ required his followers to maintain against the overgrown propensities and appetites of human nature. Moreover, when the Gospel was first preached, unchastity prevailed to a most frightful extent in the Græco-

Roman world. The early conference of the apostles (see Acts xv.) mentions fornication as prohibited to the Gentile converts, placing it on the list among things indifferent, as the eating of blood and of things strangled. The reason was that fornication was almost reckoned by the heathen among the adiaphora, so prevalent was the vice and so little disgrace did it bring. Asceticism arose in the Church as a part and fruit of an energetic protest against an all-pervading sensuality. The reaction naturally led to an extravagance.

Although the work before us is marked by candor and a spirit of moderation, yet the reader would, perhaps, gather from it a more unfavorable impression of the character of the Middle Ages and of mediæval religion than a comprehensive view would justify. There was not only a vast amount of devotion in "the ages of faith;" there was also a vast amount of conscientiousness and of earnest endeavor to live a truly Christian life. The careful reader will find evidences of this fact in the continual resistance to abuses and the reiterated enterprises of reform, the record of which is given on the pages of this history. Whatever may be said of the motives underlying the custom of celibacy as it arose and finally became a law in the Latin Church, no fair-minded reader of Mr. Lea's work will doubt that it has been productive of immeasurably more evil than good. Experience has proved that even where purity of life has existed among a celibate clergy, they have often suffered greatly from a loss of that education of the human affections which the family is adapted to afford. The temper of ecclesiastics would have been less hard if they had dwelt in the sunshine of pleasant homes. Worse than this is the immorality to which this enforced custom has led, and which it has not unfrequently been thought to palliate, if not excuse. It is a most significant fact that in various countries and at different periods the laity have preferred to see the priest, if not married, yet permanently connected with a female without the sanction of the marriage tie. They have desired this as a safeguard for their wives and daughters. Celibacy doubtless contributed to the independence of the Church, and aided the Papal power in building up that compact, well-organized hierarchy which brought so great blessings, along with great evils, upon European society in the ages of transition from barbarism to modern civilization. But this feature of mediæval Christianity is destined to pass away with the mistaken views that engendered it. The calmly reasoned, deeply learned, and dispassionate history of Mr. Lea will do its part in producing this wholesome result. It deserves an honorable place among the standard works in the province of historical theology.

MAGAZINES FOR JULY.

The Galaxy has fallen into sensational ways. The July number, long before it was issued, was advertised and "paragraphed" as containing "an article by Horace Greeley" and "an article on Ritualism by the Reverend Morgan Dix," a gentleman who is supposed to be as High Church in his views as almost any clergyman in this High Church Diocese, and who, it was inferred, might have something to say on the topic above-mentioned that would disgust some people, amuse others, delight others, and in some way or another stir the feelings of all. But the articles about which so much noise was made are of the stupidest kind. Mr. Greeley, in exactly three pages, commits himself fearlessly to the assertion that "The Fruits of the War" are the abolition of slavery, the restoration of the Union, the disappearance of the theory of secession and of the apprehension of future civil war. One might set a figure-four trap in the City Hall Park, and not catch a newsboy who has not at his tongue's end everything which Mr. Greeley has written for The Galaxy, and which the editors of that magazine have published with such a flourish of trumpets. As for Mr. Dix, one thinks, as one reads his article, that he would like to say and could say a great deal more about "Ritualism" than he has chosen to say in this utterance. With what we regard as uncandidness, he has written a good many pages on the upholstery aspect of the new movement, and has said nothing of that vital principle of it which, if it is not what attracts the most of those who are called Ritualists, is certainly what rouses the hostility before which the movement will sooner or later turn out powerless. Such Ritualism as he talks about is not the Ritualism which it is worth while to regard. But there is a Ritualism that it is worth while to regard.

The two novels, Mrs. Harding Davis's and Mrs. Edwards's, are still going on in The Galaxy, and there is the usual variety of light reading. This number contains two illustrations, one a very lifelike little picture by Gaston Fay, which has been much hurt in the printing by injury to the eyes of the figure; the other, a picture by C. C. Griswold, which fails to convey the idea of the two verses it was meant to illustrate.

In Hours at Home there is as good a paper on "Walrussia" as we have read since Mr. Seward acquired that region. Our new fellow-citizens appear to be not a very engaging set. The Indians among them are described as bloodthirsty and cruel, and we should say that the Esquimaux will bear a great deal of civilization. It is customary for the youthful Tchoutki or Esquimaux to remain unweaned till he is five years old, and it is added that he has been known to borrow a chew of tobacco and then go to take the breast. By the way, if he is deformed, he is very likely killed soon after he is born. When he grows up—and he grows to a height of between five feet one inch and five feet ten—he may have as many wives as he can support, and probably will think none too much of any of them. Our fellow-citizen, Matonabbee, for instance, is represented as saying that women were made for labor, that they can haul or carry twice as much as a man, and that the expense of keeping one can be kept at a very low figure, because being always the cook the mere licking of her fingers is an ample subsistence for her. These people live in deerskin tents in the summer season, and in semi-subterranean drift-wood huts in the winter. Skins furnish them not only their summer habitations, but their leggings, their tunics, their hoods, and their boots. Of the intestines of the seal or whale they make their windows, and also their one musical instrument, a sort of drum; and their diet is, of course, continually meat and fish. As for personal appearance, they are short, with a light yellowish-brown complexion, which, however, darkens with age, dirt, grease, weather-stains, and the process of tattooing. "They are robust, muscular, and active, their chief strength being in the back." Their height, as we have seen, is not so very dwarfish; their faces wear a good-natured expression, and the women are said not to be ill-looking when young, but to be miserable objects when old, as might, indeed, be inferred from their habit of wearing lip-rings, from the decay of teeth, to which all Esquimaux are liable, and from the expressed sentiments of Matonabbee above-mentioned. They are modest before and shameless after marriage, and are encouraged by their husbands in violating the marriage vow. The intellectual capacity of the race is small; it is doubtful if they can count above six. As for religion, they seem to believe in a future existence, for they say that when a man dies his body sleeps and his soul goes underground to feed on stones, mosquitoes, and roots; they think that earth, air, and sea are full of invisible spirits, and, in general, they are given over to senseless superstitions, and their natural science is quite on an equality with their theology. Mr. Snow estimates the whole number of Esquimaux and allied tribes of supposed Tartar origin to be no greater than twenty-five hundred.

The latest of Dr. Bushnell's essays, "On the Moral Uses of Dark Things," is entitled "Of Oblivion, or Dead History," and contains some fresh thought and many passages in Dr. Bushnell's best manner—forcible, flowing, and, if suggestive of the pulpit, suggestive of a sort of pulpit eloquence of which it is to be wished there were much more than there is. Some of the thought, too, is fresh as well as forcibly expressed. This passage following is to be quoted not so much for its matter as for its expression, and no doubt it is a specimen of energy of expression somewhat too unrestrained. Nor will the thought command assent:

> "John, the apostle, had Mary, the mother, with him, we know not how many years, and she told the story over, how tenderly, how many times. He was getting old, too, when he wrote his gospel, and old men are proverbially garrulous; and yet he says not one word of the infancy, or gives any faintest allusion to Mary's conversations. No; he has something great to record here, and something which can be fitly honored only in a few bold strokes of narrative, such as will even make the story idealize itself more vividly than words can describe it. Why should he pile it with cargoes of circumstance, when the world itself could not contain the books, and Christ himself would be written out of his divinity, by an itemizing gospel that proposes to enhance his record?"

Other articles in this magazine are an instructive outline of Dr. Döllinger's oration on "The Universities of Europe" (J. F. Hurst); "The Last of My Panama Pets," which is by Mr. C. H. Webb, and is light and entertaining; a tourist's article on the Homes of Charles Dickens, Florence Nightingale, and Charlotte Brontë (John D. Sherwood); "Abyssinia and its Border Lands" (Professor E. P. Evans); Honoré de Balzac, a well-written but brief and sketchy article (Miss V. W. Johnson); "Carl Ritter," by Professor Schele De Vere; an interesting description of Modern Athens (Professor W. S. Tyler); and "God in History" (Professor E. A. Lawrence).

In The Catholic World a writer on "The Indissolubility of Marriage" proves to his own (celibate?) satisfaction that Christianity admits of divorce for no cause but one; and that, after divorce even for that cause, adultery is committed if either the innocent or the guilty party marry again. Not to give the argument a wider scope than the writer has given it, we remark merely that the Protestant moralists, who, without exception, we believe, dissent from his view, do not, as he does, base their conclusions on a distortion of the language of Scripture.

Another writer in the same magazine urges the convening of church congresses, meetings of the clergy and laity, like those which since 1848 have been repeatedly held in European countries. There is need enough of such gatherings, he thinks; it is not easy to find an architect who knows more about building a Catholic church than about building a Mohammedan mosque; it is common enough to see a priest clad in Roman vestments celebrating mass at a Gothic altar, furnished with Byzantine candlesticks and crucifix, and adorned with a miscellaneous job lot of French artificial flowers; Catholic institutions of learning in this country are much inferior to the Protestant colleges, except in the matter of teaching the dead languages; there is not one Catholic daily paper in the United States; and the Church is making such rapid advances in America that the clergy need the help and encouragement of the laity, and this can best be got by holding congresses. The work done by these bodies, then, is various. Last year's congress held in Malines, for example, besides discussing an indefinite number of humanitarian and religious themes, passed judgment on seventy-six musical compositions, and awarded to one of them, which was thought to be the best mass, a prize of a thousand francs; the same sum is to be given by this year's congress for the best architectural design for a church; the Malines and other Belgian congresses have given a great impetus to religious journalism in Belgium; the German congresses are now considering a project for a grand Catholic university.

In a critical examination of the works of Adelaide Anne Procter, the poetry of that very pleasing writer, who set down too diffusely, in very smooth verses, a good many melancholic thoughts and a good many pretty ones, is treated of by an over-enthusiastic admirer; "The Souls of Animals" is full of stories, good, but old; good enough, we suppose, and old enough certainly, is everything in "The Catholic Church and Modern Art;" Guettée's "Papacy Schismatic" is to be made the theme of a series of articles, for its reviewer considers it a fair specimen of the works written against the Romish Church, and says that it contains all that schismatics have first and last alleged against her. For the rest, we may say that this month's Catholic World has a greater number of original articles than we have seen in any previous number of the magazine, and that they are all readable, though none of them can be called very valuable nor of a high degree of purely literary excellence.

In The Atlantic Monthly the most noticeable article, and noticeable mainly because it is almost the only one not pleasant, is Mazzini's discourse on "The Religious Side of The Italian Question." When a man, being asked why he does not go back to his country and work as hard as he can to put his ideal into fact, brings out his rhetoric and informs us that "Italy is a religion," we feel a desire almost irresistible to tell him what he is, and to cease pitying him for having A. C. Swinburne for his laureate. The article is a revelation in the ordinarily eloquent way of the conceit and impracticability of the typical talking reformer, and has its usual effect of petrifying the reader into a stonier Philistine than he was before.

As to "The Guardian Angel," neither we nor Dr. Holmes have anything new to say. Mr. Howells is at his very best in his article entitled "At Padua." The world of American literature is discovering not slowly what a genuine gain it has made in the advent of this writer, whose work is marked by exquisite, if not the most exquisite, taste, by humor lighter and more cheerful than Hawthorne's, more refined and subtle than Irving's, and in no way imitative, by much critical acumen and by considerable force of thought. His articles, and this is the best of him, steadily grow better, or so it seems to the reader. Mr. E. E. Hale is satirical upon Boston—and, not to offend the Bostonians, we will pronounce him more satirical on other cities nearer the periphery of the universe—in a readable essay, not readable merely because it is satirical, which is entitled "My Visit to Sybaris." Hawthorne's "English Note-Books," excerpts from which are soon to be published in a book, have begun to do duty in the publishers' magazine. They repay study, and the reader may be glad that he gets them in short lessons before he gets them in a volume. Hawthorne's mild disregard—contempt is far too strong a word—for the poet of Helvellyn, is very evident in these passages from his diary.

"An Artist's Dream" is by Colonel Higginson. We find nothing in it, and more than that one feels all the time as if he were going to find something, and something unpleasant. But nothing unpleasant is found; only there is suggested a weakly morbidness in one who delights in these fine-drawn torturing improbabilities. The true poverty of "Poor Richard" and his probable wretchedness begin to grow plain to the reader of Mr. James's elaborate study of character. But surely Richard, if not too subtle, does talk too lucidly in explication of subtleties. Evidently, however, plenty of a literary conscience and the consequent labor go into Mr. James's novel, and we dissent with diffidence. "Dr. Molke," if it is true, is good. "A Struggle for Life" is not true, but is good in its way, which is the way of the ingenious and "magaziny" tale. "The Piano in America" is Mr. Parton's, and is nearly the dullest thing from his pen we have ever seen. We except an article on "Presidential Nominations," which he has just contributed to the new New Jersey Magazine, and which is considerably more perfunctory than this on the piano.

The poetry of the July Atlantic is by Lowell, Whittier, and Alice Cary. Miss Cary has hardly ever written with more vagueness, or more of the sweet pastoral simplicity which is her charm, than in the verses in "Mona's Mother." Mr. Whittier's "Freedom in Brazil" is excellent in rhyme and rhythm, and is fine moral eloquence. Mr. Lowell's "Ember Picture" is a picture, and would not be out of place in an expurgated gallery of Heine, if we could imagine that painter good and happy.

About Harper's for July we have room to say little, and we believe almost nothing requires to be said. "The Dodge Club" is really funny; "Our New Northwest" is an illustrated article about Russian America; "The Great Show at Paris" is a well enough written letter, apparently by an artist; and for the rest there is little love this month, a good deal of patriotism, and, we are happy to say, no poetry.

NOTES ON THE NEW EDITION OF WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

NO. XVI.

[In making up from my notes the article on etymologies and definitions of words beginning with the letter B, the following remarks on the origin of the word battledoor were accidentally omitted:]

Battledoor, supposed by editors of Webster to be "corrupt. from the Spanish batallador, a great combatant," etc.

This derivation is contrary both to philological and to historical probability. There is no such analogy of meaning between the two words as to render it more than barely possible that the English noun should have been taken from the Spanish, and such a deduction is not to be admitted without some better evidence than mere similarity of sound. As a point of historical etymology, the question has a certain importance, because, if the proposed derivation be accepted, we must ascribe to the Spanish language an influence in the formation of our vocabulary at a period when the Peninsular dialects have been hitherto supposed to have contributed little or nothing to it, except possibly in certain special nomenclatures not connected with the domestic life and amusements of England.

In the "Promptorium Parvulorum," compiled in 1440, Way's edition, p. 27, we find: "BATYLDOURE, or wasshynge betylle. Feretorium;" in a pictorial vocabulary printed from a MS. of the fifteenth century in "National Antiquities," Vol. I., p. 269, "Hoc feratorium, hoc pecten, a batylledore;" and in Palsgrave (A.D. 1530), p. 197, "Batyldore, battover a lessive." The M. L. feritorium was a paddle-shaped stick or baton for beating clothes in washing—a practice still followed on the Continent—and Palsgrave's battoir à lessive means the same thing. Pecten was what is now called the sley of a loom (A.-S. slæ, from slean, to beat), a contrivance for beating the wool of the web together while weaving. There is no reasonable doubt that the battledoor used with the shuttlecock, as well as in other games, took its name from the battledore, beater, or batler (see Halliwell) of the washerwoman, the form of both implements being the same. We find the word in its modern sense as early as the time of Florio, who, in his Italian dictionary, 1611, ascribes to paletta, among other meanings, that of "a batledur to play at tennis or shuttlecocks."

The immediate source of the word is probably the Provençal batedor (see Raynourd) or batadouiro (see Azais), the former of which is used in the general sense of beater and in various more specific applications, and the latter is defined "palette de bois avec laquelle on bat le linge pour le laver." These forms explain the introduction of the d into the last syllable—a rare process in English etymology—but we must look elsewhere for the l, which seems equally out of place in a word derived from the French verb battre. The implement in question has a great variety of names in the French dialects most nearly connected with English, and several of those which contain the letter l are apparently diminutives from the Latin baculus. Others, however, with the same liquid, are evidently from battre, or from a Mediæval Latin derivative of the same original root. Halliwell gives us O. English forms batler, batlet, battling-staff, and battleton. We find in Med. Latin batillum, batlitorium; and an intermediate form, batillatorium, may easily be supposed, if a direct Latin origin be preferred. In any event, the French and Latin sources suggested furnish a more probable derivation for battledoor than a word so remote in origin and signification as the Sp. batallador.

Halliwell quotes Miege as saying that battledore "was formerly a term for a horn-book," but he gives no citation. A better authority for an analogous use of the word is the sturdy Quaker apostle, George Fox, who published in 1650 a curious volume, entitled "A Battle Door for Teachers and Professors to learn Plural and Singular," in which the word occurs a number of times. The editors of Webster give the sense of horn-book on the authority of Halliwell, but do not attempt to explain its origin in this application, which is, however, not very obscure. In the early days of modern philology, janua, a door or gate, was a not uncommon title for grammars and other treatises on language. Thus, in 1631 Comenius published the first edition of a "Janua Linguarum reserata," an introduction to the study of five languages, which had great success, and was often reprinted; and Anchoran adopted a similar title for his philological work, "Porta Linguarum Trilinguis Reserata et Aperta;" or, as he translates it in the English edition of 1663, "The Gate of Tongves Vnlocked." In French, battant is a leaf of a folding or double door, and porte à deux battants is a folding door, or door with two leaves. Battle-door is the English translation of this name, and means a door, a janua or gate, which, having two leaves, affords a wider and easier entrance than a common door of one leaf, and thus serves as a convenient introduction to knowledge. The word in this sense is quite different from battle-door, a palette or bat, and George Fox, by writing the two components separately, battle door, showed that he understood the meaning and etymology of a term which modern lexicographers have not been able to make out.

The foregoing remarks, which may perhaps be thought trivial observations on a trivial subject, connect themselves with considerations of higher philological interest and importance, because the history of the mediæval and modern growth and development of the radical from which battre, beat, and battledoor are derived, furnishes abundant illustration of an etymological process in the evolution of language from expressive germs which we have not many opportunities of observing upon so wide a scale.

The root in question, whatever may have been its primary origin, form, and significance, probably appears in the Greek πάταγος and πατάσσω, and certainly in the rarely used Latin verb batuo, as well as in the Anglo-Saxon beatan. But inasmuch as the Greeks, the Latins, and the Anglo-Saxons had other words to express the various special modifications of meaning involved in the generic notion to beat, they did not find it necessary to form a numerous progeny of derivatives and compounds from this particular root. Batuo does indeed occur in a very small number of passages in approved Latin authors, but it was not a classical word, and evidently belonged to the lingua rustica or vulgar dialect of ancient Latium. This, like other unwritten dialects, doubtless had a very limited vocabulary, and of course as the uses and applications of language became multiplied and diversified among those who spoke the dialect, its generic terms were obliged to do double and even tenfold duty. The conquests of Rome carried the lingua rustica wherever her soldiery was stationed, and batuo hence became an established word in all the colonies of the Roman Empire. Its character as a word of generic signification adapted it to a great variety of uses in the multifarious new conditions of Roman colonial life, and numerous derivatives and compounds were formed from it in all the countries to which the Romans transplanted their laws, institutions, and popular speech. Thus a root, which had remained almost sterile for uncounted centuries, throwing up only a very few slender offshoots, became suddenly productive in the Middle Ages, and the humble radical bat, probably in its origin a mere imitative utterance, now counts a forest of descendants, which have spread themselves through the whole territory of Romance as well as English philology. This process of multiplication, diversification, and diffusion has taken place within the historical period, and existing literary monuments enable us to trace the annals of this family of words with a certainty and minuteness of which historical etymology affords not many instances.

Cabochon.—When a precious stone, whose crystalline angles have been rounded off by rolling in water or other accidental attrition, is polished without being cut into facets, it is said to be cut en cabochon, a word derived from Fr. caboche, a head or lump. As this form is particularly suited to show off to advantage certain colored gems—the opal, for example—such stones are often reduced to the cabochon form, though found in comparatively regular shapes. This is not strictly an English word, but we have no other to express the idea, and as it is constantly used among English dealers in gems, it is entitled to a place in English dictionaries.

Calash.—The Italian calare, to let down, as applicable to a carriage with a top which can be lowered or raised at pleasure, is primâ facie a probable etymology for this word in both its meanings. Its real derivation is purely a historical question, and a mere resemblance between calash and a Slavonic word signifying not specifically a carriage with a movable top, but, generally, any wheel carriage, is not sufficient evidence of relationship beween the two.

Caliber.—The derivation from "qua libra, of what pound, what weight," is unsupported by historical evidence, and is of very slight philological probability. The word first appears in Spanish, and the Arabic galab, a mould for casting, a pattern, a model or standard, is in all likelihood the true source of caliber.

Caii Julii Cæsaris Commentarii de Bello Gallico. With Explanatory Notes by George Stuart, A.M., Professor of the Latin Language in the Central High School of Philadelphia. (Philadelphia: Eldridge & Brother. 1867.)—This is, we are informed, the first of a series of Greek and Latin text-books to be published by the Messrs. Eldridge under the name of "Chase and Stuart's Classical Series." In external form and typography it is superior to most American school-books; in other respects we are sorry to find less improvement than we had hoped. In striving to avoid encumbering the work with matter which should more properly be found in books of reference, the editor seems to us to have gone too far the other way, and to have omitted much that is really indispensable. The life of Cæsar prefixed is meagre and unsatisfactory; the map of Gaul small and incomplete. We should have been glad, also, to have seen a brief but accurate argument of the contents of each book given at the beginning; a running chronology at the top of each page; a brief chronological table at the end of the text, followed by a short historical introduction; a diagram illustrating the crucial passage in Lib. IV. cap. xvii., is almost indispensable to making the passage intelligible to the majority of school boys. The interpretation of difficult passages and the explanation of constructions given in the notes are, for the most part, as they should be, brief, intelligible, and correct. We have specified the defects of the book more at length than we should otherwise have done, in the hope that the gentlemen who have in charge the remaining books of the series will consider somewhat more carefully the peculiar requirements of text-books in a country like our own, where books of reference, beyond the most ordinary grammars and dictionaries, are, except in cities, extremely rare, and for boys at school almost unattainable.

Recent Republications.—Scribner, Welford & Co. offer in one small volume, which yet is too large, an epitome of Miss Agnes Strickland's "Lives of the Queens of England," a work which in its original form made something like six octavo volumes. The abridgment is done by Miss Strickland herself, and is done "for the use of schools and families." For anything we can see, all the unreliability of the six volumes is got without diminution into the one, and the youthful student will have to read about as many better books in correction of this as in correction of those. It will not, however, go into many schools or families in this country.

The third edition of a book published by T. N. Kurtz, of Baltimore, and James Miller, of New York, we could, we think, describe better than by copying its title-page, but its title-page may pass for an account of it: "Gleanings from the Harvest Fields of Literature. A Melange of Excerpta, Curious, Humorous, and Instructive. Collated by C. C. Bombaugh, A.M., M.D. 'So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned; and it was about an ephah of barley.'—Ruth ii. 17. 'I have here only made a nosegay of culled flowers, and have brought nothing of my own but the string that ties them.'—Montaigne." "The string that ties them" is that all are in a sense literary curiosities—specimens of acrostics, for example; of alliteration; of church-yard literature; of difficult versification; of conformity of sense to sound; of inscriptions on bills, fly-leaves, inns, clocks, wedding-rings, window-panes; of anachronisms of Shakespeare; of macaronic verse; of Persian poetry, puzzles, Puritan peculiarities, and so on, and so on, almost without limit.

Mr. G. P. Putnam's "Excursion Papers" carries one to the chief cities of the continent of Europe, the Holy Land, the West Indies, the Pacific, the home of Evangeline, and the home of Elijah Pogram. Mr. Curtis is the only author whose hand we detect, and that is plainly visible in the opening paper: "Newport in Winter." It affords an interesting and in some respects curious parallel with Mr. Higginson's "Oldport in Winter," the one being the impressions of a transient visitor out of season, the other those of a recent settler who has summered and wintered the gay watering-place and the decayed town. Between the two the reader gets a very just idea of Newport, and even a local knowledge that will serve him should he ever go there. Of the other papers it may be said that they are all readable, and contain a good deal of trustworthy information. Mr. John Banvard's voyage down the Mississippi on a drift-log is the most remarkable "excursion" described in these covers. A part of this edition, we may remark by the way, is bound in paper only, and this, together with the title, "Railway Classics," may induce some to attach but a transient importance to the series, as if it were only to be read in the cars and left on the seat when the station is reached. But it has features that entitle it to permanent preservation, and the volumes in cloth would ornament the shelves of any library.

With the twelfth volume Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. complete their reprint of the works of Burke—an edition which lacks nothing in respect of good workmanship, typographical or editorial. There may have been elsewhere other as handsome editions as this, but the present publishers are more solicitous to say that they have spared no pains to make this more accurate than any, indeed as accurate as possible, and that they have reasonably succeeded in so doing. We believe that the fact is as stated, and those who own these volumes may justly congratulate themselves on possessing the very best edition of Burke in the English language.

Articles on any of the subjects usually discussed in this journal will be received from any quarter. If used, they will be liberally paid for; if rejected, they will be returned to the writers on the receipt of the requisite amount of postage stamps.

All Communications which pertain to the literary management of THE NATION should be addressed to the Editor.

FUTURE POLITICAL ISSUES.

No one can doubt that the political issues of the war will soon pass away, unless revived by the folly of those who assume to be the especial friends of the South. There can be no dispute over negro slavery when negro suffrage is an accomplished fact. Nor will those who were loudest in opposition to the admission of the negro to political privileges venture upon any practical effort to take from him the ballot which he has gained in spite of them. Doubtless, in a few isolated States, a blind and stupid party will take pride in delaying the application of the principle of equality to their own States, but this cannot defeat its final triumph, nor give rise to a national contest. But in conceding that these issues, which have occupied so much of our own thought, and which have absorbed our energies in the past, must pass away, we by no means admit that the party which has maintained the side of universal liberty in the contest so nearly over must also pass into obscurity. Parties live long upon the tradition of past achievements—longer, in many cases, than is good for the country or even for themselves; for a party is better dead than moribund. The Whig party of England held power for seventy years upon the credit of 1688, and even yet, although reduced to a mere shadow, has the largest share of the government by virtue of its past history. The Tories retained power uninterruptedly for fifteen years after their triumphant conclusion of the war against Napoleon. So in this country the Democratic party has lived through blunders, incapacity, and corruption of the most amazing kind, solely upon its traditions of past glories; and to-day the great embarrassment of its managers is, that while its present organization is too offensive to the loyal spirit of the country to warrant the hope of winning a majority to its side, the party name constitutes so much of its strength with its present adherents that an abandonment of that name would probably disband the party.

We see no reason for supposing that the Republican party will prove an exception to this general rule. It has achieved a military success as complete as and more marvellous than the triumph of England over Napoleon, which gave the Tories a long lease of power. It has enfranchised a larger proportion of the Southern people than the Whig party of England did of its people in 1832. The strength of the hold which it has thus acquired upon the new voters is proved at every Southern election; and there are as yet no serious indications of its power being diminished at the North. It cannot calculate upon a blind and unconditional support; but it has every reason to expect that it will command the grateful and affectionate adherence, within reasonable limits, of vast masses of men who look upon it as the instrument of their own elevation or the preservation of a system dear to them as their own lives.

Some questions, over which there is just now much clamor, are not of sufficient importance to have a permanent or general effect upon politics. Thus the eight-hour delusion, which is being made use of quite extensively by desperate politicians, will speedily expend its force in a few still-born statutes. Probably nine-tenths of the real workers of the country have no interest in an eight-hour law; and even the classes who are deceived by their addle-pated leaders into relying upon it as a means of their elevation, will speedily be disgusted with its results, if they succeed in putting it in force. Nor will any of the other schemes for interference with property or business raise any permanent political issue. A community in which property is so widely spread as it is in our Northern States cannot be led into any hare-brained plans for its redistribution. The laborer who has saved one hundred dollars is too tenacious of that to be willing to divide it with his penniless neighbor, in the hope of getting a larger share in the general division. The South contains a much greater proportion of destitute people, and therefore such visionary schemes may for a while be popular there; but the colored people are beginning to accumulate property under equal laws, and will lose all interest in confiscation as soon as they have homes of their own, however small and mean. While severely censuring those who strive to delude the negro with the hope of plundering his late master, we are not apprehensive that any such efforts can be successful.

The issues arising out of temperance and Sunday laws are merely local; and though they may be controlling in New York, yet they will be settled there without affecting national politics very materially.

The reconstruction of the South will not be completed, even under the most favorable circumstances, until the spring of 1868; and until that is accomplished, its completion will be the chief political consideration with the people. Even after the restoration of the Southern States to the full privileges of the Union, there must be a period of anxiety for the successful working of the new machinery which will tend to unite the Republican party, and thus to prolong its power.

Financial questions must, however, absorb a larger share of attention in the future than they have in the past. The amount to be raised by taxation is so large as to require a degree of wisdom in the mode of assessment which has never before been called for, and which is consequently not to be found among our legislators. The public mind is uneducated on these points, and the people, seeking blindly for relief from burdens which oppress them, are for a time at the mercy of charlatans, who offer remedies which seem to promise instant relief, but which really aggravate the disease. The hard lessons of experience will soon make us all wiser, and we shall learn that the possession of long rivers, great mountains, vast prairies, and free institutions does not liberate us from the laws of political economy, as thousands of well-meaning men now firmly believe that it does. By-and-by they will discover that water runs down hill in America just as much as in Europe.

Now, there is no absolute necessity for drawing party lines upon financial issues. For years to come there will be so much doubt as to the stability of the new order of things in the South as to make it the duty of all good men to co-operate in guaranteeing equal rights, in maintaining justice, and in promoting education. In most of the Southern States, if not in all, the numerical power of the colored race will steadily diminish, by reason of the increase of white immigration, hitherto kept out by slavery and its concomitants. The colored people must rise in intelligence with a rapidity unequalled by any other liberated race in order to counteract their loss of the influence of mere numbers. That they are capable of doing this, we believe; but the work to be done by and among them is immense, and requires all the moral influence and material aid which the North can give. It might be seriously retarded if the National Government should fall into unfriendly hands. For this purpose the Republican party ought to keep itself in power, and if it acts wisely it can do so. But it must be tolerant of differences of opinion upon minor points, however important they may be. It has no right to construct a platform upon which a large minority of its members cannot stand. It has no right to deny nominations to men who are preferred by the people, and against whom no objection is made except that upon some question of revenue, currency, or local legislation they differ from the party managers. This is the natural tendency of all triumphant parties, and it is one of the principal reasons why they fall asunder. It is a moral impossibility to find a hundred intelligent men whose views coincide upon every political issue; and parties, which organize by millions, must inevitably contain an endless diversity of views.

Nor is it upon mere party grounds that we desire to see toleration upon the subjects we have mentioned. These subjects will be more impartially discussed, and the popular verdict upon them will be more likely to be just, if they are not made the grounds of party divisions. Neither will either party feel bound upon its accession to power to reverse the financial policy of the preceding administration, as it otherwise would; and thus the stability of commercial arrangements would not depend upon the maintenance of any party. In proportion, therefore, to the certainty of justice which either side to these controversies feels, should be its anxiety to keep its dogmas out of mere partisan politics.

If, however, the managers of the Republican party, elated with success and over-influenced by special interests, should insist upon conformity to their financial views as a test of party fidelity, they will certainly destroy its supremacy. For by virtue of the very intelligence, education, and morality of its members, of which the party is so justly proud, it necessarily includes within itself a multitude of conflicting opinions, deliberately formed and conscientiously adhered to by men who will not suffer dictation. We suppose that a party caucus at Washington would decide in favor of an inflation of the currency; but if it should proceed to rule out of the party all who refused to endorse that opinion, it would lose almost every Eastern State.

Party ties hang more loosely than they formerly did. Twenty years ago a majority of ten thousand was enough to determine the political character of a State for years. Now majorities of thirty to fifty thousand are no guaranty of permanence. The defeated party is not disheartened; the successful party cannot venture to relax its efforts. A greater responsibility, therefore, rests upon party managers to avoid needless tests, and to abstain from attempts to drive men as intelligent as themselves and more independent.

CLASSES IN POLITICS.

Before the war it would have been difficult to point, in the Northern States at least, to a single indication, except the steady growth of large manufactories worked by hired laborers, that the great curse of the Old World—the division of society into classes—was likely to befall us here or affect American politics. But this growth was not rapid enough to warrant the apprehension that the general progress of society and the abundance of land would not suffice to counteract any tendency to the formation of permanent social divisions. The great development given to manufactures, however, by the high tariff, and the premium on gold, and the powerful stimulus given to immigration by the consequent demand for labor, have done more within the last five years, we venture to assert, towards reproducing in many of the States the most marked features of European society, than all other influences combined had done during the previous twenty years. Everybody acknowledges that in New England, for instance, the old state of society, the equality, the general intelligence, the perfect community of feeling, are fast vanishing. The cities are now peopling with artisans living almost from hand to mouth, and great capitalists are employing whole armies of persons, from whom, no matter how good their intentions, they are of necessity separated by a wide social gulf. Moreover, the American mechanics who were bred under the ancient régime, and to whom classes and class feeling are as novel as detestable, are daily abandoning the Eastern States and seeking new homes in the West, because they cannot accept the position assigned them in the new order of things—the position of inferiority and dependence and isolation, into which the newly-arrived foreigners pass as a matter of course, without desiring or, for a while at least, expecting anything better.

Now, classes once formed, the growth and development and appearance in politics of class feeling is a matter of course. We have the first expression of it in the eight-hour agitation. This agitation has owed the success it has achieved to the formation in nearly every State of a powerful party composed of voters who deliberately adopted as the motive of their political action the theory that the national issues which divided the great political parties, such as the terms of reconstruction, the regulation of the suffrage, the tariff and the currency, or the foreign policy of the Government, either did not concern them at all, or only concerned them in a minor degree, and who determined that they would support whichever party, no matter what its general aims might be, was willing to go farthest in the legal regulation of the relations between employer and employed. Accordingly, we have seen in nearly every State Democrats and Republicans bidding for their support by rampant professions of willingness to do whatever the "working-man" might require of them. It is true that the measure of success yet achieved by the movement has been very trifling. Its leaders have been simple enough to accept acts of the legislature which really give them nothing they did not possess before, but in this we confess we can see nothing very reassuring, as it shows that these leaders have not only learnt the secret of their power, but are very gullible. Of course the laws of trade are stronger than acts of the legislature, and so is the practical good sense of the community. Therefore we need not fear that the delusion that working-men profit as much by eight as by ten hours' labor will last very long; but we do fear that the collapse of the delusion will not put a stop to class action in politics. We may depend upon it we shall hear of it again in our party struggles. When "one of our grandest public men," as The Independent calls Mr. Wade, can find nothing better to do than harangue on the inequality of fortunes as an evil which legislation can possibly rectify in a country in which large fortunes are almost always prizes of industry or economy or sagacity, we may be sure there will be plenty of voters always found to treat poverty and hard work as great political abuses.

Besides the "working-man's" party, there has grown up since the war an Irish party, or, more strictly speaking, a Fenian party, which is the worst and most dangerous of all, as it contains the most ignorant and least civilized elements of the population. It is true that before the war the Irish vote was a matter of considerable importance to politicians, and strenuous efforts were made to secure it by any sort of compliances that might be necessary. But the Irish of that day, to do them justice, were not exacting, and they were comparatively a feeble body. They sought nothing beyond equality and easy admission to citizenship, and as much broad flattery of their national peculiarities and broad abuse of England as orators in and out of Congress might find it convenient to utter. The highest ambition of the Irish voter at that time was to be absorbed in the ranks of the Democratic party, and to act with it on great questions simply as an American citizen. He was almost always a supporter of slavery because he feared the negro would come North and take his work from him, and he was, of course, in favor of the largest extension of the rights of man, of the largest possible number of officers and elections; but in his political acts he got rid, as far as possible, of all marks of foreign origin.

Latterly, however, the Irish have received powerful reinforcements from home, and although they opposed the war bitterly at the polls, they rendered considerable service in the field. Before it closed they had formed a distinctly Irish party, the object of which is to keep alive amongst Irish settlers in this country the feeling that they belong to a separate nationality, and have and ought to have hopes, aims, and interests apart from the rest of the community, and that the main value of American citizenship consists in the means it affords of securing either aid or impunity for the organization on American soil of hostile expeditions against a foreign power. To mark the character of the organization, too, still more distinctly, the form of a political party has been thrown aside and that of a separate political community assumed—a sort of imperium in imperio, with an executive head, a legislature, administrative bureaux, an army, and a treasury, and machinery for raising revenue. Of course an organization of this kind in this age and in this country would speedily perish of its own folly and absurdity if it were met with calm good sense by the rest of the nation. But it has not been so met, and is not likely to be. The House of Representatives at once went to work to assist the leaders in keeping up the delusion by bills and resolutions, while a portion of the press, and a very influential portion, has also lent aid. The New York Tribune, which has been for twenty-five years the organ of what is most moral, high-minded, truthful, and religious in the community, and which acquired almost all its influence by its attacks on political time-serving, humbug, and dishonesty, and which for years was never weary of exposing the way in which the Democratic party played on the ignorance of the Irish voters, at once recognized the Fenian organization as a natural, proper, and valuable political entity, capable of making war and peace, and likely to dismember the British Empire.

It reported the Fenian campaigns with the greatest care and approbation, and violently assailed the President for obeying his oath of office by preventing the irruption of large bands of marauders into Canada. The result was that when an attempt was made to bring the leaders to justice they defied the Government, browbeat the United States judges, and drove the District Attorney into an abandonment of the prosecution. More than this, they have in this city, strange as it may sound, actually succeeded in securing for their Church the position of an established church all but in name. Out of over $100,000 voted from the city taxes in aid of various religious bodies last year, all but about $5,000 were given to the Catholic Church; and, in addition to this, a grant of a block of land worth one million dollars, in the most valuable part of the city, at a nominal rate for a term of one hundred years. To suppose that with these evidences of their power before their eyes the Fenians will speedily cease to act as a foreign party, or will any longer allow themselves to be influenced in their political action by American questions solely, would be to suppose them both enlightened and disinterested to a degree which we know they are far from having attained, and which no body of men in history similarly circumstanced have ever attained. They already, in all parts of the country in which they are to be found in large numbers, are able to secure practical impunity for almost any crime.

We were in hopes that when the emancipation of the negroes was achieved, when every legal distinction between them and men of other races had been abolished, and when the ballot had been put into their hands, all good and intelligent men, both North and South, would have united in trying to put their color for ever out of sight, to make them feel, and make others feel, that they had no interests apart from the rest of the community, that their political action ought to be guided by reference to the good of the nation at large, and that the race of life had to be run and its prizes won by them just as by white men, and that the true way to break down the social prejudice against them, and make it seem wicked and absurd, was to show that in freedom they were as capable of getting rich, of being as eloquent, learned, and accomplished, as the whites, and that all their friends would, therefore, put all their energies into furnishing them with the means of education and into enforcing the laws for the protection of their rights.

Far from this, however, a considerable body of Radicals are just now occupied in getting up a distinct negro party at the South, and is actually soliciting subscriptions for that purpose—a party based solely on color, whose mission it will be to remind the nation incessantly that the blacks are a class apart, with separate interests and aims, whose conduct ought not to be guided by the motives which act on the whites, and who are not only justified in using, but bound to use, their votes in so working on the greed or ambition or other base passions of party politicians as to extort from them honors or privileges for negroes which negroes could not otherwise receive. The confiscation of white men's lands is accordingly laid before them as the first political job they have to do, and they are assured that this is necessary to their elevation and happiness. More than this, they are assured that not only would this not be robbery, but that it would be a piece of statesmanship for which there are many historical precedents. The fact is that there is no class of prosperous farmers in the civilized world who have obtained their lands by any such process, that the reason why small landholders in various countries are happy and prosperous is, that their lands were honestly acquired and are industriously cultivated; that no confiscation on a great scale has ever taken place which did not result in ages of misery and confusion, and that the only approach to a precedent for the scheme now recommended as a panacea for negro ills is Baron Stein's reforms in Prussia. But these bore no sort of resemblance to the Phillips-Stevens plan. He did not confiscate; he simply gave the tenant farmers fixity of tenure in the farms they already held, converting all the landlord's claims into a fixed rent-charge. If this kind of teaching should prove successful—and we still hope the good sense of the negroes will defeat it—we should then, in addition to the working-men's party and the Irish party, have a black party, all three being bent on the promotion of their own interests at whatever cost, and all three putting their votes up to sale at every great election, and leading ambitious politicians into follies of which the worst exploits of the great political deceivers of the present day afford but a very imperfect idea.

WHO OWNS AN AUTHOR'S IDEAS ?

A LETTER from Mr. Merriam, the publisher of "Webster's Dictionary," has been published in The Springfield Republican, arguing against the justice and expediency of an international copyright, apropos of the recent discussion of the compensation received by Charles Dickens from American publishers. A corrected copy of the letter has been sent us, we presume by the author, and we infer from this that he invites an answer to his arguments, and considers them, as we have no doubt they are, a good statement of the case of those publishers who are opposed to being compelled by law to pay foreign authors for the privilege of reprinting their books. We are very sorry that we have not space for the reproduction of the whole letter, but we shall endeavor not to misstate its positions in commenting upon them.

The first is that in refusing to pay English authors for their copyright American publishers simply do what English publishers do. Mr. Merriam says he has for thirty years published a series of English law-books, and has never paid a cent for the privilege ; but, on the other hand, the English have gone on for the same period reissuing "Webster's Dictionary," a far more valuable work, and have refused all compensation to the author or his family or his publishers. The other day Mr. Merriam tried to sell the plates of an abridgment of the quarto to a London publisher, but was coolly told that a set could be manufactured in London for half the price. All this is, no doubt, valuable as a statement of facts, but as an argument against a copyright treaty, it is worthless. Reciprocity in stealing does not make theft any the less objectionable on the score either of expediency or morality. The same argument might have been set up by the inhabitants of the English and Scotch border in the sixteenth century against the interference of the two parliaments with their mutual raids. It would have doubtless been easy for any English cattle-lifter to show that there were as many cows carried off one side of the line as the other ; but then one of the objects of government is to provide either by treaty or legislation better protection for property than is to be found in the liberty of each citizen to rob those who rob him. We do not put either American or English publishers on a level with caterans or cattle-lifters, but if authors have any property in their works other than what is created by local law, the conduct of those who republish their books without their consent can only be defended by taking a chapter or two out of the cateran's or cattle-lifter's code.

Have authors any such property ? Is their right to print and publish their ideas the same in its essence as their right to the possession of their land or houses, or is copyright merely a privilege conferred by local law for the encouragement of literary talent and industry, and which no foreigner is bound to regard ? This is, after all, the main question ; and whether the American or English publishers who reprint foreign books without compensating the writers are or are not guilty of wrong-doing, depends on how it is answered. Let us hear what Mr. Merriam says on this point :

> "What are the true grounds for a claim for an international copyright ?—for the question finally resolves itself into this, since the foreign author does not assume the attitude of a beggar. It is said an author has a natural, perfect, perpetual, and inalienable—but by his own act—right to the coinage of his own brain, as fully as the mechanical workman to the product of his own hands ; that no publisher, therefore, foreign or domestic, has any moral right to issue his work but by a special arrangement with the author, and on such terms, if at all, as he may prescribe. I deny the premise, and the conclusion therefore fails. It is true that while his manuscript is in his own possession he may do what he will with his own. As Peter said to Ananias about the piece of ground, 'While it remained, was it not thine own ?' But when he publishes, he parts with his exclusive ownership, and gives it to the public under a contract with that public which for the benefit thus received secures to him in return certain valuable unexclusive rights and enjoyments, and extends over him the shield of its protective law. In other words, literary property is the creature of law. If it were not so, if the author's property in his work is founded in natural right, then is he entitled to the exclusive enjoyment not only in all lands, but through all time, and the descendants or heirs of Shakespeare and Milton and Chaucer, and David even, as well as the living Dickens and Longfellow, may claim perpetual toll on the continued published writings of those immortal men. But no copyright legislation of any nation that I ever heard of accords this exclusive enjoyment but for a fixed and limited period. If, then, it may be limited as to time, it may also as to territory, and finally, as an international question, resolves itself into one of policy and expediency, precisely, in regard to literary wares, like the question of free trade or a dutiable commodity, in the hardware or woollens or silks of Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, or Lyons. Why should the British author or the British public, with strange inconsistency, clamor for free trade in the one and demand a high protective duty in the other ? Let them take either horn, but not gore us with both."

When we began to read the foregoing paragraph, we imagined that Mr. Merriam was going to prove to us that the author's property in his works was not founded in natural right. But he contents himself with "denying the premise," and the reason he gives for denying it is that he has never heard of any legislation in which this natural right was recognized, and this he evidently considers a reductio ad absurdum. There are, however, a good many very good natural rights which legislators have never, or only very recently, recognized. We maintain that copyright is a natural right ; that legislation does not create it, that the absence of legislation cannot destroy it, that honest men are just as much bound to respect it as any other right for which legislators have been too careless or too ignorant to provide protection ; and we maintain, moreover, that no moral distinction of any value for legislative purposes has ever been pointed out between a man's property in his horse and a man's right of printing and selling the expression of his ideas, except the vastly greater deprivation which would be suffered by the community from the dearness of ideas than from the dearness of horses. The only reason for imposing any restriction on Longfellow or Thackeray in the disposition of their copyrights is the very reason which has prompted all governments to regulate the disposition of all other kinds of property. I am not permitted to tie up my personal property in perpetuity because perpetuities are considered injurious to the community at large, and my copyright ceases after a certain period because a perpetual monopoly of it would, it is believed, do my fellow-men more harm than it would do me or my descendants good; but my right to the enjoyment of it for a period sufficient to compensate me for my labor in producing the book is as unquestionable as my right to my bank stock or specie.

How it is that ordinary minds have always found so much difficulty in perceiving the true nature of an author's claim to the exclusive reproduction of his works is not, we think, very difficult to explain. Property in anything apart from possession is an abstract idea. It requires some education and some imagination to grasp it. To the savage, property in a thing and possession of it are inseparable. In his eyes, possession lost, property is lost. In fact, odd as it may sound, for the thorough and ready comprehension of legal ideas nothing is more necessary than a cultivated imagination. There is very little doubt that ignorance promotes crime mainly through its damaging influence on this faculty. The ignorant man robs and murders more readily than the educated man, because he has greater difficulty in picturing to himself the consequences of his crime and the feelings or relations of his victim. To make an ignorant or uncultivated man thoroughly recognize property in a thing, therefore, you have to show him the owner in actual corporeal possession of it. Uses and trusts, for instance, were the product of high civilization; a barbarian could not be made to understand them. Now there is no species of property so intangible, delicate, and so dissociated outwardly from actual possession, as an author's or inventor's or designer's property in his ideas, and, therefore, there is no species of property which has had so much difficulty in securing recognition from legislators, and of the sanctity of which it is so hard to persuade the ordinary run of men. They understand readily, as Mr. Merriam does, an author's property in his manuscript so long as he has it in his hands, or an inventor's property in his invention as long as he keeps his model locked up in his closet, but that either should continue to be the owner of the ideas and have the right of following them after they have floated out in the world, and sell the right to embody them at a distance in machinery or ornamentation or books, they have great difficulty in comprehending at all.

Accordingly, we find that, at the bottom of the copyright legislation of nearly every country, there lies a desire rather to encourage authors to write than to do them justice. A temporary monopoly is conferred on them in order to stimulate them to the full use of their powers. We see, too, in the most highly civilized countries, plenty of men of good character and standing, who would sooner die than steal a watch or forge a bill of exchange, even if all the legal penalties of those offences were suspended, and who will yet have no hesitation whatever in stealing a book or an invention and making a fortune out of it, if the unhappy author or inventor should have neglected the legal formalities necessary to protect it, and will drive him from their door with contumely if he ask for a share in their profits, although they know that it has cost him years of toil and privation, and though it may be a marvel of ingenuity and may be capable of changing the face of a continent or the fortunes of a nation. In fact, an inventor who does not know how to surround the results of his labor with the necessary legal guards is treated very much as a helpless traveller is apt to be treated by a gang of Bedouins. Everybody who can turn his wares to account proceeds to plunder him without mercy or scruple, and, for so doing, does not suffer in the least in the opinion of his neighbors. Authors fare rather better, and this for two reasons, partly because the temptation to steal an invention, out of which a fortune may perhaps be made in a year, is greater than the temptation to steal a book, from which the most that can generally be expected is a small addition to the publisher's income; and secondly, because publishers are a more cultivated body of men than manufacturers or machinists. But even some of them often treat the laws of morality in this matter as figments of the literary imagination, and will tell an author, the sale of whose thoughts is enriching them, that inasmuch as he is not a countryman of theirs, or as there is no act of Congress or Parliament recognizing his right to the fruits of his toil, they will give him nothing, and think him a ninny for expecting anything.

To show what depths of absurdity have been reached in the search of some support for this monstrous position, we may mention here that a Western philosopher named Kroeger has actually propounded the doctrine that no foreigner has in any country any moral claim to protection for either life, freedom, or property, much less to copyright. Hear him, in the St. Louis Republican:

> "If a foreigner or Englishman travels abroad—say in France—his life freedom, and property is respected, not as rights guaranteed by France, but because reasons of expediency and courtesy urge France to protect all strangers from countries in which French travellers may be likely to require the same courtesy. If a war should break out between both countries, or even if their friendship should cool off, this courtesy would diminish in an equal degree or cease altogether."

On this theory, when King Khamrasi plunders and eats all the strangers who enter Unyoro, he acts in his strict right. Louis Napoleon, therefore, refrains from cutting off the heads of the Americans in Paris, and dressing the Empress and the Court ladies in their diamonds and cashmere shawls, not because the Americans have any right to better treatment, but because he is a well-bred man.

The most singular portion of Mr. Merriam's position, however—and it is not his only—has still to be noticed. He acknowledges an author's property in his manuscript, but denies him any natural right to the exclusive reproduction of what it contains. We have already tried to account for this doctrine by ascribing it to deficiency of imagination. But its economical absurdity is not visible at first sight. A book in manuscript in an author's possession has no economical value whatever. It is so much waste paper, worth perhaps seven cents a pound Therefore a legislator or political economist can hardly be said to be in any manner concerned about it. De minimis non curat Prætor. The author's title to it is not worth discussing, and when Mr. Merriam concedes it, he simply trifles with us. When we talk of books as property, and therefore as articles of commerce, as things which can be bought and sold and pledged, and the title to which is a subject for the consideration of the legislator or economist or honest man, we mean the ideas, and the particular mode of expressing them which the book contains. It is to get at these that the book is bought; it is these which furnish the inducement for publishing the manuscript, and without these it is not a marketable commodity, or, in other words, has no value in use, and hardly any value in exchange. Property in a book does not mean property in two or three pounds of paper; it means the right to multiply the manuscript, or, in other words, the combination of words and signs to be found on the manuscript. This is a commodity; this has value; by this money may be made; this is worth stealing; so that what Mr. Merriam really maintains is that the very act of bringing a certain thing to market deprives the owner of the exclusive right to sell it; that, in short, the very and the only step which gives the author's work economical value gives everybody else the right to fall on him and plunder him. What would Mr. Merriam think of telling a farmer that his wheat was his own as long as it lay in his barn, but if he threshed it out and offered it for sale it became thereupon the property of mankind? What befogs Mr. Merriam, as well as many other good men, on this point, is the circumstance—morally utterly unimportant—that the book can be reproduced at any distance from the author and without his assistance. But no matter how many editions of a book may be published, it is still the author's labor, and not the printer's, which gives each of them all its value. If you could take out of each printed copy of a work what the author has contributed to it, it would bear about the same relation to the commodity which the public seek that a dead carcase would bear to the living horse. The author's connection with his book differs from other kinds of property, in short, not in essence, but in incidents; it is less apparent, but not less real.

Why, it will be asked, have not authors and inventors asserted their rights, and forced governments to protect their interests, as other classes of the community have? There are several answers to this, but we can only stop to mention the principal one—and that is the recent growth of the class. It is only within the memory of men now living that authorship can be said to have become a profession, or that property in books has been worth thinking about or legislating about. It is still a precarious profession, its most successful members are rarely wholly dependent on it, and the distance between the grades is so great that there is little unity of feeling amongst them, and consequently concert of action, so that the growth of what politicians would call an "author's interest" has been almost impossible. But we feel satisfied that now that successful books have become so enormously valuable, now that the copyright of a first-class history or novel, even as copyright now is, is worth a fortune, it will be difficult to maintain much longer the code of morality about authors' rights of which Mr. Merriam has made himself the expounder, or to prevent the assimilation in the moral sense as well as in the legislation of all civilized countries of literary property to other property. Mr. Merriam concludes his letter by opposing an international copyright on the simple ground of expediency—inasmuch as, owing to the greater number of readers in America than in England, America gains more for the present by stealing from English authors than England can for the present gain by stealing from American authors. This mode of justifying stealing reminds us of the excuse made by the Earl of Kildare for burning the Cathedral of Cashel, that he thought the Archbishop was inside. You commit a wrong and offer as a justification what is in reality an aggravation—that you have the advantage of your victim in strength and skill.

We have only been able to speak here of the moral basis of literary property. Of the expediency of respecting it we hope to speak hereafter.

MAURICE SAND'S SKETCH OF AMERICAN GIRLS.

OUR readers may remember that we attempted some time ago to give them an idea of a study of American life and manners made by M. Maurice Sand in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and called "Miss Mary." When we took leave of the hero and heroine, M. de Montaret, the young French engineer, and Miss Mary Sewell, the young New York lady, the daughter of the wealthy and respectable New York banker and speculator, she had just presented him with a ring and, to his great astonishment, had declared herself engaged to him, and they were kissing on the track of the railroad at Cleveland until interrupted by the approach of a locomotive. M. Sand's position in the French literary world, and still more the position of the periodical which publishes his tale, are such that it would be hardly respectful to pass hastily by any picture of American society which they may present for our edification, and although most Americans probably think they know American society pretty well, there is always something to be learnt from the observations of an agreeable foreign traveller. We therefore propose not to follow "Miss Mary" to the end, but to give some further glimpses of the world in which M. Sand describes her as living.

Miss Mary accompanied her father and lover on their second trip to the great iron mines at Lake Superior, in which Mr. Sewell and M. de Montaret were interested, and there had a variety of adventures with Indians and rival explorers, and were followed secretly by Miss Arabella Williams, the opera singer and chorister of Grace Church, who was madly jealous of Miss Mary. During their stay at the mines, however, an Indian chief named Wakontchaka fell in love with Arabella, and Naissa, a beautiful Indian squaw, fell in love with M. Montaret, and, after much heart-burning, intriguing, and one or two attempts at assassination, they all returned to New York after having secured some capital property at the mines.

They were hardly at home when the rapacious Sewell—true American father that he was—gets Montaret to settle his own share of the mining property on Miss Mary, and actually cheats the unsuspicious Frenchman into the belief that this is Miss Mary's "dot." Money, however, is not the only object of Sewell's desires. He is also capable of loving woman in a coarse, violent, eager way; so he falls in love with Arabella Williams, who, partly from a desire to get at his money and partly from a desire to get into the position of a stepmother to Miss Mary, so as to wreak vengeance on her more effectually, accepts his advances. They become engaged. Sewell takes a gorgeous house for Arabella at "Glen Cow," where she and her mother live in barbarous luxury on his money pending the nuptials, and waited on by an Irish girl of great beauty named Fanny, whom the cunning Sewell has engaged to serve as a spy on the conduct of his betrothed. M. de Montaret's feelings as he watches these performances may be imagined but cannot be described.

About this time M. de Montaret is taking a walk one evening at the lower end of Broadway, when whom should he see on the Battery but Wakontchaka, the Indian chief, covered with feathers and war paint, and armed to the teeth, addressing a large crowd in French, an obliging gentleman who happened to be present translating the speech, which was received with great applause. Montaret interrupted it, and carried the Indian off to his hotel, where the latter explained to him that he had come on from Lake Superior on foot, through the snow, simply to see Arabella Williams, for love of whom he was suffering tortures under which the bravest pale-face would succumb. He accordingly went to the Academy of Music that very night to hear her sing; and although the appearance of an Indian chief in the parquet, in full costume, with a double-barrelled rifle in his hand, excited a little surprise at first, the performance went on as usual, Wakontchaka, however, standing on his seat and testifying his admiration of Arabella's singing and general appearance in a manner natural to his wild but simple nature, in spite of the efforts of Montaret's devoted black valet, Telemachus by name, to get the untutored savage to sit down and conduct himself with propriety. Things came to a crisis, however, when Arabella, at the close of the act, began to withdraw from the stage. The chief crossed the parquet, over the heads of the audience, in three bounds, smashed the musical instruments in the orchestra, lighted on the stage, and, with a yell of love and admiration, proposed to Arabella to sing and dance with him before the pale-faces. Arabella took refuge in her box and barred the door. Wakontchaka, overcome, says the chronicler, with love and whiskey, was demanding admission, when the manager, Mr. Sewell, and six policemen made their appearance on the scene, and "invited" the chief to stop his noise and quit the place. The only answer made by the son of the forest to this coarse appeal was to draw his tomahawk and proceed to break the door open. The policemen thereupon flung themselves upon him, but, being slippery and lightly clad, he glided from their hands like a serpent and ran to the end of the lobby, cocked his rifle, shot a policeman, and made his escape to M. de Montaret's hotel, and to him he told the story in the high-epic fashion in which he always conversed. Montaret was naturally alarmed, washed Wakontchaka's face, put a pair of pantaloons, an overcoat, and a hat on him, led him stealthily to Harlem, where he put him in the train for the north, with his rifle wrapped up in a buffalo robe, and a purse in the pocket of the pantaloons. So far all was well, but the last thing Wakontchaka said clearly indicated that he expected Montaret to marry Naissa, his cousin, "the pretty squaw."

Now, Mr. Sewell was not a man of much delicacy of feeling, and did not, of course, care much about having his fiancée figuring in the opera, but having her chased off the stage by a Red Indian was a little too much even for his hardened nature, so he paid twenty thousand dollars to the manager to release Arabella from her engagement, and made her retire to "Glen Cow." Here in selfish and voluptuous ease she brooded over her plans of vengeance on Miss Mary and Montaret, the latter of whom she still madly loved. In the spring they all went back once more to the mines, taking with them a great army of workmen, but found that in the interval a rival company had taken possession of the mines and was working them. Miss Mary, fierce and implacable, brave and reckless of bloodshed, as American girls usually are, wants to attack the intruders at once; so does her father, who thirsts for dividends; and it is with the greatest difficulty that Montaret and his uncle, an old missionary priest, manage to keep the peace. Anything to equal the villany of their rivals has never been witnessed, except perhaps the rage and rancor of Mr. Sewell. In an interview with the opposite party Miss Sewell interrupted the negotiations by drawing a little revolver which she carried in her pocket, and the result was a volley from the enemy, one ball going through the folds of her petticoat. Her father had soon after to go to Lansing to procure evidence of his title from the State authorities. Miss Mary refused to accompany him, as she had perceived Naissa the squaw's growing attachment for Montaret, and stayed behind to keep an eye on them, evidently having little faith in the Frenchman's fidelity. She remained, therefore, as the guest of the doctor of the mines, and looked sharply after her lover and the squaw.

Meantime Arabella Williams was far from being satisfied with her rural retreat at "Glen Cow." Jealousy and ennui combined to make that peaceful abode perfectly insupportable to her, and as she cared nothing about Mr. Sewell, she determined to make one more effort to carry off M. de Montaret from her hated rival. She accordingly packed her trunks and started for Lake Superior, with the lovely but perfidious Fanny, a cook, maître de hotel, coachman, and carriage and horses. When near the mines she lost her way in the woods, and, as one might expect, was captured by her lover, the Indian chief Wakontchaka, who carried her off three days' journey out of her route, and lodged her in an abandoned house belonging to a defunct mining corporation, and pressed his suit with all a savage's ardor and impetuosity. She devised various plans for escaping—one was to ride on horseback for her health and bolt when opportunity served, but the wary Wakontchaka penetrated her design and killed every horse belonging to the tribe. After this she was followed whenever she walked abroad by the chief's two sisters and twenty picked squaws of inferior condition, so that escape was hopeless.

She now set to work to weave an infernal plot for the destruction of her rival, the hated Miss Mary. Wakontchaka, of course, knew that Montaret was engaged to Miss Mary, but he also knew that the lovely squaw Naissa was enamored of the same gentleman, and as he himself loved Montaret also for having given him a rifle and a new suit of clothes, and helped him out of his scrape at the Academy of Music, he was naturally anxious that he should marry into his family and not into the pale-face Sewell connection. On these mingled feelings of his simple savage heart did the wily Arabella play. She got him to approach the mines with his young men and herself, with the view of kidnapping Miss Mary. The braves reached the scene just as the Montaret party were going to make an armed attack on the entrenched camp of their enemies; and when the chief and his band arrived on the field of battle they found Miss Mary on horseback in front of the line cheering on the miners to the assault, and her vindictive parent, whose thirst for vengeance was only equalled by his thirst for gold, lurking behind logs, and taking sly shots with his rifle at such of the opposite party as were special objects of his hate. With the assistance of the Indians, who charged with loud cheers, very much in the same way as the Zouaves, the position was easily carried, but the slaughter was horrible. Montaret, outraged by the part his fiancée had taken in the fray, dragged her from her horse and carried her to the rear, with bitter reproaches. She, deeply moved, admitted to him that her conduct had been strange and unbecoming, but confessed that she had charged in the forefront of the battle in the hope that a friendly bullet would end her days, her life having become perfectly insupportable through her jealousy of the lovely squaw Naissa.

Mr. Sewell's behavior after the fight was deplorable. Instead of seeking to bring the criminals who had been captured to justice, he offered to let off the guiltiest of them all for one hundred thousand dollars, and made the wretch sign a note for that amount on the spot. This caused Montaret's cup to flow over. He determined to break off his engagement and cut the Sewell connection on the spot, and sought an interview with Mr. Sewell for that purpose. But the miserable papa, true Yankee as he was, refused to release him from his engagement with his daughter, unless he made an assignment to him of all his (Montaret's) interest in the mines; but this done, he declared the match broken off, in a voice tremulous with joyful emotion. That very night Miss Mary is carried off by Wakontchaka and his band, and is closely followed by Montaret, in whom a reaction has set in. On the arrival of the young lady at Wakontchaka's headquarters, Arabella Williams earnestly entreats the chief to tie her up and torture her, an incident which may give one an idea of the terrible nature of the passion of jealousy as it shows itself in the breasts of New York musicians. Wakontchaka, however, refuses, though he attempts some moral torture, by tying Mary to a tree and driving tomahawks and knives into the wood close to her face; but she, with the undaunted courage and fortitude peculiar to young women in this country, never winks or begs for mercy.

Want of space prevents us, of course, following the story through all its details. Wakontchaka found out that Arabella Williams was going to marry Mr. Sewell, was transported with fury and flung her into a lake, and, when she attempted to scramble ashore, brained her with a tomahawk. On hearing of her death and seeing her mangled and repulsive remains, Mr. Sewell died of apoplexy, after having formally forbidden his daughter to marry Montaret. The young couple, who were now reconciled, returned to New York together, and got married on their arrival, but found that Arabella had spent all Mr. Sewell's money, and that the bride was penniless. So they went to work, and were very happy together.

Some people may think it wildly improbable that a young New York girl, whose character was at bottom very good, should behave in this odd way: "chaff" a strange Frenchman on a ferry-boat, walk up Broadway arm-in-arm with him after midnight, make declarations of love to him, give him a ring and kiss him in the middle of a railroad track, be furiously jealous of another young woman and insult her in public, be so alarmed by the affection of a young Sioux squaw for the man of her choice as to seek death in a border "muss," and bear a shower of Indian tomahawks without flinching. But those who do only display their own ignorance. That all this is very natural M. Sand explains in the following passage, which he puts into the mouth of his heroine. Her lover was having "an explanation" with her and reproaching her for her ferocity, cruelty, and hard-heartedness. Said she:

> "Have you reflected on what you are saying, Henri? Have you not yourself already justified me, in saying that we live here in a world still half-savage? When foreigners see us pretty and stylish in our great cities, they are astonished that they should find us freer and bolder than seems useful or graceful; but look at our position; look at those forests which shut out the horizon, and remember that they cover immeasurable space. Those blue horizons, all wooded, all uncultivated, all alike, all wild, all filled with the same obstacles and the same perils! It is nevertheless into these terrible solitudes that we have to follow our husbands and our fathers; it is thither you yourself have led your fiancée; it is thence the civilized world is condemned to draw its resources and renew the elements of its existence. Can you severely blame a romantic young girl who, in her dreams of the future, had cherished the thought of taking the place of all else to her husband in this austere wilderness, in order not to prove an embarrassment to him in his march, to guarantee the security of his home in his absence, and, in fine, to dispute with robbers and savages and wild beasts the spouse of her bosom and the children of her womb? No, it is impossible; you cannot have spoken advisedly," etc., etc.

The freedom and independence of the young ladies of our Eastern cities, which have puzzled so many travellers, are now accounted for. These qualities are acquired in training for Indian fights, bear-hunts, and mining "scrimmages" in the far West, in the settlement and reclamation of which fashionable women, of course, bear a prominent part. M. Sand's forte is evidently "insight," and we trust the Revue will keep him at work on American subjects.

PARIS GOSSIP.

Paris, June 7, 1867.

A conspicuous feature of the motley throng now filling the Exhibition and the thoroughfares of Paris is the deputation of the "Free-shooters" of the Vosges, 1,500 strong, who have come hither to see the Exhibition and to present their homage to the Prince Imperial, whom they have made their honorary president; a fine, sturdy, active set of men, in blouses, full trousers, and gaiters of unbleached linen, with pointed grey hats, surmounted by a bunch of cock's feathers and scarlet ribbons. They are lodged gratis in a vast building put up by the committee for facilitating the visits of workmen to the Exhibition, in the immediate neighborhood of the Champ de Mars, have been reviewed on the open ground of the Trocadero by the little Prince, arrayed in the uniform of the corps, and again by the Emperor in the Place du Carrousel, and dined and fêted to their hearts' content. Their appearance and manœuvring have excited such admiration that the Parisians are asking why such a corps should not be created in every department of France—forgetting that the institution has come down from the days when the Vosges were German, and is essentially German and not French in its spirit, as in its origin and organization.

The bona fide Strauss and his unrivalled band are giving, before returning to Vienna, a series of concerts that are abundantly justifying their high reputation, and completely eclipsing the performances not only of the so-called "Strauss orchestra" of this city, but even of the famous Waldteufel band, which during the last two "seasons" had come to be considered as the ne plus ultra of dance-music. The true Strauss divides his concerts into two parts, giving the first half of the evening to the choicest classical productions of the great German composers, rendered with inconceivable perfection under the leadership of the accomplished chapel-master of the Austrian Kaiser, and the second half, under his own leadership, to the bewitching dances which have made his father's name and his own so famous.

Joachim and Sivori have both been delighting their admirers. Each of these great artists, so unquestionably at the head of the violinists of our day, has his group of fantastic admirers ready to exalt its idol at the expense of his rival; but the mere lover of art would find it difficult to pronounce for either at the expense of the other. Nothing can exceed the large, magnificent mastery of his instrument which enables Joachim to draw forth the rich, round volume of tone that distinguishes his playing, and to render with equal perfection all the varied effects of the most sublime compositions of the immortal masters, as, on the other hand, nothing can be more exquisite than the melodious discourse of Sivori's bow, appealing in turn to every fibre of the listener's soul, rendering every emotion, and calling up with electric vividness all the images, the souvenirs, the aspirations it may be the magician's pleasure to evoke.

Madame Szarvody (Wilhelmina Clauss) is also here—in the quality of the tone she draws from the piano, and in her passionate and poetic mastery of that instrument, almost as splendidly apart from other pianists as are the two great artists just referred to from the other votaries of the violin. As for the operas, theatres, circuses, and other places of amusement more or less artistic, they are crammed night after night, those most in favor being unable to find accommodations for the crowds that apply for admission, and all of them making profits to an extent absolutely without parallel in their annals. Among other candidates for the contents of the public pocket, attracted hither by the great gathering of the present summer, is a conjuror of unknown origin who claims to be Chinese, and who, admitted a few days ago to give a specimen of his cunning to a select score or so of the members of the International Club, seems to have left those gentlemen in a state of doubt as to whether they had not become in watching his performances the victims of some sort of hallucination. Among other inexplicable feats performed by this new rival of the Boscos and Andersons was his apparent swallowing of eggs, glass balls, etc., which objects he presently drew forth seemingly from his mouth, one after the other, and this in a parlor, with no table or other screen before him, after which he seemed to plunge a large sword down his throat until only half of the weapon was visible, placed an iron ring weighing several pounds round the hilt, thus, as it were, forcing the sword down into his body until only ring and hilt remained in sight, took off the ring, fixed to the hilt a pistol furnished with a hollow appendage for receiving it, fired off the pistol, and drew forth the sword, as all the spectators would swear, were not the thing impossible, from his throat

One of the favorite attractions here is the new "boxing exhibition" which takes place daily at the Jardin Mabille, where the champions of the French ring, Roberts, Pons, Jacob, Merigrac, Gras, Hamel, and Staat, show off their "play" in the midst of an admiring crowd. The fact of such a spectacle being not only tolerated but enthusiastically patronized by the Parisians, who have hitherto been so loud in their denunciations of prize-fighting as a peculiarly English vice, is rather startling, especially as we are now informed that the South of France—whence all these heroes hail—is the conservator of the "pure traditions of gladiatorial art," and that the wrestlers of the Jardin Mabille are the lineal descendants and exact imitators of the athletes of the Coliseum. Such is the acceptance which has greeted these votaries of classic "sport" that it is gravely proposed to challenge the rest of the world to a grand international wrestling match.

The admirers of the Polish patriot, poet, and philosopher, Adam Mickiewicz, driven from his chair of literature in the College of Kowno for having joined the Society of the Philarèthes, which incurred the suspicion of the Russian Government, have just inaugurated a monument to his memory in the cemetery of Montmorency, where the Polish colony of Paris are accustomed to bury their dead. Prince Galitzin having obtained his recall from exile, attached him to his household; but his chivalric poem of Konrad Walenrod, published in 1828, having largely contributed to the Polish rising of 1830, the fiery poet established himself in Paris, where he published his terrible patriotic poems called "Old Men" and "Book of the Pilgrims," which paint with such harrowing fidelity the sufferings of his unhappy nation, and a brilliant picture of life in Poland, published in the Revue des Deux Mondes, under the title of Monsieur Thadée. Appointed in 1840 to the chair of Slavonic literature in the Collége de France, Mickiewicz, unable to repress the ardor of his national and republican convictions, gradually transformed his professorial chair into a political tribune, and thus drew upon himself the displeasure of the French Government, which deprived him of his post, which was given to Michelet, while Mickiewicz was consoled for his deposition by being made librarian of the Arsenal. In 1855, the French Government having sent him on a scientific mission to the East, he was seized with cholera in Constantinople and brought back to Paris a corpse. The Poles regard the great poet and savant as one of their noblest martyrs, and the inauguration of the monument to his memory was the occasion of a general gathering of the colony here resident. In curious contrast with such a life is that of the Baron James, head of the great house of Rothschild, who has just given a déjeûner of more than royal splendor to the King and Queen of the Belgians, at his château of Ferrières, which is not only one of the most magnificent residences of Europe, but is filled with art-treasures scarcely equalled even by the richest state collections, and contains, among other costly gatherings, a pheasantry not to be matched on this planet, and for which the old money-king has just purchased, for the pretty little sum of 2,750 frs., a peacock-pheasant, a bird so rare that only one other—the female in the Zoölogical Garden at Antwerp—has ever been imported into Europe.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:

"Whatever may be the interest of Mr. Parkman's previous narratives, it is certain that this touching story of the Jesuit missions in Canada is no less dramatic and instructive."—The Nation.

"A singularly interesting history; even more attractive than 'The Pioneers of France in the New World.'"—N. Y. Evening Post.

"A rare addition to historical literature."—N. Y. Gazette.

"The graphic style and descriptive power of the author here illustrate a theme which is itself attractive in no ordinary degree."—N. Y. Observer.

"The story is wonderfully well told, and the author's style is rich and elegant. We have the hard facts of history informed by the genius of a competent and conscientious writer."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

"A book to give even the most blasé story-reader a fresh sensation."—Home Journal, N. Y.

"The research implied in every glowing chapter of Mr. Parkman's volume would have been sufficient to give him a deserved reputation, even if its result had been stated in sterile sentences. But we have here not merely the facts, but the life and significance of the facts; a realizing imagination which vitalizes every name of a person into the real human being, and every record of an incident into the image of an event."—Boston Transcript.
